On her brother's death, in 1822, she returned to Hanover, which she never again quitted, passing the last twenty-six years of her life in repose—enjoying the society and cherished by the regard of her remaining relatives and friends—gratified by the occasional visits of eminent astronomers—and honoured with many marks of favour and distinction on the part of the king of Hanover, the crown prince, and his amiable and illustrious consort.

To within a very short period of her death her health continued uninterrupted, her faculties perfect, and her memory (especially of the scenes and circumstances of former days) remarkably clear and distinct. Her end was tranquil and free from suffering—a simple cessation of life.

The writer of this very interesting memoir has, however, omitted to state, that besides being an Honorary Member of the Royal Astronomical Society, Miss Herschel was also similarly honoured by the Royal Irish Academy.

The accompanying portrait is copied, by permission, from a picture in the possession of Sir John Herschel, believed to be the only portrait of any authenticity. It very strongly recalls Miss Herschel's air and appearance in 1829, when the picture was painted; i. e., when the lady was in her 80th year.

We add the following just and eloquent tribute to the merits of Miss Herschel, from Dr. Nichol's "Views of the Architecture of the Heavens:"—

"The astronomer, (Sir William Herschel,) during these engrossing nights, was constantly assisted in his labours by a devoted maiden sister, who braved with him the inclemency of the weather—who heroically shared his privations that she might participate in his delights—whose pen, we are told, committed to paper his notes of observations as they issued from his lips. 'She it was,' says the best of authorities, 'who, having passed the nights near the telescope, took the rough manuscripts to her cottage at the dawn of day, and produced a fair copy of the night's work on the ensuing morning; she it was who planned the labour of each succeeding night, who reduced every observation, made every calculation, and kept everything in systematic order;' she it was—Miss Caroline Herschel—who helped our astronomer to gather an imperishable name. This venerable lady has in one respect been more fortunate than her brother; she has lived to reap the full harvest of their joint glory. Some years ago, the gold medal of our Astronomical Society was transmitted to her to her native Hanover, whither she removed after Sir William's death; and the same learned Society has recently inscribed her name upon its roll: but she has been rewarded by yet more, by what she will value beyond all earthly pleasures; she has lived to see her favourite nephew, him who grew up under her eye unto an astronomer, gather around him the highest hopes of scientific Europe, and prove himself fully equal to tread in the footsteps of his father."

In 1847, she celebrated the ninety-seventh anniversary of her birth, when the king of Hanover sent to compliment her; the Prince and Princess Royal visited her; and the latter presented her with a magnificent arm-chair embroidered by herself; and the king of Prussia sent her the gold medal awarded for the Extension of the Sciences.

Miss Herschel died at the opening of the following year, January 9th, 1848, crowned with the glory which woman's genius may gain, working in the way Divine Providence appointed her,—as the helper of man.

HEYWOOD, ELIZA,

A most voluminous female writer, was the daughter of a tradesman in London, in 1693. Nothing is known of her early education, but only of her works. She wrote "The Court of Armenia," "The New Utopia," and other similar romances. The looseness of these works was the ostensible reason of Pope for putting her into his Dunciad; but it is more probable that some private provocation was the real motive. She seemed to perceive her error; and, in the numerous volumes she published afterwards, she preserved more purity and delicacy of sentiment. Her later writings are, "The Female Spectator," in four volumes, "Epistles for the Ladies," "Fortunate Foundling," "Adventures of Nature," "History of Betsey Thoughtless," "Jenny and Jemmy Jessamy," "Invisible Spy," "Husband and Wife," and a pamphlet, entitled, "A Present for a Servant Maid." She also wrote dramatic pieces, but none that succeeded. She died in 1756, aged sixty-three.

HOFLAND, BARBARA,

WAS born at Sheffield, in 1770. Her father, Mr. Robert Wreaks, was an extensive manufacturer, in Sheffield. In 1796, Miss Wreaks married Mr. T. Bradshaw Hoole, a young man connected with a large mercantile house in Sheffield; but he died in two years after their marriage, leaving her with an infant son only four months old; and soon after, she lost the greater part of her property. Mrs. Hoole, in 1805, published a volume of poems, with the proceeds of which she established herself in a small school, at Harrogate, where she continued to write, but principally in prose. In 1808, Mrs. Hoole married Mr. Thomas C. Hoffland, a landscape-painter, and went with him to London. She still pursued her writing with great zeal, and in 1812 published five works. In 1833 she lost her son by Mr. Hoole; and her husband died in 1843. She had continued to write till this time, but her health now failed, and she expired the following year, 1844, aged seventy-four. Her principal works are, "The Clergyman's Widow," "The Daughter-in-Law," "Emily," "The Son of a Genius," "Beatrice," "Says she to her Neighbour, What?" "Captives in India," "The Unloved One," "Daniel Dennison," &c. &c. All her productions are moral and instructive; she was earnest in her purpose of doing good. And she has done much service to the cause of improvement, though her works are not of that high order of genius which keeps its place in the heart of humanity, because its productions mirror life and not manners.

HOHENHAUSER, PHILIPPINE AMALIE ELISE VON,

BORN 1790, daughter of the Westphalian General von Ochs, was married, in 1810, to Leopold, Baron von Hohenhauser. In 1816, she wrote her first work, "Spring Flowers;" in 1819, she published "Minden and its Vicinity;" in 1820, "Nature, Art, and Life," and "Recollections of Travels;" and afterwards several other novels and tales, and a translation of Byron's Corsair. In 1833, she lost a promising son, who was then a student at the university of Bonn. A peculiar monomania induced him to commit suicide. This unhappy event caused his parents to write a work entitled "Charles von H—," in which much wise counsel is given to parents, guardians, and instructors.

HOHENHEIM, FRANCISCA, COUNTESS VON,

BORN in 1748, at Adelmansfelden, daughter of the lord of Bernardin. She married, when quite a child, the old and disagreeable lord of Laubrum. She became afterwards acquainted with Charles Eugene, duke of Wurtemberg, who fell violently in love with her, and persuaded her to elope with him. She was afterwards divorced from her first husband, and married to the duke in Morganatic marriage. She became a blessing to the duchy of Wurtemberg, by the happy influence she exercised over her otherwise harsh and cruel husband. She was the foundress of numerous charitable institutions. When her husband died, she withdrew to Kirchheim, where she died, in 1811.

HOOPER, LUCY,

WAS born in Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1816. When she was about fifteen, the death of her father caused the removal of the family to Brooklyn, Long Island. Soon after her arrival in that city she began to write and publish poems, under the initials of L. H. In 1840, she published an "Essay on Domestic Happiness," and a work entitled "Scenes from Real Life." She was engaged in preparing a work entitled "The Poetry of Flowers," during the time of her last sickness: the book was published after her decease, which occurred in August, 1841. The following year one of her friends collected and arranged the "Literary Remains of Miss Hooper," which were published, with an affectionate tribute to her genius and the excellence of her private life. Another biographer remarks: "There have been in our literary history few more interesting characters than Lucy Hooper. She died at an early age, but not until her acquaintances had seen developed in her a nature that was all truth and gentleness, nor until the world had recognised in her writings the signs of a rare and delicate genius, that wrought in modesty, but in repose, in the garden of the affections and in the light of religion."

The following will serve as specimens of her style of thought and poesy:

THE OLD DAYS WE REMEMBER.

The old days we remember,
How softly did they glide,
While all untouched by worldly care
We wandered side by side!
In those pleasant days, when the sun's last rays
Just lingered on the hill,
Or the moon's pale light with the coming night
Shone o'er our pathway still.

The old days we remember—
 Oh! there's nothing like them now,
 The glow has faded from our hearts,
 The blossom from the bough;
 In the chill of care, 'midst worldly air,
 Perchance we are colder grown,
 For stormy weather, since we roamed together,
 The hearts of both have known.

The old days we remember—
 Oh! clearer shone the sun,
 And every star looked brighter far
 Than they ever since have done!
 On the very streams there lingered gleams
 Of light ne'er seen before,
 And the running brook a music took
 Our souls can hear no more.

The old days we remember—
 Oh! could we but go back
 To their quiet hours, and tread once more
 Their bright, familiar track—
 How we picture again what we pictured then
 Of the sunny world that lay
 From the green hillside, and the waters wide,
 And our glad hearts far away!

The old days we remember,
 When we never dreamed of guile,
 Nor knew that the heart could be cold below,
 While the lip still wore its smile!
 Oh, we may not forget, for those hours come yet;
 They visit us in sleep,
 While far and wide, o'er life's changing tide,
 Our barks asunder keep.

Still, still we must remember
 Life's first and brightest days,
 And a passing tribute render
 As we tread the busy maze;
 A bitter sigh for the hours gone by,
 The dreams that might not last,
 The friends deemed true when our hopes were new,
 And the glorious visions past!

"TIME, FAITH, ENERGY."*

High words and hopeful!—fold them to thy heart.
 Time, Faith, and Energy, are gifts sublime;
 If thy lone bark the threatening waves surround,
 Make them of all thy silent thoughts a part.
 When thou wouldst cast thy pilgrim staff away,
 Breathe to thy soul their high, mysterious sound,
 And faint not in the noontide of thy day:
 Wait thou for Time!

Wait thou for Time: the slow-unfolding flower
 Chides man's impatient haste with long delay:
 The harvest ripening in the autumnal sun;
 The golden fruit of Suffering's weighty power
 Within the soul—like soft bells' silvery chime
 Repeat the tones, if fame may not be won,
 Or if the heart where thou shouldst find a shrine,
 Breathe forth no blessing on thy lonely way—

Wait thou for Time: it hath a sorcerer's power
 To dim life's mockeries that gayly shine,
 To lift the veil of seeming from the real,
 Bring to thy soul a rich or fearful dower,
 Write golden tracery on the sands of life,
 And raise the drooping heart from scenes ideal
 To a high purpose in the world of strife:
 Wait thou for Time!

Yea, wait for Time, but to thy heart take Faith,
 Soft beacon-light upon a stormy sea;
 A mantle for the pure in heart, to pass
 Through a dim world, untouched by living death,
 A cheerful watcher through the spirit's night,
 Soothing the grief from which she may not flee—
 Herald of glad news—a seraph bright,
 Pointing to sheltering heavens yet to be.

by a passage in Bulwer's Night and Morning.

Yea, Faith and Time—and thou that through the hour
 Of the lone night hast nerved the feeble hand,
 Kindled the weary heart with sudden fire,
 Gifted the drooping soul with living power,
 Immortal Energy! shalt thou not be
 While the old tales our wayward thoughts inspire
 Linked with each vision of high destiny,
 Till on the fadeless borders of that land

Where all is known we find our certain way,
 And lose ye, 'mid its pure, effulgent light?
 Kind ministers, who cheered us in our gloom,
 Seraphs who lightened griefs with guiding ray,
 Whispering through tears of cloudless glory dawning—
 Say, in the gardens of eternal bloom
 Will not our hearts, when breaks the cloudless morning,
 Joy that ye led us through the drooping night?

HOPTON, SUSANNA,

A LADY of Staffordshire, England, who became a Roman Catholic, but afterwards returned to the Protestant faith, and died at Hereford, in 1709, aged eighty-two. She married Richard Hopton, one of the Welsh judges. She wrote "Daily Devotions," "Hexameron, or Meditations on the Six Days of the Creation," and also corrected the devotions in the ancient way of offices, published by her friend Dr. Hickeys. She was a very charitable woman, and was noted for her excessive severity in performing her religious duties.

HORTENSE DE BEAUHARNOIS BONAPARTE,
 EX-QUEEN OF HOLLAND,

WAS born in 1783, daughter of the vicomte Alexandre de Beauharnois and Josephine, subsequently empress of France. The vicomte married at an early age; his dissipated habits and unjustifiable conduct obliged his wife to separate herself from him for a time; during this period, the education and charge of her children devolved solely upon her. A reconciliation took place, and the married pair seem to have afterwards lived in the utmost domestic peace and happiness.

Upon the breaking out of the Revolution, the vicomte rendered himself obnoxious to the existing powers, and after undergoing a sad imprisonment, was executed by the guillotine, July 24th, 1794. The childish days of Hortense were thus clouded by severe afflictions. It would be superfluous to detail the well-known circumstances of Josephine's marriage with General Bonaparte, who, in his rapid elevation to the imperial throne, bore with him to the highest worldly splendours the family de Beauharnois. Hortense received a brilliant education; and, both from her charms and position in life, was one of the most admired women in Paris. Her marriage was not one of her choice; Napoleon obliged her to give her hand to his brother Louis. This match took place on the 4th of January, 1802; and never was a wedding more gloomy! Louis was an honourable, an amiable, a cultivated man; Hortense, one of the most fascinating women; yet both were averse to the union. Neither could estimate the merits of the other.

In 1806, Louis Bonaparte was made king of Holland by Napoleon; but Louis cared little for the show and state of royalty, and after a few years of discontent, having abdicated his nominal sovereignty in favour of his son, he appointed his wife Hortense regent. She had left him, and gone to Paris to enjoy the pleasures of the court circle. Their son, Napoleon Charles, was particularly loved by Napoleon, who created him grand-duke of Berg, and had even spoken of adopting him as heir of the empire. The death of this promising boy, was a great blow to Hortense. After Holland was incorporated with France, Hortense was obliged to relinquish the title of queen, and was usually styled countess of St. Leu; yet she was recognised as the ex-queen of Holland by many of the French writers of that time. Hortense bore her reverses better than her exaltation; she was an affectionate mother, and a devoted daughter; for many of the errors she committed, her position, and the peculiar circumstances in which she was placed, are a palliation, if not an excuse.

Without poetic genius to rank among authors, Hortense had a very pretty talent for making occasional poems for society. Her romances, for which she also composed the music, have been published in a collected form; some of these obtained great popularity. She died in 1847.

HOUDETOT, SOPHIE DE LA BRICHE, COUNTESS D',

Was born at Paris, in 1730. Her father was an officer of the government; and she married the count d'Houdetot in 1748. This lady was the friend of St. Lambert, and was highly esteemed by Rousseau and Marmontel.

The power by which Madame d'Houdetot captivated the gay, handsome, dissipated St. Lambert, or kindled the imagination of Rousseau, was not that of beauty. Her face was plain, and slightly marked with the small-pox; her eyes were not good; she was extremely short-sighted, which made her often appear ungraceful; she was small in person, and, but for her warm kindness of heart and cheerful sunshine of spirit, would have been quite overlooked in the world. To her singular power of charming, Madame d'Houdetot added talents of no common order, though never much cultivated. She was a musician, a poet, a wit; but every thing "par la grâce de Dieu." However, all these gifts, and her benevolence of her nature, will not make amends for her bad morals. Like Dr. Donne's servant, who was perfect, except for one thing—he was a thief. She died in 1813, aged eighty-three. Her poems were only published as fugitive pieces; the following is characteristic of her mode of writing:—

IMITATION DE MAROT.

Jeune, j'aimai; ce temps de mon bel âge,
Ce temps si court, l'amour seul le remplit.
Quand j'atteignis la saison d'être sage,
Encor j'aimai, la raison me le dit.
Me voici vieille, et le plaisir s'envole;
Mais le bonheur ne me quitte aujourd'hui,
Car j'aime encore, et l'anjour me console:
Rien n'aurait pu me consoler de lui.

HOWARD, ANNE, VISCOUNTESS IRWIN,

Was daughter of the earl of Carlisle, and married first the viscount Irwin, and afterwards Colonel Douglas. She was a poetess, and wrote in a very spirited style. She died in 1760. The best known of her poems is the one in reply to Pope's sarcastic reflections on the sex, in his "Characters of Women." Duncomb, in his "Feminead," praises this poem. We will give an extract from her witty "Reply," &c.:

—View a fair nymph, blessed with superior charms,
Whose tempting form the coldest bosom warms;
No eastern monarch more despotic reigns
Than this fair tyrant of the Cyprian plains
Whether a crown or bauble we desire,
Whether to learning or to dress aspire,
Whether we wait with joy the trumpet's call,
Or wish to shine the fairest at a ball;
In either sex the appetite's the same,
For love of power is still the love of fame.
—Women must in a narrow orbit move,
But power alike both males and females love.
What makes the difference then, you may inquire,
Between the hero and the rural squire?
Between the maid bred up with courtly care,
Or she who earns by toil her daily fare?
Their power is stinted, but not so their will.
Ambitious thoughts the humblest cottage fill,
Far as they can they push their little fame,
And try to leave behind a deathless name.
In education all the difference lies:
Woman, if taught, would be as learned and wise
As haughty man, inspired by arts and rules;
Where God makes one, nature makes many fools,
And though nugatixes are daily found,
Flattering nugatixes equally abound.
Such heads are toy-shops filled with trifling ware
And can each folly with each female share.
A female mind like a rude fallow lies,
No seeds are sown, but weeds spontaneous rise.
As well might we expect in winter spring,
As land untill'd a fruitful crop should bring.
As well we might expect Peruvian ore
We should possess, yet dig not for the store.
Culture improves all fruits, all sorts we find,
Wit, judgment, sense, fruits of the human mind.

HOWARD, CATHARINE,

FIFTH wife of Henry VIII. of England, was daughter of Lord Edmund Howard and Joyce, his wife. This marriage proved prejudicial to the Reformation, as Catharine was no friend to the Protestants. She gained such an ascendancy over the king, that he gave public thanks to God for the happiness he enjoyed with her. But the next day, archbishop Cranmer came to him with information that the queen was unfaithful to him. Henry would not at first believe this; and on Catharine's guilt being clearly proved, he wept. She was tried, found guilty, and executed on Tower-hill, in 1542, about seventeen months after her marriage. Catharine acknowledged that she was not innocent at the time of her marriage, having been seduced by a retainer of her aunt's, the duchess of Northumberland, who had taken charge of her at her parents' death, when she was only fourteen; but persisted in asserting her fidelity to the king since their marriage. She was young and beautiful at the time of her death

HUBER, MARY,

A VOLUMINOUS author, was born at Geneva, in 1710. The manner of her education is not particularly known. Her principal works are, "Le monde fou, préféré au monde sage;" "Le Système des Théologians Anciens et Modernes, sur l'état des âmes séparées des corps;" "Suite du même."

ouvrage, servant de réponse à M. Ruchat;" "Reduction du Spectateur Anglais." This was an abridgment of the Spectator, but did not succeed. "Lettres sur la Religions essentielle à l'homme." Mary Huber was a Protestant, and this latter work in particular was attacked by the divines of the Roman Catholic communion. She had wit and knowledge, but was sometimes coarse in her expressions. She died at Lyons, in France, in 1753.

HUBER, THERESA,

DAUGHTER of the celebrated philologist Heyne, was married to Louis Ferdinand Huber, son of Michael Huber, professor at Leipsic. She was born in 1764, at Göttingen, and was a popular German novelist. During her husband's life, she published several novels under his name. She also edited for some time the Morgenblatt. She died a few years since.

HUNTER, ANNE,

WIFE of John Hunter, the celebrated surgeon, was a sister of Sir Everard Home. She was born in 1742, and was remarkable for her literary attainments. Intimately connected with Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, Mrs. Delany, &c., Mrs. Hunter was a member of the learned coterie of ladies who composed that celebrated society. She excelled in lyric poetry. Several of her songs were set to music by Haydn, and greatly admired. Her productions were collected and published in one volume, previous to her decease. She died in 1821, much lamented, for her virtues as well as her talents had greatly endeared her to her friends. We add specimens of her poetry.

SONG.

O tuneful voice! I still deplore
Those accents which, though heard no more,
Still vibrate on my heart;
In echo's cave I long to dwell,
And still would hear the sad farewell,
When we were doomed to part.

Bright eyes, O that the task were mine
To guard the liquid fires that shine,
And round your orbits play;
To watch them with a vestal's care,
And feed with smiles a light so fair,
That it may ne'er decay!

INDIAN DEATH SONG.

The sun sets in night, and the stars shun the day,
But glory remains when their lights fade away.
Begin, you tormentors! your threats are in vain,
For the son of Alknomook will never complain.

Remember the arrows he shot from his bow,
Remember your chiefs by his hatchet laid low.
Why so slow? Do you wait till I shrink from the pain?
No; the son of Alknomook shall never complain.

Remember the wood where in ambush we lay,
And the scalps which we bore from your nation away.
Now the flame rises fast; you exult in my pain;
But the son of Alknomook can never complain.

I go to the land where my father is gone,
His ghost shall rejoice in the fame of his son;
Death comes, like a friend, to relieve me from pain;
And thy son, O Alknomook! has scorned to complain.

THE LOT OF THOUSANDS.

When hope lies dead within the heart,
By secret sorrow close concealed,
We shrink lest looks or words impart
What must not be revealed.

'Tis hard to smile when one would weep:
To speak when one would silent be;
To wake when one would wish to sleep,
And wake to agony.

Ye such the lot by thousands cast
Who wander in this world of care,
And bend beneath the bitter blast
To save them from despair

But Nature waits her guests to greet,
Where disappointment cannot come
And time guides with unerring feet
The weary wanderers home.

HUNTINGDON, SELINA, COUNTESS OF,

Was born in 1707. She was one of three daughters and co-heirs of Washington Shirley, earl Ferrers; the other two being Lady Kilmorey and Lady Elizabeth Nightingale. Selina, the second daughter, married, in 1728, Theophilus Hastings, earl of Huntingdon, with whom she lived very happily till his sudden death, in October, 1746. She had several children, four of whom died young.

Probably these heavy afflictions disposed this lady to take such deep interest in religion. It was at the time when the founders of Methodism, Wesley and Whitfield, were exciting in England a spirit of more intense devotion than was generally prevalent, and the Countess of Huntingdon embraced their doctrines with her whole heart.

She rather inclined to Whitfield's peculiar doctrines than to Wesley's; but she chose to be herself the founder of a sect, which were called "The Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion." She had the control of a large income during her forty-five years of widowhood, and as her own personal expenses were small, and she was assisted by other opulent persons, she supported a college at Trevecca, in Wales, for the education of ministers, and built sixty-four chapels, the ministers of which she assisted to support. Her largest chapel was at Bath, which she frequently attended. She created a trust for the support of her college and chapels after her death. And not only did she thus merit the title of public benefactor, but she also expended, annually, large sums in private charities. She lived for others, and at her death, which took place June 17th, 1791, was deeply mourned by all who knew her; even those who regarded her conduct as the result of mistaken enthusiasm, respected her for the noble virtues of her character and her Christian conduct.

HUTCHINSON, ANNE,

A WOMAN who caused much difficulty in New England soon after its settlement, came from Lincolnshire to Boston in 1635, and was the wife of one of the representatives of Boston. The members of Mr. Cotton's church used to meet every week to repeat his sermons and discourse on doctrines. She established similar meetings for women, and soon had a numerous audience. She advocated sentiments of her own, and warped the discourses of her clergyman to coincide with them. She soon threw the whole colony into a flame. The progress of her sentiments occasioned, in 1637, the first synod in America. This convention of ministers condemned eighty-two erroneous opinions then propagated in the country. Mrs. Hutchinson was called before the court in November, 1637; and, being convicted of traducing the ministers and advancing errors, was banished from Massachusetts. She went with her husband to Rhode Island; and in 1742, after her husband's death, removed into the Dutch colony beyond New Haven, where she, with most of her family, consisting of sixteen persons, were captured, and all, except one daughter, killed by the Indians. This occurred in 1643.

HUTCHINSON, LUCY,

DAUGHTER of Sir Allan Aspley, was born in 1624. At the age of eighteen she was married to Colonel John Hutchinson, who distinguished himself as one of the most efficient among the Puritan leaders in the war between Charles I. and the Parliament. Their courtship was a very romantic one, as it is given by the lady in her "Memoir" of her husband. She says—"Never was there a passion more ardent and less idolatrous; he loved her better than his life; with inexpressible tenderness and kindness; had a most high, obliging esteem of her; yet still considered honour, religion and duty, above her; nor ever suffered the intrusion of such a dotage as should blind him from marking her imperfections." That it was "not her face he loved," but "her honour and her virtue were his mistresses," he abundantly proved; for, "on the day fixed for the marriage, when the friends of both parties were assembled, and all were waiting the appearance of the bride, she was suddenly seized with an illness, at that time often the most fatal to life and beauty. She was taken ill of small-pox; was for some time in imminent danger; and, at last, when her recovery was assured, the return of her personal attractions was considered more than doubtful. She says, indeed, herself, that her illness made her, for a long time after she had regained her health, "the most deformed person that could be seen." But Mr. Hutchinson's affection was as strong as his honour. He neither doubted nor delayed to prosecute his suit; but, thankful to God for her preservation, he claimed her hand as soon as she was able to quit her chamber; and when the clergyman who performed the service, and the friends who witnessed it, were afraid to look at the wreck of her beauty. He was rewarded; for her features were restored, unblemished as before; and her form, when he presented her as his wife, justified his taste as much as her more intrinsic qualities did his judgment. They were united to each other on the 3d of July, 1638.

Their union was an example of the happiness which marriage confers on those who fulfil its duties in holy truth and faithful love. In the perils of war Mrs. Hutchinson was an attendant on her beloved husband; and when, after the restoration of Charles II., Colonel Hutchinson was imprisoned in the Tower, she followed him, and never ceased her exertions and importunities till she was permitted to visit him. When her husband was removed to Sandown Castle in Kent, she, with some of her children, went also, and used every entreaty to be permitted to reside in the castle with him. This was refused; but she took lodgings in Deal, and walked every day to Sandown to see and cheer the prisoner. All that could be done to obtain his pardon or liberation, she did; but as Colonel Hutchinson was a Puritan and a republican on principle, and would not disclaim his opinions, though he would promise to live in quiet, his enemies listened to no pleadings for mercy. What was to have been his ultimate punishment will never be known; the damp and miserable apartment in which he was confined brought on an illness which ended his life, September 11th, 1664, leaving his wife with eight children and an embarrassed estate to mourn his irreparable loss. Mrs. Hutchinson was not with him at his death; she had gone to their home to obtain supplies and bring away the children left there. His death-scene shows the estimation in which he held her. So long as he was able to sit up, he read much in the Bible; and on looking over some notes on the Epistle to the Romans, he said, "When my wife returns, I will no more observe their cross humours; but when her children are all near, I will have her in the chamber with me, and they shall not pluck her out of my arms. During the winter evenings she shall collect together the observations I have made on this Epistle since I have been in prison."

As he grew worse, the doctor feared delirium, and advised his brother and daughter not to defer anything they wished to say to him. Being informed of his condition, he replied with much composure, "The will of the Lord be done; I am ready." He then gave directions concerning the disposal of his fortune, and left strict injunctions that his children should be guided in all things by their mother; "And tell her," said he, "that as she is above other women, so must she on this occasion show herself a good Christian, and above the pitch of ordinary minds."

Faithfully she fulfilled these injunctions; evincing her sorrow and her love, not by useless repinings, but by training up her children to be like their father, and employing her talents in constructing a monument to his fame. For this purpose she undertook her great work, "The Life of Colonel Hutchinson, by his widow Lucy." This has been republished lately, and the Edinburgh Review thus closes a notice of the work:

"Education is certainly far more generally diffused in our days, and accomplishments infinitely more common; but the perusal of this volume has taught us to doubt whether the better sort of women were not fashioned of old, by a purer and more exalted standard; and whether the most eminent female of the present day would not appear to disadvantage by the side of Mrs. Hutchinson. There is something in the domestic virtue and calm commanding mind of this English matron, that makes the Corinnes and Heloises appear very insignificant. We may safely venture to assert that a nation which produces many such wives and mothers as Mrs. Lucy Hutchinson, must be both great and happy."

We should do injustice to the worth of female genius if we omitted to give a few extracts from this work of Mrs. Hutchinson. An "Address to her Children" forms the introduction to the Memoir. Thus she writes:—

"I, who am under a command not to grieve at the common rate of desolate women, while I am studying which way to moderate my wo, and, if it were possible, to augment my love, can find out none more just to your dear father, or more consoling to myself, than the preservation of his memory; which I need not gild with such flattering commendations as the hired preachers equally give to the truly and the nominally honourable; an undrest narrative, speaking the simple truth of him, will deck him with more substantial glory than all the panegyrics the best pens could ever consecrate to the virtues of the best men. To number his virtues is to give the epitome of his life, which was nothing else but a progress from one degree of virtue to another. His example was more instructive than the best rules of the moralists; for his practice was of a more divine extraction, drawn from the Word of God, and wrought up by the assistance of his spirit. He had a noble method of government, whether in civil, military, or domestic administrations; which forced love and reverence even from unwilling subjects, and greatly endeared him to the souls of those who rejoiced to be governed by him. He had a native majesty that struck awe into the hearts of men, and a sweet greatness that commanded love."

* * * * *

His affection for his wife was such, that whoever would form rules of kindness, honour, and religion, to be practised in that state, need no more, but exactly draw out his example. Man never had a greater passion or a more honourable esteem for woman; yet he was not uxorious, and never remitted that just rule which it was her honour to obey; but he managed the reins of government with such prudence and affection, that she who would not delight in such honourable and advantageous subjection, must have wanted a reasonable soul. He governed by persuasion, which he never employed but in things profitable to herself. He loved her soul better than her countenance; yet even for her person he had a constant affection, exceeding the common temporary passion of fond fools. If he esteemed her at a higher rate than she deserved, he was himself the author of the virtue he doated on; for she was but a faithful mirror, reflecting truly, but dimly, his own glories upon him. When she ceased to be young and lovely, he showed her the most tenderness. He loved her at such a kind and generous rate as words cannot express; yet even this, which was the highest love any man could have, was bounded by a superior feeling; he regarded her, not as his idol, but as his fellow-creature in the Lord, and proved that such a feeling exceeds all the irregularities in the world."

Mrs. Hutchinson brought up her children and lived to see some of them married. The time of her decease is not known.

HYDE, ANNE, DUCHESS OF YORK,

THE eldest daughter of Lord Clarendon, and mother of two of the queens of Great Britain, was born in 1638. During the exile of the royal family she attended her father abroad, and was appointed maid of honour to the princess of Orange, the eldest sister of Charles II. Her intercourse with James, duke of York, then a young and gallant soldier, commenced when Miss Hyde was in her twenty-first year. She had accompanied the princess of Orange to Paris, on a visit to her mother, queen Henrietta, when James saw, and fell in love with her. They were betrothed at Breda, November 24th, 1659; but there were so many difficulties in obtaining the consent of the royal family to this alliance, that they were not married till September 3d, 1660. The ceremony was performed at Worcester-House, London. The duchess of York was a handsome and sensible woman, and lived in harmony with her husband, notwithstanding his open infidelities. Before her death she became a Roman Catholic. She died at St. James' palace, March 31st, 1671, in her thirty-fourth year.

I.

INCHBALD, ELIZABETH,

A DRAMATIST and novelist, whose maiden name was Simpson, was born in 1756, at Stanningfield, near Bury, in Suffolk. The beauty of Elizabeth Simpson was much celebrated in the circle of her acquaintance, and she appears to have been noticed by those of a higher rank than her own circle; but an imperfection in her organs of utterance rendered her averse to society, and she would, in early youth, fly to solitude, and seek, in books, for the amusement she could not enjoy in conversation. The kind of education she received may be gathered from an observation of her own: "It is astonishing how much all girls are inclined to literature, to what boys are. My brother went to school seven years, and could not spell; I, and my two sisters, though we were never taught, could spell from our infancy."

To cure the impediment in her speech she exerted the most persevering efforts, and by repeated trials discovered the way of palliating her defects. She says that she wrote out all the words with which she had any difficulty, carried them constantly about with her, and at last perceived, or fancied she perceived, that stage declamation was favourable to this defect, rather than the reverse.

When sixteen she secretly left her family, prompted by an irrepressible desire to visit London. After escaping many dangers in this rash adventure, she married Mr. Inchbald, of Drury Lane theatre, and was for several years on the stage. Mr. Inchbald died suddenly, in 1779, and left his widow, at twenty-five years of age, entirely dependent on herself for support. She continued on the stage for a time, but left it in 1789, and from that time devoted herself solely to her literary labours. She wrote nineteen dramas, some of which were very successful, and two novels, "The Simple Story," and "Nature and Art," which rank among the standard works in that class of literature; and she edited "The British Theatre," "The Modern Theatre," and a collection of farces. Mrs. Inchbald died August 1st, 1821, aged sixty-seven.

The following is the opinion of Miss Edgeworth respecting the "Simple Story," the most popular of Mrs. Inchbald's works: "I have just been reading, for the third, I believe for the fourth time, the 'Simple Story.' Its effect upon my feelings was as powerful as at the first reading; I never read any novel—I except none—I never read any novel that affected me so strongly, or that so completely possessed me with the belief in the real existence of all the persons it represents. I never once recollected the author whilst I was reading it; never said or thought, that's a fine sentiment—or, that is well expressed—or, that is well invented; I believed all to be real, and was affected as I should be by the real scenes, if they had passed before my eyes; it is truly and deeply pathetic."

Of her second novel, "Nature and Art," Mr. Chambers, in his "Cyclopædia of English Literature," remarks: "Its object may be gathered from the concluding maxim—'Let the poor no more be their own persecutors—no longer pay homage to wealth—instantaneously the whole idolatrous worship will cease—the idol will be broken.' Mrs. Inchbald illustrated this by her own practice; yet few of her readers can feel aught but mortification and disappointment at the denouement of the tale, wherein the pure and noble-minded Henry, after the rich promise of his youth and his intellectual culture, finally settles down with his father to 'cheerful labour in fishing, or the tending of a garden, the produce of which they carry to the next market-town?' The following brief allusion to the miseries of low London service reminds us of the vividness and stern pathos of Dickens:—"In romances, and in some plays, there are scenes of dark and unwholesome mines, wherein the labourer works during the brightest day by the aid of artificial light. There are, in London, kitchens equally dismal, though not quite so much exposed to damp and noxious vapours. In one of these under ground, hidden from the cheerful light of the sun, poor Agnes was doomed to toil from morning till night, subjected to the command of a dissatisfied mistress, who, not estimating as she ought the misery incurred by serving her, constantly threatened her servants with a dismissal, at which the unthinking wretches would tremble merely from the sound of the words; for to have reflected—to have considered what their purport was—to be released from a dungeon, relieved from continual upbraiding and vile drudgery, must have been a subject of rejoicing; and yet, because these good tidings were delivered as a menace, custom had made the hearer fearful of the consequence. So, death being described to children as a disaster, even poverty and shame will start from it with affright; whereas, had it been pictured with its benign aspect, it would have been feared but by few, and many, many would welcome it with gladness."

But better than any sentiment contained in her works of fiction are the noble generosity and true Christian self-denial she practised towards her poor, unfortunate sister, whom she supported for many years. The brief notices of her charitable deeds, gathered from letters and the records of her friends, are her best monument. One writer says: "Mrs. Inchbald frequently suffered from the want of fire herself, when it is known that she had enabled others to avail themselves of that necessary of life, and her donations to her sisters and other friends in distress were generous and munificent. To her sister, Mrs. Hunt, she eventually allowed nearly a hundred per annum. At the time when Mrs. Inchbald was her own servant, she writes, 'I have raised her allowance to eighty, but in the rapid strides of her wants, and my obligation as a Christian to make no selfish refusal to the poor, a few months hence, I foresee, must make the sum a hundred.' Again, in 1810, she says, 'I say no to all the vanities of the world, and perhaps soon shall have to say, that I shall allow my poor infirm sister a hundred a year.'

To the last, Mrs. Hunt depended on Mrs. Inchbald almost exclusively for support. The following expresses the sentiments of her feeling and affectionate heart, on the receipt of the intelligence that she had no longer a brother or sister in the world. 'To return to my melancholy. Many a time this winter, when I cried with cold, I said to myself—but, thank God, my sister has not to stir from her room: she has her fire lighted every morning; all her provisions bought, and brought to her ready cooked: she would be less able to bear what I bear; and how much more should I have to suffer, but from this reflection! It almost made me warm, when I reflected that she suffered no cold; and yet, perhaps, this severe weather affected her also, for after only two days of dangerous illness she died I have now buried my whole family.’”

Probably our readers would like to have a description of this excellent as well as eminent woman, who has shown an example of noble virtues under very adverse circumstances, and therefore is entitled to high estimation. Mrs. Inchbald was a strict Roman Catholic. One who knew her well thus describes her personal appearance: “‘The fair muse,’ as she was often termed, was, when between thirty and forty, above the middle size, rather tall, of a striking figure, but a little too erect and stiff. She was naturally fair, slightly freckled, and her hair was of a sandy auburn hue. Her face and features were beautiful, and her countenance was full of spirit and sweetness.” This description is from a decided admirer of hers, who winds it up with observing, that “her dress was always becoming, and very seldom worth so much as eight pence.”

INGLIS, ESTHER,

Is celebrated for her skill in calligraphy, or fine writing. In the beauty, exactness, and variety of her characters, she excelled all who preceded her. In the library of Christ-church in Oxford are the Psalms of David, written in French by Mrs. Inglis, who presented them in person to queen Elizabeth, by whom they were given to the library. Two manuscripts, written by Mrs. Inglis, were also preserved with care in the Bodleian library: one of them is entitled “Le six vingt et six Quatrains de Guy de Tour, sieur de Pybrac, escrits par Esther Inglis, pour son dernier adieu, ce 21 e jour de Juin, 1617.” The following address is, in the second leaf, written in capital letters: “To the right worshipful my very singular friende, Joseph Hall, doctor of divinity, and dean of Winchester, Esther Inglis wisheth all increase of true happiness. Junii xxi. 1617.” In the third leaf is pasted the head of the writer, painted upon a card. The other manuscript is entitled “Les Proverbes de Salomon; escrites en diverses sortes de lettres, par Esther Anglois, en Françoisse. A Lislebourg en Escosse,” 1599. In the royal library, D. xvi. are “Esther Inglis’s fifty Emblems,” finely drawn and written: A Lislebourg en Escosse, l’annee 1624.

Esther Inglis married, when she was about forty, a Scotchman, Bartholomew Kello, and had one son, who was a learned and honourable man. The time of her death is not known.

IRETON, BRIDGET,

ELDEST daughter of Oliver Cromwell, was baptized at St. John’s church, Huntingdon, on the 4th of August, 1624. She was a gloomy enthusiast, and such a bigoted republican, that she grudged her father his title of Protector. Nevertheless, she is spoken of as a person of great wisdom, “humbled and not exalted by her accession of greatness.” January 15th, 1647, she was married at Norton to the saintly Henry Ireton, Lord Deputy of Ireland; and after his death to Fleetwood, who was appointed to the same high post. She seems to have cherished as much admiration for her first husband as she entertained contempt for her second. To Fleetwood, however, her strong sense, and advice, were of the greatest assistance. She died at Stoke Newington, where she was buried, September 5th, 1681.

ISABELLA, QUEEN OF HUNGARY,

SISTER of Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, married, in 1539, John Zapolita, king of Hungary. In 1540, she brought him a son, while her husband was besieging the castle of Fogarras; and he was so transported at the news that he gave a splendid feast to his soldiers, and died of intemperance on the occasion. Isabella, unable to retain the crown for her son, implored aid from the Ottoman Porte, the armies of which, entering Hungary, vanquished the troops of Ferdinand of Austria, employed in the siege of Buda. Solymán, who headed his troops in person, sent magnificent presents to the young king, whom he entreated he might be allowed to see. He excused himself, at the same time, from visiting the queen, lest their interview might prove injurious to her fame. Isabella, while she acknowledged the kindness and delicacy of the sultan, hesitated whether to trust her son in the Ottoman camp. But, at length, impressed by the services which Solymán had rendered to her, and overcome by the remonstrances of her counsellors, she determined on a compliance with the request. The prince, in a superb cradle, on a carriage of state, accompanied by his nurse, with some noble matrons and lords of the court, was conveyed to the camp. He was received by Solymán, who tenderly caressed him, and presented him to his sons Bajazet and Selim, with every royal honour, as a vassal of the Ottoman Porte, and the son of John Zapolita, whom he had highly esteemed.

But these specious appearances proved but a cover to the insidious purposes of the sultan, who, throwing off the mask, seized upon Buda, September 5th, 1541, and obliged Isabella to retire to Lippha, with the poor consolation of a promise, that when her son became of age, Hungary should be restored to him. In this reverse of fortune, Isabella displayed great constancy, and endeavoured to content herself with the title of regent of Transylvania, which the rapacity of Solymán had left to her. But, having appointed as her coadjutor in the administration of the government, George Martinusias, a monk, she experienced from him a thousand mortifications, and found the title of regent but an empty honour. A rupture with Martinusias was the consequence; when, enraged at the loss of his authority, he called in the assistance of Ferdinand of Austria, who sent an army into Hungary, and compelled Isabella, in 1551, to resign Transylvania into his hands, and to retire to Cassovia. While on her journey to Cassovia, the ruggedness of the roads obliged her to descend from her carriage; when, looking back to Transylvania while the driver was extricating his wheels, and recollecting her former situation, she carved on a tree her name, with this sentence:—“SIC FATA VOLUNT”—“So Fate decrees.”

Her disposition was too restless and active to allow her to remain long at Cassovia. She went to Silesia, and thence to Poland, where her mother, Bonna Sforza, resided. In the hope of regaining her power, she continued to correspond with the grandses of Transylvania; and she also applied again to Solymán. In 1556, she was, by the efforts of the sultan, restored to Transylvania. She maintained her authority during the rest of her life, without imparting any share of it to her son, John Sigismund. She died September 5th, 1558.

Isabella was a warm Roman Catholic, and some of her regulations were directed with much severity against the heretics. She was a woman of great talents and learning. Her son, after her death, declared in favour of the Protestants.

J.

JARDINS, MARIE CATHARINE DES,

Was born about 1640, at Alençon, in Normandy, where her father was provost. She went when young to Paris, where she supported herself for some time by writing novels and dramas. She was three times married; first, to M. Villedieu, a young captain of the infantry, who was only separated, not divorced, from a former wife; after his death, to the marquis de la Chasse, who was also only parted from his wife; and, for the third time, to one of her cousins, who allowed her to resume the name of Villedieu. She soon after retired to a little village, called Clinchemare, in the province of Maine, where she died in 1683.

Her works were printed in 1702, and form ten duodecimo volumes. Her compositions consisted of dramas, miscellaneous poems, fables, and romances; among which latter class are "Les Disorders de l'Amour;" "Portraits des Faiblesses Humaines;" "Les Exiles de la Cour d'Auguste;" "Cleonice;" "Carmeute;" "Les Galanteries Grenadines;" "Les Amours des Grands Hommes;" "Les Memoirs du Serail;" &c.

Her style is rapid and animated; but she is often incorrect, and her incidents improbable. Her short stories certainly extinguished the taste for tedious romances, and led the way to the novel; but were by no means of such excellence as those that have since been written. Her verse is inferior to her prose. Her society was much sought by men of learning, wit, and fashion; and her conduct during her widowhood was by no means irreproachable. But good morals were not then the fashion in French society.

JEWSBURY, MARIA JANE.

We choose to retain the name by which this gifted woman was known as an authoress, although she had changed it before her decease; but we can never think of her as Mrs. Fletcher. Miss Jewsbury was born about 1800, in Warwickshire, England. In early youth she lost her mother, and was thenceforth called to take her place at the head of a large family. Her father, soon after her mother's death, removed to Manchester; and here, in the midst of a busy population, oppressed with ill health, and the grave cares of life, the promptings of genius still triumphed, and the young lady found time to dream dreams of literary distinction, which the energy of her mind, in a few years, converted into realities.

It was at this period that she addressed a letter to Wordsworth, full of the enthusiasm of an ardent imagination: this led to a correspondence with the bard of the Excursion, which soon ripened into permanent friendship. She was also materially assisted in the development of her talents, and the circulation of her first literary efforts, by the advice and active kindness of Mr. Alaric Watts, at that time a resident in Manchester: these obligations she always gratefully acknowledged.

Her first work was entitled "Phantasmagoria;" or, Essays of Life and Literature,"—which was well received by the public. This was followed by "Letters to the Young," written soon after a severe illness: then appeared "Lays for Leisure Hours." Her last work was her "Three Histories,"* which she allows displays much of her own character and feelings. But her best writings are to be found in the periodicals and annuals, to which she was a large and most popular contributor.

In 1833, she married Mr. Fletcher, a gentleman who held an office under the London East India Company—and soon after her marriage left England with her husband for Bombay. She anticipated with eager pleasure the riches of nature and antiquity, which the gorgeous East would open before her—but the buoyant and active spirit was soon to be called to another and higher existence. She died a short time after reaching India, and sleeps in that "clime of the sun," a fit resting-place for her warm and ardent heart.

As the best illustration of her character and genius which we can give, we subjoin some extracts from a private letter, which she wrote to a friend† a short time before she left England:—

"The passion for literary distinction consumed me from nine years old. I had no advantages—great obstacles—and now, when from disgust I cannot write a line to please myself, I look back with regret to the days when facility and audacity went hand in hand; I wish in vain for the simplicity which neither dreaded criticism nor knew fear. Intense labour has, in some measure, supplied the deficiency of early idleness and commonplace instruction; intercourse with those who were once distant and bright as the stars, has become a thing of course; I have not been unsuccessful in my own career. But the period of timidity and sadness is now come, and with my foot upon the threshold of a new life, and a new world—

'I would lay down like a tired child,
And weep away this life of wo.'

"Unfortunately, I was twenty-one before I became a reader, and I became a writer almost as soon: it is the ruin of all the young talent of the day, that reading and writing are simultaneous. We do not educate ourselves for literary enterprise. I would gladly burn almost everything I ever wrote, if so be I might start now with a mind that has seen, read, thought, and suffered somewhat, at least, approaching to a preparation. Alas, alas! we all sacrifice the palm-tree to obtain the temporary draught of wine! We slay the camel that would bear us through the desert, because we will not endure a momentary thirst.

"I have done nothing to live. The powers which I feel, and of which I have given promise, may mature—may stamp themselves in act; but the spirit of despondency is strong upon the future exile, and I fear they never will. In the language of Keats,

"I feel the long grass growing o'er my heart.

"In the best of everything I have done, you will find one leading idea—Death. All thoughts, all images, all contrast of thoughts and images, are derived from living much in the valley of that shadow. My poetry, except some half-dozen pieces, may be consigned to oblivion; but in all you would find the sober hue, which, to my mind's eye, blends equally with the golden glow of sunset, and the bright green of spring; and is seen equally in the 'temple of delight,' as is in the tomb of decay and separation. I am melancholy by nature, but cheerful on principle."

Such was the mind and heart of this noble woman. In conversation she was brilliant and eloquent; in the domestic circle she was a treasure that Solomon would have placed above "rubies." Active, judicious, and kind, she showed the strength of her understanding, as well as the correctness of her principles, by discharging her household duties with the same promptness and cheerfulness with which she pursued her literary career.

Her friendships are sufficient testimony of her genius and her goodness. Mr. Wordsworth, who was her warm friend, thus speaks of her with beautiful simplicity:—

"Her enthusiasm was ardent, her piety steadfast, and her great talents would have enabled her to be eminently useful in the path to which she had been called. The opinion she entertained of her own performances, given to the world under her maiden name, was modest and humble, indeed far below her merits, as is often the case with those who are making trial of their powers to discover what they are fit for. In one quality—quickness in the motions of her mind—she was, in the author's estimation, unrivalled."

In the "Three Histories," Miss Jewsbury has commemorated the friend of her heart's idolatry, Mrs. Hemans. The picture of "Egeria" was, avowedly, taken from this original; its exquisite beauty renders it a fitting selection to show the power of Miss Jewsbury's genius when brightened by a subject which warmed her heart as well as her imagination.

PICTURE OF MRS. HEMANS.

"Egeria was totally different from any other woman I had ever seen, either in Italy or England.

She did not dazzle, she subdued me; other women might be more commanding, more versatile, more acute, but I never saw any one so exquisitely feminine. . . . Her birth, her education, but, above all, the genius with which she was gifted, combined to inspire a passion for the ethereal, the tender, the imaginative, the heroic—in one word, the beautiful. It was in her a faculty divine, and yet of daily life—it touched all things, but, like a sunbeam, touched them with 'a golden finger.' Anything abstract or scientific was unintelligible and distasteful to her; her knowledge was extensive and various, but, true to the first principle of her nature, it was poetry that she sought in history, scenery, character, and religious belief—poetry that guided all her studies, governed all her thoughts, coloured all her imaginative conversation. Her nature was at once simple and profound; there was no room in her mind for philosophy, nor in her heart for ambition;—the one was filled by imagination, the other engrossed by tenderness. She had a passive temper, but decided tastes; any one might influence, but very few impressed her. Her strength and her weakness alike lay in her affections; these would sometimes make her weep, at others imbue her with courage; so that she was alternately 'a falcon-hearted dove,' and a 'reed broken with the wind.' Her voice was a sad, sweet melody, and her spirits reminded me of an old poet's description of the orange-tree, with its

'Golden lamps hid in a night of green; or of those Spanish gardens where the pomegranate grows beside the cypress. Her gladness was like a burst of sunlight; and if, in her depression, she resembled night, it was night bearing her stars. I might describe and describe for ever, but I should never succeed in portraying Egeria; she was a muse, a grace, a variable child, a dependent woman, the Italy of human beings."

THE WEEPER AT THE SEPULCHRE.

A sound in yonder glade,
But not of fount or breeze,
A sound—but of the whispering made
By the palm and the olive trees;
It is not the minstrel's lute,
Nor the swell of the night-bird's song,
Nor the city's hum, when all else is mute,
By echo borne along.

'Tis a voice—the Saviour's own—
"Woman, why weepest thou?"
She turns—and her grief is for ever frown,
And the shade that dimmed her brow;
He is there, her risen Lord,
No more to know decline;
He is there, with peace in his every word
The wept one—still divine.

"My father's throne to share,
As King, as God, I go,
But a brother's heart will be with me there
For my brethren left below!"
The Weeper is laid in dust,
Her Lord is throned on high,
But our's may be still that Weeper's trust,
And our's that Lord's reply.

Mourner — 'mid nature's boom,
 Dimming its light with tears,—
 And captive — to whom the lone dark room
 Grows darker yet with fears,—
 And spirit — that like a bird
 Rests not on sea or shore,—
 The voice in the olive-glade once heard,
 Hear ye — and weep no more!

BIRTH-DAY BALLAD.

Thou art plucking spring-roses, Genie,
 And a little red-rose art thou;
 Thou hast unfolded to-day, Genie,
 Another bright leaf, I trow;
 But the roses will live and die, Genie,
 Many and many a time,
 Ere thou hast unfolded quite, Genie —
 Grown into maiden prime.

Thou art looking now at the birds, Genie,
 But oh, do not wish their wing,
 That would only tempt the fowler, Genie,
 Stay thou on earth and sing;
 Stay in the nursing-nest, Genie,
 Be not soon thence beguiled,
 Thou wilt ne'er find a second, Genie;
 Never be twice a child.

Thou art building towers of pebbles, Genie —
 Pile them up brave and high;
 And leave them to follow a bee, Genie,
 As he wandereth singing by;
 But if thy towers fall down, Genie,
 And if the brown bee is lost,
 Never weep — for thou must learn, Genie,
 That soon life's schemes are crossed.

Thy hand is in a bright boy's, Genie,
 He calls thee his sweet wee wife;
 But let not thy little heart think, Genie,
 Childhood the prophet of life:
 It may be life's minstrel, Genie,
 And sing sweet songs and clear;
 But minstrel and prophet now, Genie,
 Are not united here.

What will thy future fate be, Genie?
 Alas! shall I live to see!
 For thou art scarce a sapling, Genie,
 And I am a moss-grown tree!
 I am shedding life's leaves fast, Genie,
 Thou art in blossom sweet;
 But think betimes of the grave, Genie,
 Where young and old oft meet.

SONG.

She's on my heart, she's in my thoughts,
 At midnight, morn and noon;
 December's snow beholds her there,
 And there the rose of June.

I never breathe her lovely name
 When wine and mirth go round;
 But oh, the gentle moonlight air
 Knows well the silver sound.

I care not if a thousand hear
 When other maids I praise;
 I would not have my brother by,
 When I upon her gaze.

The dews were from the lily gone,
 The gold has lost its shine,
 If any but my love herself
 Could hear me call her mine.

PASSING AWAY.

I asked the stars, in the pomp of night,
 Gilding its blackness with crowns of light,
 Bright with beauty, and girt with power,
 Whether eternity were not their dower;
 And dirge-like music stole from their spheres,
 Bearing this message to mortal ears:—

We have no light that hath not been given;
 We have no strength but shall soon be riven;
 We have no power wherein man may trust;
 Like him are we things of time and dust;
 And the legend we blazon with beam and ray,
 And the song of our silence, is— Passing away

"We shall fade in our beauty, the fair and bright,
 Like lamps that have served for a festal night;
 We shall fall from our spheres, the old and strong,
 Like rose-leaves swept by the breeze along;
 The worshipped as gods in the olden day,
 We shall be like a vain dream—" Passing away."

From the stars of heaven, and the flowers of earth,
 From the pageant of power, and the voice of mirth
 From the mists of morn on the mountain's brow
 From childhood's song, and affection's vow,—
 From all, save that o'er which soul bears sway,
 Breathes but one record—" Passing away."

"Passing away," sing the breeze and rill,
 As they sweep in their course by vale and hill;
 Through the varying scenes of each earthly clime,
 'Tis the lesson of nature, the voice of time;
 And man at last, like his fathers grey,
 Writes in his own dust—" Passing away."

JOHNSON, LADY ARABELLA,

WAS daughter of Thomas, earl of Lincoln. She married Mr. Isaac Johnson, who left his native land for New England, from religious motives. Lady Arabella cheerfully accompanied him, and they arrived at Salem, Massachusetts, in April, 1630. Her exalted character and gentleness gained her universal esteem; but she died the September after her arrival. Mr. Johnson survived her little more than a month. He is regarded as the founder of Boston; and though his time was brief, yet the good work he accomplished will never be forgotten by the people of New England. But dearer still is the memory of the Lady Arabella, whose example as a wife and a Christian is an ever-beaming light to her sex.

JOHNSON, ESTHER,

CELEBRATED as the Stella of Dean Swift, was born in 1684. Her father was the steward of Sir William Temple, who, at his death, left the daughter £1000, in consideration of her father's faithful services. At the death of Sir William, she was in her sixteenth year; and about two years afterwards, at Swift's invitation, she left England, accompanied by Mrs. Dingley, a lady fifteen years older, and whose whole fortune, though she was related to Sir William, was only an annuity of £27. Whether Swift desired the company of Miss Johnson as a friend, or intended to make her his wife, is uncertain; but they took every precaution to prevent scandal. When Swift was absent, Miss Johnson and her friend resided at the parsonage, but when he returned, they removed; nor were they ever known to meet but in the presence of a third person. During his visits to London, he wrote, every day, an account of what had occurred, to Stella, and always placed the greatest confidence in her.

In 1713, Swift, it is believed, was married to her, by Dr. Ashe, bishop of Clogher; but they continued to live in separate houses, and the marriage was never publicly acknowledged. This state of affairs is supposed to have preyed upon Stella's health so as to cause a decline. Dean Swift offered, when she was on her death-bed, to acknowledge her as his wife; but she replied, "It is too late!" She died in 1728, aged forty-three. She was a beautiful and intellectual woman. The whole story is more romantic than any romance of fiction; nor have the mysteries ever been satisfactorily explained.

JORDAN, DOROTHEA,

Was the daughter of Captain Bland, of a most respectable family in Ireland. Her father eloped with her mother, and they both went on the stage. Dorothea commenced her career as an actress in Dublin, but soon quitted that for Tate Wilkinson's York company. She then attracted the attention of the London managers, and was for a long time a great favourite on the English stage. Her forte was comedy. She was at one time the mistress of the duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., by whom she had several children. She died at St. Cloud, in France, in 1816, and was indebted to the kindness of a casual English traveller for a decent interment.

JOSEPHINE ROSE TASCHER DE LA PAGERIE,

EMPERESS of the French, queen of Italy, was born in Martinique, June 24th, 1763. At a very early age she came to Paris, and was married to the Viscount Beauharnais. By this marriage, which is represented as not having been a happy one, the marquis being attached to another at the time of his union with his wealthy bride—she became the mother of two children, Eugene and Hortense, afterwards so well known. In 1787 Madame Beauharnais returned to Martinique, to nurse her aged mother, but was soon driven away by the disturbances in that colony. During her absence the French Revolution had broken out, and on her return she found her husband actively engaged in public affairs. Although one of the first actors in the movement which was to regenerate France, Beauharnais fell a victim to the blood-thirsty fanaticism of the times. Cited before the bar of the Convention, he was condemned to death, and publicly beheaded on the 23d July, 1794. Josephine was imprisoned, where she remained until the death of Robespierre threw open the doors of the prisons.

Josephine is said to have preserved her serenity during her imprisonment, through her strong faith in a prediction which had been made her; an old negress in Martinique having foretold, under circumstances of a peculiarly imposing character, that she would one day become queen of France. However reasonably we may doubt the influence of such a circumstance on the mind of a woman condemned to death in such relentless times as these, there is no question of its being a subject often dwelt upon by Josephine when she actually sat upon the throne of France. The prophecies that come to pass, are always remembered! Through her fellow-prisoner, Madame Tallien, Josephine became, after the establishment of the Directory, an influential member of the circle of Barras. According to some writers, she there made the acquaintance of General Bonaparte. The most general belief is, however, that the acquaintance was formed through her son Eugene, in the following manner: "The day after the 13th of Vendemiaire, the disarming of the citizens having been decreed, a boy of fifteen called upon General Bonaparte, then commandant of Paris, and with ingenuous boldness demanded the sword of his father. The general was struck with the boy's deportment; he made particular inquiries about him, and sought an acquaintance with his mother." Bonaparte soon became passionately attached to Madame Beauharnais, and married her on the 17th of February, 1796; and his affection for her continued through life. She possessed considerable influence over him, and his letters to her are proofs of his warm attachment, as well as of her amiability. She was always accessible and benevolent to those who sought for mercy or protection from Napoleon. She followed the young hero to Italy, and was with him during that brilliant period when he laid the foundation of his military reputation. When Bonaparte set out on his expedition to Egypt, Josephine took up her residence at Malmaison. Much has been said of her conduct during this period. Whether the censure was fully merited or not, has never been known; that Napoleon, on his return, contemplated a separation, is well ascertained. A reconciliation was effected by her children, whom he tenderly loved, and Josephine was again restored to the affection and confidence of her husband. When Napoleon was elevated to the consulate, Josephine constantly exercised her benevolence in favour of the unfortunate. She was particularly kind to the emigrants, many of whom she restored to their country. Napoleon, in one of his letters to her, said, "If I gain battles, it is you who win hearts."

Josephine loved pomp and show; her extravagance and wasteful expenditure frequently calling down the severest censure from her more just-minded husband. When Napoleon became emperor a divorce was proposed to him, but he rejected it. Josephine was consecrated empress of France by pope Pius VII., December 2d, 1804, and the crown which his genius had won for her was placed by Napoleon upon her brow. Soon after, at Milan, she was crowned queen of Italy. Josephine acquitted herself in her exalted position with a grace and dignity which won all hearts; to many, it was a matter of surprise how she had acquired this "royal bearing." Eugene and Hortense, her children, shared her elevation; Napoleon never neglected their interest, nor that of any members of Josephine's family. As Napoleon's power increased, and his family became to all appearances more and more firmly established upon the throne of France, his desire for offspring to continue his line increased; and after much deliberation, and many painful scenes, a divorce was determined upon. Josephine bore it with a fortitude which her good sense alone enabled her to exert. To have opposed the will of Napoleon would have availed her nothing, and it was every thing to her to continue to possess his esteem. The world, too, would sympathize with a wife who, under such painful circumstances, yielded with dignity to her fall; her impotent resistance would only excite its contempt or sneers. Josephine retired to Malmaison, at the age of forty-six, with the title of empress-dowager, and two millions of francs a year. Napoleon visited her occasionally, and always gave proofs of his esteem and regard for her. While at St. Helena, he paid the highest tribute to her virtues and amiability. On the birth of the king of Rome, in 1811, Josephine is said to have exhibited the most unfeigned satisfaction. If such was really the case, her magnanimity was of the highest order; for that event, which must have confirmed Napoleon's sense of the expediency of the divorce, also rendered his wife more dear to him, and Josephine's situation more glaringly humiliating.

In 1814, Josephine beheld the downfall of that throne which she had once shared. When Napoleon retired to Elba, she wrote to him, signifying her wish, if permitted, to follow him in his reverses. When the allies entered Paris, she was treated with the most distinguished consideration. The king of Prussia and the emperor of Russia visited her at Malmaison, and showed her flattering attentions. On the 19th of May, the emperor Alexander and the king of Prussia dined with her. She was extremely indisposed, and, in opposition to her physician's wishes, did the honours to her royal guests. The next day she became much worse; her disease, a species of quinsy, increasing rapidly. On the 29th of May, 1814, she expired, in the full possession of her faculties. Her children were with her, and, by their affectionate attentions, soothed her last moments. Her body was interred in the church of Ruel, where, seven years after, her children were permitted to erect a monument to her.

Josephine was handsome; her figure was majestic and elegant; but her greatest charms were her grace and goodness of heart. She has been called Napoleon's "star." His fortunes, it is said, arose with her, and waned when their connexion ceased. The English, when they paint the empress

Josephine, in their hatred of Napoleon always depict her in the most glowing colours. To exalt Napoleon's repudiated wife, is to censure him. We, who are less liable to prejudice, may be able to estimate her character more impartially, and may fairly inquire how much of the devotion for which she has been so highly praised, belonged to the man, how much to his station.

Napoleon's ardent attachment to her admits of no such doubt; his actions, as well as his letters to her, prove it; particularly those written in the early part of their married life, when he frequently complains of her coldness. The prudence of her conduct while Napoleon was absent in Egypt, may reasonably be doubted. If so, we may ask, how far the woman who was chosen by such a man as the sharer of his name and fortunes was worthy of her destiny? Her extravagance, even while seated upon a throne, we have seen, was considered reprehensible by her husband. Napoleon had not an exalted opinion of women; how much this might be owing to the example of the woman whom he knew best, the reader must decide. If Josephine had been as eminent for high womanly virtues, as he was for exalted genius; if she had been in truth Napoleon's "star," her fate might have been a different one.

JUDSON, ANNE HASSELTINE,

Was born in 1789, in Bradford, Massachusetts. She was carefully educated, and became early distinguished for her deep and earnest religious character. In February, 1812, she married Adoniram Judson; and in the same month sailed for Calcutta, her husband being appointed missionary to India. Soon after they reached Calcutta, they were ordered by the East India Company, who were opposed to all missionary labour among the natives, to quit the country. While waiting for an opportunity of leaving, Mr. and Mrs. Judson employed their time in investigating the subject of baptism; and being convinced that their previous opinions had been erroneous, they joined the Baptist Church at Calcutta. In July, 1813, Mr. and Mrs. Judson arrived at Rangoon, in Burmah, where for many years they laboured successfully and diligently in the cause of religion. In 1821, in consequence of protracted ill health, Mrs. Judson returned alone to America, where she remained till 1823, when she rejoined her husband in Rangoon. Difficulties arising between the government of Bengal and the Burman empire, and the taking of Rangoon by the British in 1824, caused the imprisonment of Mr. Judson and several other foreigners, who were at Ava, the capital of the Burman empire. For two years, the inexpressible sufferings endured by these prisoners, were alleviated by the constant care and exertions of Mrs. Judson; and it was owing in a great measure to her efforts that they were at last released.

In 1826, the missionary establishment was removed from Rangoon to Amherst; and in October, of that year Mrs. Judson died of a fever during her husband's absence. The physician attributed the fatal termination of the disease to the injury her constitution had received from her long-protracted sufferings and severe privations at Ava. In about six months after her death, her only child, an infant daughter, was laid by her side. That some correct idea may be formed by those who have not read the memoir of Mrs. Judson, of the exertions and sufferings of this angelic woman, whose mission was to wear out her precious life for the preservation of others and the advancement of her Saviour's cause, we will give one extract from her "Narrative" of the imprisonment of Mr. Judson, written in form of a letter to her brother-in-law.

MRS. JUDSON AT OUNG-PEN-LA.

"The next morning I arose and endeavoured to find something like food. But there was no market, and nothing to be procured. One of Dr. Price's friends, however, brought some cold rice and vegetable curry, from Amarapura, which, together with a cup of tea from Mr. Lansago, answered for the breakfast of the prisoners; and for dinner, we made a curry of dried salt fish, which a servant of Mr. Gouger had brought. All the money I could command in the world, I had brought with me, secreted about my person; so you may judge what our prospects were, in case the war should continue long. But our Heavenly Father was better to us than our fears; for notwithstanding the constant extortions of the jailers, during the whole six months we were at Oung-pen-la, and the frequent straits to which we were brought, we never really suffered for the want of money, though frequently for want of provisions, which were not procurable. Here at this place my personal bodily sufferings commenced. While your brother was confined in the city prison, I had been allowed to remain in our house, in which I had many conveniences left, and my health had continued good beyond all expectations. But now I had not a single article of convenience—not even a chair or seat of any kind, excepting a bamboo floor. The very morning after my arrival, Mary Hasseltine was taken with the small-pox, the natural way. She, though very young, was the only assistant I had in taking care of little Maria. But she now required all the time I could spare from

Mr. Judson, whose fever still continued in prison, and whose feet were so dreadfully mangled, that for several days he was unable to move. I knew not what to do, for I could procure no assistance from the neighbourhood, or medicine for the sufferers, but was all day long going backwards and forwards from the house to the prison with little Maria in my arms. Sometimes I was greatly relieved by leaving her, for an hour, when asleep, by the side of her father, while I returned to the house to look after Mary, whose fever ran so high as to produce delirium. She was so completely covered with the small-pox, that there was no distinction in the pustules. As she was in the same little room with myself, I knew Maria would take it; I therefore inoculated her from another child, before Mary's had arrived at such a state as to be infectious. At the same time, I inoculated Abby, and the jailer's children, who all had it so lightly as hardly to interrupt their play. But the inoculation in the arm of my poor little Maria did not take—she caught it of Mary, and had it the natural way. She was then only three months and a half old, and had been a most healthy child; but it was above three months before she perfectly recovered from the effects of this dreadful disorder.

"You will recollect I never had the small-pox, but was vaccinated previously to leaving America. In consequence of being for so long a time constantly exposed, I had nearly a hundred pustules formed, though no previous symptoms of fever, &c. The jailer's children having had the small-pox so lightly, in consequence of inoculation, my fame was spread all over the village, and every child, young and old, who had not previously had it, was brought for inoculation. And although I knew nothing about the disorder, or the mode of treating it, I inoculated them all with a needle, and told them to take care of their diet,—all the instructions I could give them. Mr. Judson's health was gradually restored, and he found himself much more comfortably situated, than when in the city prison.

"The prisoners were at first chained two and two; but as soon as the jailers could obtain chains sufficient, they were separated, and each prisoner had but one pair. The prison was repaired, a new fence made, and a large airy shed erected in front of the prison, where the prisoners were allowed to remain during the day, though locked up in the little close prison at night. All the children recovered from the small-pox; but my watchings and fatigue, together with my miserable food, and more miserable lodgings, brought on one of the diseases of the country, which is almost always fatal to foreigners. My constitution seemed destroyed, and in a few days I became so weak as to be hardly able to walk to Mr. Judson's prison. In this debilitated state, I set off in a cart for Ava, to procure medicines, and some suitable food, leaving the cook to supply my place. I reached the house in safety, and for two or three days the disorder seemed at a stand; after which it attacked me so violently, that I had no hopes of recovery left—and my only anxiety now was, to return to Oung-pen-la to die near the prison. It was with the greatest difficulty that I obtained the medicine-chest from the Governor, and then had no one to administer medicine. I however got at the laudanum, and by taking two drops at a time for several hours, it so far checked the disorder, as to enable me to get on board a boat, though so weak that I could not stand, and again set off for Oung-pen-la."

To show the estimate in which the services and talents of Mrs. Judson were held by the British residents of India, we will give the statement made by one of the English prisoners confined at Ava with Mr. Judson. It was published in a Calcutta paper.

"Mrs. Judson was the author of those eloquent and forcible appeals to the government, which prepared them by degrees for submission to terms of peace, never expected by any, who knew the hauteur and inflexible pride of the Burman court.

"And while on this subject, the overflowings of grateful feelings, on behalf of myself and fellow-prisoners, compel me to add a tribute of public thanks to that amiable and humane female, who, though living at a distance of two miles from our prison, without any means of conveyance, and very feeble in health, forgot her own comfort and infirmity, and almost every day visited us, sought out and administered to our wants, and contributed in every way to alleviate our misery.

"While we were all left by the government destitute of food, she, with unwearied perseverance, by some means or other, obtained for us a constant supply.

"When the tattered state of our clothes evinced the extremity of our distress, she was ever ready to replenish our scanty wardrobe.

"When the unfeeling avarice of our keepers confined us inside, or made our feet fast in the stocks, she, like a ministering angel, never ceased her applications to the government, until she was authorized to communicate to us the grateful news of our enlargement, or of a respite from our galling oppressions.

"Besides all this, it was unquestionably owing, in a chief degree, to the repeated eloquence, and forcible appeals of Mrs. Judson, that the untutored Burman was finally made willing to secure the welfare and happiness of his country, by a sincere peace."

Mrs. Ann H. Judson was the first American woman who resolved to leave her friends and country to bear the Gospel to the heathen in foreign climes. Well does she merit the reverence and love of all Christians; nor can the nineteenth century furnish the record of a woman who so truly deserves the title—a missionary heroine.

JUDSON, SARAH B.,

DAUGHTER of Ralph and Abia Hull, was born in Alstead, New Hampshire, November 4th, 1803. She was first married to the Rev. George D. Boardman, in 1825, and soon after accompanied her husband, and other missionaries, to Calcutta. The first destination of Mr. and Mrs. Boardman was Tavoy; and there, after encountering great dangers and sufferings, and overcoming appalling difficulties and discouragements, in all of which

Mrs. Boardman shared with her beloved husband, Mr. Boardman died, in 1831. She had previously lost two children; one only, a son, was left her, and they were alone, in a strange land. But she did not desert her missionary duties. Four years she remained a widow, and then was united in marriage with the Rev. Dr. Judson. Their union was a happy one; but after the birth of her fourth child her health failed, and a voyage to America was recommended as the only hope of restoration. Dr. Judson, with his wife and children, took passage for their own country; but on reaching the Isle of France, Mrs. Judson's health was so greatly improved, that Dr. Judson, whose duties in Burmah were urgent, determined to return, while his wife and children should visit America. The arrangements were accordingly made, and in expectation of the parting, Mrs. Judson wrote this sweet and most pathetic poem, addressed to her husband:

We part on this green islet, love,—
Thou for the eastern main;
I for the setting sun, love,
Oh, when to meet again!

My heart is sad for thee, love,
For lone thy way will be;
And oft thy tears will fall, love,
For thy children and for me.

The music of thy daughter's voice
Thou'lt miss for many a year,
And the merry shout of thine elder boys
Thou'lt list in vain to hear.

When we knelt to see our Henry die,
And heard his last, faint moan,
Each wiped the tear from the other's eye—
Now each must weep alone.

My tears fall fast for thee, love,
How can I say farewell?
But go, thy God be with thee, love,
Thy heart's deep grief to quell.

Yet my spirit clings to thine, love,
Thy soul remains with me,
And oft we'll hold communion sweet,
O'er the dark and distant sea.

And who can paint our mutual joy,
When, all our wanderings o'er,
We both shall clasp our infants three,
At home on Burmah's shore.

But higher shall our raptures glow,
On yon celestial plain,
When the loved and parted here below
Meet, ne'er to part again.

Then gird thine armour on, love,
Nor faint thou by the way—
Till the Boodh shall fall, and Burmah's sons
Shall own Messiah's sway.

But they did not thus part; on putting out to sea, Mrs. Judson grew rapidly worse, and died within sight of the rocky island of St. Helena, where she was buried, September 3d, 1845.

If this second Mrs. Judson was less distinguished than her predecessor for strength of mind and the power of concentrating her energies, so as to display, at a glance, her talents, yet she was not inferior in loveliness of character. The genius and piety of Mrs. Sarah B. Judson will ever keep her memory sacred as a pure light in the path of the female missionary

JULIANA,

A SINGULAR character, of Norwich, England, who, in her zeal for mortification, confined herself for several years within four walls. She wrote "Sixteen Revelations of Divine Love showed to a devout Servant of our Lord, called Mother Juliana, an Anchoret of Norwich, who lived in the days of King Edward III.," published in 1610.

JULIANA,

A WOMAN who possessed great influence at the court of the Mogul emperors of Hindostan, in the early part of the last century. She was born in Bengal, in 1658, and was the daughter of a Portuguese named Augustin Diaz d'Acosta. Being shipwrecked, she went to the court of the great Mogul, Aurengzebe, whose favour she conciliated by presenting him with some curiosities. Being appointed superintendent of the harem of that prince, and governess of his son, Behadur Shah, she rendered important services to the latter, who succeeded to the crown in 1707, under the title of Shah Aulum. He was obliged to defend his authority against his brothers by force of arms; and in the battle, Juliana, mounted on an elephant by his side, encouraged and animated both him and the troops, and he was indebted to her for the complete victory he obtained. Her services were rewarded with the title of princess, the rank of the wife of Seu Omrah, and a profusion of riches and honours. Shah Aulum often said, "If Juliana were a man, she should be my vizier." Jehander Shah, who became emperor of Hindostan in 1712, was equally sensible of her merit; and though she experienced some persecution when that prince was deposed, in 1713, by his nephew, she speedily recovered her influence, and retained it till her death, in 1733.

JUNOT, LAURA, DUCHESS D'ABRANTES,

Was born in Montpellier, 1785. Constantine Comnena, a scion of the imperial stock, emigrated from the Peloponnesus, in 1676. He was followed by a body of three thousand Greeks. After two years of wandering they settled in the island of

Corsica, then a savage and uncultivated region, which they brought to some degree of culture and civilization, although the fierce and restless spirit of the native inhabitants kept them in a state of perpetual, sharp, yet petty warfare. When Corsica was sold to France, under Louis XIII., another Constantine, a man of approved valour and worth, was at the head of the Comnena family. He was the father of three sons, and a daughter, called Panona, who married a Frenchman by the name of Pernon. Upon the breaking out of the Corsican revolution, he was driven to seek shelter in France. From this union sprang the Duchess d'Abrantes. Destined to experience the most extraordinary vicissitudes, her very cradle was disturbed by the agitations which convulsed France at that period. In an autobiographical sketch, she speaks of her childish terrors, when, in the absence of her parents, she was placed at a boarding-school among strangers; the terrible days of September (1792) are particularly commemorated. Her father, for whom she appears to have entertained a particularly tender affection, died while she was still a child: she also lost the sister nearest her own age—to these afflictions were added most straitened pecuniary circumstances. The latter difficulties, after a time, diminished, and Madame Pernon established herself comfortably in Paris, where her house soon became the resort of all the most noted men of that day. The attractions, personal and mental, of her daughter, were not undistinguished. A man of rank and wealth made an offer of his hand: he was old enough to be her grandfather, but this seemed no objection in the eyes of the mother, who with difficulty yielded to Laura's repugnance, and gave up a match which held out so many mercenary advantages. Another matrimonial proposal soon was presented, which came to a more fortunate conclusion. Among the generals who distinguished themselves in the wars of Napoleon, was Junot, born of respectable parents at Bussy-le-Grand, in 1771. Before entering the career of arms, he had studied jurisprudence, with his friend Marmont; but the cannons of the revolution roused him to visions of fame, and he enrolled himself in the very first battalion that was formed in his province. At the siege of Toulon he was a sergeant of grenadiers: an accident was the beginning of his advancement. Napoleon called out, on some exigency, for somebody to step forward who possessed a good hand-writing. Junot came from the ranks, and began a letter, under the great man's dictation. Scarcely had he formed the last sentence, when a bomb cast by the English, bursting at ten paces from him, covered the writer and the writing with earth. "Capital!" said Junot, smiling, "here is exactly what we want, sand to dry the ink." Such intrepidity was not lost on Bonaparte; he kept the heroic soldier in his eye, and soon after obtaining his generalship, he made Junot his adjutant. This man, on his return from the expedition to Egypt, was introduced to the house of Madame Pernon. He soon manifested an attachment to the young Laura; and as his military grade, and favour with the first consul, were united to personal beauty and pleasing address, he was successful in the suit: they were married in 1800. A very brilliant course awaited this couple, to be terminated with respect to both in a manner singularly unfortunate. Title, riches, and honours, were showered upon them; the duchess d'Abrantes was attached to the imperial household, and no less favoured by the ladies of the Bonaparte family than her husband was by its chief. Junot, in the very height of his fortunes, became suddenly a raging lunatic. His cure being despaired of, by the consent of the best physicians, he was placed in a celebrated asylum for the insane: here his sole object appeared self-destruction. Taking advantage of a momentary absence of his keeper, he violently wrenched away the window-bolt, and threw himself out: he was taken up in the street below, without a sign of life. The death of the duke d'Abrantes was followed by the destruction of the empire, and the unfortunate widow found herself in a position which combined want of friends with want of means. It was then that she determined to have recourse to literature to aid her in the maintenance and education of her family. Her first work of importance was "Historical Recollections of Napoleon, the Revolution, the Consulship, the Empire." She has been charged with a blind admiration of the hero of these scenes, perhaps justly; but it was difficult for those who rose through that meteor's course, and partook of its brilliancy, to preserve cool and unbiassed the judgment. We may safely grant the author good faith in all she advances. This production was followed by various successful works of history, biography, travels, and romances. But for the descendant of the Greek emperors, the authoress of fifty volumes, the member of learned societies, what a sad end was reserved! She had been for twenty years troubled by a painful malady, to alleviate which she indulged in the use of opium, and it is supposed this pernicious drug accelerated the progress of her disease. Worse than physical pains, a hard-hearted creditor, seeing the increasing illness, and fearing death might step in to withdraw his victim, actually brought an execution to her death-bed, and for the miserable sum of four hundred francs, sold the furniture of her apartment under her very eyes. She had not yet sunk deep enough in misery: it remained for her to be taken to the hospital to die! Removed from splendid apartments, she was cast into a bare, unfurnished cell, and left to the cares of a hireling nurse, whose venal attentions were distributed among many others. But earthly difficulties were fast passing away. On the night of the 7th June, 1838, she received the sacrament from the hands of the archbishop of Paris, who came to this humble couch to administer comfort to one who was the favourite of his flock. She died the next morning in the arms of her children, in a state of perfect resignation, confiding in the promises of the Saviour. She left four children, two daughters and two sons, all estimable, and worthy of the attention their mother had ever bestowed on them.

K.

KAMAMALU,

(THE name signifies The Shade of the Lonely One,) was the daughter of Kamehameha, king of the Sandwich Islands, who, from his conquests and character, has been styled "the Napoleon of the Pacific." Kamamalu was his favourite daughter, and he married her to his son and heir, Liholiho, who was born of a different mother; intermarriages of brother and sister being then practised in those heathen islands.

After the death of Kamehameha, his son Liholiho succeeded to be king of Hawaii, and all the islands of the group; and Kamamalu was queen, and his favourite wife, though he had four others. This was in 1819; the following year was the advent of the Gospel and Christian civilization to these miserable heathen. As has ever been the case, women joyfully welcomed the glad tidings of hope and peace and purity. Kamamalu was among the first converts, and eagerly embraced the opportunities for instruction. In 1822, she was diligently prosecuting her studies, could read and write, and her example was of great influence in strengthening the wavering disposition of her husband, and finally inducing him to abandon his debaucheries, and become, as he said, "a good man."

As proof of the wonderful progress made by this people in the manners of civilized life, and also marking the thoughtful benevolence of Kamamalu, we give an extract from a valuable work by Mr. Jarves on the Hawaiian Islands.

"On the 26th of March, 1823, his majesty held his annual festival in celebration of the death of Kamehameha I. On this occasion he provided a dinner in a rural bower, for two hundred individuals. The missionaries and all respectable foreigners were present; and the dresses were an improvement upon the costume of the preceding year. Black was the court colour, and every individual was required to be clothed in its sombre hue. Kamamalu appeared greatly to advantage

The company were all liberally provided for by her attentions; and even a party of sailors, to the number of two hundred, who were looking on with wistful eyes, were served with refreshments."

In the autumn of the same year, Liholiho determined to visit England first; and then the United States. Kamamalu, his favourite wife, (polygamy was not then abolished,) was selected to accompany him; they left Honolulu, November 27th, 1823. The people were greatly distressed at the departure of their king and queen. Kamamalu remained on shore to the last, mingling her tears with those of her attendants, to whom her amiability and attention to domestic concerns had greatly endeared her. Before stepping into the boat, she, after the manner of her forefathers, thus chaunted her farewell: "O! heaven; O! earth; O! mountains; O! sea; O! my counselors and my subjects, farewell! O! thou land for which my father suffered, the object of toil which my father sought. We now leave thy soil; I follow thy command; I will never disregard thy voice; I will walk by the command which thou hast given me." Royal salutes were fired, and the ship soon disappeared before a favourable breeze.

They reached London safely; and the first appearance of Kamamalu was rather novel; she wore loose trousers and a long bed-gown of coloured velvet. However, the whole party were soon fitted with clothes of the newest fashion. Kamamalu for the first time encircled her ample waist in corsets; and as she was really a fine-looking woman, and had an air of native majesty, and was moreover a queen, many of the London ladies sought patterns of the turban that graced her brow.

This party of semi-barbarians was flattered and feasted, and hurried from one rout to another, in a manner which their tropical constitutions could very ill bear. The king, Liholiho, took the measles; and, in a few days afterwards, his wife Kamamalu was seized with the same disease. Liholiho appeared to be recovering rapidly, when his wife was found to be dying. The mutual grief of the royal couple was affecting. They held each other in a warm and protracted embrace, while the thought of dying so early in their career, so far from their loved islands and friends, caused the tears to gush freely. In the evening she died. This sad event so affected the depressed spirits of the king, that although hopes of his recovery had been entertained, he sank rapidly, and on the 14th, after much severe suffering, breathed his last. Previously to his death, he drew up a rough memorandum, in which he expressed his wish to have his body and that of his consort conveyed to their native land; his personal effects he distributed among his retinue.

The will of the dead was observed; the bodies of Liholiho and Kamamalu were taken to Honolulu; and, with a mingling of barbaric pomp and Christian observances, interred.

Kamamalu was about twenty-six years of age at the time of her decease. Had her life been prolonged, with her uncommon talents and the earnest purpose she manifested of learning the true and doing works of goodness, she would doubtless have been of great aid in the improvement of the people of Hawaii.

KAPIOLANI

WAS wife of Naihe, hereditary counsellor in the court of king Liholiho, at Honolulu. As wife of one of the highest chiefs, Kapiolani had great influence, which she used in favour of the missionaries, and in aid of the improvement of the people of Hawaii. She did much to prevent infanticide, debauchery, and drunkenness; but the heroic deed which distinguishes her name was the overthrow of the idolatrous worship of Pele. The immediate region around the crater of Kilauea, being remote from all the mission stations, remained for several years under the influence of the priesthood of this goddess, the most fearful of all the deities of Hawaii. Sacrifices were there offered, and the wicked rites of heathenism practised. The priests taught that whoever insulted the tabu or withheld the offerings required, would be destroyed by Pele, who would spout forth liquid fire, and devour her enemies; and their poor ignorant followers believed them. But early in the year 1825, their credulity was staggered by the boldness of Kapiolani, who, with a daring which, when her previous associations are considered, does her infinite credit, determined to convince its votaries of the falsity of their oracles. She visited the wonderful phenomenon; reproved the idolatry of its worshippers, and neglected every rite and observance which they had been taught to consider as necessary for their welfare. In vain the priests launched their anathemas, and denounced upon her the vengeance of the offended deity. She replied, she feared not; and would abide the test of daring Pele in the recesses of her domains: the fires of the volcano were the work of the God she worshipped. Venturing to the brink of the abyss, she descended several hundred feet toward the liquid lava, and after casting the sacred berries into the flames, an act than which none more sacrilegious according to their ideas could have been done, she composedly praised Jehovah amid one of the most sublime and terrible of his works. There is a moral grandeur in this deed, worthy of a Christian philosopher. The sincerity of her faith could not have been put to a severer test.

KARSCH, ANNA LOUISA,

A GERMAN poetess, was born December 1st, 1722, in a small hamlet called Nammer, on the borders of Lower Silesia. Her father kept an alehouse; but, dying before Louisa was eight years old, she was taken by a great-uncle, residing in Poland, who taught her to read and write.

Having remained three years with this relative, she returned to her mother, who employed her in household labour and in taking care of the cows. It was at this time that Louisa began to display her fondness for intellectual occupations; but her mother checked her inclinations as much as possible. When she was seventeen she was married to a wool-comber; and, being obliged to share his labour, as well as attend to her household, she had but little leisure to cultivate the muses. She, nevertheless, composed verses while she worked, and on Sunday committed them to paper. After living with this husband for eleven years, she obtained a divorce.

Her poverty induced her to marry Karsch, a tailor, whose dissipated habits threw all the support of the family on Louisa, and rendered her very unhappy. It was at this time that she first began to sell her poems; and she also wandered about the country as an improvisatrice. Her writings having fallen into the hands of several gentlemen, she was encouraged by them to persevere. In 1755, she removed with her family to Great Glogau, where, for the first time, she gained access to a bookseller's shop.

In 1760, she became acquainted with Baron Cottwitz, a Silesian nobleman, who, travelling through Glogau, was struck with her talents; and, commiserating her distress, he took her with him to Berlin, and introduced her to the circle of literati, and to the king, Frederic William II. Here she composed most of the poems that were printed in her collection.

Several small pensions were bestowed upon her; but as she had two children and a brother dependent on her, they proved insufficient for her support. Frederic William II. had a house built for her, and she was so anxious to occupy it, that she went into it before the walls were dry. This imprudence cost her her life. She died, October, 1791. Her daughter published her memoirs and some of her poems, in 1792.

KAUFFMAN, MARIA ANGELICA,

Was born in 1742, at Coire, the capital of the Grisons. She was instructed in the elements of painting by her father, whose talents were moderate, and whom she soon excelled. She loved music, and her admiration of the beautiful was early developed. At the age of fourteen her father took her to Milan, where her talents and personal accomplishments rendered her an object of general admiration. In 1764 she went to Venice, and the following year accompanied Lady Wentworth, the wife of the British ambassador, to England. Here she painted the whole royal family, which increased her reputation and improved her circumstances; and she was soon elected a member of the royal academy. In London she contracted a most unfortunate marriage, the details of which, from their romantic character, we are apt to assume, are only to be found in the pages of fiction. An English artist who had addressed her and been refused, stung by his disappointment, determined to be revenged upon her. He selected a very handsome young man from the lowest ranks—some say he was a footman—and passing him off for a German count, introduced him into the house of Angelica, where he soon became a suitor. Angelica was deceived, and married him. The rejected artist now disclosed the deceit, and Angelica obtained a divorce; not, however, without suffering great ill-usage from her low-minded husband, who fled, after robbing her of three hundred pounds. Seven years after, her husband having meanwhile died, Angelica married a Venetian painter, Signor Zucchi, with whom she lived very happily. She continued to retain her maiden name, and never had any children. Signor Zucchi also died long before her. Angelica resided seventeen years in England; she then went to Rome, where she devoted herself to painting till her death, in 1807. In 1808, her bust was placed in the Pantheon. She left a select library, some beautiful original paintings of old masters, and a considerable fortune, which she divided among several individuals and charitable institutions. She painted many portraits and historical pictures, the latter chiefly after the antique; she treated poetical subjects in a fascinating manner that was peculiarly her own, drew well, coloured beautifully, and etched in a spirited style. Her works are remarkable for grace, though the critic may discover in them incorrectness of style and sameness of plan.

KELLEY, FRANCES MARIA,

Was born at Brighton, England, December 15th, 1790. Her father was an officer in the navy, and brother to Michael Kelley, under whom Frances studied music and singing. She made her first appearance at Drury Lane, in 1800, and in 1806 was engaged at the Haymarket, and afterwards at the English Opera House, where she was very successful. As an actress, Miss Kelley's talents were very versatile. Her character was always irreproachable.

KERALIO, MADAME DE,

Was born at Paris, in 1758. She is known principally as a translator of several works from the English and Italian. She also wrote a voluminous "History of Queen Elizabeth," several novels, and edited a collection of the best French works composed by women.

KILLIGREW, ANNE,

"A GRACE for beauty, and a Muse for wit," as Wood says, was the daughter of Dr. Henry Killi-grew, one of the prebendaries of Westminster, and born in London, a little before the restoration of Charles II. She showed indications of genius very early, which being carefully cultivated, she became eminent in the arts of poetry and painting. She painted a portrait of the duke of York, afterwards James II., and also of the duchess, to whom she was maid of honour. She also painted some historical pictures and some pieces of still-life, for her own amusement. She was a woman of exemplary piety and virtue. Dryden speaks of her in the highest terms, and wrote a long ode to her memory. She died of the small-pox, June, 1685, in her twenty-fifth year. She was buried in the Savoy Chapel.

KILLIGREW, CATHARINE,

DAUGHTER of Sir Anthony Cooke, was born at Giddy-hall, in Essex, about 1530; and married Henry Killigrew, Esq., a Cornish gentleman, who was knighted, for the good service he did his country when an ambassador. This lady, having an excellent education, and much natural talent, became, like many other women of her time, very learned. She understood Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and was famous for her poetical skill. The following lines were addressed to her sister Mildred, Lady Burleigh; the subject of this poem has never been fully ascertained—whether a lover, a husband, or a friend, was the happy person for whom the lady pleaded. Dr. Fuller thinks the lines refer to Sir Henry Killigrew, when about to be sent ambassador to France, which, as the times were troublesome, was not a desirable mission.

LINES TO MILDRED CECIL.

Si mihi quem cupio cures, Mildreda, remitti,
Tu bona, tu melior, tu mihi sola soror:
Sin malè cessando retines, et trans mare mittis,
Tu mala, tu pejor, tu mihi nulla soror.
Is si Cornubia, tibi pax sit et omnia læta;
Sin mare, Cecilæ nuncio bella. Vale.

Translation.

If Mildred, to my wishes kind,
Thy valued charge thou send,
In thee my soul shall hold combined
The sister and the friend.
If from my eyes by thee detained
The wanderer cross the seas,
No more thy love shall soothe as friend,
No more as sister please.
His stay let Cornwall's shore engage;
And peace with Mildred dwell!
Else war with Cecil's name I wage,
Perpetual war!—Farewell.

KINGSTON, ELIZABETH, DUCHESS OF,

DAUGHTER of Colonel Chudleigh, governor of Chelsea college, England, was born in 1720. On her father's death, as she was left without adequate provision, her friends obtained for her the post of maid of honour to the princess of Wales, mother of George III. Her wit and beauty made her very much admired, and the duke of Hamilton proposed to her. But while he was on the continent, and Miss Chudleigh was visiting her aunt, Mrs. Hanmer, she was induced, August 4th, 1744, to marry, privately, Captain Hervey, a naval officer, afterwards earl of Bristol. She soon conceived a violent dislike to her husband, heightened by the discovery that she had been deceived about the duke of Hamilton, and the marriage was never acknowledged. Wishing to destroy all record of her union with Captain Hervey, she contrived to tear the leaf out of the parish register in which her marriage was entered; but after he became earl of Bristol she had it replaced. When the duke of Kingston made her a proposal of marriage, she endeavoured to obtain Lord Bristol's consent to a divorce, and at length succeeded, and married, March 8th, 1769, Evelyn Pierrepont, duke of Kingston, who left her, at his death, in 1773, his immense fortune. The heirs of the duke had her arrested for bigamy, as having been divorced by an incompetent tribunal. She was tried before the house of lords, and found guilty; but on her pleading the privilege of peerage, she was discharged, on paying the fees of the office. Her fortune was not affected by the sentence. She went abroad, and died near Fontainebleau, in France, August 28th, 1788.

KIRCH, MARY MARGARET,

OF Leipsic, Germany, was the daughter of Matthias Winkelman, a Lutheran divine. She married, in 1692, Godfrey Kirch, an eminent astronomer, of Luben, in Lower Lusatia, who, when appointed royal astronomer, in 1700, in the academy of sciences at Berlin, found in his wife an intelligent assistant, and an able calculator. She discovered, in 1702, a comet; and, in 1707, she observed that remarkable Aurora Borealis which the astronomers of Europe noticed in their memoirs. The husband died in 1710, and the following year his wife published "A Discourse on the approaching Conjunction of Jupiter, Saturn, &c." She was equally eminent for her private virtues as for her talents, and died at Berlin, in 1720, aged fifty.

KIRCHGESSNER, MARIANNE,

WAS born, 1770, at Bruchsal. The loss of her eye-sight, in her fourth year, by the small-pox, seemed rather to have augmented than lessened her talent for music. In the sixth year of her age, she astonished her auditors by her execution on the piano. Taught by Schmittbaur, in Carlsruhe, she made the most extraordinary progress. In company with Mr. Bassler (her biographer) she travelled, in her tenth year, over Germany, where she received everywhere, great applause; and, 1794, she went to London. Her abode there, of three years, besides the perfecting of her art, was useful to her on account of her eye-sight having become partly restored. In November, 1796, she visited Copenhagen, and went from thence to St. Petersburg; and after having gained just approbation and well-merited reward in all these places, she chose the beautiful village of Gahles, near Leipsic, for her dwelling-place. She remained there until 1807, in the society of her friend, Mr. Bassler, when she intended to go back to her native country; but at Schaffhausen she experienced a violent attack of fever, of which she died, on the 9th of December, in her thirty-eighth year.

KLOPSTOCK, MARGARET,
or META,

WHOSE maiden name was Moller, was born in Hamburg, March 19th, 1728. In 1751, the famous Frederic Gottlieb Klopstock became acquainted with this young enthusiastic German maiden. The story of their courtship and marriage has been told by the lady herself; any abridgement would mar its beautiful simplicity; even its imperfect English has the charm of truth; it is like the lisping, stammering language of a child, who is only earnest to make you understand its feelings, and caring nothing for the criticism its language may cause. These letters of Mrs. Klopstock were addressed to Richardson the novelist, author of Sir Charles Grandison.

HAMBURG, March 14th, 1758.

You will know all that concerns me. Love, dear sir, is all what me concerns! and love shall be all what I will tell you in this letter.

In one happy night I read my husband's poem, the Messiah. I was extremely touched with it. The next day I asked one of his friends, who was the author of this poem? and this was the first time I heard Klopstock's name. I believe, I fell immediately in love with him. At the least, my thoughts were ever with him filled, especially because his friend told me very much of his character. But I had no hopes ever to see him, when quite unexpectedly I heard that he should pass through Hamburg. I wrote immediately to the same friend, for procuring by his means that I might see the author of the Messiah, when in Hamburg. He told him that a certain girl at Hamburg wished to see him, and, for all recommendation, showed him some letters, in which I made bold to criticise Klopstock's verses. Klopstock came, and came to me. I must confess, that, though greatly prepossessed of his qualities, I never thought him the amiable youth whom I found him. This made its effect.

After having seen him two hours, I was obliged to pass the evening in a company, which had never been so wearisome to me. I could not speak, I could not play; I thought I saw nothing but Klopstock. I saw him the next day, and the following, and we were very seriously friends. But the fourth day he departed. It was an strong hour the hour of his departure! He wrote soon after, and from that time our correspondence began to be a very diligent one. I sincerely believed my love to be friendship. I spoke with my friends of nothing but Klopstock, and showed his letters. They rallied at me and said I was in love. I rallied them again, and said that they must have a very friendshipless heart, if they had no idea of friendship to a man as well as to a woman. Thus it continued eight months, in which time my friends found as much love in Klopstock's letters as in me. I perceived it likewise, but I would not believe it. At the last Klopstock said plainly that he loved, and I startled as for a wrong thing. I answered, that it was no love, but friendship, as it was what I felt for him; we had not seen one another enough to love. (As if love must have more time than friendship:) This was sincerely my meaning, and I had this meaning till Klopstock came again to Hamburg. This he did a year after we had seen one another the first time. We saw, we were friends, we loved; and we believed that we loved; and a short time after I could even tell Klopstock that I loved. But we were obliged to part again and wait two years for our wedding. My mother would not let marry me a stranger. I could marry then without her consent, as by the death of my father my fortune depended not on her; but this was an horrible idea for me; and thank heaven that I have prevailed by prayers. At this time, knowing Klopstock, she loves him as her lively son, and thanks God that she has not persisted. We married, and I am the happiest wife in the world. In some few months it will be four years that I am so happy, and still I dote upon Klopstock as if he was my bridegroom.

* * * * *

He is good, really good, in all his actions, in all the foldings of his heart. I know him; and sometimes I think if we knew others in the same manner, the better we should find them. For it may be that an action displeases us which would please us, if we knew its true aim and whole extent. No one of my friends is so happy as I am; but no one has had courage to marry as I did: They have married—as people marry; and they are happy—as people are happy.

HAMBURG, August 26, 1758.

Why think you, Sir, that I answer so late? I will tell you my reasons. Have not you guessed that I, summing up all my happinesses, and not speaking of children, had none? Yes, Sir, this has been my only wish ungratified for these four years. But thanks, thanks to God! I am in full hope to be a mother in the month of November. The little preparations for my child (and they are so dear to me) have taken so much time, that I could not answer your letter; nor give you the promised scenes of the Messiah. This is likewise the reason wherefore I am still here; for properly we dwell in Copenhagen. Our staying here is only on a visit (but a long one) which we pay my family. My husband has been obliged to make a little visit alone to Copenhagen, I not being able to travel yet. He is yet absent—a cloud over my happiness! He will soon return—But what does that help? he is yet equally absent! We write to each other every post—but what are letters to presence? But I will speak no more of this little cloud; I will only tell my happiness! But I cannot tell how I rejoice! A son of my dear Klopstock! Oh, when shall I have him! It is long since I made the remark that the children of geniuses are not geniuses. No children at all, bad sons, or, at the most, lovely daughters, like you and Milton. But a daughter or a son, only with a good heart, without genius, I will nevertheless love dearly.

This is no letter, but only a newspaper of your Hamburg daughter. When I have my husband and my child, I will write you more, (if God gives me health and life.) You will think that I shall be not a mother only, but a nurse also; though the latter (thank God! that the former is not so too) is quite against fashion and good manners, and though nobody can think it possible to be always with the child at home. M. KLOPSTOCK.

But these hopes were never, in this life, to be realized; the mother and babe both died; — and the poor bereaved husband and father was left desolate! In a letter to a friend, Klopstock describes the manner of her death and their last parting. After having prayed with her for a long time, he said, as he bent over her, "Be my guardian angel, if God permits." "You have ever been mine," she replied. And when with stifled voice he again repeated, "If God permits, be my guardian angel!" she fixed her eyes upon him full of love, and said, "Ah, who would not be your guardian angel!"

Just before she died, she said, with the serene smile of an angel, "My love, you will follow me!"

Some time after her decease, Klopstock published her writings, which are, "Letters from the Dead to the Living;" "The Death of Abel," a tragedy; and several small poems. Her husband says that these were written entirely for her own amusement, and that she always blushed and was very much embarrassed whenever he found her writing, and expressed a wish to see what she had done. He says, too, "that her taste was correct, and highly cultivated, and that her criticisms upon his poetry were always extremely apt and judicious; he knew instantly by her countenance, whether his thoughts pleased her; and so perfect was their sympathy, that their souls could hold delightful communion almost without the aid of language."

KOERTEN, JOANNA,

A CELEBRATED Dutch artist, was born at Amsterdam, in 1650. She married Adrian Block, and arrived at great excellence in drawing, painting, and embroidery. She also modelled in wax, made artificial ornaments, and flowers; but her principal excellence was in cutting figures out of paper with the scissors; and her portraits and landscapes in this way were so celebrated, that foreigners visited Amsterdam to see them, amongst whom was Peter the Great, of Russia. Sea-pieces, animals, architecture, and still-life, were her favourite subjects; but she also cut portraits on paper with as striking a resemblance as if they had been painted by the ablest artists. The elector-palatine offered her one thousand florins for three small pictures of her cutting, which she refused as insufficient. At the request of the emperor of Germany, she designed a trophy with the "arms of the empire, ornamented with laurel crowns, wreaths of flowers, and other suitable designs, which she executed with great correctness of drawing and wonderful beauty. The empress gave her for it four thousand florins. She also cut the emperor's portrait, which is hung up in the imperial cabinet at Vienna. She died in 1716, aged sixty-five.

KÖNIGSMARK, MARIE AURORE COUNTESS OF,

ONE of the numerous mistresses of Augustus II., king of Poland and elector of Saxony, was born in 1678. She was descended from one of the oldest families in Brandenburg, and was a woman of great beauty and talents, and of uncommon political abilities. Thoroughly educated, she spoke several languages, played on various instruments, composed music, and sang and painted with great skill; she also excelled in conversation. In 1678 she went to Dresden, and, at first sight, Augustus fell in love with her. She rejected his overtures for some time, but at last yielded, and became the mother of the famous Marshal Saxe. When the love of Augustus declined, the countess of Königsmark conducted herself so discreetly that he always remained her friend. By his influence she was appointed superintendent of Quedlinberg, in 1700, where she remained till her death, in 1728. She was beloved by all around her, and was very kind to the poor.

KRÜDENER, JULIANNA, BARONESS OF VALERIA,

Was born in Riga, about 1776. Her father, Baron Vietinghoff, one of the richest landed proprietors in Courland, gave her a careful education. When a young girl, her parents took her to Paris, where her father's house was the resort of men of talents; and her wit, beauty, and cheerfulness, were much admired. In her fourteenth year, she was married to Baron Krüdener, a Livonian, about thirty-six years old. She accompanied her husband to Copenhagen and Venice, where he was Russian minister. In these places, and in St. Petersburg, Madame Krüdener, placed by rank and wealth in the first circles, was one of their most brilliant ornaments. She was surrounded by admirers of her talents and beauty; but she was not happy. She became the mother of two children; but her natural liveliness of temperament, and the allurements of the world, led her into levities which finally caused a divorce from her husband. In 1791 she returned to her father's house, in Riga, where she was considered one of the most amiable and accomplished ladies, with a feeling heart and lively imagination. But Riga did not satisfy her, and she lived alternately at Paris and St. Petersburg. Her love of amusements involved her, in both places, in many difficulties. In the midst of these, she wrote a novel, of which she had formed the plan at an earlier period — "Valerie ou Lettres de Gustave de Linar à Erneste de G." — in which she delineated certain scenes of her own life. The disasters of Prussia arrived; and Madame Krüdener, being then about the person of the queen of Prussia, and participating in her affliction, turned her mind from the pleasures of the world to the subject of religion, though, perhaps, little change may have been produced in the essentials of her character. Ambition, a lively sensibility, and love of excitement, seem to have remained the great springs of her actions. She was now attracted by the principles of the Moravians. She went again to Paris, where she found many disciples, chiefly among those who, having been accustomed to live on excitements from early youth, and having become sickened with those of fashionable life, turn with pleasure to those of devotion. On the commencement of the war of the northern powers against Napoleon, Madame Krüdener went to Geneva. She began to believe herself called to preach the gospel to the poor; and therefore visited the prison at Heidelberg, and preached to the criminals condemned to death. In 1814 she returned to Paris, where she became acquainted with Alexander, the emperor of Russia, who had already shown a disposition to religious contemplations, and upon whom her conversation had great influence. In Paris she had prayer-meetings, attended by distinguished personages, where she was seen in the back-ground of a suite of rooms, in the dress of a priestess, kneeling in prayer. It is very generally believed that her conversations with Alexander were mainly instrumental in suggesting the idea of the holy alliance: it is certain that in her later sermons she held it up almost as a new covenant. In 1815 she went to Bâle, where a small community of devout mystics was already collected. Here a young clergyman of Geneva followed her, and preached in the prayer-meetings which the baroness held every evening. Women and girls went in numbers to these meetings, and gave liberally to the poor, often to a degree much beyond what they could afford. These meetings had a very bad moral effect. Cases were reported which excited great scandal, and a preacher named Füsich finally denounced the priestess. The magistracy of Bâle obliged her to leave the city. She experienced the same treatment at Lörrach, Aaran, and other places; yet, according to the common course of things, the number of her followers increased, particularly among young females. At the same time, she carried on an extensive correspondence, and money was sent to her from great distances. In 1816, with her daughter, she went to reside not far from Bâle, in Baden. Here she assembled many poor people, great numbers of whom were vagabonds, whom she provided with food and lodgings without labour. These were very ready to profit by the kindness of the benevolent lady, who preached against the cold-heartedness of the rich as the source of all evil. The public peace was so much disturbed by these proceedings, that her place of residence was surrounded by soldiers, in 1817, and her disciples carried away to Lörrach. She wrote, in consequence, a remarkable letter to the minister at Carlsruhe, in which she spoke of the "desert of civilization" through which she was obliged to wander, and reminded him of the law of God, requiring the authorities to take care of the poor. She now travelled about, preaching in the open air, often surrounded by thousands of people, and giving bountifully to the poor. Whenever she arrived, she was under the surveillance of the police. In Leipsic, police officers were even placed at her door, so that nobody could be admitted to see her. At length the police transported her to the Russian frontier, where she received orders not to go to Moscow or to St. Petersburg. In 1824, she went with her daughter and her son-in-law to the Crimea, and died there the same year, December 13th, at Karafubasar. She appears to have been an amiable enthusiast, pouring out pious effusions, mingled with arrogant prophecies; and is one of the many instances where ardent zeal and good intention (for it is probable that she considered herself to be doing right) are by no means sufficient to render one capable of effecting a great reformation.

L.

LABBÉ, LOUISE, (LA BELLE CORDIÈRE),

Was born in Lyons, in 1525 or 1526. Her father, Pierre Chardin, surnamed Labbé, was a rope-maker or seller. He had her carefully instructed in the Greek, Latin, Spanish, and Italian languages, and also in riding and military exercises. She was fond of music, hunting, and war. Her boldness was increased by the example of the heroines of her own time. Before she was sixteen, she went to Perpignan, in the army of the young dauphin, where, under the name of Captain Loys, she showed great valour. Among the numerous admirers attracted by her beauty, her talents, and her courage, a young warrior, whose name is unknown, inspired her with a lasting passion.

Louise Labbé married Ennemond Perrin, a wealthy rope-seller, by which she was enabled to devote herself entirely to her literary tastes. Her house, near Lyons, became the resort of ~~the~~ of letters, and persons of distinction. In these societies, where Louise was the presiding genius, every thing was collected that could gratify the understanding, delight the imagination, or captivate the senses. The charms, talents, and assemblies of La belle Cordière, excited jealousy, and provoked scandal in the society of Lyons. Her writings, too, sometimes voluptuous, and sometimes satirical, afforded new provocation for censure, for which her conduct gave suspicion if not proof.

The most celebrated of her works is a fiction entitled "Debat de Folie et d'Amour;" it is dedicated to her illustrious friend Clemence de Bourges. This piece is full of wit, originality, and beauty. Erasmus and La Fontaine were both indebted to it; the first, for the idea of "The Praise of Folly," and the last, for "L'Amour et la Folie." In truth, La Fontaine's poem is only a versification of the prose story of Louise Labbé. Her elegies and sonnets are highly esteemed by the French.

We may find some excuse for her conduct in the character of the age, when gallantry was not considered dishonourable; and she herself was surrounded by a crowd of agreeable and distinguished, but licentious men. Her generosity, her taste for learning, and her acquirements, so extraordinary for the times, effaced this stain in the eyes of most of her contemporaries, as we learn from tributes of esteem paid her. The street in Lyons where her house was situated was called after her, and still bears the name of La Belle Cordière. The charm of her conversation, her accomplishments, her talents, the verses which she composed and sung to the lute, contributed to fascinate her admirers to the end of her life. She died in 1566.

LABROUSE, CLOTILDE SUZETTE COURCELLES,

A CELEBRATED French visionary, was born May 8th, 1747, of respectable parents, in the town of Vauxains, in Perigord, in the department of Dordogne. From the age of four she displayed deep religious fervour, and her greatest happiness was in the performance of her religious duties, to which, notwithstanding the remonstrances of her mother, and the raillery of her young companions, she devoted the most of her time. From her earliest years she regarded herself as an especial instrument to make known the will of God. She fasted, wore a girdle lined with sharp points, slept on the floor in winter, cut off her beautiful hair, and gave up music, of which she was very fond. She had offers of marriage, from a young man of great piety and immense fortune, whom she liked, but refused to marry, as she said an internal voice commanded her to do, that she might not fail in the great mission which had devolved on her.

Her strongest desire was to travel to convert mankind, but this she was prevented from doing till 1779; she then escaped from her home, and arrived safely in Paris, where she passed some time under the protection of the Duchess de Bourbon. Here she was visited by all classes of people, and regarded as a prophetess. She predicted various events, and carried on a profound argument with the Abbé Maury, in which she came off victorious. Leaving Paris, where she had been very successful, she returned to Perigord, and went from there to Rome, to convert the pope and cardinals "to the principles of liberty and equality; of the civil constitution of the clergy; and to persuade the pope to abdicate his temporal power." Suzette preached at the different places through which she passed; but when she reached Boulogne, in October, 1792, she was ordered by the pope's legate to leave the city. She took refuge in Viterbo; but the pope had her seized, and confined in the castle of San Angelo. She was not ill-treated, however; and when the Directory, in 1796, requested her liberation, she replied that she did not wish to leave Italy till 1800, when she had predicted that there would be a sign in heaven which would open the eyes of the pope himself. But when the French took Rome, in 1798, she returned to Paris, where she was surrounded by a number of disciples, although the year 1800 passed without the sign. Her followers, many of whom were learned men, remained steadfast, however, and Suzette continued to have visions till she was seventy-four. She died in 1821. Pontard, bishop of Paris, remained faithful to her to the last.

LACOMBE, ROSE,

ONE of the terrible heroines or rather furies of the French revolution, born about 1768, was an actress of high reputation, and very beautiful. She was one of the leaders in that crowd of ferocious women who attacked the Hotel-de-Ville, and obliged the king and his family to return from Versailles to Paris. She founded a club of women, in which she was the chief speaker; and joined in the attack on the Tuilleries, in which she showed such intrepidity, that the city of Marseilles decreed to her a civic crown. She entered with her whole soul into all the scenes of savage cruelty which disgraced those times. After having been the recognised leader and orator of the republican women for some time, she suddenly lost nearly all her influence by falling violently in love with, and endeavouring with her usual reckless impetuosity, to save, but in vain, a young nobleman who was imprisoned.

The latter part of her life was passed in a small shop, where she gained her livelihood by the sale of petty articles. The time or manner of her death is not known.

LAFAYETTE, MADAME,

BELONGED to the noble family of Noailles, and was married, when quite young, to General Lafayette. When, in 1793, he was imprisoned at Olmutz by the Austrians, she was confined in Paris, and only saved from the guillotine by the death of Robespierre. The first use she made of her freedom was to proceed to Vienna, where, through the compassion of prince de Rossenberg, she succeeded in obtaining an audience of the emperor. She pleaded earnestly for the release of her husband on the grounds of common justice and humanity, and urged her strong desire to see him restored to his family. The emperor said it was out of his power to grant her request, but he was willing she and her two daughters, (then about twelve and fifteen years of age,) should enliven the prisoner by taking up their abode with him. This indulgence was gratefully accepted, and the long-separated friends were restored to each other.

Madame Lafayette was deeply affected at the emaciated figure and pale countenance of her husband. She found him suffering under annoyances much worse than she had feared.

She wished to write to the emperor; but this was refused. She made applications for redress in other quarters, but received no answer, except, "Madame Lafayette has submitted to share the captivity of her husband. It is her own choice."

At length, her health, already impaired by sixteen months imprisonment in Paris, began to give way. She solicited permission to go to Vienna, to breathe pure air, and consult a physician. During two months she received no reply; but, at last, she was informed that the emperor permitted her to go out, upon condition that she never returned to the prison.

Being desired to signify her choice in writing, she wrote as follows.

"I consider it a duty to my family and friends to desire the assistance necessary for my health ; but they well know it cannot be accepted by me at the price attached to it. I cannot forget that while we were on the point of perishing, myself by the tyranny of Robespierre, and my husband by the physical and moral sufferings of captivity, I was not permitted to obtain any intelligence of him, nor to acquaint him that his children and myself were yet alive ; and I shall not expose myself to the horrors of another separation. Whatever then may be the state of my health, and the inconveniences of this abode for my daughters, we will gratefully avail ourselves of his Imperial Majesty's generosity, in permitting us to partake this captivity in all its circumstances."

After this, Madame Lafayette fearful of being separated from her husband, refrained from making any complaint ; although the air of the prison was so foetid, that the soldiers, who brought food, covered their faces when they opened the door.

She remained with him till he was set at freedom, after four years' captivity, by the intervention of Bonaparte. Madame Lafayette's health suffered so much from the close confinement, that she died soon after her release, in 1807.

LA FERTÉ IMBAULT, MARIA THERESA GEOFFRIN, MARCHIONESS DE,

DAUGHTER of the celebrated Madame Geoffrin, was born at Paris in 1715. She married, in 1733, the Marquis de la Ferté, great-grandson of the marshal of that name ; and distinguished herself, not only by her literary talents, but also by her opposition to the philosophical party among the French literati of the last century, with whom her mother had been intimately connected. In 1771, the Marquis de Croismare, a man of wit, and a friend of Madame de la Ferté Imbault, founded the burlesque order of the Lanturelas, of which he appointed that lady the grand-mistress, while he was himself the grand-master. This whimsical institution gave rise to a great many songs and lively verses ; and it attracted so much attention that Catharine II. was accustomed to advise all the Russian nobles who visited Paris to become Lanturelus, an honour which was sought by several sovereign princes. The Marchioness drew up a series of extracts from the writings of the ancient Pagan and Christian philosophers, for the instruction of the grandchildren of Louis XV. ; and she wrote a great number of letters to persons of rank and celebrity, which remain in manuscript in the hands of her husband's relations. She died at Paris, in 1791.

LAFITE, MARIE ELIZABETH DE,

Was born at Paris in 1750, and died at London in 1794. She wrote "Reponses à Démêler ou Essai d'une Maniere d'exercer l'attention ;" "Entretiens, Drames, et Contes Moraux, à l'usage des Enfants." She also translated into French, some of the works of Wieland, Gellert, and Lavater.

LAMB, LADY CAROLINE,

DAUGHTER of the Earl of Besborough, was born in 1785. The history of Lady Caroline Lamb is painfully interesting. She was united, before the age of twenty, to the Honourable William Lamb, (Lord Melbourne,) and was long the delight of the fashionable circles, from the singularity as well as the grace of her manners, her literary accomplishments, and personal attractions. On meeting with Lord Byron, she contracted an unfortunate attachment for the noble poet, which continued three years, and was the theme of much remark. The poet is said to have trifled with her feelings, and a rupture took place. "For many years Lady Caroline led a life of comparative seclusion, principally at Bocket Hall. This was interrupted by a singular and somewhat romantic occurrence. Riding with Mr. Lamb, she met, just by the park-gates, the hearse which was conveying the remains of Lord Byron to Newstead Abbey. She was taken home insensible : an illness of length and severity succeeded. Some of her medical attendants imputed her fits, certainly of great incoherence and long continuance, to partial insanity. At this supposition she was invariably and bitterly indignant. Whatever be the cause, it is certain from that time her conduct and habits materially changed ; and about three years before her death a separation took place between her and Mr. Lamb, who continued, however, frequently to visit, and, to the day of her death, to correspond with her. It is just to both parties to add, that Lady Caroline constantly spoke of her husband in the highest and most affectionate terms of admiration and respect. A romantic susceptibility of temperament and character seems to have been the bane of this unfortunate lady. Her fate illustrates the wisdom of Thomson's advice—

Then keep each passion down, however dear.
Trust me, the tender are the most severe.

Lady Caroline Lamb was the authoress of three works of fiction, which, from extrinsic circumstances, were highly popular in their day. The first, "Glenarvon," was published in 1816 ; and the hero was understood to shadow forth the character and sentiments of Lord Byron ! It was a representation of the dangers attending a life of fashion. The second, "Graham Hamilton," depicted the difficulties and dangers inseparable, even in the most amiable minds, from weakness and irresolution of character. The third, "Ada Reis," (1823,) is a wild Eastern tale, the hero being introduced as the Don Juan of his day, a Georgian by birth, who, like Othello, "is sold to slavery," but rises to honours and distinctions. In the end Ada is condemned, for various misdeeds, to eternal punishment !

LAMB, MARY,

THE daughter of respectable parents, was born in London about 1766. She was subject to attacks of insanity, and in one of them, in 1796, brought on by over-exertion, and anxiety about her mother, then quite an aged person, she stabbed her mother to the heart, killing her instantly. After recovering from this attack, she resided with her brother Charles, the well-known author of "Essays of Elia," who devoted his whole life to her. They lived in or near London. In connexion with her brother, Miss Lamb wrote two volumes of juvenile poetry; "Stories for Children, or Mrs. Leicester's School;" and "Tales from Shakspeare." Miss Lamb was remarkable for the sweetness of her disposition, the clearness of her understanding, and the gentle wisdom of all her acts and words, notwithstanding the distraction under which she suffered for weeks, and latterly for months, in every year. She survived her brother eleven years, dying May 20th, 1847. She was buried with him in Edmonton church-yard.

LAMBALLE, MARIE THÉRÈSE LOUISE, OF SAVOY, CARIGNAN, PRINCESS DE,

Was born at Turin, September 8th, 1749, and married the duke of Bourbon Penthièvre, by whom she was left a wealthy, young, beautiful, and amiable widow. When appointed intendant of the royal household of Marie Antoinette, she gained and deserved the confidence and warm affection of her mistress. On the unfortunate flight of the royal family to Varennes, Madame Lamballe escaped by another road from France to England, where she might have lived in safety; but she no sooner heard of the imprisonment of her royal friend, than she hastened back to Paris to soothe her miseries. This fidelity and devotion proved fatal to her. Dragged to the prison of La Force, she was tried before the bloody tribunal, September 3d, 1792; and, when questioned about the queen, she answered with firmness and dignity. Some of the judges, moved by her heroism, youth, and beauty, wished to spare her; but as soon as she had left the place of her trial, she was seized by the mob and literally torn and cut to pieces. Her head was placed on a pike, and paraded by the diabolical monsters in view of the unfortunate queen and her family.

The character of the princess de Lamballe was so perfect, that not even her enemies and assassins dared to asperse it.

LAMBERT, ANNE THÉRÈSE, MARQUISE DE,

Was daughter of a master of the accounts, and was born at Paris in 1647. She lost her father at three years old; and her mother then married the ingenious Bachaumont, who took great pleasure in cultivating his step-daughter's talents. She married Henri Lambert, marquis of St. Bris, in 1666; but he died in 1688. After this, she had long and troublesome law-suits; but succeeding in them, she took a house in Paris, to which it was considered an honour to be admitted. All literary persons resorted to it for the sake of conversation, as hers was almost the only house free from the vice of gaming. She died in 1733, aged 86. Her works were printed in two volumes, and are marked by fine sense, taste, and spirit. The principal ones are, "Avis d'une Mère à son fils, et d'une Mère à sa fille." These are not mere dry didactic precepts, but the easy and graceful effusions of a noble and delicate mind. "Nouvelles Reflexions sur les Femmes;" "Traité de l'Amitié;" "Traité de la Vieillesse; et "La Femme Hermite;" were among her works. The following selections give a more striking portrait of this excellent woman than any mere description.

EXTRAIT DES AVIS D'UNE MÈRE A SON FILS.

* * * * *

Au-dessus de tous vos devoirs, est le culte que vous devez à l'Être Suprême. La religion est un commerce établi entre Dieu et les hommes; par la grâce de Dieu aux hommes, et par le culte des hommes à Dieu. Les âmes élevées ont pour Dieu des sentimens et un culte à part, qui ne ressemble point à celui du peuple: tout part du cœur et va à Dieu. Les vertus morales sont en danger, sans les chrétiennes. Je ne vous demande point une religion remplie de faiblesse et de superstition: je demande seulement que l'amour de l'ordre soumette à Dieu vos lumières et vos sentimens, que le même amour de l'ordre se répande sur votre conduite; il vous donnera la justice, et la justice assure toutes les vertus.

Il y a des âmes basses qui sont toujours prosternées devant la grandeur. Il faut séparer l'homme de la dignité, et voir ce qu'il est, quand il en est dépouillé; il y a bien une autre grandeur que celle qui vient de l'autorité; ce n'est ni la puissance ni les richesses qui distinguent les hommes; la supériorité réelle et véritable entre eux, c'est le mérite.

Le titre d'honnête homme est bien au-dessus des titres de la fortune. Le plaisir le plus délicat est de faire le plaisir d'autrui; mais pour cela, il ne faut pas tant faire de cas des biens de la fortune. Les richesses n'ont jamais donné la vertu, mais la vertu a souvent donné les richesses. . . .

L'honnête homme aime mieux manquer à sa fortune qu'à la justice. L'amour des richesses est le commencement de tous les vices, comme le désintéressement et le principe de toutes les vertus.

Le plaisir le plus touchant pour les honnêtes gens, c'est de faire du bien, et de soulager les misérables. Quelle différence d'avoir un peu plus d'argent, ou de le savoir perdre pour faire plaisir, et de le changer contre la réputation de bonté et de générosité!

Ayez des pensées et des sentimens qui soient dignes de vous. La vertu rehausse l'état de l'homme, et le vice le dégrade.

EXTRAIT DES AVIS D'UNE MÈRE A SA FILLE.

Il ne suffit pas, ma fille, pour être estimable, de s'assujettir extérieurement aux bienséances; ce sont les sentimens qui forment le caractère, qui conduisent l'esprit, qui gouvernent la volonté, qui répondent de la réalité et de la durée de toutes nos vertus. Quel sera le principe de ces sentimens? la religion; quand elle sera gravée dans notre cœur, alors toutes les vertus couleront de cette source; tous les devoirs se rangeront chacun dans leur ordre. Ce n'est pas assez pour la conduite des jeunes personnes, que de les obliger à faire leur devoir; il faut le leur faire aimer: l'autorité est le tyran de l'extérieur, qui n'assujettit point le dedans. Quand on prescrit une conduite, il faut en montrer les raisons et les motifs, et donner du goût pour ce que l'on conseille.

Nous avons tant d'intérêt à pratiquer la vertu, que nous ne devons jamais la regarder comme notre ennemie, mais comme la source de bonheur, de la gloire et de la paix. Vous arrivez dans le monde; venez-y, ma fille, avec des principes; vous ne sauriez trop vous fortifier contre ce qui vous attend; apportez-y toute votre religion: nourrissez-la dans votre cœur par des sentimens; soutenez-la dans votre esprit par des réflexions et par des lectures convenables. . . .

Les femmes qui n'ont nourri leur esprit que des maximes de siècle, tombent dans un grand vide en avançant dans l'âge: le monde les quitte, et la raison leur ordonne aussi de le quitter: à quoi se prendre? le passé nous fournit des regrets, le présent des chagrins, et l'avenir des craintes. La religion seule calme tout, et console de tout; en vous unissant à Dieu, elle vous réconcilie avec le monde et avec vous-même. . . .

Les plaisirs du monde sont trompeurs; ils promettent plus qu'ils ne donnent; ils nous inquiètent dans leur recherche, ne nous satisfont point dans leur possession, et nous désespèrent dans leur perte. . . . Ne nous croyons heureuses, ma fille, que lorsque nous sentirons nos plaisirs naître du fond de notre ame. . . . Il y a de grandes vertus, qui, portées à un certain degré, font pardonner bien des défauts: la suprême valeur dans les hommes, et l'extrême pudeur dans les femmes. On pardonnait tout à Agrippine, femme de Germanicus, en faveur de sa chasteté: cette princesse était ambitieuse et hautaine; mais, dit Tacite, "toutes ses passions étaient consacrées par sa chasteté." . . .

Que votre première parure soit donc la modestie: elle a de grands avantages, elle augmente la beauté et sert de voile à la laideur; la modestie est le supplément de la beauté. . . . Il ne faut pas négliger les talens ni les agrémens, puisque les femmes sont destinées à plaire; mais il faut bien plus penser à se donner un mérite solide, qu'à s'occuper de choses frivoles. Rien n'est plus court que le règne de la beauté; rien n'est plus triste que la suite de la vie des femmes qui n'ont su qu'être belles. . . . Une honnête femme a les vertus des hommes, l'amitié, la probité, la fidélité à ses devoirs.

Les femmes apprennent volontiers l'Italien qui me paraît dangereux: c'est la langue de l'amour, les auteurs italiens sont peu châtiés; il règne dans leurs ouvrages un jeu de mots, une imagination sans règle, qui s'oppose à la justesse de l'esprit.

La poésie peut avoir des inconvéniens; j'aurais pourtant de la peine à interdire la lecture des belles tragédies de Corneille: mais souvent les meilleures vous donnent des leçons de vertu, et vous laissent l'impression du vice.

La lecture des romans est plus dangereuse: je ne voudrais pas que l'on en fit un grand usage, ils mettent du faux dans l'esprit. Le roman n'étant jamais pris sur le vrai, allume l'imagination, affaiblit la pudeur, met le désordre dans le cœur, et, pour peu qu'une jeune personne ait de la disposition à la tendresse, hâte et précipite son penchant. Il ne faut point augmenter le charme et l'illusion de l'amour: plus il est adouci plus il est modeste et plus il est dangereux. Je ne voudrais point les défendre; toutes défenses blessent la liberté, et augmentent le désir; mais il faut, autant qu'on peut, s'accoutumer à des lectures solides, qui ornent l'esprit et fortifient le cœur: on ne peut trop éviter celles qui laissent des impressions dangereuses et difficiles à effacer.

PORTRAIT DE FENELON.

Fénelon était d'une assez haute taille, bien fait, maigre et pâle; il avait la nez grand et bien tiré. Le feu et l'esprit sortaient de ses yeux comme un torrent. Sa physionomie était telle qu'on n'en voyait point qui lui ressemblât; aussi ne pouvait-on l'oublier dès qu'une fois on l'avait vu: elle rassemblait tout, et les contraires ne s'y combattaient point; elle avait de la gravité et de la douceur, du sérieux et de la gaieté. Ce qui surnageait sur tout sa personne, c'était la finesse, la décence, les grâces, et surtout la noblesse: il fallait faire effort sur soi-même pour cesser de la regarder. Tous ses portraits sont parlans, sans que néanmoins on ait jamais pu attraper la justesse et l'harmonie qui frappaient dans l'original, et la délicatesse que chaque caractère de ce visage réunissait. Ses manières y répondaient dans la même proportion: c'était une aisance qui en l'honneur aux autres, un air de bon goût dont il était redevable à l'usage du grand monde et de la meilleure compagnie, et qui se répandait, comme de soi-même, dans toutes ses conversations, et cela avec une éloquence naturelle, douce, fleurie; une politesse insinuante, mais noble et proportionnée; une élocution facile, nette, agréable; un ton de clarté et de précision pour se faire entendre, même en traitant les matières les plus abstraites et les plus embarrassées. Avec cela il ne voulait jamais avoir plus d'esprit que ceux à qui il parlait; il se mettait à la portée de chacun sans le faire sentir, il mettait à l'aise, et semblait enchanter de façon qu'on ne pouvait le quitter, ni s'en défendre, ni ne pas soupirer après le moment de le retrouver. C'est ce talent si rare et qu'il avait au suprême degré, qui lui tint ses amis si attachés toute sa vie, malgré sa chute, sa disgrâce, et qui, dans le triste éloignement où ils étaient de lui, les réunissait pour parler de lui, pour le regretter, pour le désirer, pour soupirer après son retour, et l'espérer sans cesse.

LAMBRUN, MARGARET,

Was a Scotchwoman, one of the retinue of Mary, Queen of Scots, as was also her husband, who died of grief on account of his queen's execution. Margaret Lambrun then resolved to avenge the death of both by assassinating Queen Elizabeth; she, therefore, dressed herself like a man, took the name of Anthony Sparke, and went to the court of the English queen, carrying with her a brace of pistols; one for the queen, and the other for herself. But, as she was pressing through the crowd to get near her majesty, who was then walking in her garden, she dropped one of her pistols. This being seen by the guards, she was seized, and brought before the queen, who wished to examine the prisoner herself. When Elizabeth demanding her name, country, and condition, Margaret replied with great firmness:

"Madam, though I appear in this habit, I am a woman; my name is Margaret Lambrun; I was several years in the service of Queen Mary, whom you have so unjustly put to death; and, by her death, you have also caused that of my husband, who died of grief to see so innocent a queen perish so iniquitously. Now, as I had the greatest love and affection for both these personages, I resolved, at the peril of my life, to revenge their death by killing you, who are the cause of both. I confess to you, that I suffered many struggles within my breast, and have made all possible efforts to divert my resolution from so pernicious a design, but all in vain; I found myself necessitated to prove by experience the certain truth of that maxim, that neither reason nor force can hinder a woman from vengeance, when she is impelled thereto by love."

The queen heard this bold address with composure, and answered calmly: "You are then persuaded that, in this action, you have done your duty, and satisfied the demands which your love for your mistress and your spouse indispensably required from you; but what think you now is my duty to do to you?"

Margaret replied, with the same unmoved hardness: "I will tell you frankly my opinion, provided you will let me know whether you put this question in the quality of a queen or in that of a judge?"

To which her majesty professing that of a queen: "Then," said Margaret, "your majesty ought to grant me a pardon."

"But what assurance can you give me," said the queen, "that you will not make the like attempt on some other occasion?"

"Madam," replied Lambrun, "a favour given under such restraint is no more a favour; and, in so doing, your majesty would act against me as a judge."

The queen turned to some of her council, and said, "I have been thirty years a queen, but do not remember to have had such a lecture ever read to me before;" and immediately granted an entire and unconditional pardon. Margaret Lambrun showed her prudence by begging the queen to extend her generosity still farther, and grant her a safe conduct to the coast of France; with which request Elizabeth complied.

LAMOTTE, VALOIS, COUNTESS OF,

Was the principal actor in the affair of the necklace, which caused so much annoyance and injury to Marie Antoinette, queen of France. The countess of Lamotte, an immoral intriguing woman, well known as such to most of the principal persons in Paris, suddenly, from great poverty, apparently became very wealthy. The means by which she supported her extravagance at length was ascertained. The countess, knowing the great desire of prince Louis de Rohan, cardinal bishop of Strasburg, who had fallen into disgrace at court, to regain favour, told him that the queen, Marie Antoinette, with whom she said she was on very confidential terms, wished to obtain a diamond necklace then for sale, but not having at the time sufficient money by her, would like him to purchase the necklace as if for himself, and the queen would repay him by instalments and restore him to favour. The cardinal did so, and gave the necklace to the countess de Lamotte for the queen, who gave him in return a bond which she had forged. The countess also procured a woman who resembled the queen, to personate her in a private interview with the cardinal, on a night in August, 1784. When the time for payment arrived, the cardinal, not being able to meet the demand, told the jewellers that he had bought it for the queen. The jewellers, after some time, applied to the king, and the fraud was discovered. Rohan was tried and acquitted; but the countess de Lamotte was sentenced to be scourged, branded, and imprisoned for life. After some months' confinement she escaped and went to England, where her husband was living on the proceeds derived from the sale of the necklace. Here she wrote a pamphlet defaming the queen, which prejudiced many people against that princess. The countess was found one morning dead on the pavement in one of the streets of London, having fallen, while intoxicated, from a window in the third story of her lodgings.

LANDA, CATHARINE,

Was eminent for her beauty and learning. She wrote a letter in Latin to Peter Bembo, which, with his answer, is printed in that author's works. She died in 1526, at a very early age.

LANE, JANE,

A WOMAN of great spirit and sagacity, assisted in the escape of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester. The royal fugitive, disguised in her father's livery, rode before her on horseback from Bentley-Hall, in Staffordshire, to Mr. Norton's, near Bristol. Charles II., on his restoration, rewarded her amply; and she married Sir Clement Fisher, bart., of Packington-Hall, in Warwickshire.

LANDON, LETITIA ELIZABETH,

GENERALLY known as L. E. L., in consequence of having first published under her initials only, was born at Hans Place, Chelsea, in 1802. Her father, Mr. Landon, was a partner in the house of Adairs, army agents. When about seven years of age, Miss Landon's parents removed to Trevor Park, not far from East Barnet, where, amidst scenes vividly depicted in various passages in her later works, were passed many of the happiest days of her childhood. In the "Traits and Trials of Early Life," in "The History of a Child," she is supposed to have portrayed that of her own early years; but the account is part romance and part reality. She describes "a large, old, and somewhat dilapidated place,"—of which "only part of the grounds were kept in their original high order." Here she was wont "to wander in the almost deserted shrubberies, where the flowers grew in all the luxuriance of neglect over the walls." According to the same fictitious picture, on a small island, in a deep pond, almost dark with the depth of shadow, and partly covered with water-lilies, "with the large green leaves that support the loveliest of ivory boats, fit for the fairy queen and her summer court," grew one curiously-shaped but huge yew-tree, and in the shadows of this gloomy tree the embryo poetess was wont to conceal herself for the whole of her playtime, "chewing the cud of sweet and bitter fancy," and brooding over the troubles and sorrows which necessarily await every shy and sensitive person, and which are perhaps never more acutely felt than in the days of early childhood. Her childhood, however, was cheerful and often joyous.

In 1815, when Miss Landon was about thirteen years of age, the family quitted Trevor Park; and after a twelvemonths' residence at Lewis Place, Fulham, Mr. Landon removed to Brompton, where a considerable part of his daughter's youth was passed, excepting a year or two spent with her grandmother in Sloane street, and some occasional visits to her relations. Here, no sooner was she emancipated from the school-room, and allowed to pursue the bent of her own mind, than her poetical reveries were committed to paper; and through the encouraging kindness of Mr. Jerdan, the editor of the Literary Gazette, to whose judgment they were submitted, while still in her teens, the youthful writer had the pleasure of seeing some of her verses first appear in print, in the pages of that periodical, and visions of fame, perhaps, in some degree, comforted her for the reverses to which her family were then beginning to be subjected.

"The Fate of Adelaide," a romantic tale, and some minor poems, were published in 1821, when Miss Landon was nineteen; and the first of her principal poetical works was issued in 1824. In the summer of 1825, the "Troubadour" appeared, and some other volumes of her poetry.

Her father died about this time, and Miss Landon's literary exertions were directed to support her family and assist her brother. An extract from a letter of hers touchingly alludes to the painful circumstances in which this delicate daughter of the muse was placed:

"The more I think of my past life, and of my future prospects, the more dreary do they seem. I have known little else than privation, disappointment, unkindness, and harassment; from the time I was fifteen, my life has been one continual struggle, in some shape or other, against absolute poverty; and I must say not a tithe of my profits have I ever expended on myself. And here I cannot but allude to the remarks on my dress. It is easy for those whose only trouble on that head is change, to find fault with one who never in her life knew what it was to have two dresses at a time. No one knows but myself what I have had to contend with."

Miss Landon has herself remarked, that "a history of the how and where works of imagination have been produced, would often be more extraordinary than the works themselves." A friend of hers observes, that "though a dilettante of literature would assign for the scene of her authorship a fairy-like boudoir, with rose-coloured and silver hangings, filled with all the luxuries of a fastidious taste," yet the reality was of a very different nature; for though her drawing-room was prettily furnished, it was her invariable habit to write in her bed-room,—"a homely-looking, almost uncomfortable room, fronting the street, and barely furnished—with a simple white bed, at the foot of which was a small, old, oblong-shaped sort of dressing-table, quite covered with a common worn writing-desk, heaped with papers, while some strewed the ground, the table being too small for aught besides the desk. A little high-backed cane chair, which gave you any idea but that of comfort, and a few books scattered about, completed the author's paraphernalia."

"Miss Landon was not strictly handsome, her eyes being the only good feature in her face; but her countenance was intellectual and piquant, and her figure slight and beautifully proportioned. Altogether, however, her clear complexion, dark hair and eyes, the vivacious expression with which the latter were lighted up when animated and in good health, combined with her kind and fascinating manners, to render her extremely attractive; so that the rustic expression of sentiment from the Etrick Shepherd, when he was first introduced to her, 'I did nae think ye had been sae bonny,' was perhaps the feeling experienced by many when they first beheld L. E. L."

Such is the portrait of this fascinating writer, drawn by one of her biographers. William Howitt, in his notice of Miss Landon, gives a sweeter touch to the picture. "Your first impressions of her were—what a little, light, simple-looking girl! If you had not been aware of her being a popular poetess, you would have suspected her of nothing more than an agreeable, bright, and joyous young lady. This feeling in her own house, or among a few congenial people, was quickly followed by a feeling of the kind-heartedness and goodness about her. You felt that you could not be long with her without loving her."

In her later productions, Miss Landon greatly improved in the philosophy of her art. She addresses other feelings besides love; her style has more simplicity and strength, and the sentiment becomes elevated and womanly—for we hold that the loftiest, purest, and best qualities of our nature, the moral feelings, are peculiarly suitable, for their development and description, to the genius of woman. "The Lost Pleiad" and "The History of the Lyre," have many passages of true and simple feeling, united with an elevated moral sentiment, and that accurate knowledge of life, which shows the observing and reasoning mind in rapid progress. Such are the following passages:—

"Can that man be dead
Whose spiritual influence is upon his kind?
He lives in glory; and such speaking dust
Has more of life than half its breathing moulds.
Welcome a grave, with memories such as these,
Making the sunshine of our moral world."

* * * * *
"Love mine, I know my weakness, and I know
How far I fall short of the glorious goal
I purpose to myself; yet if one line
Has stolen from the eye unconscious tears,
Recalled one lover to fidelity,
Which is the holiness of love—or bade
One maiden sicken at cold vanity,
When dreaming o'er affection's tenderness,
The deep, the true, the honoured of my song,—
If but one worldly soil has been effaced,
That song has not been utterly in vain.
One true, deep feeling purifies the heart."

In 1838, Miss Landon married George Maclean, governor of Cape-Coast castle, and soon after sailed for Cape-Coast with her husband. She landed there in August, and was resuming, for the benefit of her family in England, her literary engagements in her solitary African home, when one morning, after writing the previous night some cheerful and affectionate letters to her friends in England, she was (October 16th) found dead in her room, with a bottle, which had contained prussic acid, in her hand. It was conjectured that she had undesignedly taken an over-dose of the fatal medicine, as a relief from spasms in the stomach, to which she was subject. Her last poems are superior in freedom, force, and originality, to her first. She is most distinguished for her poetical writings, though her tales and romances show great wit, vivacity, and knowledge of life. Her principal poetical works are "The Improvisatrice;" "The Troubadour;" "The Golden Violet;" "The Golden Bracelet;" and "The Vow of the Peacock." Besides these, she has written three novels, "Romance and Reality;" "Francesca Carrera;" and "Ethel Churchill;" and a volume of tales, entitled "Traits and Trials," in which she is supposed to have depicted the history of her own childhood. She was a frequent contributor to many of the periodicals, and nearly all the annuals of the day. Many of her best poems were written for these publications, and may be found in "Literary Remains of L. E. L., with Memoirs of her Life." Edited by Laman Blanchard. In our selections, we will cull a few of the aphorisms and sentiments which make her prose remarkable for its boldness of truth and sympathy with "those who suffer and are sad."

Extracts from "Francesca Carrera."

YOUTH.

No marvel that we regret our youth. Let its bloom, let pleasures depart, could they but leave behind the singleness and the innocence of the happy and trusting heart. The lessons of experience may open the eyes; but, as in the northern superstition, they only open to see dust and clay, where they once beheld the beauty of palaces.

ENTHUSIASM.

Enthusiasm is the royal road to success. Now, call it fame, vanity—what you will—how strange and how strong is the feeling which urges on the painter or the author! We ought to marvel less at the works produced, than at the efforts made. Their youth given to hopes, or rather fears—now brightening and now darkening, on equally slight grounds,

"A breath can mar them, as a breath has made,"— hours of ceaseless exertion in solitude, of feverish solicitude in society: doomed to censure, which is always in earnest, and to praise, which is not. Alas! we talk of their vanity; we forget that in doling forth the careless sneer, we are bestowing but the passing thought of a moment to that which has been the work of an existence. Truly, genius, like virtue, ought to be its own reward, but it cannot. Bitter though the toil, and vain the hope, human exertion must still look to human approbation.

IMAGINATION.

Nothing at first frames such false estimates as an imaginative temperament. It finds the power of creation so easy, the path it fashions so actual, that no marvel for a time hope is its own security, and the fancied world appears the true copy of the real.

APHORISMS.

There never was a mask so gay but some tears were shed behind it.

We cannot understand what we have never experienced; we need pain, were it only to teach us sympathy.

It is a great error for the heart to hoard up the romance which is only graceful in youth—and it is dangerous too.

Hopes and regrets are the sweetest links of existence.

Society is like a large piece of frozen water; and skating well is the great art of social life.

From "Trials of Early Life."

What a duty it is to cultivate a pleasant manner! how many a meeting does it make cheerful which would otherwise have been stupid and formal! We do not mean by this the mere routine of polite observance; but we mean that general cheerfulness which, like sunshine, lights up whatever it touches; that attention to others which discovers what subject is most likely to interest them; and that information which, ready for use, is easily laid under contribution by the habit of turning all resources to immediate employ. In short, a really pleasant manner grows out of benevolence, which can be as much shown in a small courtesy as in a great service.

WOMAN'S DESTINY.

"I am a woman:—tell me not of fame!
The eagle's wing may sweep the stormy path,
And fling back arrows, where the dove would die.
Look on those flowers near yon acacia tree—
The lily of the valley—mark how pure
The snowy blossoms,—and how soft a breath
Is almost hidden by the large dark leaves.
Not only have those delicate flowers a gift
Of sweetness and of beauty, but the root—
A healing power dwells there; fragrant and fair,
But dwelling still in some beloved shade.
Is not this woman's emblem?—she whose smile
Should only make the loveliness of home—
Who seeks support and shelter from man's heart,
And pays it with affection quiet, deep,—
And in his sickness—sorrow—with an aid
He did not deem in aught so fragile dwelt.
Alas! this has not been my destiny.
Again I'll borrow Summer's eloquence.
Yon Eastern tulip—that is emblem mine;
Ay! it has radiant colours—every leaf
Is as a gem from its own country's mines.
'Tis redolent with sunshine; but with noon
It has begun to wither:—look within,
It has a wasted bloom, a burning heart;
It has dwelt too much in the open day,
And so have I; and both must droop and die!
I did not choose my gift:—too soon my heart,
Watch-like, had pointed to a later hour
Than time had reached; and as my years passed on,
Shadows and floating visions grew to thoughts,
And thoughts found words, the passionate words of song,
And all to me was poetry.

THE POET'S POWER.

Oh, never had the poet's lute a hope,
An aim so glorious as it now may have,
In this our social state, where petty cares
And mercenary interests only lock
Upon the present's littleness, and shrink
From the bold future, and the stately past,—
Where the smooth surface of society
Is polished by deceit, and the warm heart
With all its kind affections' early flow,
Flung back upon itself, forgets to beat,
At least for others:—'t is the poet's gift
To melt these frozen waters into tears,
By sympathy with sorrows not our own,
By wakening memory with those mournful notes,
Whose music is the thoughts of early years,
When truth was on the lip, and feelings wore
The sweetness and the freshness of their morn.
Young poet, if thy dreams have not such hope
To purify, refine, exalt, subdue,
To touch the selfish, and to shame the vain
Out of themselves, by gentle mournfulness,
Or chords that rouse some aim of enterprise,
Lofty and pure, and meant for general good;
If thou hast not some power that may direct
The mind from the mean round of daily life,
Waking affections that might else have slept,
Or high resolves, the petrified before,
Or rousing in that mind a firer sense

Of inward and external loveness,
Making imagination serve as guide
To all of heaven that yet remains on earth,—
Thine is a useless lute: break it, and die.

MUSINGS.

Methinks we must have known some former state
More glorious than our present, and the heart
Is haunted with dim memories, shadows left
By past magnificence; and hence we pine
With vain aspirings, hopes that fill the eyes
With bitter tears for their own vanity.
Remembrance makes the poet; 't is the past
Lingering within him, with a keener sense
Than is upon the thoughts of common men,
Of what has been, that fills the actual world
With unreal likenesses of lovely shapes,
That were and are not; and the fairer they,
The more their contrast with existing things;
The more his power, the greater is his grief.
—Are we then fallen from some noble star,
Whose consciousness is as an unknown curse,
And we feel capable of happiness
Only to know it is not of our sphere?

I have sung passionate songs of beating hearts;
Perhaps it had been better they had drawn
Their inspiration from an inward source.
Had I known even an unhappy love,
It would have flung an interest round life
Mine never knew. This is an empty wish,
Our feelings are not fires to light at will
Our nature's fine and subtle mysteries;
We may control them, but may not create,
And love less than its fellows. I have fed
Perhaps too much upon the lotus fruits
Imagination yields,—fruits which unfit
The palate for the more substantial food
Of our own land—reality. I made
My heart too like a temple for a home;
My thoughts were birds of paradise, that breathed
The airs of heaven, but died on touching earth.
—The knight whose deeds were stainless as his crest
Who made my name his watchword in the field;
The poet with immortal words, whose heart
I shared with beauty; or the patriot,
Whose eloquence was power, who made my smile
His recompense amid the toil which shaped
A nation's destiny: these, such as these,
The glorified—the passionate—the brave—
In these I might have found the head and heart
I could have worshipped. Where are such as these?
—Not 'mid gay cavaliers who make the dance
Pleasant with graceful flatteries; whose words
A passing moment might light up my cheek,
But haunted not my solitude. The fault
Has been my own; perhaps I asked too much:—
Yet let me say, what firmly I believe,
Love can be—ay, and is. I held that Love
Which chooseth from a thousand only one,
To be the object of that tenderness
Natural to every heart; which can resign
Its own best happiness for one dear sake;
Can bear with absence; hath no part in Hope,—
For Hope is somewhat selfish,—Love is not.—
And doth prefer another to itself.
Unchangeable and generous, what, like Love,
Can melt away the dross of worldliness,
Can elevate, refine and make the heart
Of that pure gold which is the fitting shrine
For fire, as sacred as e'er came from heaven?

LINES OF LIFE.

Orphan in my first years, I early learnt
To make my heart suffice itself, and seek Support and sympathy in its own depths.

Well, read my cheek, and watch my eye,—
Too strictly schooled are they,
One secret of my soul to show,
One hidden thought betray.

I never knew the time my heart
Looked freely from my brow;
It once was checked by timidity,
'Tis taught by caution now.

I live among the cold, the false,
And I must seem like them;
And such I am, for I am false
As those I most condemn.

I teach my lip its sweetest smile,
My tongue its softest tone;
I borrow others' likeness, till
Almost I lose my own.

I pass through flattery's gilded sieve,
Whatever I would say;
In social life, all, like the blind,
Must learn to feel their way.

I check my thoughts like curbed steeds
That struggle with the rein;
I bid my feelings sleep, like wrecks
In the unfathomed main.

I hear them speak of love, the deep,
The true,—and mock the name;
Mock at all high and early truth,
And I too do the same.

I hear them tell some touching tale,
I swallow down the tear;
I hear them name some generous deed,
And I have learned to sneer.

I hear the spiritual, the kind,
The pure, but named in mirth;
Till all of good, ay, even hope,
Seems exiled from our earth.

And one fear, withering ridicule,
Is all that I can dread;
A sword hung by a single hair,
Forever o'er the head

We bow to a most servile faith,
In a most servile fear;
While none among us dares to say
What none will choose to hear.

And if we dream of loftier thoughts,
In weakness they are gone;
And indolence and vanity
Rivet our fetters on.

Surely I was not born for this!
I feel a loftier mood
Of generous impulse, high resolve,
Steal o'er my solitude!

I gaze upon the thousand stars
That fill the midnight sky;
And wish, so passionately wish,
A light like theirs on high.

I have such eagerness of hope
To benefit my kind;
And feel as if immortal power
Were given to my mind.

I think on that eternal fame,
The sun of earthly gloom,
Which makes the gloriousness of death,
The future of the tomb—

That earthly future, the faint sign
Of a more heavenly one;
—A step, a word, a voice, a look,—
Alas! my dream is done.

And earth, and earth's debasing stain,
Again is on my soul;
And I am but a nameless part
Of a most worthless whole.

Why write I this? because my heart
Towards the future springs,
That future where it loves to soar
On more than eagle wings.

The present, it is but a speck
In that eternal time,
In which my lost hopes find a home,
My spirit knows its clime.

Oh! not myself,—for what am I?—
The worthless and the weak,
Whose every thought of self should raise
A blush to burn my cheek.

But song has touched my lips with fire,
And made my heart a shrine:
For what, although alloyed, debased,
Is in itself divine.

I am, myself, but a vile link
Amid life's weary chain;
But I have spoken hallowed words
Oh! do not say in vain

My first, my last, my only wish,—
Say, will my charmed chords
Wake to the morning light of fame,
And breathe again my words?

Will the young maiden, when her tears
Alone in moonlight shine—
Tears for the absent and the loved—
Murmur some song of mine?

Will the pale youth, by his dim lamp,
Himself a dying flame,
From many an antique scroll beside,
Choose that which bears my name?

Let music make less terrible
The silence of the dead;
I care not, so my spirit last
Long after life has fled.

FEMALE FAITH.

She loved you when the sunny light
Of bliss was on your brow;
That bliss has sunk in sorrow's night,
And yet she loves you now.

She loved you when your joyous tone
Taught every heart to thrill;
The sweetness of that tongue is gone,
And yet—she loves you still.

She loved you when you proudly stepped
The gayest of the gay;
That pride the blight of time hath swept,
Unlike her love, away.

She loved you when your home and heart
Of fortune's smile could boast;
She saw that smile decay—depart—
And then she loved you most.

Oh, such the generous faith that glows
In woman's gentle breast;
'Tis like that star that stays and glows
Alone in night's dark vest;

That stays because each other ray
Has left the lonely shore,
And that the wanderer on his way
Then wants her light the more.

THE EVE OF ST. JOHN.

There is a flower, a magical flower,
On which love hath laid a fairy power;
Gather it on the eve of St. John,
When the clock of the village is tolling one;

Let no look be turned, no word be said,
 And lay the rose-leaves under your head;
 Your sleep will be light, and pleasant your rest,
 For your visions will be of the youth you love best.
 Four days I had not my own love seen,—
 Where, sighed I, can my wanderer have been?
 I thought I would gather the magical flower,
 And see him at least in my sleeping hour!
 St. John's Eve came; to the garden I flew,
 Where the white roses shone with the silver dew:
 The nightingale sang as I passed along—
 I startled to hear even her sweet song;
 The sky was bright with moon and star shine,
 And the wind was sweet as a whisper of thine,
 Dear love; for whose sake I stripped the tree-rose,
 And softly and silently stole to repose.
 No look I turned, and no word I said,
 But laid the white roses under my head.

Oh, sweet was the dream that came to me then!
 I dreamt of a lonely and lovely glen,
 There was a clear and beautiful sky,
 Such as is seen in the blue July:
 To the north was a forest of darkling pine;
 To the south were hills all green with the vine,
 Where the ruby clusters sparkled like gems
 Seen upon princely diadems;
 On the rocks were goats as white as snow,
 And the sheep-bell was heard in the valley below;
 And like a nest in the chestnut's shade,
 As just for love and contentment made,
 A little cottage stood, and the tree
 Shadowed it over most gracefully;
 A white rose grew up beside the door,
 The porch with the blossoms was covered o'er;
 Methought it was yours—you were standing by:
 You welcomed me, and I felt your sigh
 Warm on my cheek, and our lips met,—
 On mine the touch is thrilling yet!
 But alas! I awakened, and all I can do
 Is to tell the sweet dream, my own love, to you!

LOVE.

She prest her slight hand to her brow, or pain
 Or bitter thoughts were passing there. The room
 Had no light but that from the fireside,
 Which showed, then hid her face. How very pale
 It looked, when over it the glimmer shone!
 Is not the rose companion of the spring?
 Then wherefore has the red-leaved flower forgotten
 Her cheek? The tears stood in her large dark eyes—
 Her beautiful dark eyes—like hyacinth stars,
 When shines their shadowy glory through the dew
 That summer nights have wept:—she felt them not,
 Her heart was far away! Her fragile form,
 Like the young willow when for the first time
 The wind sweeps o'er it rudely, had not lost
 Its own peculiar grace; but it was bowed
 By sickness, or by worse than sickness—sorrow!
 And this is love! Oh! why should woman love:
 Wasting her dearest feelings, till health, hope,
 Happiness, are but things of which henceforth
 She'll only know the name? Her heart is seared:
 A sweet light has been thrown upon its life,
 To make its darkness the more terrible.
 And this is Love!

LAST VERSES OF L. E. L.

in allusion to the Pole Star, during her voyage to Africa.

A star has left the kindling sky—
 A lovely northern light;
 How many planets are on high
 But that has left the night.

I miss its bright familiar face,
 It was a friend to me;
 Associate with my native place,
 And those beyond the sea.

It rose upon our English sky,
 Shone o'er our English land,
 And brought back many a loving eye,
 And many a gentle hand.

It seemed to answer to my thought,
 It called the past to mind,
 And with its welcome presence brought
 All I had left behind.

The voyage it lights no longer, ends
 Soon on a foreign shore;
 How can I but recall the friends
 That I may see no more?

Fresh from the pain it was to part—
 How could I bear the pain?
 Yet strong the omen in my heart
 That says—We meet again.

Meet with a deeper, dearer love;
 For absence shows the worth
 Of all from which we then remove,
 Friends, home, and native earth.

Thou lovely polar star, mine eyes
 Still turned the first on thee
 Till I have felt a sad surprise,
 That none looked up with me.

But thou hast sunk upon the wave,
 Thy radiant place unknown;
 I seem to stand beside a grave,
 And stand by it alone.

Farewell! ah, would to me were given
 A power upon thy light!
 What words upon our English heaven
 Thy roving rays should write!

Kind messages of love and hope
 Upon thy rays should be;
 Thy shining orbit should have scope
 Scarcely enough for me.

Oh, fancy vain, as it is fond,
 And little needed too;
 My friends! I need not look beyond
 My heart to look for you.

LANNY, THE COUNTESS OF,

By birth, countess of Loos Coswaren. She was born at the castle of Gray, in Brabant, in 1767. In 1788 she espoused the count de Lannoy, and emigrated with him, when the Low Countries were overrun by the French armies of the republic. Having lost all their property by confiscation, like many other families of rank, they were reduced to the utmost need in a strange land. All their resources lay in the energy and ability of the countess. She had always devoted herself to music for the gratification of her taste, and had even attempted composition; she now made it a profession, and gave instructions with success in the city of Berlin. She published several trios for the piano, violin, and violoncello; several songs, with an accompaniment for the harp and the piano; with other pieces of music for those instruments. In 1801 she was permitted to return to Belgium with her family, but was obliged to go through with a tedious lawsuit, which involved all her fortune. After several anxious years, the suit was lost, and she was obliged to take refuge at Paris, with her daughters, where, by resuming her musical labours, she obtained a scanty living. She died in 1822.

LAPIERRE, SOPHIE,

A PRETTY Parisian singer, was a member of the conspiracy, which was formed in 1795, to overthrow the Directory, and replace the authority in the hands of the people. Sophie, and several other women, were taken prisoners with the conspirators, and she confronted her judges with the greatest composure, and even levity. As, however, she could only be accused of singing republican songs, she was acquitted.

LASHFORD, JOAN,

DAUGHTER of Elizabeth Warne, by a former husband, was burned as a heretic by the Roman Catholics, during the reign of Mary of England, in the year 1556. A number of other women, about the same time, sealed their faith with their blood. Joan Lashford was about twenty years of age when she thus suffered and died a martyr.

LAVALETTE, EMILIE, COUNTESS DE,

NIECE of the empress Josephine, married Marie Chamans Lavalette, aid-de-camp to Bonaparte. Her maiden name was Emilie Beauharnais. The manner in which the marriage was brought about is well described in the "Memoirs of Lavalette."

General Bonaparte, wishing to reward the bravery of his aid-de-camp, and being then restricted in his power, determined he should marry this niece of Madame Bonaparte. "I cannot make you a major," said Bonaparte, "I must therefore give you a wife. You shall marry Emilie Beauharnais. She is very handsome, and well educated."

Lavalette raised objections: he had no fortune, and was immediately to depart for Egypt with his chief; he urged that he might be killed there, or, which was perhaps his strongest objection, that the lady might not fancy him.

Bonaparte overruled all these objections, telling him that, if he, Lavalette, was killed, his widow would have a pension, and might marry again advantageously; and concluded by saying, "The wedding shall take place in eight days. I will allow you a fortnight for the honeymoon. You must then come and join us at Toulon. Come, come, the thing is all settled. Tell the coachman to drive home."

Lavalette continues the story thus:

"In the evening I went to see Madame Bonaparte. She knew what was going forward, and was kind enough to show some satisfaction, and call me her nephew. "To-morrow," she said, "we shall go to St. Germain—I will introduce you to my niece: you will be delighted with her—she is a charming girl." Accordingly, next day, the General, Madame Bonaparte, Eugene, and I, went in an open carriage to St. Germain, and stopped at Madame Campan's. The visit was a great event at the boarding-school; all the young girls were at the windows, in the parlours, or in the court-yard, for they had obtained a holiday. We soon entered the gardens. Among the forty young ladies I anxiously sought for her who was to be my wife. Her cousin, Hortense, led her to us, that she might salute the General and embrace her aunt. She was, in truth, the prettiest of them all. Her stature was tall, and most gracefully elegant, her features were charming, and the glow of her beautiful complexion was heightened by her confusion. Her bashfulness was so great, that the General could not help laughing at her, but he went no further. It was decided that we should breakfast in the garden. In the mean time I felt extremely uneasy. Would she like me? Would she obey without reluctance? This abrupt marriage, and this speedy departure grieved me. When we got up, and the circle was broken, I begged Eugene to conduct his cousin into a solitary walk. I joined them, and he left us; I then entered on the delicate subject. I made no secret of my birth, or of my want of fortune; and added—"I possess nothing in the world but my sword, and the good-will of the General—and I must leave you in a fortnight. Open your heart to me. I feel myself disposed to love you with all my soul—but that is not sufficient. If this marriage does not please you, repose a full confidence in me; it will not be difficult to find a pretext to break it off—I shall depart: you will not be tormented, for I will keep your secret." While I was speaking, she kept her eyes fixed on the ground; her only answer was a smile, and she gave me the nosegay she held in her hand; I embraced her. We returned slowly to the company, and eight days afterwards went to the municipality. The following day, a poor priest, who had not taken the oaths, married us in a small convent of the Conception, in the Rue St. Honore. This was in some manner forbidden, but Emilie set a great importance on that point; her piety was gentle and sincere."

In a fortnight after the marriage, Lavalette left his bride, and joined the expedition to Egypt. In eighteen months he returned, and was most affectionately welcomed by his wife, who presented to him their infant daughter; the happiness of the married pair was complete, and their affection for each other continued faithful and true during years of prosperity.

On the restoration of the Bourbons, the Count

Lavalette was imprisoned and condemned to death. His wife tried every means to obtain his pardon; and, failing in this, she proposed to him, the night before his execution, to put on her dress, and imitating her walk and manner, holding his handkerchief to his face, as if he were weeping, to go out from the prison, and when once in the street, she had provided means for his safety. As they were about the same height, the deception succeeded, and Count Lavalette escaped to Belgium; but his wife was kept for six weeks in prison, and not allowed to see any one but her jailor. She passed twenty-five days without sleep, fearing at every moment that she might see her husband brought back a prisoner. This anxiety at length produced insanity, which continued, with some intervals of rationality, during her whole life. Lavalette left France in 1816; in 1822 he was allowed to return, and from that time till his death devoted himself to the care of his wife.

LEAPOR, MARY,

WAS born in Northamptonshire, in 1712, her father having been many years gardener to a gentleman in that country. Her education was suitable to her humble rank, but her attainments far surpassed all expectation. Her modesty kept her merit concealed till it was too late for her to reap any temporal emoluments from her writings. She died in her twenty fourth year, and, when on her death-bed, gave her father a collection of papers, containing original poems, which were afterwards published. Some of these poems are very good. She also wrote a tragedy entitled "The Unhappy ather."

LEE, ANNE,

WAS born at Manchester, England, in 1736. She was the daughter of a blacksmith, and also at an early age she became the wife of a blacksmith. She is distinguished as the person who introduced Shakerism into this country; and she became the leader of the sect. Her first "testimony of salvation and eternal life," borne in 1770, was the injunction of celibacy as the perfection of human nature; and next, she claimed to be a divine person. From this time she was honoured with the title of "Mother Anne," while she styled herself "Anne the Word." Having been persecuted in England, she came out to America, in 1774, with several members of the society, and formed the first community of Shakers, at Water-vliet, near Albany, where she died, in 1784.

LEE, SOPHIA,

THIS amiable and ingenious lady was born in the metropolis in the year 1750. Her father, originally bred to the law, was an actor of merit, whose conduct gained him admission into the best circles, and who gave his children an excellent education. At an early age, the subject of this article exercised her pen in composition, and in 1780 produced the diverting comedy entitled the "Chapter of Accidents," which met with considerable success. With the profits of this play, on the death of her father, which took place the following year, she was enabled to open a school at Bath, which, aided by her sisters, she conducted for several years with great reputation. Her next performance, published in 1784, was the well-known novel entitled the "Recess, or a Tale of Other Times," the story of which is founded on the fate of two supposed daughters of Mary queen of Scots, by a secret marriage with the duke of Norfolk. It is ingeniously and pathetically wrought up; but some severe casuists have condemned the unfair liberty which it takes with some historical characters. This romance, which became very popular, was followed in 1787 by a ballad called a "Hermit's Tale, found in his Cell." In 1796, Miss Lee produced a tragedy, called "Almeyda, Queen of Grenada;" but, although aided by the great talents of Mrs. Siddons, it did not realize the expectations which her power of moving the passions in the "Recess" had created. In the succeeding year Miss Harriet Lee published the first five volumes of her "Canterbury Tales," three stories in which were from the pen of her sister; and of these three, one called "Krutzmar" was selected for the subject of a tragedy by Lord Byron. In 1803, having secured a handsome competence, she retired from teaching; soon after which appeared her "Life of a Lover," a novel written in early life. In 1807, a comedy by Miss Lee, termed the "Assignment," was unsuccessfully produced at Drury Lane; which drama terminated her literary career. She died at Clifton, near Bristol, March 13th, 1824.

LEGGE, ELIZABETH,

ELDEST daughter of Edward Legge, an ancestor of the Earl of Dartmouth, was born in 1580. She was particularly noted for her faculty of acquiring languages, having studied thoroughly the Latin, French, Spanish, and Irish tongues; besides cultivating her poetical genius. Unfortunately, these acquisitions soon proved nearly useless, as she lost her sight, indeed became totally blind, in consequence of severe study and midnight readings. She was never married, lived chiefly in Ireland, and died at the great age of 105.

LENNGREN, ANNA MARIA,

A SWEDISH poetess, was born, 1754, and died in 1817. She was the daughter of Professor Malmstadt, of Upsala. Her "Visit to the Parsonage;" "Portraits;" and other writings, are charming pictures of domestic life. The Swedish Academy honoured her memory by a medallion, on one side of which is her bust, and on the other a muse holding a lyre, with this inscription: "Quo minus gloriam potebat eo magis assecuta."

LENCLOS, ANNE or NINON DE,

WAS born in Paris, in 1615. Her father, a man of good family, had served under Henry IV. and Louis XIV.; had gained considerable reputation for his bravery and knowledge of military tactics. Having resigned his commission, he determined to spend the rest of his life in the pleasures of society; perhaps we might say dissipated society. His wife, a timid, narrow-minded woman, had totally different views; but unfortunately, though she was pious and well-principled, her want of character and understanding reduced her to a negative position in the family; and Ninon, from her childhood, was submitted to very little discipline that did not accord with her own tastes. She manifested a precocious wit and aptness for learning which gratified her father's vanity highly; he delighted in the admiration she excited; and, totally neglecting the foundation of every good education, that moral and religious training of the heart, which gives strength for the vicissitudes of life; he raised a dazzling superstructure of accomplishments and graces, that adorned without exalting their possessor. Thus he formed a woman whose fame was her disgrace, whose glory was her shame.

The premature death of both her parents left Ninon an orphan at sixteen. Her inheritance being but moderate, she converted it into a life-annuity, which gave her the means of living in the enjoyment of affluence. Her personal charms consisted not so much in surprising beauty as in unspeakable grace. She was of the middle height, and perfectly well proportioned; her eyes were remarkably fine; her voice soft and musical; and her manners were irresistibly winning. She was quite famous for her conversational powers and talents for repartée. As she was by no means particular in the selection of her society, and excluded none but the dull and tiresome, her attractions and the miscellaneous group around her rendered her soon celebrated; and all the distinguished men of the day, the courtly, the learned, and the military, resorted to her house.

She had two sons, one of whom entered the navy; the other, whose father was the Marquis de Gersey, was the wretched being, victim of an unhallowed passion he entertained for her: upon learning that she was his mother, he retreated into the garden and put an end to his own existence with his sword! She was then fifty-six years of age. This sad event appears to have greatly shocked her at the moment; but vicious habits were too inveterate to be broken; she returned to her sallies of frivolity, allured new lovers, and again ran the giddy round of dissipation.

She was at one time upon intimate terms with that distinguished woman, Madame Scarron, who died the widow of Louis XIV. It is said that Madame de Maintenon, when at Versailles, offered Ninon the privilege of a residence in that royal chateau. Ninon, however, considered herself happier in her life of independence, and declined the proposal of the all-powerful favourite.

Christina of Sweden visited Ninon when in Paris, and offered to attach her to her household. Less sagacity than that of the witty Parisian would have been sufficient to reject a bondage to so whimsical a personage.

The most surprising circumstance in the history of this woman, a little apocryphal to be sure, is, that she excited a violent passion in the abbe Gedoy, then twenty-nine years old, when she had actually attained her eightieth birth-day. She may be said, according to Horace Walpole's expression, to have "burned her candle to the snuff in public;" for she never changed her habits of living in company, and engaging in its diversions until her death, which took place in her ninetieth year.

A volume has been published, said to be her letters, written to the Marquis de Sevigné; but they are well known to be spurious. Some of her genuine letters are to be found in the correspondence of St. Evremont; they are written with simplicity, but by no means justify the reputation of her colloquial powers. St. Evremont is the author of that well-known madrigal in her praise, where he attributes to her nothing less than the "virtue of Cato." Whether we consider sex, place, character, or situation, a less appropriate parallel could scarcely have been found in the catalogue of distinguished persons.

That in an age of lax morality, the meretricious charms of Ninon de Lenclos should have gained her many admirers, and that indulgence should have been shown to her errors, may be understood. Her bon-mots are often repeated; her life of what is called pleasure and gayety; the attentions of the illustrious; the charms that lasted nearly a century; these things, with the thoughtless, sometimes obscure the true view of her career. It would be unpardonable, then, in this place, not to exhibit the reverse of the medal. Entitled by her birth, and by her individual talents, to an honourable place in society, she saw herself an object of dread and disgust to those really distinguished women whose rank was their least title to consideration. Madame Sevigné, whose "honest fame" is contemporary with the name of Ninon, shows in various passages the shallowness and mockery of the homage paid by those often cited great men to this celebrated courtesan. The boast frequently repeated by her admirers, that if not a virtuous woman she had the qualities of an honest man, is indeed an empty one. She was under no temptations to commit gross acts of fraud, intemperance, or other manly vices. If she had been brought to the trial, it is less than doubtful that she would have failed; as the much stronger barriers that fence woman's conduct were too feeble to resist her passions. It was her policy to carry off her course of life with a gay air; but, that she bitterly felt its emptiness and degradation, is evident from what she says in one of her letters to St. Evremond. "If I were told I had to go over again the life I have led, I would hang myself to-morrow," are her significant words. It is a well authenticated fact, that upon one occasion she narrowly escaped being sent to a house for the reformation of the lowest objects of public compassion. The queen, thinking her an object for punishment, issued an order to that effect; and it required powerful influence to get it countermanded. Despised, and justly, by her relatives, excluded from her natural station in life; a mother, without filial respect or affection; feeling her life worse than death itself! Such was Ninon de Lenclos!

*Count all the pleasure prosperous vice attains,—
"Tis but what virtue flies from, and disdains."

LENNOX, CHARLOTTE,

THE friend of Johnson and Richardson, was born in 1720, at New York, of which her father, Colonel Ramsay, was lieutenant-governor. She was sent to England to be educated; married; was left a widow with one child; and resorted to her pen for subsistence. Her latter days were clouded by poverty and sickness. Some of her works are, "The Female Quixote;" "Henrietta, Sophia, and Euphemia;" "Shakspeare Illustrated;" two plays, and various translations.

Dr. Johnson assisted her in drawing up proposals for an edition of her works, in three volumes, 4to.; but it does not appear to have been published. Dr. Johnson had such an opinion of Mrs. Lennox, that on one occasion, not long before his death, he went so far as to pronounce her talents as a writer, superior to those of Mrs. Carter, Miss Hannah More, and Miss Burney. She died January 4th, 1804.

LENORMAND, MADEMOISELLE,

Was born in Alençon. Being left an orphan at an early age, she was educated, together with her sister, in the convents of Alençon, and when of a suitable age, she was apprenticed to a milliner. She commenced her vocation by announcing that the superior of the convent of the Benedictines, where she was then living, would be deprived of her office, and she informed her companions of the name, age, and other particulars of the successor of the deprived abbess. For this prophecy, Mademoiselle Lenormand was obliged to undergo a penance; but the event verifying the truth of her predictions, her pretensions as a prophetess were confirmed. Alençon was, however, too confined a place for a spirit like hers, and when she was fourteen she set out for Paris, with nothing but the clothes she wore, and six francs in her pocket. Her step-father, who was in Paris, obtained for her a situation in a shop, where she soon became a great favourite, and studied arithmetic, book-keeping, and mathematics. After remaining there some time, Mademoiselle Lenormand removed to No. 5, Rue de Tournon, where she continued to exercise her profession, without incurring the censure of government. She attracted people of all ranks in life. The Princess de Lamballe, the Count de Provence, afterwards Louis XVIII., Mirabeau, Murat, Robespierre, St. Just, Barrière, Madame Tallien, and even Madame de Staël, were among her frequent visitors. Josephine, wife of Napoleon, reposed the greatest confidence in her, and constantly sent to ask the result of any enterprise the emperor was about to undertake. She was several times on the point of imprisonment; at one time for foretelling the divorce of Josephine; at others, for prophesying the downfall of persons in power; but she always escaped. She bought lands and houses at Alençon, where she retired after the revolution of July, 1830. At this, her native place, she was unwilling to exercise her profession. She was a short, fat, and very plain woman, with remarkably bright piercing eyes. She left her property to her nephew, whom she adopted after her sister's death.

In 1827, she published "Mémoires Historiques et Secrets de l'imperatrice Joséphine." She foretold that her own death would not take place till she was one hundred and twenty-four, that is, till near the close of the present century. In this she proved a false prophet, as she died a few years ago.

LESCAILE, CATHARINE,

ONE of those learned and accomplished women, who have been honoured with the appellation of the "Tenth Muse," was a native of Holland. Her poems were published in 1728. They consist principally of tragedies, which, although they violate the ordinary rules, show frequent marks of superior genius. She died in 1711.

LESPINASSE, MADEMOISELLE DE,

BORN about 1720, was the illegitimate daughter of Madame d'Albon, a married lady of rank. She was brought up in a convent, under the name of Lespinasse, and when she was of age, was placed in the family of her mother, as a governess. Acquainted with the secret of her birth, her situation was distressing, and the affection shown her in secret by her mother, was her only consolation. But when she died, and the proofs of her birth, as well as a large sum of money, left her by her mother, were wrested from her by her family, her condition became singularly humiliating and desolate. At this juncture she met with Madame du Deffand, and readily accepted her proposal of residing with her as "demoiselle de compagne." The cold, selfish Madame du Deffand treated her young dependant with little kindness. She made her sleep, like her, during the day, and sit up all night, in order to read to her. This unnatural mode of life destroyed the health of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse. Her chief consolation was in the friendship of D'Alembert, the friend of Madame du Deffand. Born under similar circumstances, his sympathy flowed out to the friendless girl, and his devotion to her continued till death separated them. Madame du Deffand's friends soon discovered the attractions of her companion; but in order not to excite her jealousy, they avoided, in her presence, taking too much notice of her. To enjoy her society they secretly visited her in her own room, an hour before the usual time of meeting; Madame du Deffand generally sleeping till the arrival of her guests. For a long time Madame du Deffand remained unconscious of this arrangement; but when she became acquainted with it, her rage was without bounds. She accused Mademoiselle de Lespinasse of the blackest treachery, and announced her intention of dismissing her immediately. The sense of her destitution and helplessness, added to Madame du Deffand's reproaches, acted powerfully upon the excitable imagination of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse, and, in a fit of exaggerated sensibility, she took laudanum. Timely remedies saved her from the consequences of this rash act, but she never entirely recovered the shock given to her nerves. They parted, and the Parisian world took sides in the affair; each had their partisans, and warm and bitter recrimination followed. The friends of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse procured her a pension, and Madame Geoffrin made her a yearly allowance. Placed above want, she soon gathered around her a choice literary circle, many of the friends of Madame du Deffand deserting her for her young rival. All the accounts left of the circle of Mademoiselle de Lespinasse represent it as one of the most agreeable places of Parisian resort; her tact in presiding over society being a quality in which she had attained the highest excellence.

With all the external graces of a French woman of the eighteenth century, Mademoiselle de Lespinasse possessed none of the heartlessness which characterized the period. Her nature had all the fire and passion of the inhabitants of a southern clime. A calm and even state of mind was insupportable to her, and it was perhaps this perpetual mobility of feeling which rendered her presence so attractive. Among her visitors was a young Spanish nobleman of distinguished talents, the Marquis de Mora; he became devotedly attached to her, and his friends fearing he would marry her, recalled him to Spain. His passion was returned, and during three years of separation, the lovers corresponded unceasingly. De Mora's health declining, his friends allowed him to return to Paris; but the fatigue of the journey was too great; he died on the road, without having seen the object of his idolatry. Mademoiselle de Lespinasse was overwhelmed with grief, and from that time she slowly declined; but it was not till after her death that it became known that there lay in her heart a hidden sorrow deeper still. During the absence of M. de Mora she had conceived a passion for the Count de Guibert, a man who ranked high in the opinion of the world. She loved him with all the impassioned fervour of her nature, which passion he for a short time, through vanity, feigned to return; but he married, and wounded affection, united with remorse for her involuntary faithlessness to her devoted lover Mora, brought her to the grave. Even D'Alembert, her life-friend, never knew till after her death that Mora was not the only one whom she had preferred to him. Mademoiselle Lespinasse's history is chiefly remarkable as an illustration of the difficulties and miseries which surround the path of a young lady who has no natural or legal protector. All these difficulties were enhanced by the profligacy of French society under the old régime.

LICHTENAW, WILHELMINA, COUNTESS OF,

THE celebrated friend of Frederic William II. Her father, whose name was Enke, travelled over the greater part of Europe, as a clever musician on the French horn, and was afterwards received into the royal musical chapel of Berlin. She had two sisters, the eldest of whom, on account of her splendid figure, was engaged at the Italian opera. Count Matuschki eloped with her to Venice, and married her, after which they returned to Berlin, where they lived in a brilliant style, their house becoming the resort of the fashionable world. Her sister, Wilhelmina, when ten years of age, lived with her. The hereditary prince, Frederic William, who visited the house of Count Matuschki, thus accidentally made her acquaintance. She was then thirteen. Her beauty inspired the prince with an enthusiastic love; and when, on some occasion, the two sisters had quarrelled, he considered it most proper to have her sent back to the house of her father. However, his growing passion did not suffer him to stop here; he conducted her to Potsdam, to one of his confidants, procured her a governess and the most skilful masters, and came every day himself, to contribute, by his own instruction, to her mental development. Their mutual attachment was pure and disinterested; but when also in Wilhelmina's bosom a strong passion awoke for her amiable benefactor, she was no longer able to resist his protestations of unchangeable love. Notwithstanding, the prince followed other transient inclinations; and, not to be disturbed by Wilhelmina's presence, placed her, under pretext of perfecting her mind and accomplishments, under the guardianship of her sister, (the countess,) in Paris. When six months had elapsed, he decided himself entirely in her favour; yet, for the sake of outward propriety, a marriage was feigned with a certain Retz. After the death of Frederic I. she was elevated to a higher but more difficult position. To avoid envy and jealousy, was impossible; neither could she live in the same good intelligence with all parties of the court, who differed greatly in their views. In the year 1792 she travelled, with the king, to Vienna, where she was present at the coronation of Francis II.; three years later, she visited Italy, and on her return, received the diploma, which gave her the title of Countess Lichtenaw. On her arrival in Berlin, she was introduced as such to the queen; at the same time she received for her establishment 500,000 crowns, and the estates to which she had a claim by her title. Besides, she possessed a house in Berlin, (an inheritance of her deceased son, Count von der Mark,) and a beautiful villa in Charlottenburg. Her situation, as well as the king's favour, lasted until his death, in 1797. But as soon as Frederic William had closed his eyes forever, the scene changed. She was forthwith arrested, at Potsdam, and, for four months, strongly secured; during which time her papers were examined, and she herself minutely interrogated. Although no discovery could be made to accuse her of a state crime, she was sent to Fort Glasgow, and her property confiscated. Not until after an imprisonment of three years, and an unconditional renunciation of her entire property, was she released, and obtained an annuity of 4000 crowns. In 1811 her estates were partly restored, but the annuity was withdrawn. She afterwards lived in retirement, and died in 1820.

As to the bad influence which, according to the statements of her enemies and misinformed persons, this woman is said to have exercised over the monarch, and, through him, over the Prussian state, and the abuse which she made of her power for the destruction of worthy and the advancement of unworthy statesmen, there is no foundation whatever. Men of undoubted character speak of her with the highest esteem; and she is praised by those who intimately knew her, as a woman of deep sensibility, rare good-nature, correct judgment, and unfeigned self-sacrificing interest in those whom she loved. It is an acknowledged fact, that she never sought distinction or wealth for herself, nor for her nearest relations. Her parents died poor; her youngest sister was married to a merchant; and her two brothers, of whom the one was high-forester, and the other equerry, had never more than a competency to live on, and lost even that during the unfortunate period of the French war.

LINCOLN, ELIZABETH, COUNTESS OF,

Was one of the daughters and co-heiresses of Sir John Knevet, of Charlton, in Wiltshire, England, and was married to Thomas, Earl of Lincoln, about 1602, by whom she had seven sons and nine daughters. She published, in 1628, a small but valuable tract, called "The Countess of Lincoln's Nursery." It was addressed to her daughter-in-law, the Countess of Lincoln, and is a well-written essay on the advantages of mothers nursing their own children.

LLOYD, MARY,

Was the daughter of George Michael Moser, of England, and distinguished herself so much as an admirable artist in flower-painting, that she was elected a member of the Royal Academy at London. After her marriage, she practised her art solely for amusement. She died in 1819.

LOGAN, MARTHA,

A GREAT florist, was the daughter of Robert Daniel, of South Carolina. In her fifteenth year she married George Logan, and died in 1779, aged seventy-seven. At the age of seventy, she wrote a treatise "On Gardening."

LOGES, MARIE BRUNEAU,

Was one of the most illustrious women in France in the seventeenth century. She was zealous for the reformed religion, and was highly esteemed by Malherbe and Balzac, and all the greatest wits and princes of her time. She died in 1641, and left nine children by her husband, Charles de Rechignevois, Lord des Loges, at one time gentleman in ordinary of the king's bed-chamber.

LOHMAN, JOHANNA FREDERICA,

Was born in 1749, at Wittenburg. She was the daughter of the Professor of Law, J. D. Richter. She married the auditor Lohman in Schoenbeck, by Magdeburg. She lived at first in Leipzig, then in Magdeburg, and after the death of her husband again in Leipzig, where she died, in 1811. Most of her works were published anonymously. She wrote "The Jacobin," in 1794; "Clara of Waburg," in 1796; "Carelessness and its Consequences," in 1805.

LOHMAN, EMELIE F. SOPHIE,

DAUGHTER of the above-mentioned lady, was born in 1784, at Schoenbeck, and died, in 1830, at Leipzig. She was a very prolific writer. Some of her best works are, "Winter Evenings," 1811; "Life and Poetry," 1820; and "New Tales," 1823.

LONGUEVILLE, DUCHESS DE,

SISTER of the great Condé, was the daughter of Henry, prince de Condé, and of Marguerite de Montmorenci. She married Henry d'Orleans, duke de Longueville, who, though brave, intelligent, and virtuous, preferred a quiet and retired life; and soon withdrew from the wars of the Fronde, in which his wife had induced him to take an active part, to his own estate. The duchess, whose character was very different, embraced with warm ardour the views of that party, whose heroine she soon, from her high birth, beauty and intrepidity, became. Her influence and charms were of great use to the Frondeurs, by inducing the celebrated Turenne and the duke de la Rochefoucauld to join them. Turenne, however, soon returned to his allegiance to the king; but the duke remained faithful to the last, "à ses beaux yeux."

After the amicable termination of the civil war, the duchess was received into the favour of Louis XIII., and from that time devoted herself to literature, and united with her illustrious brothers, the great Condé, and the prince de Condé, in encouraging rising genius. On the death of the duke de Longueville, she left the court, and consecrated the remainder of her days to the most austere penitence. She had a house built at Port-Royal aux Champs, where, although she renounced "the pomps and vanities of the world," she still retained her love for society, and the conversation of intelligent persons. The recluses at Port-Royal were all people who had acquired a high reputation while they lived in the world. Human glory followed them to their hermitage, all the more because they disdained it.

LOUIS, MADAME,

THE wife of an architect of celebrity, was distinguished for her abilities in music. She composed an opera called "Fleur d'Epine," which was performed at the Italian opera at Paris in 1776, and received much commendation from the musical critics. At the revolution, her husband being banished, she emigrated with him, and passed the remainder of her life in obscurity. She published several sonatas, ariettes, and some works of a scientific class upon music.

LOUISA AUGUSTA WILHELMINA AMALIA,

QUEEN of Prussia, daughter of Charles, duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, was born at Hanover, where her father was commandant, March 10th, 1776. In 1793, she and her sister were presented at Frankfort to the king of Prussia. The prince-royal was struck with her beauty, and married her, December 24th, 1793. It was the union of mutual affection. Her husband became king, November 16th, 1797; and she fulfilled all the duties of this high station so admirably, as well as those of wife and mother, that she was almost worshipped by the people, as well as by her husband and those immediately around her. In 1806, when Prussia was suffering severely from the burdens of war, this good queen, by her solicitude for others, even while oppressed with heavy cares and sorrows of her own, was the theme of general praise. Her beauty, her grace, her benevolent and lofty character, attracted the hearts of all, and her goodness won the confidence of the nation. She died in 1810.

LOUVENCOURT, MARIE DE,

WAS born at Paris in 1680. Graceful and intellectual, she was the ornament of both gay and literary society. She had a fine voice, and sang and played exquisitely. Several of her songs have been set to music by the most celebrated composers of her time. She lived unmarried, and died in 1712.

LUCAR, ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER of Paul Witterpool, was born in London in 1510. She was liberally educated, and excelled in all kinds of needle-work, writing, music, mathematics, and the languages. She was a religious woman, and died in 1537.

LUCCHESINI, GUIDICCIONI LAURA,

LIVED at Sienna in 1601, and was of the same family as John Guidiccioni, one of the first Italian poets of the time. She was distinguished for her poetical taste and talents. Her writings were principally lyrics; but she also composed three pastorals to be set to music.

LUMLEY, JOANNA, LADY,

ELDEST daughter of Henry Fitz-Allan, Earl Arundel, married Lord John Lumley. She was very learned, and translated from the Greek, three of the orations of Isocrates, of which the MS. is still preserved in the Westminster Library. She also translated the Iphigenia of Euripides. Her death occurred in 1620.

LUSSAN, MARGARET DE,

A WRITER very much admired in France for a number of romances which she produced, was the daughter of a coachman belonging to Cardinal Fleury, and was born about 1682. The celebrated Huet observed her early talents, assisted her in her education, and advised her to the style of writing in which she afterwards excelled. She had no personal beauty, but possessed many noble and generous qualities of mind and heart. She supported herself chiefly by her pen; and her works would probably have been more perfect, if she had not been obliged to write so much. Her best productions are "Histoire de la Comtesse de Gondez;" "Anecdotes de la Cour de Philippe Auguste;" "Les Vieilles de Thessalie;" "Memoirs Secret et Intrigues de la Cour de France, sous Charles VIII.;" "Anecdotes de la Cour de François I.;" &c. Some works were published under her name, which are now known to have been written by other persons, with whom she shared the profits.

M.

MACAULAY, CATHARINE,

A CELEBRATED female historian and politician, was the youngest daughter of John Sawbridge, Esq., of Ollantigh, in Kent. Catharine was born about the year 1733. During her infancy her mother died, and left her and an elder sister to be brought up by a governess, who, it appears, was very unfit for such a responsible task. The two sisters seem to have been left almost wholly to the guidance of their own feelings and instincts. Catharine, at an early age, found constant access to her father's large library, and rummaged and read whatever she fancied. Her first favourites were the periodicals, the Spectator, Rambler, Guardian, &c.; next, history attracted her mind; and at length Rollin's spirited account of the Roman republic struck on the master chord of her noble nature, and made her a republican and a writer of history.

She took the name by which she is best known from her first husband, Dr. George Macaulay, a London physician, to whom she was married in 1760. It was soon after this date that she commenced authoress, by the publication of her "History of England from the accession of James I. to the elevation of the House of Hanover," the first volume of which, in 4to., appeared in 1763, and the fifth and last, which however only brought the narrative down to the Restoration, in 1771. The work also went through more than one edition in 8vo. On its first publication it attracted considerable attention, principally from the double piquancy of the sex and the avowed republicanism of the writer; but, notwithstanding some occamonal liveliness of remark, and its notice of a good many facts omitted by most of our other historians; yet, as its spirit was purely republican, its advancement to a standard work was rendered impossible in England. The style is nervous and animated, although sometimes loose and inaccurate, and the reflections of the author are often acute and sagacious, always noble and benevolent. The five volumes of the History were followed, in 1778, by another, entitled "The History of England from the Revolution to the present time, in a series of Letters to the Reverend Dr. Wilson, rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and prebendary of Westminster," 4to., Bath. The six letters of which this volume consists come down to the termination of the administration of Sir Robert Walpole, in 1742.

A female historian, by its singularity, would not fail to excite curiosity; and as Mrs. Macaulay had ventured to step beyond the province of her sex, as it was then considered, she was more severely criticised for her political opinions than a man would have been. As her talents could not be denied, her adversaries resorted to petty, personal scurrilities against her. They said she was "deformed," "ugly," "disagreeable;" and that her ambition to become distinguished had, therefore, taken this course, most absurd for a woman—attempting to encroach on the province of man. Mrs. Arnold, a lady who subsequently became the warm friend of Mrs. Macaulay, remarks, that these notions had prejudiced her, and adds: "Judge then of my surprise, when I saw a woman elegant in her manners, delicate in her person, and with features, if not perfectly beautiful, so fascinating in their expression, as deservedly to rank her face among the higher order of human countenances. Her height was above the middle size, inclining to tall; her shape slender and elegant; the contour of her face, neck, and shoulders, graceful. The form of her face was oval, her complexion delicate, and her skin fine; her hair was of a mild brown, long and profuse; her nose between the Roman and the Grecian; her mouth small, her chin round, as was the lower part of her face, which made it appear to more advantage in front than in profile. Her eyes were as beautiful as imagination can conceive; full of penetration and fire; but their fire softened by the mildest beams of benevolence; their colour was a fine dark hazel, and their expression the indication of a superior soul. Infirm health, too often the attendant on an active and highly cultivated understanding, gave to her countenance an extreme delicacy, which was peculiarly interesting. To this delicacy of constitution was added a most amiable sensibility of temper, which rendered her feelingly alive to whatever concerned those with whom she was connected either by nature or by friendship."

In her friendships, we are told by this lady, she was fervent, disinterested, and sincere; zealous for the prosperity, and for the moral improvement, of those whom she distinguished and loved.

In 1785, Mrs. Macaulay visited the United States, and travelled through the greater part of the country, where she was very kindly received.

She terminated her journey by a visit to General Washington, with whom she corresponded for the remainder of her life. She resided after her return principally at Binfield, in Berkshire.

In 1778, or according to another account, in 1785, Mrs. Macaulay, having lost her first husband, married a Mr. Graham, of whom all that is told is that he was so many years her junior as to expose the lady to much irreverent remark. She also wrote several pamphlets, both during the progress of her great work, and after its completion. Of these the catalogue-makers have preserved the following titles: "Remarks on Hobbes's Rudiments of Government and Society," 1767; enlarged and republished in 1769, with the more striking title of "Loose Remarks on some of Mr. Hobbes's Positions;" "Observations on a pamphlet (Burke's) entitled Thoughts on the Causes of the present Discontents," 1770; "An Address to the People of England, Scotland, and Ireland, on the present Important Crisis of Affairs," 1775; "A Treatise on the Immutability of Moral Truth," called in a second much enlarged edition, "Letters on Education," 1790; and "Observations on the Reflections of the Right Hon. E. Burke on the Revolution in France, in a Letter to the Right Hon. the Earl of Stanhope," 1791.

This excellent woman died June 23d, 1791. Her friend Mrs. Arnold, in her account of the private character of Mrs. Macaulay, says: "As a wife, a mother, a friend, neighbour, and the mistress of a family, she was irreproachable and exemplary. My sentiments of this amiable woman are derived from a long and intimate acquaintance with her various excellencies; and I have observed her in different points of view. I have seen her exalted on the dangerous pinnacle of worldly prosperity, surrounded by flattering friends, and an admiring world; I have seen her marked out by party prejudice as an object of dislike and ridicule; I have seen her bowed down by bodily pain and weakness; but never did I see her forget the urbanity of a gentlewoman, her conscious dignity as a rational creature, or a fervent aspiration after the highest degree of attainable perfection. I have seen her humble herself in the presence of her Almighty Father; and, with a contrite heart, acknowledging her sins and imploring his forgiveness; I have seen her languishing on the bed of sickness, enduring pain with the patience of a Christian, and with the firm belief, that the light afflictions of this life are but for a moment, and that the fashion of the world will pass away, and give place to a system of durable happiness."

Dr. Wilson, prebendary of Westminster, was an enthusiastic admirer of hers, and erected a statue to her, as a patroness of liberty, in the church at Walbrook; but on the death of Dr. Wilson, this mark of homage was removed by his successor.

MACDONALD, FLORA,

Was the daughter of Mr. Macdonald, of Milton, in South Uist, one of the Hebrides. She was born in 1720, and, after her father's death, resided in the Isle of Skye, with her mother and stepfather, Hugh Macdonel, of Arnadale. After the disastrous defeat of Culloden, when prince Charles Edward, a hunted fugitive, was seeking concealment in the Western Isles, Flora was on a visit to her brother, in South Uist, where, as it happened, the prince lay hid. The circumstances which induced this young and beautiful girl to become the companion of the prince's wanderings, and the sharer of his dangers and almost unexampled hardships, have never been clearly explained. The most probable account, and no doubt the true one, is, that her stepfather, Hugh Macdonel, though in command of a company of royal militia, was in secret so well disposed towards the cause of the Stuarts, that he was induced to allow his stepdaughter to aid in the prince's escape, and to write privately to him by a trusty messenger, making him the offer. Flora was conducted to the prince at midnight, where in a lonely hut they concerted measures for his escape. The isles were overrun with soldiers; the prince's pursuers had traced him to South Uist, and thirty thousand pounds were offered for his apprehension. It was therefore necessary to be prompt, wary, and courageous, in the attempt, all of which qualities Flora brought to the undertaking. After passing through numerous adventures, concealed in rocks and caves, and exposed to imminent danger, they succeeded in leaving the isle; the prince dressed as a female, and personating the character of Betty Burke, an Irish woman in attendance upon Miss Macdonald. On approaching Skye, the boat was fired upon by the soldiers on shore, and Flora, though the bullets fell thick around her, positively refused the prince's request to lie down in the boat for shelter, unless he would consent to do so also, and he was obliged to yield to her importunities to ensure her safety. They succeeded in effecting a landing in Skye. Here, Flora was called upon to exercise all her skill, fortitude, and courage, in behalf of the prince; and many interesting anecdotes of the romantic incidents connected with her efforts to conceal and aid him in his escape, are on record. She conducted him in safety to Portree, whose arrangements were made to convey him to a neighbouring island, and parted from him after receiving his warmest assurances of gratitude and regard. Twenty days after they parted the prince escaped to France, but before half that period had elapsed Flora was arrested, and carried on board a vessel of war, where she was confined five months. She was then conveyed to London, and detained under surveillance for eight months. In July, 1747, she was finally set at liberty, by the provisions of the Act of Indemnity. While in London, Flora was visited by people of the highest distinction, and on her departure she was presented with fifteen hundred pounds, which had been subscribed by the Jacobite ladies of the metropolis. In 1750, Flora became the wife of Alexander Macdonald, of Kingsburgh. A few years after, in consequence of the embarrassment of their affairs, they were compelled to emigrate to America, where they settled upon an estate which they purchased in North Carolina. On the breaking out of the revolutionary war, Macdonald sided with the royalist party, and after the independence was secured, they returned to Skye. Here Flora died, at the advanced age of seventy. By her particular request her body was enclosed and buried in one of the sheets that had been used by the unfortunate prince during the night he rested at Kingsburgh, and which she had preserved, unwashed, for that purpose. Flora Macdonald was the mother of seven children, all of whom were an honour to her name. Dr. Johnson's interview with her is recorded in his "Tour to the Hebrides."

MADISON, MRS.,

Was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Payne, of Virginia, members of the society of Friends, who manumitted their slaves soon after their marriage, and removed to Pennsylvania. Miss Dolly Payne was educated in Philadelphia, and, when very young, married Mr. Todd, a lawyer in that city, who soon left her a widow, with one son. In 1794, Mrs. Todd became the wife of Mr. James Madison, and went to live on his estates in Virginia, till he was appointed secretary of state, in 1801, when they removed to Washington, where Mrs. Madison won the admiration of all by the charms of her elegant hospitality. Mrs. Madison also presided at the White House, in the absence of Mr. Jefferson's daughters, and her frank and cordial manners gave a peculiar charm to the frequent parties there assembled. But there were individuals who never visited at the president's, nor met at the other ministerial houses, whom Mrs. Madison won, by the sweet influence of her conciliatory disposition, to join her evening circle, and sit at her husband's table—always covered with the profusion of Virginia hospitality, but not always in the style of European elegance. The wife of a foreign minister ridiculed the enormous size and number of the dishes, observing that "it was more like a harvest-home supper, than the entertainment of a secretary of state." Mrs. Madison heard of this and similar remarks, and only answered with a smile, "that she thought abundance was preferable to elegance; that circumstances formed customs, and customs formed taste; and as the profusion, so repugnant to fo reign customs, arose from the happy circumstance of the superabundance and prosperity of our country, she did not hesitate to sacrifice the delicacy of European taste, for the less elegant, but more liberal fashion of Virginia." Her house was very plainly furnished, her dress never extravagant; it was only in hospitality and in charity that she was profuse. The many families daily supplied from that profusely-spread table testified to the real hospitality of the hostess.

In 1809 Mr. Madison was elected president of the United States, which high office he administered for eight years. During all this period, which included the most stormy times of our republic, when the war with Great Britain and other important questions, arrayed a most violent opposition to the government, and party animosity was bitter and vindictive; yet always in the presence of Mrs. Madison, the spirit of discord was hushed; the leaders of opposite parties would stand around her, smiling and courteous to each other, as though in the sunshine of her benevolence all were friends. Mr. Madison was, in manner, cold, reserved, and lofty; his integrity of character was respected by all; but the popularity he enjoyed was won by the mildness and gentle virtues of his wife; she ruled over the hearts of all who knew her. It is said that she never forgot a name she had once heard, nor a face she had once seen, nor the personal circumstances connected with every individual of her acquaintance. Hence her quick recognition of persons; her recurrence to the peculiar interests of each left the gratifying impression that each one was an object of special regard.

In 1817, Mr. Madison's second term of office having expired, he retired to his paternal estate, in Virginia. Montpelier, as this place was called, had a large and commodious mansion, designed more for comfort and hospitality than show, where the mother of Mr. Madison had always resided. One wing of the house was appropriated to her, and she had there her separate establishment and her old servants, and maintained all the old customs of the last century. By only opening a door the observer passed from the elegancies, refinements, and gayeties of modern life, into all that was venerable, respectable, and dignified in by-gone days. It was considered a high favour and distinction by the great and the gay who thronged to visit Mr. and Mrs. Madison at Montpelier, if they were permitted to pay the homage of their respects to his reverend mother. A lady who was admitted to visit her when she was in her ninety-seventh year, thus describes the scene: "She—Mrs. Madison, the elder—still retained all her faculties, though not free from the bodily infirmities of age. She was sitting, or rather reclining on a couch; beside her was a small table filled with large, dark, and worn quartos and folios, of most venerable appearance. She closed one as we entered, and took up her knitting, which lay beside her. Among other inquiries, I asked her how she passed her time.

"I am never at a loss," she replied; "this and these"—touching her knitting and her books—"keep me always busy; look at my fingers, and you will perceive I have not been idle." In truth her delicate fingers were polished by her knitting-needles. "And my eyes, thanks be to God, have not failed me yet, and I read most part of the day. But in other respects I am feeble and helpless, and owe everything to her"—pointing to Mrs. Madison, who sat by us. "She is my mother now, and tenderly cares for all my wants!" My eyes were filled with tears as I looked from the one to the other of these excellent women. Never, in the midst of her splendid drawing-room, surrounded by the courtly and brilliant, the admired and respected—herself the centre of attraction, the object of admiration—never was Mrs. Madison so interesting, so lovely, so estimable, as in her attendance on her venerable mother-in-law, whom she loved and honoured with grateful affection."

In 1836 Mr. Madison died. He had lived twenty years in retirement, and had found, in the society of his wife, and in her unremitting attentions to him, when enfeebled by age and infirmity, that she was the best gift of God; or, as he expressed it, "his connexion with her was the happiest event of his life."

After his decease, Mrs. Madison removed to the city of Washington, where she continued to be held in the highest respect till her death, which occurred July 22d, 1849. Her funeral was attended by a very large concourse; the highest officers of the government united with the people in this testimonial of regard to the honoured and beloved Mrs. Madison.

MAILLARD, MADEMOISELLE,

A BEAUTIFUL French actress and dancer, who made herself conspicuous in the revolution in France, by representing, in 1793, in public, the part of the Goddess of Reason, and receiving in that character the homage of the phrenzied people.

MAINE, ANNE LOUISE BENEDICTE DE BOURBON, DUCHESSE DE

GRAND-DAUGHTER of the great Condé, was born in 1676; and was married, in 1692, to Louis Augustus de Bourbon, duke de Maine, son of Louis XIV., and Madame de Montespan. Through the influence of Madame de Maintenon, the children of Madame de Montespan were legitimized; and she wrung from the old king, on his death-bed, a testament in favour of the duke du Maine. This having been revealed to the duke of Orleans, he took steps, before the opening of the will, to have his claim to the regency, as first prince of the blood, acknowledged, and the will was set aside. A strong and dangerous party, opposed to the power of the regent, immediately sprung up, of which the duchess du Maine was the acknowledged chief. Her rank, talents, and ambition, rendered her influence formidable; and had she only been able to impart her own active and energetic spirit to her husband, the duke of Orleans would not have obtained the regency without a struggle. She held her little court at Sceaux, and, under the mask of pleasure and devotion to literature, she carried on political intrigues.

Madame du Maine had received an excellent classical education. Her wit was light and brilliant, and her conversation singularly felicitous. She was bold, active, and vehement, but deficient in moral courage. Her temper was fickle, selfish, and violent; and, small as she was in person, she had the reputation of beating her husband, who, grave, learned, and deformed in person, had no latent energies to arouse. The weakness of du Maine encouraged the princes of the blood to protest against the edicts by which the legitimized children of Louis XIV. had been rendered their equals in rank. Madame du Maine answered this attack by a long and learned memorial, in which the rights of these princes were set forth; but without avail. The legitimized princes were deprived of their right of succession to the crown. Bent upon revenge, Madame du Maine's projects were favoured by the state of the country. She carried on intrigues with Spain and with the disaffected Bretons, and moved every engine within her reach to bring the regent into disrepute and overturn his power. A plot was formed, having many ramifications, its chief objects being the deposition of the regent, and the aggrandizement of the duke du Maine. The plot, however, was prematurely discovered. The duke and duchess were arrested, and the duchess was imprisoned in the castle of Dijon, where, after a tedious confinement, she became so heartily weary as to make her submission to the regent. She was liberated, and her husband was released at the same time. They resumed their former mode of existence, and the little court at Sceaux was soon as gay as ever, though it was never again so brilliant as formerly. The political part of Madame du Maine ended with her captivity. Her literary influence, though circumstances caused it to decline, was more real and lasting than her political power. If she gave no new impulse to genius, she assisted its development, and had enough taste to feel the superiority of Voltaire. Her most extraordinary quality appears to have been her conversational style.

MAINTENON, MADAME DE,

AN extraordinary woman, who, from a low condition, was elevated to the honour of becoming the wife of Louis XIV., was descended from the ancient family of d'Aubigné, her proper name being Frances d'Aubigné. M. d'Aubigné, her grandfather, was a Protestant, and a man of great merit and high standing; but his son, Constante d'Aubigné, the father of Madame de Maintenon, was a man of most infamous character, and actually murdered his first wife. He married afterwards the daughter of Peter de Cardillac, lord of Lane, at Bordeaux, December 27th, 1627. Going to Paris soon after his second marriage, he was, for some very great offence, thrown into prison. Madame d'Aubigné in vain solicited his pardon. Cardinal Richelieu told her, that "to take such a husband from her, was to do her a friendly office." Madame d'Aubigné shut herself up in prison with him, and there her two oldest sons were born. She then obtained leave to have her husband removed to the prison at Niort, that they might be near their relations. In that prison her only daughter, Madame de Maintenon, was born, November 27th, 1635. Her aunt, Madame Villette, took compassion on the poor infant, and gave it to the care of her daughter's nurse. M. d'Aubigné was at length released on condition that he should become a Roman Catholic; and, in 1639, he embarked for America with his family. He died at Martinico in 1646, leaving his wife in the greatest poverty. She returned to France, leaving her daughter in the hands of the principal creditor, as a pledge for the payment of her debts; but he soon sent her to France after her mother, who, being unable to support her, her aunt Villette offered her a home, which she thankfully accepted. But Madame Villette was a Protestant, and instructed her niece in the peculiar tenets of that faith. This alarmed another relation of Frances d'Aubigné's, Madame de Neuillaut, a Catholic, who solicited and obtained an order from the court to take her out of the hands of Madame Villette; and, by means of threats, artifices, and hardships, she at length made a convert of her.

In 1651, Madame de Neuillaut took her to Paris, where, meeting the famous wit, the abbé Scarron, she married him, notwithstanding his being infirm and deformed; preferring this to the dependent state she was in. She lived with him many years; and Voltaire says that these were undoubtedly the happiest part of her life. Her beauty, but still more her wit, though her modesty and good sense preserved her from all frivolity, caused her society to be eagerly sought by all the best company in Paris, and she became highly distinguished. Her husband's death in 1660 reduced her to the same indigent state as before; and her friends used every effort to prevail on the court to continue to her the pension which Scarron had enjoyed. So many petitions were sent in, beginning "The widow Scarron most humbly prays," that the king exclaimed with irritation, "Must I always be tormented with the widow Scarron?" At last, however, he settled a much larger pension on her, as a mark of esteem for her talents.

In 1671, the birth of the duke of Maine, the son of Louis XIV. and Madame de Montespan, who was then a year old, had not yet been made public. The child had a lame foot, and the physician advised that he should be sent to the waters of Barége. This trust was committed to Madame Scarron, as a safe person; and from this time she had the charge of the duke of Maine's education. The letters she wrote to the king on this subject charmed him, and were the origin of her fortune. Louis gave her the lands and name of Maintenon in 1679, which was the only estate she ever had, though afterwards in a position that afforded her an opportunity of acquiring an immense property.

Her elevation, however, was to her only a retreat. Shut up in her rooms, which were on the same floor with the king, she confined herself to the society of two or three ladies, whom she saw but seldom. The king came to her apartment every day, and continued there till after midnight. Here he did business with his ministers, while Madame de Maintenon employed herself with reading or needle-work, carefully avoiding all interference in state affairs, but studying more how to please him who governed, than to govern. She made but little use of her influence over the king, either to enable her to confer benefits or do injuries.

About the end of 1685, Louis married Madame de Maintenon. She was then fifty years of age, and the king forty-eight. This union was kept a profound secret, and she enjoyed very little public distinction in consequence of her elevation. But after the king began to lead this retired life with Madame de Maintenon, the court grew every day more serious; and the monotony of her life was so great, that she once exclaimed to her brother, "I can bear this no longer; I wish I were dead!"

The convent of St. Cyr was built by her at the end of the park of Versailles, in 1686. She gave the form to this establishment, assisted in making the rules, and was herself superior of the convent, where she often went to dissipate her ennui and melancholy.

The king died, September 2d, 1715; after which event, Madame de Maintenon retired wholly to St. Cyr, and spent the remainder of her days in acts of devotion. Louis XIV. made no certain provision for her, but recommended her to the duke of Orleans, who bestowed on her a pension of 80,000 livres, which was all she would accept. She died, April 15th, 1719.

In 1756, the letters of Madame de Maintenon were published in nine volumes, at Amsterdam; but with many arbitrary changes. Another, and more complete edition, was published in 1812. In 1848, "A History of Madame de Maintenon, &c., by M. le Duc de Noailles," appeared in Paris. This last work gives a highly favourable portrait of the character of Madame de Maintenon. Her talents no one ever questioned; and none, save the enemies of virtue, have doubted hers. The following morceaux are from her published letters:

LETTRE À M. D'AUBIGNÉ, SON FRÈRE.

On n'est malheureux que par sa faute. Ce sera toujours mon texte et ma réponse à vos lamentations. Songez, mon cher frère, au voyage d'Amérique, aux malheurs de notre père, aux malheurs de notre enfance, à ceux de notre jeunesse, et vous bénirez la providence, au lieu de murmurer contre la fortune. Il y a dix ans que nous étions bien éloignés l'un et l'autre du point où nous sommes aujourd'hui. Nos espérances étaient si peu de chose, que nous bornions nos vues à trois mille livres de rente. Nous en avons à présent quatre fois plus, et nos souhaits ne seraient pas encore remplis! Nous jouissons de cette heureuse médiocrité que vous vantiez si fort. Soyons contents. Si les biens nous viennent, recevons-les de la main de Dieu; mais n'ayons pas de vues trop vastes. Nous avons le nécessaire et le commode; tout le reste n'est que cupidité. Tous ces désirs de grandeur partent du vide d'un cœur inquiet. Toutes vos dettes sont payées; vous pouvez vivre délicieusement, sans en faire de nouvelles. Que désirez-vous de plus? Faut-il que des projets de richesse et d'ambition vous coûtent la perte de votre repos et de votre santé? Lisez la vie de Saint Louis, vous verrez combien les grandeurs de ce monde sont au-dessous des désirs du cœur de l'homme. Il n'y a que Dieu qui puisse le rassasier. Je vous le répète, vous n'êtes malheureux que par votre faute. Vos inquiétudes détruisent votre santé, que vous devriez conserver, quand ce ne serait que parce que je vous aime. Travaillez sur votre humeur; si vous pouvez la rendre moins bilieuse et moins sombre, ce sera un grand point de gagné. Ce n'est point l'ouvrage des réflexions seules; il y faut de l'exercice, de la dissipation, une vie unie et réglée. Vous ne penserez pas bien, tant que vous vous porterez mal; dès que le corps est dans l'abattement, l'âme est sans vigueur. Adieu. Ecrivez-moi plus souvent, et sur un ton moins lugubre.

A MADAME DE ST. GÉRAN.

Vous voulez savior, Madame, ce qui m'a attiré un si beau présent. La chose du monde la plus simple. On croit dans le monde que je le dois à Madame de Montespan, on se trompe: je le dois au petit duc. Le roi s'amusant avec lui, et content de la manière dont il répondit à ses questions, lui dit: "Vous êtes bien raisonnable."—"Il faut que je le sois, répondit l'enfant; j'ai une gouvernante qui est la raison même."—"Allez lui dire, reprit le roi, que vous lui donnerez ce soir cent mille francs pour vos dragées." La mère me brouille avec le roi; son fils me réconcilie avec lui; je ne suis pas deux jours de suite dans la même situation: je ne me fais point à cette vie, moi qui me croyais capable de me faire à tout. On ne m'envierait pas ma condition, si l'on savait de combien de peines elle est environnée, combien de chagrin elle me coûte. C'est un assujettissement qui n'a point d'exemple; je n'ai ni le temps d'écrire, ni de faire mes prières; c'est un véritable esclavage. Tous mes amis s'adressent à moi, et ne voient pas que je ne puis rien, même pour mes parens. On ne m'accordera point le régiment que je demande depuis quinze jours; on ne m'écoute que quand on n'a personne à écouter. J'ai parlé trois fois à M. Colbert; je lui ai représenté la justice de vos prétentions : il a fait mille difficultés, et m'a dit que le roi seul pouvait les résoudre. J'intéresserai Madame de Montespan, mais il faut un moment favorable, et qui sait s'il se présentera ? S'il ne s'offre point, je chargerai notre ami de votre affaire, et il parlera au roi ; je compte beaucoup sur lui.

AU ROI.

Sire,—La reine n'est pas à plaindre : elle a vécu, elle est morte comme une sainte : c'est une grande consolation que l'assurance de son salut. Vous avez, Sire, dans le ciel, une amie qui demandera à Dieu le pardon de vos péchés et les grâces des justes. Que votre majesté se nourrisse de ces sentimens : Madame la dauphine se porte mieux. Soyez, Sire, aussi bon chrétien que vous êtes grand roi.

A MADAME DE LA MAISON-FORT.

Il ne vous est pas mauvais de vous trouver dans des troubles d'esprit : vous en serez plus humble, et vous sentirez par votre expérience, que nous ne trouvons nulle ressource en nous, quelque esprit que nous ayons. Vous ne serez jamais contente, ma chère fille, que lorsque vous aimerez Dieu de tout votre cœur : ce que je ne dis pas, par rapport à la profession où vous vous êtes engagée. Salomon vous a dit il y a longtemps, qu'après avoir cherché, trouvé et goûté de tous les plaisirs, il confessait que tout n'est que vanité et affliction d'esprit, hors aimer Dieu et le servir. Que ne puis-je vous donner toute mon expérience ! Que ne puis-je vous faire voir l'ennui qui dévore les grands, et la peine qu'ils ont à remplir leurs journées ! Ne voyez-vous pas que je meurs de tristesse dans une fortune qu'on aurait eu peine à imaginer, et qu'il n'y a que le secours de Dieu qui m'empêche d'y succomber ? J'ai été jeune et jolie, j'ai goûté des plaisirs, j'ai été aimée partout ; dans un âge un peu avancé, j'ai passé des années dans le commerce de l'esprit, je suis venue à la faveur ; et je vous proteste, ma chère fille, que tous les états laissent un-vide affreux, une inquiétude, une lassitude, une envie de connaître autre chose, parce qu'en tout cela rien ne satisfait entièrement. On n'est en repos que lorsqu'on s'est donné à Dieu, mais avec cette volonté déterminée dont je vous parle quelquefois : alors on sent qu'il n'y a plus rien à chercher, qu'on est arrivé à ce qui seul est bon sur la terre : on a des chagrins, mais on a aussi une solide consolation, et la paix au fond du cœur au milieu des plus grandes peines.

MALEGUZZI-VALERI, VERONICA,

A LEARNED lady, born at Reggio. She supported in public, in a very satisfactory manner, two theses on the liberal arts, which have been published ; besides "Innocence Recognised," a drama. She died, 1690, in the convent of Modena, where she had retired.

MALEPIERRA, OLYMPIA,

A VENETIAN lady of noble birth, who wrote poems of some merit, published at Naples, and died in 1559.

MALESCOTTE, MARGHERITA,

OF Sienna, has left some poems in the collection of Bergalli. She enjoyed considerable reputation among the learned of her day, and died in 1720.

MALIBRAN, MARIA FELICITÉ

DAUGHTER of a singer and composer of music of some celebrity, of the name of Garcia, was born at Paris, March 24th, 1808. When scarcely five, she commenced her musical education at Naples, under the best masters. She sang in public, for the first time, in 1824, and so successfully as to give promise of attaining a very high order of excellence in her art. In 1825, she accompanied her father to England, when a sudden indisposition of Madame Pasta led to her performance, at a short notice, of the part of Rosina, in the Barber of Seville. The highly satisfactory manner in which she acquitted herself, secured to her an engagement for the season in London ; and she sang afterwards in Manchester, York, and Liverpool. Her father, having been induced to come to the United States, brought his daughter with him, as the prima donna of his operatic corps. Here her success was unbounded, and she qualified herself by the most assiduous study, for competing, on her return to Europe, with the most celebrated singers of the time.

In March, 1826, she married, at New York, a French merchant of the name of Malibran, of more than double her own age, but who was thought very wealthy. Soon after the marriage, he became a bankrupt ; and the cold and selfish reliance he placed on her musical powers, as a means of re-establishing his ruined fortunes, so offended the feelings of his wife, that she left him, and went to France in September, 1827.

After two years of a most brilliant career in Paris and the departments, she accompanied Lablache on a professional tour through Italy. Her winters were afterwards passed in Paris, and her summers in excursions in different directions. In 1835, the French court pronounced her marriage with M. Malibran to have been ab initio null and void, not having been contracted before an authority regarded as competent by the French law. In 1836, she married M. de Bériot, the celebrated violinist, and went with him to Brussels to reside. In consequence of an injury received by a fall from a horse a few weeks after her marriage, her health began to decline ; and, having gone to England during the summer, she was suddenly attacked by a nervous fever, after singing at a musical festival at Manchester, contrary to the advice of her physicians. Her enfeebled constitution was unable to resist the progress of the disease, and she died, September 23d, 1836, at the age of twenty-eight.

MANLEY, MRS.,

THE author of "The Atalantis," was the daughter of Sir Roger Manley, and born in Guernsey, of which her father was governor. She became an orphan early, and was deceived into a false marriage by a relation of the same name, to whose care Sir Roger had bequeathed her. He brought her to London, but soon deserted her, and she passed three years in solitude. Then the duchess of Cleveland, mistress of Charles II., took her under her protection; but, being a very fickle woman, she grew tired of Mrs. Manley in a few months, who returned again to her solitary mode of life.

Her first tragedy, called "The Royal Mischief," was acted in 1696, and brought her great applause and admiration, which proved fatal to her virtue. She then wrote "The New Atalantis," in which she spoke freely of many exalted persons; several of the characters in the book being only satires on those who brought about the revolution which placed William and Mary on the throne of Great Britain.

To shield the printer and publisher of these volumes, against whom a warrant was issued, Mrs. Manley voluntarily presented herself before the court of King's-bench as the unassisted author of the "Atalantis." She was confined for a short time, but afterwards admitted to bail, and finally discharged. She lived for some time after in high reputation as a wit, and in great gayety. She wrote several dramas, and was also employed in writing for Queen Anne's ministry, under the direction, it is supposed, of Dean Swift. She died, July 11th, 1724.

MANSON, MARIE FRANÇAISE CLAIRISSE,

REMARKABLE from the manner in which she became implicated with murderers and robbers in a criminal trial, was born in 1785, at Rhodes, a manufacturing town in the south of France. She was the daughter of President Enjalran, and the wife of Antoine Manson, an officer, whom she had married in obedience to her father, but from whom she was separated. She is represented as a woman of amiable disposition, somewhat enthusiastic and independent in character, but of fair reputation.

M. Fualdes was a highly esteemed and wealthy inhabitant of Rhodes, who dealt in money transactions with all the rich and respectable inhabitants of the place; among them were the brothers Jausion and Bastide Grammont, who were his relations and daily visitors, and deeply in his debt. Fualdes, having sold his real estate with the intention of removing from Rhodes, insisted upon settling his affairs with the Grammonts. On the morning of the 19th of March, 1817, they had some altercation about it, and a meeting for the evening of the same day was agreed upon, to conclude the business. With this view, Fualdes set out at eight o'clock P. M., to proceed to the place of meeting. In the Rue des Hebdomadiers, he was set upon by several men, who at a concerted signal were joined by numerous others. He was dragged into a suspicious house, belonging to one Bancal, where, after having been forced to sign several bills of exchange, he was murdered in the most revolting manner. The children of Bancal, a woman in masculine attire, and another covered with a veil, witnessed the whole scene in an adjoining room. The dead body was packed like a bale of merchandise, carried through the streets, and thrown into the river near the town, where it was found the next morning. The officers of justice immediately began a search; traces of murder were discovered in the house of Bancal, whose little daughter had already betrayed some circumstances of importance. The brothers Grammont, Bancal, and several others, were arrested and thrown into prison, where Bancal committed suicide.

On the trial, witnesses were wanted; but Madame Manson, having spoken in conversation of circumstances connected with the deed which led to the suspicion that she had witnessed it, was examined, and confessed to her father and the prefect, that on the evening of the 19th she had been in disguise in the street when the attack was made, and had taken refuge in the first house open, which proved to be Bancal's. She was forced into a closet, and a scream of horror, accompanied by a fainting fit, betrayed her presence to the murderers. One of them was about to kill her, but was prevented by the rest; they then swore her to silence upon the dead body. As soon as the report of this confession was spread through the town, Madame Manson received several letters threatening her life, and that of her little daughter. Overwhelmed with terror when she appeared at court and beheld the murderers, she fainted; and, on being questioned, recalled her confession, and denied having been in the house of Bancal. The murderers were convicted, but appealed to a higher court. Madame Manson was arrested for giving false evidence. On the second trial, upon being spoken to by Bastide in an insulting manner, she confessed her duplicity, and gave a true account of the transaction. Bastide and his accomplices were condemned to death. Madame Manson wrote her memoirs while in prison. In Paris four thousand copies were sold in a few hours; and it went through seven editions in the course of the year. The whole trial was full of dramatic interest, and attracted so much attention that Madame Manson was offered a hundred and twenty thousand francs to come to Paris to gratify the curiosity of the Parisian world.

MANZONI, GIUSTI FRANCESCA

THIS erudite lady was as highly esteemed for her virtue and prudence as for her extraordinary intellect and the fertility of her imagination. Her death, which happened in 1743, was universally lamented. She was a member of the academy of the Filodossi of Milan. The subjoined is a list of her works:—"An Epistle in Verse to the Empress Maria Theresa;" "Ester," a tragedy; "Abigalle," a sacred drama; "Debora," an oratorio "Gedeone," an oratorio; "Sagrifizio d'Abramo;" "Translation of Ovid's Tristitia."

MARA, GERTRUDE ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER of Mr. Schmaling, city musician in Cassel, was born about 1749. When she was seven, she played very well on the violin, and when she was fourteen, she appeared as a singer. Frederic the Great of Prussia, notwithstanding his prejudice against German performers, invited her to Potsdam, in 1770, and gave her an appointment immediately. In 1774, she married Mara, a violoncello player, a very extravagant man, and he involved her so much in debt, that, in 1786, Frederic withdrew her appointment from her, and she went to Vienna, Paris, and London, where she was received with great enthusiasm. In 1808 she went to Russia, and while at Moscow she married Florio, her companion since her separation from Mara. By the burning of Moscow she lost most of her property. She passed the latter part of her life, which was very long, at Reval, where she died, in 1833. She possessed extraordinary compass of voice, extending with great ease over three octaves.

MARATTI, ZAPPI FAUSTINA,

Of Rome. Her poems appear to have contributed to the improvement of style which took place in the Italian poetry when she wrote. They are filled with the tender affection of a devoted wife and mother. She was the daughter of the famous painter Maratti. She died in 1740.

MARGARET, DUCHESS OF PARMA,

Was the natural daughter of Charles V. of Germany and Margaret of Gest. She was born in 1522, and married, first, Alexander de Medici, and afterwards Octavio Farnese, duke of Parma and Piacenza. Her half-brother, Philip II. of Spain, appointed her, in 1559, to the government of the Netherlands, where she endeavoured to restore tranquillity; and she might have succeeded, if the duke of Alva had not been sent with such great power that nothing was left to her but the title. Indignant at this, Margaret returned to her husband in Italy, and died at Ortona, 1586. She left one son, Alexander Farnese, duke of Parma.

MARGARET OF FRANCE,

QUEEN of Navarre, daughter of Henry II. of France and Catharine de Medicis, was born in 1552. Brantôme says, "If ever there was a perfect beauty born, it was the queen of Navarre, who eclipsed the women who were thought charming in her absence." She walked extremely well, and was considered the most graceful dancer in Europe. She gave early proofs of genius, and was a brilliant assemblage of talents and faults, of virtues and vices. This may, in a great measure, be attributed to her education in the most polished, yet most corrupt court in Europe. Margaret was demanded in marriage, both by the emperor of Germany and the king of Portugal; but, in 1572, she was married to Henry, prince of Bearn, afterwards Henry IV. of France. Nothing could equal the magnificence of this marriage; which was succeeded by the horrors of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Though Margaret was a strict Roman Catholic, she was not entrusted with the secrets of that horrible day. She was alarmed with suspicions, which her mother would not explain to her, and terrified by a gentleman, who, covered with wounds and pursued by four archers, burst into her chamber before she had risen in the morning. She saved his life, and by her prayers and tears, obtained from her mother grace for two of her husband's suite. Henry himself escaped the fate prepared for him, and Margaret refused to suffer her marriage to be cancelled.

In 1573, when the Polish ambassadors came to create her brother, the duke of Anjou, king of that country, Margaret, as a daughter of France, received them. The bishop of Cracow made his harangue in Latin, which she answered so eloquently, that they heard her with astonishment. She accompanied the duke d'Anjou as far as Blamont, and during this journey she discovered a plot of her husband and her next brother, who was become duke d'Anjou, to revenge the massacre, which she revealed to her mother, on condition that no one should be executed. The princes were imprisoned; but the death of Charles IX., in 1577, set them at liberty.

The king of Navarre, continually occupied by new beauties, cared little for the reputation of his wife; yet, when he stole from the court, he commended his interests to her, in a letter he left for her. But Margaret was then confined to her apartments, and her confidants were treated with the greatest severity. Catharine, however, prevented her brother from pushing matters to extremity with her, and by her assistance she obtained a short peace. Margaret then demanded permission to retire to her husband in Guienne; but Henry III. refused to allow his sister to live with a heretic.

At length open war was commenced against the Protestants, and Margaret withdrew into the Low Countries, to prepare the people in favour of her brother, the duke d'Alençon, who meditated the conquest of them by the Spaniards. There are curious details of this journey in her memoirs. On her return, she stopped at La Fere, in Picardy, which belonged to her, where she learned that, for the sixth time, peace was made in 1577. The duke d'Alençon came to Picardy, and was delighted with the pleasures that reigned in the little court of Margaret. She soon returned to France, and lived with her husband at Pau, in Bearn, where religious toleration was almost denied her by the Protestants; and Henry showed her little kindness; yet the tenderness with which she nursed him during an illness, re-established friendship between them, from 1577 to 1580, when the war again broke out. She wished to effect another reconciliation, but could only obtain the neutrality of Nerac, where she resided.

After the war, Henry III., wishing to draw the king of Navarre, and Margaret's favourite brother, the duke d'Anjou, to court, wrote to Margaret to come to him. Discontented with the conduct of her husband, she gladly complied, and went in 1582; yet so much was her brother irritated by her affection for the duke d'Anjou, that he treated her very unkindly. Some time after, a courier, whom he had sent to Rome with important dispatches, being murdered and robbed by four cavaliers, he suspected his sister of being concerned in the plot, and publicly reproached her for her irregularities, saying everything that was bitter and taunting. Margaret kept a profound silence, but left Paris the next morning, saying, that there never had been two princesses as unfortunate as herself and Mary of Scotland. On the journey she was stopped by an insolent captain of the guards, who obliged her to unmask, and interrogated the ladies who were with her. Her husband received her at Nerac, and resented the cruel treatment she had experienced from her brother; but her conduct, and the new intrigues in which she was constantly engaged, widened the breach between them. When her husband was excommunicated, she left him, and went to Agen, and thence from place to place, experiencing many dangers and difficulties.

Her charms made a conquest of the marquis de Carnillac, who had taken her prisoner; but though he insured her a place of refuge in the castle of Usson, she had the misery of seeing her friends cut to pieces in the plains below; and though the fortress was impregnable, it was assailed by famine, and she was forced to sell her jewels, and but for her sister-in-law, Eleanor of Austria, she must have perished. The duke d'Anjou, who would have protected her, was dead; and though, on the accession of her husband to the throne of France, in 1589, she might have returned to court, on condition of consenting to a divorce, she never would do so during the life of Gabrielle d'Estrées.

After the death of the mistress, Margaret herself solicited Clement VIII. to forward the divorce, and, in 1600, Henry was married to Marie de Medicis. Margaret, in the mean time, did some acts of kindness for the king, and was permitted to return to court after an absence of twenty-two years. She even assisted at the coronation of Marie de Medicis, where etiquette obliged her to walk after Henry's sister. She consoled herself by pleasures for the loss of honours; and though Henry IV. begged her to be more prudent, and not to turn night into day and day into night, she paid but little attention to his advice.

Margaret passed her last years in devotion, study, and pleasure. She gave the tenth of her revenues to the poor, but she did not pay her debts. The memoirs she has left, which finish at the time of her re-appearance at court, prove the elegant facility of her pen; and her poetry, some of which has been preserved, equals that of the best poets of her time. She was very fond of the society of learned men.

"Margaret," said Catharine de Medicis, "is a living proof of the injustice of the Salic law; with her talents, she might have equalled the greatest kings."

"The last of the house of Valois," says Mezeray, "she inherited their spirit; she never gave to any one, without apologising for the smallness of the gift. She was the refuge of men of letters, had always some of them at her table, and improved so much by their conversation, that she spoke and wrote better than any woman of her time." She appears to have been good-natured and benevolent; wanting in fidelity, not in complaisance to her husband; as, at his request, she rose early one morning, to attend to one of his mistresses who was ill. How could Henry reproach her for infidelities, while living himself a life of the most scandalous licentiousness! If Margaret had had a more affectionate and faithful husband, she would doubtless have been a true and affectionate wife. This does not justify her errors, but it accounts for them. She died in 1615, aged sixty-three.

MARGARET,

DAUGHTER of Francis I. of France, married Emmanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy, and died highly respected, September 14th, 1574, aged fifty-one.

MARGARET LOUISA OF LORRAINE,

DAUGHTER of Henry, duke of Guise, married, in 1605, at the instance of Henry IV., who was in love with her, and wished to fix her at court, Francis de Bourbon, prince of Conti. They however left the court immediately on marrying. The prince died in 1617, and Louisa devoted herself to the belles-lettres. She was one of Cardinal Richelieu's enemies, and he banished her to Eu, where she died in 1631. She was suspected of having married the marshal of Bassompierre for her second husband. She wrote the amours of Henry IV., under the title of "Les Amours du Gr. Alexandre."

MARQUETS, ANNE DE,

WAS born of noble and rich parents, and was carefully instructed in belles-lettres, and in her religious duties. She became a nun in a convent of the order of St. Dominic, at Poissy, where she devoted the poetic talents for which she was distinguished, to the service of religion. Her poems show great but enlightened zeal. Ronsard, and other celebrated contemporary poets, have spoken very highly of her. She reached an advanced age, but lost her sight some time before her death, which took place in 1558. She bequeathed to Sister Marie de Fortia, a nun in the same convent, three hundred and eighty sonnets of a religious nature.

MARIA THERESA,

ARCHDUCHESS of Austria, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, and empress of Germany, born in 1717, was the eldest daughter of Charles VI. of Austria, emperor of Germany. In 1724, Charles, by his will, known as the Pragmatic Sanction, regulated the order of succession in the house of Austria, declaring that in default of male issue, his eldest daughter should be heiress of all the Austrian dominions, and her children after her. The Pragmatic Sanction was guaranteed by the diet of the empire, and by all the German princes, and by several powers of Europe, but not by the Bourbons. In 1736, Maria Theresa married Francis of Lorraine, who, in 1737, became grand-duke of Tuscany; and in 1739, Francis, with his consort, repaired to Florence.

Upon the death of Charles VI. in 1740, the ruling powers of Prussia, Bavaria, Saxony, France, Spain, and Sardinia, agreed to dismember the Austrian monarchy, to portions of which each laid claim. Maria Theresa, however, went immediately to Vienna, and took possession of Austria, Bohemia, and her other German states; she then repaired to Presburg, took the oaths to the constitution of Hungary, and was solemnly proclaimed queen of that kingdom in 1741. Frederic of Prussia offered the young queen his friendship on condition of her giving up to him Silesia, which she resolutely refused, and he then invaded that province. The Elector of Bavaria, assisted by the French, also invaded Austria, and pushed his troops as far as Vienna. Maria Theresa took refuge in Presburg, where she convoked the Hungarian diet; and appearing in the midst of them with her infant son in her arms, she made a heart-stirring appeal to their loyalty. The Hungarian nobles, drawing their swords, unanimously exclaimed, "Moriatur pro Rege nostro, Maria Theresa!" "We will die for our queen, Maria Theresa." And they raised an army and drove the French and Bavarians out of the hereditary states. What would have been their reflections could those brave loyal Hungarians have foreseen that, in a little over a century, a descendant of this idolized queen would trample on their rights, overthrow their constitution, massacre the nobles and patriots, and ravage and lay waste their beautiful land! Well would it be for men to keep always in mind the warning of the royal psalmist, "Put not your trust in princes."

In the mean time, Charles Albert, Elector of Bavaria, was chosen Emperor of Germany, by the diet assembled at Frankfort, under the name of Charles VII.

Frederic of Prussia soon made peace with Maria Theresa, who was obliged to surrender Silesia to him. In 1745, Charles VII. died, and Francis, Maria Theresa's husband, was elected emperor. In 1748, the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle terminated the war of the Austrian succession, and Maria Theresa was left in possession of all her hereditary dominions, except Silesia. In 1756 began the Seven Years' war between France, Austria, and Russia, on one side, and Prussia on the other. It ended in 1763, leaving Austria and Prussia with the same boundaries as before. In 1765, Maria Theresa lost her husband, for whom she wore mourning till her death. Her son Joseph was elected emperor. She however retained the administration of the government.

The only act of her political life with which she can be reproached is her participation in the first partition of Poland; and this she did very unwillingly, only when she was told that Russia and Prussia would not regard her disapproval, and that her refusal would endanger her own dominions.

The improvements Maria Theresa made in her dominions were many and important. She abolished torture, also the rural and personal services the peasants of Bohemia owed to their feudal superiors. She founded or enlarged in different parts of her extensive dominions several academies for the improvement of the arts and sciences; instituted numerous seminaries for the education of all ranks of people; reformed the public schools, and ordered prizes to be distributed among the students who made the greatest progress in learning, or were distinguished for propriety of behaviour, or purity of morals. She established prizes for those who excelled in different branches of manufacture, in geometry, mining, smelting metals, and even spinning. She particularly turned her attention to agriculture, which, on a medal struck by her order, was entitled the "Art which nourishes all other arts;" and founded a society of agriculture at Milan, with bounties to the peasants who obtained the best crops. She took away the pernicious rights which the convents and churches enjoyed of affording sanctuary to all criminals without distinction, and in many other ways evinced her regard for the welfare of the people. She was a pious and sincere Roman Catholic, but not a blind devotee, and could discriminate between the temporal and spiritual jurisdiction. She put a check on the power of the Inquisition, which was finally abolished during the reign of her sons. She possessed the strong affections of her Belgian subjects; and never was Lombardy so prosperous or tranquil as under her reign. The population increased from 900,000 to 1,130,000. During her forty years' reign she showed an undeviating love of justice, truth, and clemency; and her whole conduct was characterized by a regard for propriety and self-respect.

Maria Theresa was, in her youth, exceedingly beautiful; and she retained the majesty, grace, and elegance of queenly attractiveness to the close of her life. She was strictly religious, sincere in her affection for her husband, and never marred the power of her loveliness by artifice or coquetry. She used her gifts and graces not for the gratification of her own vanity, to win lovers, but as a wise sovereign to gain over refractory subjects; and she succeeded, thus showing how potent is the moral strength with which woman is endowed. This queen has been censured for what was styled "neglect of her children."

Maria Theresa was the mother of sixteen children, all born within twenty years. There is every reason to suppose that her naturally warm affection, and her strong sense, would have rendered her, in a private station, an admirable, an exemplary parent; and it was not her fault, but rather her misfortune, that she was placed in a situation where the most sacred duties and feelings of her sex became merely secondary. While her numerous family were in their infancy, the empress was constantly and exclusively occupied in the public duties and cares of her high station; the affairs of government demanded almost every moment of her time. The court physician, Von Swietar, waited on her each morning at her levée, and brought her a minute report of the health of the princes and princesses. If one of them was indisposed, the mother, laying aside all other cares, immediately hastened to their apartment. They all spoke and wrote Italian with elegance and facility. Her children were brought up with extreme simplicity. They were not allowed to indulge in personal pride or caprice; their benevolent feelings were cultivated both by precept and example. They were sedulously instructed in the "Lives of the Saints," and all the tedious forms of unmeaning devotion, in which, according to the sincere conviction of their mother, all true piety consisted. A high sense of family pride, an unbounded devotion to the house of Austria, and to their mother, the empress, as the head of that house, was early impressed upon their minds, and became a ruling passion, as well as a principle of conduct with all of them.

We have only to glance back upon the history of the last fifty years to see the result of this mode of education. We find that the children of Maria Theresa, transplanted into different countries of Europe, carried with them their national and family prejudices; that some of them, in later years, supplied the defects of their early education, and became remarkable for talent and for virtue. That all of them, even those who were least distinguished and estimable, displayed occasionally both goodness of heart and elevation of character; and that their filial devotion to their mother and what they considered her interests, was carried to an excess, which in one or two instances proved fatal to themselves. Thus it is apparent that her maternal duties were not neglected; had this been the case she could never have acquired such unbounded influence over her children.

Maria Theresa had long been accustomed to look death in the face; and when the hour of trial came, her resignation, her fortitude, and her humble trust in heaven, never failed her. Her agonies during the last ten days of her life, were terrible, but never drew from her a single expression of complaint or impatience. She was only apprehensive that her reason and her physical strength might fail her together. She was once heard to say, "God grant that these sufferings may soon terminate, for otherwise, I know not if I can much longer endure them."

After receiving the last sacraments, she summoned all her family to her presence, and solemnly recommended them to the care of the emperor

Joseph, her eldest son. "My son," said she, "as you are the heir to all my worldly possessions, cannot dispose of them; but my children are still, as they have ever been, my own. I bequeath them to you; be to them a father. I shall die contented if you promise to take that office upon you." She then turned to her son Maximilian and her daughters, blessed them individually, in the tenderest terms, and exhorted them to obey and honour their elder brother as their father and sovereign. After repeated fits of agony and suffocation, endured, to the last, with the same invariable serenity and patience, death, at length, released her, and she expired on the 29th of November, 1780, in her sixty-fourth year. She was undoubtedly the greatest and best ruler who ever swayed the imperial sceptre of Austria; while, as a woman, she was one of the most amiable and exemplary who lived in the eighteenth century.

MARIA ANTOINETTA AMELIA,

DUCHESS of Saxe Gotha, daughter of Ulric of Saxe Meinungen, was born in 1572. Her talents as a performer on the piano, and as a composer, would have been creditable to a professed artist. Several of her canzoni, and also variations for the piano, have been published; but her most important work is a symphony in ten parts. She died towards the beginning of this century.

MARIE ANTOINETTE JOSEPHE
JEANNE DE LORRAINE,

ARCHDUCHESS of Austria and queen of France, daughter of the emperor Francis I. and Maria Therese, was born at Vienna, November 2d, 1755. She was carefully educated, and possessed an uncommon share of grace and beauty. Her hand was demanded by Louis XV. for his grandson, the dauphin, afterwards Louis XVI., to whom she was married in 1770, before she had attained her fifteenth year. A lamentable accident, which occurred during the festivities given by the city of Paris to celebrate the marriage, was looked upon as a sinister omen, which subsequent events having confirmed, has acquired undue importance.

Owing to the injudicious arrangements for the exhibition of fireworks, a great number of people were thrown down and trodden to death, more than three hundred persons having been killed or wounded. In 1774 Louis XVI. ascended the throne; in 1778 the queen became, for the first time, a mother. During the first years of her residence in France, Marie Antoinette was the idol of the people. After the birth of her second son, when, according to usage, she went to church to return thanks, the populace wished to remove the horses from her carriage, and draw her through the streets; and when she alighted and walked, to gratify them, they flung themselves upon their knees, and rent the air with acclamations. Four years from this period, all was changed. The acts of kindness and benevolence which the queen had exhibited; her grace, beauty, and claims upon the nation as a woman and a foreigner, were all forgotten. Circumstances remote in their origin had brought about, in France, a state of feeling fast ripening to a fearful issue. The queen could no longer do with impunity what had been done by her predecessors. The extravagance and thoughtlessness of youth, and a neglect of the strict formality of court etiquette, injured her reputation. She became a mark for censure, and finally an object of hatred to the people, who accused her of the most improbable crimes. An extraordinary occurrence added fuel to the flame of calumny. The countess de la Motte, a clever but corrupt woman, by a vile intrigue in which she made the cardinal de Rohan her tool, purchased, in the queen's name, a magnificent diamond necklace, valued at an enormous sum. She imposed upon the cardinal by a feigned correspondence with the queen, and forged her signature to certain bills; obtained possession of the necklace, and sold it in England. The plot exploded. The queen, indignant at the cardinal, demanded a public investigation. The affair produced the greatest scandal throughout France, connecting as it did the name of the queen with such disgraceful proceedings; and though obviously the victim of an intrigue, she received as much censure as if she had been guilty. Accused of being an Austrian at heart, and an enemy to France, every evil in the state was now attributed to her, and the Parisians soon exhibited their hatred in acts of open violence. In May, 1789, the States-General met. In October the populace proceeded with violence to Versailles, broke into the castle, murdered several of the body-guard, and forced themselves into the queen's apartments. When questioned by the officers of justice as to what she had seen on that memorable day, she replied, "I have seen all, I have heard all, I have forgotten all."

She accompanied the king in his flight to Varennes, in 1791, and endured with him with unexampled fortitude and magnanimity the insults which now followed in quick succession. In April, 1792, she accompanied the king from the Tuilleries, where they had been for some time detained close prisoners, to the Legislative Assembly, where he was arraigned. Transferred to the Temple, she endured, with the members of the royal family, every variety of privation and indignity. On the 21st of January, 1793, the king perished on the scaffold; the dauphin was forcibly torn from her, and given in charge to a miserable wretch, a cobbler called Simon, who designedly did everything in his power to degrade and brutalize the innocent child. On the 2d of August, Marie Antoinette was removed to the Conciergerie, to await her trial in a damp and squalid cell. On the 14th of October, she appeared before the revolutionary tribunal. During the trial, which lasted seventy-three hours, she preserved all her dignity and composure. Her replies to the infamous charges which were preferred against her were simple, noble, and laconic. When all the accusations had been heard, she was asked if she had anything to say. She replied, "I was a queen, and you took away my crown; a wife, and you killed my husband; a mother, and you deprived me of my children. My blood alone remains: take it, but do not make me suffer long." At four o'clock, on the morning of the 16th, she was condemned to death by an unanimous vote. She heard her sentence with admirable dignity and self-possession. At half-past twelve, on the same day, she ascended the scaffold. Scarcely any traces remained of the dazzling loveliness which had once charmed all hearts; her hair had long since become blanched by grief, and her eyes were almost sightless from continued weeping. She knelt and prayed for a few minutes in a low tone, then rose and calmly delivered herself to the executioner. Thus perished, in her thirty-seventh year, the wife of the greatest monarch in Europe, the daughter of the heroic Maria Theresa, a victim to the circumstances of birth and position. No fouler crime ever stained the annals of savage life, than the murder of this unfortunate queen, by a people calling themselves the most civilized nation in the world.

Marie Antoinette had four children. Marie Therese Charlotte, the companion of her parents in captivity, born 1778. In 1795 she was exchanged for the deputies whom Dumouriez had surrendered to Austria, and resided in Vienna till 1799, when she was married by Louis XVIII. to his nephew, oldest son of Charles X. Napoleon said of her that "she was the only man of her family." The dauphin, Louis, born in 1781, and died in 1789. Charles Louis, born in 1785; the unfortunate prince who shared his parents' imprisonment for a time, and died in 1795, a victim to the ill-treatment of the ferocious Simon; and a daughter who died in infancy.

MARIA LOUISA LEOPOLDINE CAROLINE,

ARCHDUCHESS of Austria, duchess of Parma, was the eldest daughter of Francis I., emperor of Austria, by his second marriage, with Maria Theresa, daughter of the king of Naples. She was born in 1791, and April 1st, 1810, married Napoleon. Her son was born March 20, 1811. When Napoleon left Paris to meet the allied army, he made her regent of the empire. On the 29th of March, 1814, she was obliged to leave Paris; Napoleon abdicated his authority April 11th, and Maria Louisa went to meet her father at Rambouillet, who would not allow her to follow her husband, but sent her, with her son, to Schönbrunn. When Napoleon returned from Elba, he wrote to his wife to join him, but his letters remained unanswered. In 1816 she entered upon the administration of the duchies of Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla, secured to her by the treaty of Fontainebleau. While there she privately married her master of the horse, Colonel Neipperg, by whom she had several children. She was apparently amiable, but weak, self-indulgent, and surrounded by artful advisers, who kept her in the thralldom of sensuous pleasures till she lost the moral dignity of woman. What signified her royal blood and high station! She lived unhonoured, and died unwept.

MARINA, DOÑA,

CELEBRATED for her faithfulness to the Spaniards, and for the assistance which she afforded them in the conquest of Mexico, was born at Painalla, in the province of Coatzacoalco, on the south-eastern borders of the Mexican empire. Her father, a rich and powerful Cacique, died when she was very young. Her mother married again; and, wishing to give her daughter's inheritance to her son by the second marriage, she cruelly sold her to some travelling merchants, and announcing her death, performed a mock-funeral to deceive those around her. These merchants sold the Indian maiden to the Cacique of Tabasco; and when the Tabascans surrendered to Cortés, she was one of twenty female slaves who were sent to him as propitiatory offerings. Speaking two of the Mexican dialects, Marina was a valuable acquisition to Cortés as interpreter, which value increased tenfold, when with remarkable rapidity she acquired the Spanish language. Cortés knew how to value her services; he made her his secretary, and, finally won by her charms, his mistress. She had a son by him, Don Martin Cortés, commendador of the military order of St. James, who afterwards rose to high consideration; but finally falling under suspicion of treasonable practices against the government, was, in 1568, shamefully subjected to the torture in the very capital which his father had acquired for the Castilian crown!

Prescott, to whose admirable work, "The Conquest of Mexico," we are chiefly indebted for this memoir, describes Marina as follows:—"She is said to have possessed uncommon personal attractions; and her open, expressive features, indicated her generous temper. She always remained faithful to the countrymen of her adoption; and her knowledge of the language and customs of the Mexicans, and often of their designs, enabled her to extricate the Spaniards, more than once, from the most embarrassing and perilous situations. She had her errors, as we have seen; but they should be rather charged to the defects of her early education, and to the evil influence of him to whom, in the darkness of her spirit, she looked with simple confidence for the light to guide her. All agree that she was full of excellent qualities; and the important services which she rendered the Spaniards have made her memory deservedly dear to them; while the name of Malinche—the name by which she is still known in Mexico—was pronounced with kindness by the conquered races, with whose misfortunes she showed an invariable sympathy."

Cortés finally gave Marina away in marriage to a Spanish knight, Don Juan Xamarillo. She had estates assigned her, where she probably passed the remainder of her life. Marina is represented as having met and recognised her mother after a long lapse of time, when passing through her native province. Her mother was greatly terrified, fearing that Cortés would severely punish her: but Marina embraced her, and allayed her fears, saying, "that she was sure she knew not what she did when she sold her to the traders, and that she forgave her." She gave her mother all the jewels and ornaments about her person, and assured her of her happiness since she had adopted the Christian faith.

MARINELLI, LUCREZIA,

OF Venice, was born in 1571. Her talents were surprisingly versatile. She was learned in church history, understood and practised the art of sculpture, was skilled in music, and besides left many literary productions, lives of several saints, a treatise entitled "The Excellence of Women and the Defects of Men;" an epic poem; several epistles to the duchess d'Este; and many other pieces of poetry, both sacred and profane. She died in 1653.

MARINELLA, LUCRETIA,

A VENETIAN lady, who lived in the seventeenth century, in 1601, published a book at Venice with this title—"La nobilita é la eccellenza della donne, con difetti é manecamenti degli uomini;" in which she attempted to prove the superiority of women to men. Marinella published some other works; among these, one called "La Colomba Sacra;" and "The Life of the Holy Virgin, and that of St. Francis."

MARLBOROUGH, SARAH, DUCHESS OF

WAS the daughter of Mr. Jennings, a country gentleman of respectable lineage and good estate. She was born on the 26th of May, 1660, at Holywell, a suburb of St. Albans. Her elder sister, Frances, afterwards duchess of Tyrconnel, was maid of honour to the duchess of York; and Sarah, when quite a child, was introduced at court, and became the playfellow of the princess Anne, who was several years younger than herself. Sarah succeeded her sister as maid of honour to the duchess of York; which, however, did not prevent her having constant intercourse with the princess, who lived under the same roof with her father, and who at that early age showed the greatest preference for her.

In 1677, Sarah Jennings married, clandestinely, the handsome colonel Churchill, favourite gentleman of the duke of York. Both parties being poor, it was an imprudent match; but the duchess of York, whom they made the confidant of their attachment, stood their friend, and offered her powerful assistance. She gave her attendant a handsome donation, and appointed her to a place of trust about her person. The young couple followed the fortunes of the duke of York for some years, while he was a sort of honourable exile from the court; but when the establishment of the princess Anne was formed, she being now married, Mrs. Churchill, secretly mistrusting the durability of the fortunes of her early benefactress, expressed an ardent wish to become one of the ladies of the princess Anne, who requested her father's permission to that effect, and received his consent. The early regard evinced by the princess Anne for Mrs. Churchill, soon ripened into a romantic attachment; she lost sight of the difference in their rank, and treated her as an equal, desiring a like return. When apart, they corresponded constantly under the names, chosen by the princess, of Mrs. Morley and Mrs. Freeman.

No two persons could be less alike than the princess and Sarah Churchill; the former was quiet, somewhat phlegmatic, easy and gentle, extremely well bred, fond of ceremony, and averse to mental exertion; the latter, resolute, bold, inclined to violence, prompt, unwearied and haughty. Swift, who was, however, her bitter enemy, describes her as the victim of "three furies which reigned in her breast, sordid avarice, disdainful pride, and ungovernable rage." The duchess of Marlborough's strongest characteristic appears to have been a most powerful will. Much is said of the ascendancy which a strong mind acquires over a weak one; but in many instances where this is thought to be the case, the influence arises from strength of will, and not from mental superiority. In the present instance, this was not altogether so; for the duchess of Marlborough was undoubtedly greatly superior to queen Anne in mind, but if her sense and discretion had been properly exercised, in controlling that indomitable will, which foamed and raged at everything which obstructed her path or interfered with her opinions, her influence might have been as lasting as it was once powerful.

On the accession of James II., Churchill was created a baron; but, attaching himself to the Protestant cause, when the prince of Orange landed, he deserted his old master and joined the prince; lady Churchill, meanwhile, aiding the princess Anne in her flight and abandonment of the king her father. On the accession of William and Mary, in 1692, to the English throne, Churchill was rewarded for his zeal by the earldom of Marlborough, and the appointment of commander-in-chief of the English army in the Low Country. Afterwards, falling into disgrace with the king and queen, lord and lady Marlborough were dismissed the court. Princess Anne espoused the cause of her favourite, and retired also; but, upon the death of queen Mary, they were restored to favour. The accession of Anne to the throne on the death of William, placed lady Marlborough in the position which her ambitious spirit coveted; she knew her own value and that of her gallant husband. She knew that Anne not only loved but feared her; that she would require her aid, and have recourse to her on all occasions of difficulty; and she felt equal to every emergency. A perusal of the letters of the queen to lady Marlborough at this period, is sufficient evidence of the subjection in which she (the queen) was held by her imperious favourite; the humility which they express are unworthy of her as a sovereign and as a woman. That Anne was already beginning to writhe under this intolerable yoke, there can be no doubt. From the commencement of her reign, a difference in politics between herself and her favourite was manifested. Lady Marlborough had a strong leaning to the whig side, while the queen was always attached to the tory party; and dissensions soon arose as to the ministers who were to surround the throne. Since the advancement of lord Marlborough, his lady had lost much of the caressing devotion which she had hitherto manifested for the queen; and exhibited to her some of that overbearing arrogance with which she treated the rest of her contemporaries. It is not astonishing that the queen, under these circumstances, should have sought for sympathy in one near her person who had suffered from the same overbearing temper. Abigail Hill, a poor relation of lady Marlborough's, whom she had placed about the queen as bed-chamber woman, was the prudent and careful recipient of her mistress's vexations, and gradually acquired such influence with her as eventually to supersede her powerful relative as favourite. Much has been said of the ingratitude of Mrs. Masham to her early benefactress. As there is no evidence that she had recourse to improper or dishonourable means to ingratiate herself with the queen, this charge cannot be substantiated. The queen's favour was a voluntary gift. Lady Marlborough alienated her mistress by her own arbitrary temper; and the queen only exercised the privilege which every gentlewoman should possess, of selecting her own friends and servants. Meanwhile, the brilliant successes of lord Marlborough obliged the queen to suppress her estranged feelings towards his wife, and bound her more closely to the interests of his family. In 1702, lord Marlborough was created a duke; and in 1705, after the battle of Blenheim, the royal manors of Woodstock and Wootton were bestowed upon him, and the palace of Blenheim was erected by the nation at an enormous cost.

The duchess of Marlborough's favour waned rapidly. She began to suspect Mrs. Hill, and remonstrated angrily with the queen on the subject, as if regard and affection were ever won back by reproaches! The secret marriage of Abigail Hill to Mr. Masham, a page of the court, which the queen attended privately, finally produced an open rupture. After a protracted attempt to regain her influence, during which period the queen had to listen to much "plain speaking" from the angry duchess, she was forced to resign her posts at court, and with her, the different members of her family, who filled nearly all the situations of dignity and emolument about the queen.

The duchess followed her husband abroad soon after her dismissal, where they remained till the death of queen Anne. George I. restored the duke of Marlborough at once to his station of captain-general of the land forces, and gave him other appointments; but he never regained his former political importance. The duchess of Marlborough was the mother of five children; her only son died at the age of seventeen, of that then fatal disease, the small-pox. Her four daughters, who inherited their mother's beauty, married men of distinction, two of whom only survived her. Lady Godolphin, the oldest, succeeded to the title of the duchess of Marlborough.

The duchess survived her husband twenty-three years. Her great wealth brought her many suitors, to one of whom, the duke of Somerset, she made the celebrated reply, "that she could not permit an emperor to succeed in that heart which had been devoted to John duke of Marlborough."

In her eighty-second year she published her vindication against all the attacks that in the course of her long life had been made against her. She also left voluminous papers to serve for the memoirs of her husband, as well as many documents since used in compiling her own life. Much of her latter life was spent in wrangling and quarrelling with her descendants; with some of whom she was at open war. She is said to have revenged herself upon her grand-daughter, lady Anne Egerton, by painting the face of her portrait black, and inscribing beneath it, "She is blacker within."

The duchess of Marlborough, in a corrupt age, and possessed of singular beauty, was of unblemished reputation. She had many high and noble qualities. She was truthful and honourable, and esteemed those qualities in others. Her attachment to her husband was worthy of its object, and of the love he bore her. A touching anecdote of the duke's unfading love for her is upon record, as related by herself. "She had very beautiful hair, and none of her charms were so highly prized by the duke as these tresses. One day, upon his offending her, she cropped them short, and laid them in an an'-a-chamber through which he must pass to her room. To her great disappointment, he passed, and repassed, calmly enough to provoke a saint, without appearing conscious of the deed. When she sought her hair, however, where she had laid it, it had vanished. Nothing more ever transpired upon the subject till the duke's death, when she found her beautiful ringlets carefully laid by in a cabinet where he kept whatever he held most precious. At this part of the story the duchess always fell a crying." The duchess of Marlborough died in October, 1774, at the age of eighty-four, leaving an enormous fortune.

MARLEY, LOUISE FRANÇOISE DE, MARCHIONESS DE VIELBOURG,

WAS a French lady of eminence for her extensive learning and great virtues. She lived about 1615.

MARON, THERESA DE,

A SISTER of the celebrated Raphael Mengs, was born at Auszig, in Bohemia. From her earliest youth she excelled in enamel, miniature, and crayon paintings; and she retained her talents in full vigour till her death, at the age of eighty, in 1806. She married the Cavalier Maron, an Italian artist of merit.

MARS, MADEMOISELLE HYPPOLITE BOUTET,

AN eminent French actress, daughter of Monvel, a celebrated French actor, was born in 1778. She appeared in public in 1793, and was soon engaged at the Théâtre Français.

Her father, Monvel, who was an actor of great celebrity, in giving her instructions had the good taste and judgment not to make her a mere creature of art. On the contrary, he taught her that much ought to be left to the inspiration of natural feelings, and that art ought only to second, not to supersede nature. Her original cast of parts consisted of those which the French term ingénues—parts in which youthful innocence and simplicity are represented. These she performed for many years with extraordinary applause. At length she resolved to shine in a diametrically opposite kind of acting—that of the higher class of coquettes. In accomplishing this, she had to encounter a violent opposition from Mademoiselle Leverd, who was already in possession of this department; for, in France, each actor has exclusive right to a certain species of character. Mademoiselle Mars succeeded, however, in breaking through this rule, a great triumph for her; and in the coquette she was fully as charming and successful as in personating the child of nature. She pleased foreigners as well as her own countrymen. Mr. Alison, the son of the historian, spoke of her as being “probably as perfect an actress in comedy as ever appeared on any stage. She has (he continues) united every advantage of countenance, and voice, and figure, which it is possible to conceive.” Mademoiselle Mars was very beautiful, and retained her charms till a late period in life. This beauty gave, no doubt, additional power to her genius, and assisted her in establishing her sway over the theatrical world. At Lyons she was crowned publicly in the theatre with a garland of flowers, and a fête was celebrated in honour of her by the public bodies and authorities of the city. Her last performance at the theatre was at Paris, in April, 1841; and she died in that city in 1848, aged seventy years.

MARTHA, SISTER, (ANNA BIGET,)

Was born on the 26th of October, 1748, at Thoraise, a pleasant village situated on the Doubs, near Besançon. Her parents were poor, hard-working country folks. From infancy she showed an uncommonly tender and kind disposition; always wishing to aid those who were in any distress; ever willing to share her dinner with the beggar or the wayfarer. At the age to be placed in some service, she petitioned, and obtained the situation of tourière sister in the convent of the Visitation. This monastic establishment had been founded by the baroness of Chantal; it was chiefly intended as an asylum for young ladies of high birth, who needed a protecting refuge, or whose piety urged them to withdraw from the world; but as the delicate education and habits of such ladies would render them inadequate to many rough duties essential to every household, the convent received poor girls from the families of peasants and petty artizans, who had been used from childhood to labour and fatigue. In this capacity Anne Biget was received. Upon pronouncing her vows, she took the name of Sister Martha, a name ever to be remembered among the benefactors of misery. The archbishop of Besançon gave her permission to visit the prisons, and she devoted herself to the wretched tenants with enthusiasm, when the breaking out of the revolution filled them with a different and still more miserable order of inhabitants. During the reign of terror, Sister Martha, her convent destroyed, her companions dispersed, remained faithful to her vocation. She still comforted the prisoners, now prisoners of war; she dressed their wounds, applied to the charitable throughout the town, for the means of affording them necessary comforts; they were as her children, so active, so devoted was her zeal in their behalf during a series of years. Spaniards, Englishmen, Italians, all in turn experienced her tender cares. When the French soldiers who were accustomed to her care were wounded, and away from home, they would exclaim, “Oh, where is Sister Martha? If she were here, we should suffer less.” When the allied sovereigns were in Paris, they sent for Sister Martha, and bestowed valuable gifts upon her. Medals were sent her, at different times, from the emperor of Russia and from the emperor of Austria. Nor was her benevolence confined to the soldiers alone; the poor, the suffering of every description, resorted to Sister Martha, and never in vain. In 1816 she visited Paris, to obtain succours for her poor countrymen suffering from a scanty harvest, and consequent scarcity of food. She was very graciously received by Louis XVIII., and the giddy butterflies of the court vied with each other in attentions and caresses to the poor nun. Sister Martha finished a life employed in good works in 1824, at the age of seventy-six.

MARTIN, ELIZABETH AND GRACE,

THE wives of the two eldest sons of Abram Martin, of South Carolina, who were engaged in active service in their country's cause during the war of the revolution, distinguished themselves by a daring exploit. Being left at home alone with their mother-in-law, Elizabeth Martin, during their husbands' absence, and hearing that two British officers, with important despatches, were to pass that night along the road near their dwelling, the two young women disguised themselves in their husbands' apparel, and taking fire-arms, concealed themselves by the road, till the courier appeared with his attendant guards, when springing from the bushes, they demanded the despatches. Taken by surprise, the men yielded, gave up the papers, and were put on their parole. The despatches were immediately sent to General Greene.

MARTIN, SARAH,

Who has won for herself the fame most desirable for a woman, that of Christian benevolence, unsurpassed in the annals of her sex, was born in 1791. Her father was a poor mechanic in Caister, a village three miles from Yarmouth, England. Sarah was the only child of her parents, who both died when she was very young; she had then to depend on her grandmother, a poor old widow, whose name was Bonnett, and who deserves to have it recorded for the kind care she took of her granddaughter.

Sarah Martin's education was merely such as the village school afforded. At the age of fourteen, she passed a year in learning the business of dress-making; and then gained her livelihood by going out and working at her trade by the day, among the families of the village. In the town of Yarmouth was the county prison, where criminals were confined; their condition is thus set forth in the work* from which we gather our sketch:

* Edinburg Review, 1847.

"Their time was given to gaming, swearing, playing, fighting, and bad language; and their visitors were admitted from without with little restrictions. There was no divine worship in the jail on Sundays, nor any respect paid to that holy day. There were underground cells, (these continued even down to 1836,) quite dark, and deficient in proper ventilation. The prisoners describe their heat in summer as almost suffocating, but they prefer them for their warmth in winter; their situation is such as to defy inspection, and they are altogether unfit for the confinement of any human being."

No person in Yarmouth took thought for these poor, miserable prisoners; no human eye looked with pity on their dreadful condition; and had their reformation been proposed, it would, no doubt, have been scouted as an impossibility.

In August, 1819, a woman was committed to the jail for a most unnatural crime. She was a mother who had "forgotten her sucking child." She had not "had compassion upon the son of her womb," but had cruelly beaten and ill-used it. The consideration of her offence was calculated to produce a great effect upon a female mind; and there was one person in the neighbourhood of Yarmouth who was deeply moved by it. Sarah Martin was a little woman of gentle, quiet manners, possessing no beauty of person, nor, as it seemed, any peculiar endowment of mind. She was then just eight-and-twenty years of age, and had, for thirteen years past, earned her livelihood by going out to the houses of various families in the town as a day-labourer in her business of dress-making. Her residence was at Caister, a village three miles from Yarmouth, where she lived with an aged grandmother, and whence she walked to Yarmouth and back again in the prosecution of her daily toil. This poor girl had long mourned over the condition of the inmates of the jail. Even as long back as in 1810, "whilst frequently passing the jail," she says, "I felt a strong desire to obtain admission to the prisoners to read the Scriptures to them; for I thought much of their condition, and of their sin before God; how they were shut out from society, whose rights they had violated, and how destitute they were of the scriptural instruction which alone could meet their unhappy circumstances." The case of the unnatural mother stimulated her to make the attempt, but "I did not," she says, "make known my purpose of seeking admission to the jail until the object was attained, even to my beloved grandmother; so sensitive was my fear lest any obstacle should thereby arise in my way, and the project seem a visionary one. God led me, and I consulted none but Him." She ascertained the culprit's name, and went to the jail. She passed into the dark porch which overhung the entrance, fit emblem of the state of things within; and no doubt with bounding heart, and in a timid modest form of application, uttered with that clear and gentle voice, the sweet tones of which are yet well remembered, solicited permission to see the cruel parent. There was some difficulty—there is always "a lion in the way" of doing good—and she was not at first permitted to enter. To a wavering mind, such a check would have appeared of evil omen; but Sarah Martin was too well assured of her own purposes and powers to hesitate. Upon a second application she was admitted.

The manner of her reception in the jail is told by herself with admirable simplicity. The unnatural mother stood before her. She "was surprised at the sight of a stranger." "When I told her," says Sarah Martin, "the motive of my visit, her guilt, her need of God's mercy, she burst into tears, and thanked me!"

Her reception at once proved the necessity for such a missionary, and her own personal fitness for the task; and her visit was repeated again and again, during such short intervals of leisure as she could spare from her daily labours. At first she contented herself with merely reading to the prisoners; but familiarity with their wants and with her own powers soon enlarged the sphere of her tuition, and she began to instruct them in reading and writing. This extension of her labour interfered with her ordinary occupations. It became necessary to sacrifice a portion of her time, and consequently of her means, to these new duties. She did not hesitate. "I thought it right," she says, "to give up a day in the week from dress-making, to serve the prisoners. This regularly given, with many an additional one, was not felt as a pecuniary loss, but was ever followed with abundant satisfaction, for the blessing of God was upon me."

In the year 1826, Sarah Martin's grandmother died, and she came into possession of an annual income of ten or twelve pounds, derived from the investment of "between two and three hundred pounds." She then removed from Caister to Yarmouth, where she occupied two rooms in a house situated in a row in an obscure part of the town; and, from that time, devoted herself with increased energy to her philanthropic labours. A benevolent lady, resident in Yarmouth, had for some years, with a view to securing her a little rest for her health's sake, given her one day in a week, by compensating her for that day in the same way as if she had been engaged in dress-making. With that assistance, and with a few quarterly subscriptions, "chiefly 2s. 6d. each, for bibles, testaments, tracts, and other books for distribution," she went on devoting every available moment of her life to her great purpose. But dressmaking, like other professions, is a jealous mistress; customers fell off, and, eventually, almost entirely disappeared. A question of anxious moment now presented itself, the determination of which is one of the most characteristic and memorable incidents of her life. Was she to pursue her benevolent labours, even although they led to utter poverty? Her little income was not more than enough to pay her lodging, and the expenses consequent upon the exercise of her charitable functions: and was actual destitution of ordinary necessities to be submitted to? She never doubted; but her reasoning upon the subject presents so clear an illustration of the exalted character of her thoughts and purposes, and exhibits so eminent an example of Christian devotedness and heroism, that it would be an injustice to her memory not to quote it in her own words:—"In the full occupation of dressmaking, I had care with it, and anxiety for the future; but as that disappeared, care fled also. God, who had called me into the vineyard, had said, 'Whatsoever is right I will give you.' I had learned from the Scriptures of truth that I should be supported; God was my master, and would not forsake his servant; He was my father, and could not forget his child. I knew also that it sometimes seemed good in his sight to try the faith and patience of his servants, by bestowing upon them very limited means of support; as in the case of Naomi and Ruth; of the widow of Zarephath and Elijah; and my mind, in the contemplation of such trials, seemed exalted by more than human energy; for I had counted the cost; and my mind was made up. If, whilst imparting truth to others, I became exposed to temporal want, the privation so momentary to an individual, would not admit of comparison with following the Lord, in thus administering to others."

Her next object was to secure the observance of Sunday; and, after long urging and recommendation, she prevailed upon the prisoners "to form a Sunday service, by one reading to the rest; . . . but aware," she continues, "of the instability of a practice in itself good, without any corresponding principle of preservation, and thinking that my presence might exert a beneficial tendency, I joined their Sunday morning worship as a regular hearer."

After three years' perseverance in this "happy and quiet course," she made her next advance, which was to introduce employment, first for the women prisoners, and afterwards for the men. In 1823, "one gentleman," she says, "presented me with ten shillings, and another, in the same week, with a pound, for prison charity. It then occurred to me that it would be well to expend it in material for baby-clothes; and having borrowed patterns, cut out the articles, fixed prices of payment for making them, and ascertained the cost of a set, that they might be disposed of at a certain price, the plan was carried into effect. The prisoners also made shirts, coats, &c. * * * By means of this plan, many young women who were not able to sew, learned this art, and, in satisfactory instances, had a little money to take at the end of the term of imprisonment. . . . The fund of £1 10s. for this purpose, as a foundation and perpetual stock, (for whilst desiring its preservation, I did not require its increase,) soon rose to seven guineas, and since its establishment, above £408 worth of various articles have been sold for charity."

The men were thus employed:—

"They made straw hats, and, at a later period, bone spoons and seals; others made mens' and boys' caps, cut in eight quarters—the material, old cloth or moreen, or whatever my friends could find up to give me for them. In some instances, young men, and more frequently boys, have learned to sew grey cotton shirts, or even patch-work, with a view of shutting out idleness and making themselves useful. On one occasion I showed to the prisoners an etching of the chess-player, by Retzsch, which two men, one a shoemaker and the other a bricklayer, desired much to copy; they were allowed to do so, and being furnished with pencil, pen, paper, &c., they succeeded remarkably well. The chess-player presented a pointed and striking lesson, which could well be applied to any kind of gaming, and was, on this account, suitable to my pupils, who had generally descended from the love of marbles and pitch-halfpenny in children, to cards, dice, &c., in men. The business of copying it had the advantage of requiring all thought and attention at the time. The attention of other prisoners was attracted to it, and for a year or two afterwards many continued to copy it."

After another interval she proceeded to the formation of a fund which she applied to the furnishing of work for prisoners upon their discharge; "affording me," she adds, "the advantage of observing their conduct at the same time."

She had thus, in the course of a few years—during which her mind had gradually expanded to the requirements of the subject before her—provided for all the most important objects of prison discipline; moral and intellectual tuition, occupation during imprisonment, and employment after discharge. Whilst great and good men, unknown to her, were inquiring and disputing as to the way and the order in which these very results were to be attained—inquiries and disputes which have not yet come to an end—here was a poor woman who was actually herself personally accomplishing them all! It matters not whether all her measures were the very wisest that could have been imagined. She had to contend with many difficulties that are now unknown; prison discipline was then in its infancy; everything she did was conceived in the best spirit; and, considering the time, and the means at her command, could scarcely have been improved.

The full extent to which she was personally engaged in carrying out these objects, has yet to be explained. The Sunday service in the jail was adopted, as we have seen, upon her recommendation, and she joined the prisoners, as a fellow-worshipper, on Sunday morning. Their evening service, which was to be read in her absence, was soon abandoned; but, finding that to be the case, she attended on that part of the day also, and the service was then resumed. "After several changes of readers, the office," she says, "devolved on me. That happy privilege thus graciously opened to me, and embraced from necessity, and in much fear, was acceptable to the prisoners, for God made it so; and also an unspeakable advantage and comfort to myself." These modest sentences convey but a very faint notion of the nature of these singular services. Fortunately, in a report of captain Williams, one of the inspectors of prisons, we have a far more adequate account of the matter. It stands thus:—

"Sunday, November 29, 1835.—Attended divine service in the morning at the prison. The male prisoners only were assembled; a female, resident in the town, officiated; her voice was exceedingly melodious, her delivery emphatic, and her enunciation extremely distinct. The service was the liturgy of the church of England; two psalms were sung by the whole of the prisoners, and extremely well—much better than I have frequently heard in our best-appointed churches. A written discourse, of her own composition, was read by her; it was of a purely moral tendency, involving no doctrinal points, and admirably suited to the hearers. During the performance of the service, the prisoners paid the profoundest attention, and the most marked respect; and, as far as it is possible to judge, appeared to take a devout interest. Evening service was read by her afterwards to the female prisoners.”

We believe that there are gentlemen in the world who stand so stiffly upon the virtue of certain forms of ministerial ordination, as to set their faces against all lay, and especially against all female, religious teaching. We will not dispute as to what may, or may not, be the precise value of those forms. They ought to confer powers of inestimable worth, considering how stubbornly they are defended—and perhaps they do so; but every one amongst us knows and feels that the power of writing or preaching good sermons is not amongst the number. The cold, laboured eloquence which boy-bachelors are authorized by custom and constituted authority to inflict upon us—the dry husks and chips of divinity which they bring forth from the dark recesses of the theology (as it is called) of the fathers, or of the middle ages, sink into utter worthlessness by the side of the jail addresses of this poor, uneducated seamstress. From her own registers of the prisoners who came under her notice, it is easy to describe the ordinary members of her congregation:—pert London pickpockets, whom a cheap steamboat brought to reap a harvest at some country festival; boors, whom ignorance and distress led into theft; depraved boys, who picked up a precarious livelihood amongst the chances of a seaport town; sailors, who had committed assaults in the boisterous hilarity consequent upon a discharge with a paid-up arrear of wages; servants, of both sexes, seduced by bad company into the commission of crimes against their masters; profligate women, who had added assault or theft to the ordinary vices of a licentious life; smugglers; a few game-law criminals; and paupers transferred from a work-house, where they had been initiated into crime, to a jail, where their knowledge was perfected. Such were some of the usual classes of persons who assembled around this singular teacher of righteousness.

Noble woman! A faith so firm, and so disinterested, might have removed mountains; a self-sacrifice founded upon such principles is amongst the most heroic of human achievements.

This appears to have been the busiest period of Sarah Martin's life. Her system, if we may so term it, of superintendence over the prisoners, was now complete. For six or seven hours daily she took her station amongst them; converting that which, without her, would have been, at best, a scene of dissolute idleness, into a hive of industry and order. We have already explained the nature of the employment which she provided for them; the manner of their instruction is described as follows: “Any one who could not read, I encouraged to learn, whilst others in my absence assisted them. They were taught to write also; whilst such as could write already, copied extracts from books lent to them. Prisoners, who were able to read, committed verses from the Holy Scriptures to memory every day according to their ability or inclination. I, as an example, also committed a few verses to memory to repeat to them every day; and the effect was remarkable; always silencing excuse when the pride of some prisoners would have prevented their doing it. Many said at first, ‘It would be of no use;’ and my reply was, ‘It is of use to me, and why should it not be so to you? You have not tried it, but I have.’ Tracts and children's books, and large books, four or five in number, of which they were very fond, were exchanged in every room daily, whilst any who could read more were supplied with larger books.”

There does not appear to have been any instance of a prisoner long refusing to take advantage of this mode of instruction. Men entered the prison saucy, shallow, self-conceited, full of cavils and objections, which Sarah Martin was singularly clever in meeting; but in a few days the most stubborn, and those who had refused the most peremptorily, either to be employed or to be instructed, would beg to be allowed to take their part in the general course. Once within the circle of her influence, the effect was curious. Men old in years, as well as in crime, might be seen striving for the first time in their lives to hold a pen, or bending hoary heads over primers and spelling-books, or studying to commit to memory some precept taken from the Holy Scriptures. Young rascals, as impudent as they were ignorant, beginning with one verse, went on to long passages; and even the dumbest were enabled by perseverance to furnish their minds and memories with “from two to five verses every day.” All these operations, it must be borne in mind, were carried on under no authority save what was derived from the teacher's innate force of character. Aware of that circumstance, and that any rebellion would be fatal to her usefulness, she so contrived every exercise of her power as to “make a favour of it,” knowing well that “to depart from this course, would only be followed by the prisoners' doing less, and not doing it well.” The ascendancy she thus acquired was very singular. A general persuasion of the sincerity with which “she watched, and wept, and prayed, and felt for all,” rendered her the general depository of the little confidences, the tales of weakness, treachery, and sorrow, in the midst of which she stood! and thus she was enabled to fan the rising desire for emancipation, to succour the tempted, to encourage the timid, and put the erring in the way.

After the close of her labours at the jail, she proceeded, at one time of her life, to a large school which she superintended at the work-house; and afterwards, when that school was turned over to proper teachers, she devoted two nights in the week to a school for factory girls, which was held in the capacious chancel of the old church of St. Nicholas. There, or elsewhere, she was everything. Other teachers would send their classes to stand by and listen, whilst Sarah Martin, in her striking and effective way, imparted instruction to the forty or fifty young women who were fortunate enough to be more especially her pupils. Every countenance was upon her; and, as the questions went round, she would explain them by a piece of poetry, or an anecdote, which she had always ready at command, and, more especially, by Scripture illustration. The Bible was, indeed, the great fountain of her knowledge and her power. For many years she read it through four times every year, and had formed a most exact reference book to its contents. Her intimate familiarity with its striking imagery and lofty diction, impressed a poetical character upon her own style, and filled her mind with exalted thoughts. After her class duties were over, there remained to be performed many offices of kindness, which with her were consequent upon the relation of teacher and pupil; there was personal communication with this scholar and with that; some inquiry here, some tale to listen to there; for she was never a mere schoolmistress, but always the friend and counsellor, as well as the instructor.

The evenings on which there was no tuition were devoted by her to visiting the sick, either in the work-house, or through the town generally; and occasionally an evening was passed with some of those worthy people in Yarmouth by whom her labours were regarded with interest. Her appearance in any of their houses was the signal for a busy evening. Her benevolent smile, and quick, active manner, communicated her own cheerfulness and energy to every one around her. She never failed to bring work with her, and, if young people were present, was sure to employ them all. Something was to be made ready for the occupation of the prisoners, or for their instruction; patterns or copies were to be prepared, or old materials to be adjusted to some new use, in which last employment her ingenuity was pre-eminent. Odd pieces of woollen or cotton, scraps of paper, mere litters, things which other people threw away, it mattered not what, she always begged that such things might be kept for her, and was sure to turn them to some account. If, on such occasions, whilst everybody else was occupied, some one would read aloud, Sarah Martin's satisfaction was complete; and at intervals, if there were no strangers present, or if such communication were desired, she would dilate upon the sorrows and sufferings of her guilty flock, and her own hopes and disappointments in connexion with them, in the language of simple, animated truth.

Her day was closed by no "return to a cheerful fireside prepared by the cares of another," but to her solitary apartments, which she had left locked up during her absence, and where "most of the domestic offices of life were performed by her own hands." There she kept a copious record of her proceedings in reference to the prisoners; notes of their circumstances and conduct during such time as they were under her observation, which generally extended long beyond the period of their imprisonment; with most exact accounts of the expenditure of the little subscriptions before mentioned, and also of a small annual payment from the British Ladies' Society, established by Mrs. Fry, and of all other money committed to her in aid of any branch of her charitable labours. These books of record and account have been very properly preserved, and have been presented to a public library in Yarmouth.

In scenes like these Sarah Martin passed her time, never appearing to think of herself; indeed her own scanty fare was hardly better than that of the poorest prisoner. Yet her soul was triumphant, and the joy of her heart found expression in sacred songs. Nothing could restrain the energy of her mind. In the seclusion of a lonely chamber, "apart from all that could disturb, and in a universe of calm repose, and peace, and love;" when speaking of herself and her condition, she remarked, in words of singular beauty,

—"I seem to lie
So near the heavenly portals bright,
I catch the streaming rays that fly
From eternity's own light."

Thus she cheered her solitary room with strains of Christian praise and gratitude, and entered the dark valley of the shadow of death with hymns of victory and triumph. She died on the 15th of October, 1843, aged fifty-two years.

Sarah Martin is one of the noblest of the Christian heroines the nineteenth century has produced. The two predominant qualities of her soul were love, or "the charity which hopeth all things," and moral courage; both eminently feminine endowments. She performed her wonderful works with true womanly discretion. She is, therefore, an example of excellence of whom her sex should be—more than proud—they should be thankful for this light of moral loveliness enshrined in a female form. "Her gentle disposition," says one of her biographers, "never irritated by disappointment, nor her charity straitened by ingratitude, present a combination of qualities which imagination sometimes portrays as the ideal of what is pure and beautiful, but which are rarely found embodied with humanity. She was no titular Sister of Charity, but was silently felt and acknowledged to be one, by the many outcast and destitute persons who received encouragement from her lips, and relief from her hands, and by the few who were witnesses of her good works.

It is the business of literature to make such a life stand out from the masses of ordinary existences, with something of the distinctness with which a lofty building uprears itself in the confusion of a distant view. It should be made to attract all eyes, to excite the hearts of all persons who think the welfare of their fellow-mortals an object of interest or duty; it should be included in collections of biography, and chronicled in the high places of history; men should be taught to estimate it as that of one whose philanthropy has entitled her to renown, and children to associate the name of Sarah Martin with those of Howard, Buxton, Fry—the most benevolent of mankind.”

MARTINEZ, MARIANNE,

Was the daughter of a gardener of Vienna. One day the poet Metastasio met her in the street, when she was a very little child; she was singing some popular air. Her voice, and her vivacity pleased the poet, and he offered her parents to educate her. They accepted his proposals, and he kept his promises. Nothing was neglected to make the young girl an artist. She had the good fortune to receive lessons in music, and on the harpsichord, from Haydn, whose genius was not yet famous; and Porpora taught her the art of singing, and the science of composition. Her progress was rapid; she played with neatness and grace; she sang beautifully, and her compositions showed a vigour of conception together with extensive learning. She reunited the qualities of many distinguished artists. Dr. Burney, who knew her at Venice, in 1772, speaks of her with admiration. Metastasio bequeathed to her all his property. In 1796 she lived at Vienna, in affluence, and gave weekly concerts at her house, where she received all the musical celebrities. Dr. Burney cites with high eulogy many of her sonatas, and her cantatas on words of Metastasio. She composed a miserere, with orchestral accompaniment. Gerbert had a mass and an oratorio written by her.

MARTINOZZI, LAURA.

FRANCESCO I., duke of Modena, became possessed of the sovereignty, in 1629, by the resignation of his father, Alphonso III., who entered a convent of Capuchins, and, under the name of brother Giambattista, renounced all worldly pomps and vanities. Overtures had been made to the young prince, by cardinal Mazarin, for an alliance with his niece, Laura Martinuzzi. These had been rather evaded; when an autograph letter, from Louis, king of France, urgently pressing the marriage, determined the affair; and, in 1655, attended by the most magnificent pomp, Laura was received at Modena as the wife of its sovereign. At the end of six years of conjugal happiness, Alphonso died, appointing his widow regent, and guardian of his son and daughter. The duchess held the reins of empire, for thirteen years, with a firm hand, and appears to have governed with more ability than her predecessor or her successor. In 1676 she retired to Rome, where she lived in comparative seclusion till 1687, when she died. Her daughter, Mary Beatrice, was the wife of the unfortunate James II., of England, whose reverses and exile she shared.

MARY THERESA OF AUSTRIA,

DAUGHTER of Philip IV. of Spain, married, in 1660, Louis XIV. of France, and died 1683, aged forty-five. Her life was embittered by his infidelities.

MARY OF CLEVES

MARRIED Henry I., prince of Condé. She was loved so ardently by the duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III., that when called to the throne of Poland, he wrote to her, signing his name with his blood. When raised to the French throne, he determined to annul Mary's marriage; but his mother, Catharine de Medicis, opposed it, and Mary died suddenly, in 1574, at the age of eighteen, as was supposed, by poison.

MARY I., QUEEN OF ENGLAND,

ELDEST daughter of Henry VIII., by his first wife, Catharine of Spain, was born at Greenwich, in February, 1517. Her mother was very careful of her education, and provided her with proper tutors. Her first preceptor was the famous Linacre; and after his death, Lewis Vires, a learned Spaniard, became her tutor. She acquired, under these learned men, a thorough knowledge of the Latin; so that Erasmus commends her epistles in that language.

Towards the end of her father's reign, at the earnest request of queen Catharine Parr, she undertook to translate Erasmus' Paraphrase on the Gospel of St. John; but, being taken ill soon after she commenced it, she left it to be finished by her chaplain. It was published; but, on Mary's accession to the throne, she issued a proclamation suppressing it; and it is supposed that the sickness that seized her while translating this work was affected.

Edward VI., her brother, dying July 6th, 1553, she was proclaimed queen the same month, and crowned in October. Upon her accession, she declared in her speech to the council that she would not persecute her Protestant subjects; but, in the following month, she prohibited preaching without a special license, and in less than three months the Protestant bishops were excluded the house of Lords, and all the statutes of Edward VI. respecting the Protestant religion were repealed.

In July, 1554, she was married to prince Philip of Spain, who was eleven years younger than herself, and by temper little disposed to act the lover

His ruling passion was ambition, which his fond consort was resolved to gratify. She was, however, less successful in this point, than in her favourite wish of reconciling the kingdom to the pope, which was effected in form, by the legate, cardinal Pole. The sanguinary laws against heretics were renewed, and put into execution. The shocking scenes which followed this determination have indelibly fixed upon the sovereign the epithet of "bloody queen Mary." A disappointment in a supposed pregnancy, her husband's coldness and unkindness, and the discontent of her subjects, aggravated her natural fretfulness. Although Pole disapproved of the severity of persecution, the arguments of Gardiner and others in its favour suited the queen's disposition so well, that in three or four years two hundred and seventy-seven persons were committed to the flames, including prelates, gentlemen, laymen, women, and even children. The sincerity of Mary's zeal could not be doubted, for she sacrificed the revenues of the crown in restitution of the goods of the church; and to remonstrances on this head, she replied, "that she preferred the salvation of her soul to ten such kingdoms as England." She had, indeed, no scruple in indemnifying herself by arbitrary exactions on the property of her subjects; and her whole reign showed a marked tendency to despotism.

Some have supposed that the queen was compassionate, and that most of these barbarities were committed by her bishops without her knowledge. But among numberless proofs of the falsity of this opinion, we need only mention her treatment of the archbishop Cranmer, who had saved her life, when her father, Henry VIII., irritated by her firm adherence to her mother, and her obstinacy in refusing to submit to him, had resolved to put her openly to death. Cranmer alone ventured to urge king Henry against such an act; and, by his argument, succeeded in saving her. In return for this, he was condemned and burnt by Mary for heresy. She died, November 7th, 1558, at the age of forty-three, of an epidemic fever. The loss of Calais, just before her death, so affected her, that she remarked to her attendants that they would find Calais written on her heart.

Styke preserved three pieces of her writing; a prayer against the assaults of vice; a meditation touching adversity; and a prayer to be read at the hour of death. In "Fox's Acts and Monuments" are printed eight of her letters to king Edward and the lords of council; and in the "Syllogæ Epistolorum" are several more of her letters.

Miss Strickland, in her history of the "Queens of England," has collected many facts which serve to soften the dark picture of Mary's reign, heretofore exhibited. We will quote a portion of these remarks:

"Although every generous feeling is naturally roused against the horrid cruelties perpetrated in Mary's name, yet it is unjust and ungrateful to mention her maiden reign with unqualified abhorrence; for if the tyrannical laws instituted by her father had remained a few years more in force, the representative government of England would gradually have withered under the terrors of imprisonment and executions without impartial trial, and regal despotism would have been as successfully established here, as it was in France and Spain, by the descendants of Henry VIII.'s associates, Francis I. and Charles V. This change arose from the queen's own ideas of rectitude; for the majority of her privy-councillors, judges, and aristocracy, had as strong a tendency to corrupt and slavish principles as the worst enemy to national freedom could wish.

"Many wholesome laws were made or revived by her; among others, justices of the peace were enjoined to take the examination of felons in writing, at the same time binding witnesses over to prosecute: without these regulations, a moment's reflection will show, that much malignant accusation might take place in a justice-room, unless witnesses were bound to prove their words. All landholders and householders were made proportionably chargeable to the repairs of roads. The jails were in a respectable state; since Fox allows that the persons imprisoned for conscience' sake were treated humanely in the prisons under royal authority, while the persecuting bishops made noisome confinement part of the tortures of the unhappy Protestants.

"Queen Mary is commended for the merciful provision she made for the poor; there is, however, no trace of poor-rates, levied from the community at large, like those established by her sister Elizabeth, at the close of the sixteenth century. But that the poor were relieved by Mary is evident, by the entire cessation of those insurrections, on account of utter destitution, which took place in her father's and brother's reigns; and now and then under the sway of Elizabeth. This is more singular, since corn was at famine price, throughout the chief part of Mary's reign, owing to a series of inclement years and wet harvests. It seems likely that part of the church lands she restored were devoted to the relief of the destitute, since very few monasteries were re-founded. In her reign was altered that mysterious law, called benefit of clergy. It had originated in the earliest dawn of civilization, when the church snatched, from the tyranny of barbarous and ignorant chiefs, all prisoners or victims who could read, and claiming them as her own, asserted the privilege of bringing them to trial. Thus were the learned judged by the learned, and the ignorant left to the mercies of those savage as themselves. This law tended to the encouragement of learning in times when not more than one person out of two thousand laymen knew a letter in the book. Since the comparative cessation from civil war, after the accession of queen Mary's grandfather, general knowledge had surged forward in such mighty waves, that the law of benefit of clergy, with many others of high utility five centuries before, were left without an object, their actual purposes having ebbed away in the transitions of the times."

Queen Mary, having overcome the repugnance of the English to be governed by a sovereign lady, was disposed to place her own sex in stations of authority, of which there had been few examples before or since. She made lady Berkley a justice of the peace for Gloucestershire; and lady Rous she appointed of the quorum for Suffolk, "who did usually sit on the bench at assizes and sessions, among the other judges, cineta gladio, girt with the sword."

MARY II., QUEEN OF ENGLAND,

AND wife of William III., with whom she reigned jointly, was born at St. James' palace, Westminster, on the 30th of April, 1662. She was the daughter of James II. by Anne Hyde, his first wife. She married, November 4th, 1677, at the age of fifteen, William, Prince of Orange, and sailed two weeks after for the Hague. Here she lived, fulfilling all her duties as a wife and princess, to the admiration of all who knew her, till February 12th, 1689; when, accepting a solemn invitation from the states of England, she followed her husband, who had arrived the preceding November, to London.

The throne was declared vacant by the flight of James II., and William and Mary were crowned as next heirs, April 11th, 1689.

Though Mary was declared joint possessor of the throne with her husband, king William, yet the administration of the government was left entirely to him. This arrangement cost Mary no sacrifice; indeed she desired it should be made, that all rule and authority should be vested in him, remarking—"There is but one command which I wish him to obey; and that is, 'Husbands, love your wives.' For myself, I shall follow the injunction, 'Wives, be obedient to your husbands in all things.'" She kept the promise voluntarily made; and all her efforts were directed to promote her husband's happiness, and make him beloved by the English people. He had great confidence in her abilities; and when, during his absence in Ireland and on the continent, she was left regent of the kingdom, she managed parties at home with much prudence, and governed with a discretion not inferior to his own.

Mary was strongly attached to the Protestant religion and the Church of England, and was evidently led to consider its preservation a paramount duty, even when opposed to the claims of filial obedience. The unfriendly terms on which she lived with her sister, afterwards queen Anne have been alluded to as a blemish in the character of Mary; but political jealousies, and the foolish attachment of Anne to overbearing favourites, may sufficiently account for this coolness. Mary was, in truth, an amiable and excellent queen, and by her example made industry and domestic virtue fashionable. Her letter to lady Russell, in which she deplores the bustle and pomp of royalty, because it separated her so much from her husband, is a beautiful proof how the best feelings of the woman were always prominent in her heart.

Mary died of the small-pox, at Kensington, in the year 1675, being in her thirty-third year. The people were sincere mourners; but to her husband the blow was almost overwhelming. For several weeks he was incapable of attending to business. To archbishop Tennison, who was striving to console him, William said—"I cannot do otherwise than grieve, since I have lost a wife who, during the seventeen years I have lived with her, never committed an indiscretion."

MARY, OF HUNGARY,

DAUGHTER of Philip, king of Spain, married, in 1521, Louis, king of Hungary, who was killed in battle five years after. She was made governess of the Netherlands by her brother, Charles V., where she behaved with great courage, and opposed, successfully, Henry II. of France. She was a friend to the Protestants, and a patroness of literature. Her fondness for field-sports procured her the name of Diana; and from her military prowess, she was called the mother of the camp.

Her sagacity and penetration were of singular service to her brother, by whom she was consulted on all affairs of government. She conducted several wars with glory and success, frequently mingling on horseback with the troops. While Charles V. was besieging Mentz, Mary made a diversion in Picardy, to prevent the king of France from succouring the besieged; she caused, on this occasion, great havoc, ruining seven or eight hundred villages, and burning Folembrai, a royal palace, built by Francis I. Henry II. of France, in retaliation, burned several of the populous towns of the Netherlands, and the royal palace of Bains, the wonder of the age. When Mary heard of this, she swore that all France should repent the outrage; and she carried out her threat, even to cruelty, as far as she could. Henry ardently desired to take Mary prisoner, to see whether she would retain in captivity the same courageous and lofty spirit.

Her person was majestic and handsome, and her manners agreeable; her court was celebrated for the magnificence of its feasts, its tournaments, and its spectacles. She was also fond of study, particularly of the Latin authors. In 1555, she left her government of the Netherlands and returned to Spain, where she died, in 1558.

MARY LECZINSKA,

DAUGHTER of Stanislaus, of Poland, married Louis XV. of France, in 1725. She was an amiable and virtuous princess. She bore to Louis XV. two sons and eight daughters; and died, universally regretted, in 1768, aged sixty-five.

MARY BEATRICE D'ESTÉ,

WAS the daughter of Alphonso, duke of Modena. She was born, October 5th, 1658. Educated in a convent, she was desirous of becoming a nun; but before she reached her fifteenth year, she was married, against her will, to the duke of York, afterwards James II., who was more than twenty-five years older than herself. Her early repugnance to her husband soon wore off; she became fondly attached to him, and her whole future life marked her devotion to him. James, though a kind and indulgent husband, was an unfaithful one; and it was not till the moral dignity of her character became developed by the force of circumstances, that he learned to admire and respect her as she deserved. The beauty and purity of life of this princess, singular in a court so corrupt as that of Charles II., won for her in the early part of her married life, universal regard; but the unpopularity of her husband, whose open profession of the Catholic faith rendered him obnoxious to the English people, was transferred to her. Even before the accession of James to the throne, symptoms of an intention to throw a doubt upon the title of any son borne by Mary, were evident; and when, in 1688, after she became queen, she gave birth to a son, she was openly charged with having imposed a spurious heir upon the nation. As Mary had already been the mother of four children, it is difficult to understand how any people could entertain so absurd a belief, particularly with the powerful evidence to the contrary before them. In this year the rebellion broke out; the Prince of Orange landed in England, and Mary was obliged, to ensure her safety, and that of the young prince, who was then only six months old, to escape with him at midnight, and embark for France. King James soon followed her, and they were received by Louis XIV. in a spirit of noble sympathy and generosity that he never failed to exhibit to the unfortunate exiles during life.

It was in adversity that the virtues of queen Mary shone in their brightest lustre. Louis XIV., who appeared greatly struck with her conjugal tenderness, said of her, "She was always a queen in her prosperity, but in her adversity she is an angel."

James himself frankly acknowledged that he had never known what true happiness was, till rendered wise by many sorrows he had learned fully to appreciate the virtues and self-devotion of his queen; and was accustomed to say that, "Like Jacob, he counted his sufferings for nothing, having such a support and companion in them." Four years after the birth of her son, Mary of Modena became the mother of a daughter. She was the solace and comfort of her parents in their sorrows, but was cut off at the early age of nineteen by that grievous scourge, the small-pox. James II. died at St. Germain's in 1701. Henceforward his sorrowing widow devoted herself to religion; her sole remaining tie to earth being the hope of one day seeing her son—commonly called the Pretender—restored to his birthright. She lived to witness his failure in 1715, and died on the 7th of May, 1718, in the sixtieth year of her age, and the thirtieth of her exile. The political events connected with the life of Mary of Modena must be sought for in history. Her personal life is related in a narrative of uncommon interest, in Miss Strickland's "Lives of the English Queens." Mary of Modena played an important, rather than a conspicuous part, in the historic drama of the stirring times in which her lot was cast. She evinced, when called upon, a remarkable aptitude for business; but it is in her domestic character, as a devoted wife and mother, and as a practical Christian, that she chiefly recommends herself to our judgment and sympathies.

MARY DE MEDICI.

DAUGHTER of Francis I., grand-duke of Tuscany, and of the archduchess Joan of Austria, was born at Florence, in 1573, and was married, in 1600, to Henry IV. of France. She was handsome, and Henry was, for a time, really attached to her; but she was violent, jealous, and obstinate, and often quarrelled with her husband, so that his affections were soon alienated. But the best historians acquit her of any more serious misconduct, especially of the insinuation thrown out by some writers, that she was privy to the murder of her husband. Maria was weak rather than wicked, and ambitious without corresponding mental powers. After her husband's death, and during the minority of Louis XIII., she became regent and guardian of her son. Dismissing the great Sully, she allowed herself to be guided by Italian and Spanish favourites. The state lost its respect abroad, and was torn by the dissensions of the nobles at home. A treaty was concluded in 1614, granting to the disaffected all they had required; but this did not bring quiet.

Mary's conduct caused universal dissatisfaction, as she permitted the marshal d'Ancre and his wife to manage the affairs of the kingdom. Louis XIII. was at length persuaded to favour, if not to order, the murder of d'Ancre, the shameless favourite, and Mary was banished for a time; but cardinal Richelieu, in 1619, reconciled the mother and son. Mary grew dissatisfied, because the terms of the treaty were not fulfilled; another civil war was kindled, but, fortunately for the people, soon subdued. The death of de Euyne, the connétable, who was the enemy of Mary, gave her the ascendancy, and she took her place at the head of the council of state. In order to strengthen her authority, she introduced Richelieu into the council; but he proved ungrateful the moment he felt his power secure, and Mary then sought to effect his downfall. This was no easy task. Richelieu had obtained complete ascendancy over the weak-minded king, who resisted all the efforts of his mother to draw him to her party. This contest for the mastery over the king was at length decided in favour of Richelieu, who succeeded in making Louis believe his crown would be lost without the support of the prime-minister. The cardinal roused the apprehensions of the king, and excited him against his mother the queen, by representing that she intended to place her second son, Gaston, on the throne. Mary was therefore ordered, in 1634, to retire to the castle of Compiègne, and all her adherents were either banished or confined in the Bastille. Richelieu was now all-powerful in the kingdom, and Mary soon felt she was a prisoner at Compiègne; she therefore escaped, went to Belgium, England, and Germany, wandering about from place to place in much sorrow, and even want. Repeatedly she demanded justice from the parliament; but she was a weak woman, and who would dare listen to her complaints against the vindictive cardinal, who was the real sovereign of the state? After leading this miserable wandering life for about ten years, the poor exiled queen died at Cologne, 1642, in great poverty and sorrow. Mary was unfortunate, but there is no stain of vice or cruelty on her character. She did much to embellish Paris, built the superb palace of Luxembourg, the fine aqueducts and public walks, called Cours-la-Reine. She was jealous, and suffered deeply in her affections from the licentiousness of her husband, which was, probably, the first cause of her violent temper, so often censured. His was the fault. Had Henry IV. been a faithful husband, Mary would, no doubt, have been a devoted wife. "She was," says one of her biographers, "ambitious from vanity, confiding from want of intelligence, and more avaricious of distinction than power." The defects of character thus enumerated are such as a bad or neglected education induces, rather than the emanations of a bad heart.

MARY STUART, QUEEN OF SCOTS,

CELEBRATED for her beauty, her wit, her learning, and her misfortunes, was born December 3d, 1542, and was the daughter and sole heiress of James V. of Scotland, by Marie of Lorraine, his second queen, a French princess of the family of Guise. Mary was eight days old when her father died; after many disturbances, it was agreed, that the earl of Arran, the next heir to the crown, should be made governor of the kingdom, and guardian to the infant queen, who remained, with her mother, in the royal palace of Linlithgow

Henry VIII. wished to obtain the hand of this princess for his son Edward, and it was at first promised to him; but being afterwards refused by the earl of Arran, the famous battle of Musselburgh was fought in consequence. Upon the defeat of the Scots in this battle, Mary was carried by her mother to the island of Inchmahon, where she laid the foundation of her knowledge in the Latin, French, Spanish, and Italian tongues, which Mary afterwards carried to such perfection that few were found to equal her in any of them.

When the young queen was six years old, she was taken by her mother to France, where she was sent to a convent, in which the daughters of the nobility of the kingdom were educated. She wrote and spoke Latin with great ease and elegance, and had a taste for poetry; many of her compositions were highly esteemed by Ronsard. She played well on several instruments, danced gracefully, and managed a horse with ease and dexterity: she also spent much time in needlework.

On the 20th of April, 1558, Mary was married to the dauphin, afterwards Francis II. of France, who died December 5th, 1560, about six months after his accession to the throne. Mary was very much attached to him, and mourned his loss with sincere sorrow. She soon after left France, with great reluctance, to return to her own kingdom. She is said to have remained on the deck of the vessel that bore her from her beloved France, gazing on the shores of that country till they had completely disappeared from her view; then retiring below, she wrote some verses on the occasion, full of beauty and pathos.

She was welcomed with joy by her subjects, and soon after her return, Charles, archduke of Austria, was proposed to her as a husband, by the cardinal of Lorraine. But Elizabeth of England interposed, and desired she would not marry with any foreign prince. She recommended to her either the earl of Leicester, or the lord Darnley; giving her to understand, that her succession to the crown of England would be very precarious if she did not comply. Overawed by Elizabeth, and pleased by the beauty of Darnley, she consented to marry him; and creating him earl of Ross and duke of Rothsay, July 28th, 1565, he was the same day proclaimed king, at Edinburgh, and married to the queen the day after: thus uniting the two nearest heirs to the throne of England. She had one son by Darnley, born at Edinburgh, June 19th, 1566; afterwards James VI. of Scotland, and I. of England.

David Rizzio, son of a musician at Turin, had accompanied the Piedmontese ambassador to Scotland, and gained admission into the queen's family by his musical talents. His manners were insinuating, and he crept into Mary's favour, and she made him her French secretary. He afterwards acquired so much consequence, that he was applied to by all the court suitors for his recommendation and interest. When Darnley first became a candidate for the queen's affection, he contracted an intimacy with Rizzio, who assisted him, in hopes of confirming his own influence. Not long after the nuptials, Darnley displayed such a total want of every estimable quality, and behaved with such inattention and disrespect to his royal consort, that her hasty love was succeeded by dislike and disgust. The king disregarded the remonstrances of Rizzio against his misconduct, and looking with jealousy on the increasing familiarity between him and the queen, resolved to get rid of him by violence. Several men of high rank, resenting the insolence and arrogance of the favourite, concurred in this plan. A conspiracy was formed, and one evening in March, 1566, a band of armed men took possession of the gates of Holyrood house, while the king, with some accomplices, and Lord Ruthven, in complete armour, entered the room where Mary was at supper with the countess of Argyle and Rizzio. The unhappy victim saw his danger, and clung to the queen for protection. Her tears, entreaties, and menaces, were unavailing; he was dragged from her presence, and murdered in the next apartment, within her hearing. This savage and unmanly deed, aggravated by the queen's situation, could never be forgiven. The conspirators took possession of her person, but she had still so much influence over the weak king, that she contrived to detach him from his associates, and persuaded him to escape with her.

She retired to Dunbar, where she was soon joined by some nobles with their vassals, with whom she advanced towards Edinburgh. The earl of Murray, her half-brother, the illegitimate son of James V. and the countess of Douglas, with the other exiled lords, returned to Scotland; but Mary had the address to separate them from the conspirators, and the latter, destitute of every resource, fled to England. Mary, now triumphant, was at no pains to conceal her hatred of her husband, whom she treated with every mark of aversion and contempt; nor did the birth of her son produce any reconciliation.

At this time, a new favourite had obtained an influence over her susceptible heart. This was Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, a powerful nobleman, who had always shown an attachment to her cause, and had been a principal instrument in rescuing her from the power of the conspirators. The influence he obtained over her seems at first to have been of a political kind; but it cannot be doubted that sentiments of a more tender nature succeeded. The king, unable to endure his degradation, formed a design of quitting Scotland, and residing on the continent; and, when this was prevented, he continued to live apart from the queen in solitude and neglect. On removing from Stirling to Glasgow in the beginning of 1567, he was seized with a disorder which endangered his life, and was by some attributed to poison. When he was in a state of convalescence, Mary visited him at Glasgow, and, by her apparent kindness and affection, so won his confidence that he consented to accompany her to Edinburgh, that he might have the benefit of her attentions, and of the advice of the best physicians.

At Edinburgh he was lodged in a solitary house, called Kirk of Field, at some distance from the city. Mary attended to him tenderly, and slept at night in the room under his apartment. On February 9th, she left him at about eleven at night, in order to be present at a masque in the palace on the next day; and, at two o'clock, the house was blown up with gun-powder, and the king's dead body found in an adjacent field.

Public opinion accused the earl of Bothwell of this murder; and the queen was suspected of being an accessory. After the king's father, Lennox, had publicly accused Bothwell of the murder, and had him brought to trial, Mary continued to admit him to her intimacy, and even conferred on him the command of Edinburgh castle. His trial was hurried on, without regard to the requisition of Lennox for delay; and no person appearing as his accuser on the day appointed, he was necessarily acquitted. Within a week after, Bothwell invited all the nobles to an entertainment, when he declared his intention of marrying the queen; and so much was the assembly swayed by dread of his power, or desire of his favour, that they unanimously subscribed a paper expressing their full conviction of his innocence of the murder, and recommending him as a husband to the queen. But the sentiments of the nation at large by no means corresponded with the declaration of these mean-spirited nobles; and the projected marriage was generally looked upon with detestation. Bothwell, therefore, resolved to effect it in a manner suited to his daring and violent character. As Mary was proceeding from Edinburgh to Stirling, on a visit to her infant son, Bothwell suddenly appeared on the road with a large body of horse, dispersed without resistance her slender train, and seizing the queen, with a few of her courtiers, carried them to Dunbar. The queen showed neither terror nor indignation; and her attendants were informed that everything was done with her consent. Bothwell unfortunately had a wife already; but he obtained a speedy divorce from her, on the double ground of their being cousins within the prohibited degrees, and of his own unfaithfulness. Mary was then taken to Edinburgh castle, where she appeared at the court of session and declared herself at full liberty; and, on May 15th, little more than three months from her husband's murder, this scandalous union was consummated. Bothwell, without the title of king, possessed the whole power of the crown; no access was permitted to the queen except by his creatures; and he made an unsuccessful attempt to obtain possession of the person of the young prince.

From this time a series of misfortunes attended the queen. The different views and interests of the nobility, clergy, and gentry, in regard to religion and politics, had so disturbed the peace of the kingdom, that all things appeared in the greatest confusion. Bothwell, defeated in a battle, was forced to fly to Denmark; and the queen was taken prisoner to Lochleven, and committed to the care of Murray's mother, who, having been the mistress of James V., insulted the unfortunate queen, by pretending that she was the lawful wife of James V., and that Murray was his legitimate child. When queen Elizabeth heard of this treatment of Mary, she seemed very indignant at it, and sent Sir Nicholas Throgmorton into Scotland, to expostulate with the conspirators, and to consult about restoring her to liberty. But Elizabeth was by no means in earnest; and, if not the contriver of these troubles, as some have supposed her to have been, she secretly rejoiced at them. When Elizabeth was crowned, Mary, then in France, had been persuaded by the Roman Catholics to assume the arms and title of the kingdom of England; thereby declaring Elizabeth illegitimate, and her title null and void. This indignity Elizabeth never forgave.

Having been detained prisoner at Lochleven eleven months, and most inhumanly forced to comply with demands highly detrimental to her honour and interest, she escaped, May 2d, 1568, and went to Hamilton castle. Here, in an assembly of many of the nobility, was drawn a sentence, declaring that the grants extorted from her majesty in prison, among which was a resignation of the crown, were void from the beginning; upon which, in two or three days, more than six thousand people assembled to her assistance.

Murray, who had been declared regent of the kingdom, made all possible preparations; and when the two parties joined battle, the queen's army, consisting of raw soldiers, were entirely defeated; and she was obliged to save herself by flight, travelling sixty miles in one day, to the house of Maxwell, lord Herries. Thence she despatched a messenger to queen Elizabeth, with a diamond which she had formerly received from her, signifying that she would come into England, and asking her assistance. Elizabeth returned a kind answer, with large promises; but before the messenger returned, Mary, rejecting the advice of her friends, hastened into England, and landing, May 17th, at Workington, in Cumberland, she wrote a long letter in French with her own hand to Elizabeth, detailing her misfortunes, and asking her aid. Elizabeth affected to comfort her, gave her dubious promises, and commanded, under pretence of greater security, that she should be carried to Carlisle.

Mary immediately perceived her error. Denied access to Elizabeth, she was kept wandering for nineteen years from one prison to another, and was at length tried, condemned, and beheaded, for being engaged in Babington's conspiracy against queen Elizabeth. She professed to die for the Roman Catholic religion, and has been considered a saint by that church. She was executed at Fotheringay castle, February 8th, 1587, and met her death with dignity and composure. Her remains were interred by her son, in Westminster Abbey, after his accession to the English throne.

Authors have differed about the moral character of this queen; there has been but one opinion as to her charms as a woman, or the variety of her accomplishments. She wrote poems in the Latin, Italian, French, and Scotch languages; "Royal Advice" to her son, during her imprisonment; and a great number of letters, many of which are now in the library at Paris. Some of them have been printed.

Such were her fascinations of person and mind that few could be placed under their influence without becoming convinced of her innocence of all the charges against her, and devoted to her service. She also possessed keen powers of irony and sarcasm, which she sometimes used with too little discretion. Though at all times strongly attached to her own faith, she is free from the charges of bigotry and persecution. A melancholy interest attaches every heart to the memory of Mary of Scotland. It is painfully felt that fate or providence had designed her for suffering. Her charms of beauty and genius, that made her such a fascinating woman, unfitted her for the throne of a rude nation, in the most stormy period of its history. She had the misfortune to live among enemies paid to slander her; and few dared defend, while her proud and powerful rival queen was watching for an opportunity to crush her. "No inquiry," says Sir Walter Scott, in his history of Scotland, "has been able to bring us to that clear opinion upon the guilt of Mary which is expressed by many authors, or to guide us to that triumphant conclusion in favour of her innocence of all accession, direct or tacit, to the death of her husband, which others have maintained with the same obstinacy. The great error of marrying Bothwell, stained as he was by universal suspicion of Darnley's murder, is a spot upon her character for which we in vain seek for an apology. What excuse she is to derive from the brutal ingratitude of Darnley; what from the perfidy and cruelty of the fiercest set of nobles who existed in any age; what from the manners of a time in which assassination was often esteemed a virtue, and revenge the discharge of a debt of honour, must be left to the charity of the reader."

The misfortunes of Mary have furnished a subject for the tragic muse of Schiller and Alfieri; but these are not so expressive of her feelings as the two following, written by Mary during her imprisonment in Fotheringhay castle. The French being the tongue she had used from infancy, she preferred when writing; the hymn was in Latin, as that was the language of her devotions; this was her last production, "composed and repeated" by her, the day before her execution.

SONNET.

Que suis-je, hélas! et de quoi sert la vie?
J'en suis fors qu'un corps privé de cœur;
Un ombre vaine, un objet de malheur,
Qui n'a plus rien que de mourir en vie.
Plus ne me portez, O enemys, d'envie,
Qui n'a plus l'esprit à la grandeur:
J'ai consommé d'excessive douleur,
Vostre ire en bref de voir assouvir,
Et vous amys qui m'avez tenu chère,
Souvenez-vous que sans cœur, et sans santé,
Je ne scaurois aucun bon œuvre faire.
Et que sus bas étant assez punie,
J'aie ma part en la joie infinie.

Translation by a Scotch Lady.

Alas! what am I? and in what estate;
A wretched corse bereaved of its heart;
An empty shadow, lost unfortunate,
To die is now in life my only part.
Foes to my greatness! let your envy rest,
In me no taste for grandeur now is found;
Consumed by grief, with heavy ills oppressed,
Your wishes and desires will soon be crowned.
And you, my friends, who still have held me dear,
Bethink you, that when health and heart are fled,
And every hope of earthly good is dead,
'Tis time to wish our sorrow ended here;
And that this punishment on earth is given
That my pure soul may rise to endless bliss in heaven.

HYMN.

O Domine Deus! speravi in te
O care mi Jesu! nunc libera me.
In dura catenâ, in misera pœnâ, desidero te;
Languendo, gemitendo, et genu-flectendo,
Adoro, implo-ro, ut liberes me!

Translation by Rev. Geo. W. Bethune.

My God, O Jehovah, I have trusted in thee;
— Jesus, my Saviour, now rescue thou me;
Laid fetters in iron deep, griefs me environ, — thy smile let me see!
With sighing and crying, at thy feet lowly lying,
I adore thee, implore thee, now rescue thou me!

MASQUIÈRES, FRANÇOISE,

Was the daughter of a steward of the king, and was born at Paris, where she died in 1728. She had a great taste for poetry, and wrote it with facility. Among her poetical works are a "Description of the Gallery of St. Cloud," and "The Origin of the Lute."

MASHAM, LADY DAMARIS,

Was the daughter of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, and born at Cambridge on the 18th of January, 1658. She was the second wife of Sir Francis Masham, of Oates, in the county of Essex, by whom she had only one son. Her father took great pains in her education; and she was skilled in philosophy and divinity. Much of her improvement was undoubtedly owing to her intimacy with the famous Locke, who lived many years in her family, and died in her house at Oates. She wrote "A Discourse concerning the Love of God;" and "Occasional Thoughts in reference to a Virtuous and Christian Life;" and several other pamphlets which she published anonymously. She died in 1708, and was interred in the cathedral church at Bath, where a monument is erected to her memory.

MASHAM, ABIGAIL,

Was the daughter of Mr. Hill, a wealthy merchant of London, who married the sister of Mr. Jennings, the father of the duchess of Marlborough. The bankruptcy of her father obliged her to become the attendant of lady Rivers, a baronet's lady, whence she removed into the service of her relative, then lady Churchill, who procured her the place of waiting-maid to the princess Anne. The maid retained her situation after her mistress ascended the throne, and gradually acquired considerable influence over her. Abigail Hill was not a woman of superior mind or attainments; but there were many points of sympathy between the queen and herself, which may account for the ascendancy of this favourite. She possessed great powers of mimicry, and considerable taste in music, of which latter accomplishment the queen was very fond. She also favoured the Tories, to which party the queen was secretly attached. Subjected for years to the violent and domineering temper of the duchess of Marlborough, the queen turned naturally to the milder and more conciliating disposition of her maid in waiting for sympathy and repose; and she gradually superseded the duchess as favourite. In 1707, Abigail Hill married Mr. Masham, a man of ancient family, one of the pages of the court. This marriage was performed secretly, and in the presence of the queen. The duchess of Marlborough, on learning these facts, gave way to such violence, that it severed finally the tie between herself and the queen; and in a short time she was deprived of all her offices and dignities at court. One of her situations, that of keeper of the privy-seal, was given to Mrs. Masham.

Mrs. Masham leagued herself with Harley and Bolingbroke, who were intriguing to remove the duke of Marlborough and his adherents, and became an instrument in their hands. In 1711, a change of ministry took place, and Mr. Masham was raised to the peerage. Henceforward lady Masham became involved in all the intrigues of the court, especially in those of the Tories in favour of the exiled house of Stuart, which she warmly advocated. Attached to the cause of the Pretender, she was the medium of communication between the queen and her unfortunate young brother, in the latter part of her reign, when the succession was still uncertain, and when in her moments of vacillation and remorse she clung to the hope that her brother, by renouncing his religion, might succeed her.

Mrs. Masham's name occupies a prominent place in the political writings of those times, connected as she was with Swift, Arbuthnot, Bolingbroke, and other eminent men. Mrs. Masham was plain in appearance, and delicate in health. One of her personal traits was a remarkably red nose, furnishing the wits of the day with a constant subject at which to level their shafts. After the death of the queen she lived in great retirement, and died at an advanced age. Her husband's title became extinct upon the death of her only son in 1776.

MATRAINI, CLARA CANTARINI,

Was of a noble family of Lucca, and one of the best poets of her time. She was living in 1562. Her style is said to be pure, correct, and full of force and elegance; her ideas clear, noble, and ingenious; and she particularly excels as a lyrist. Many of her pieces were printed at Venice, in 1560. Many others were subjoined to her letters, which were printed at Lucca in 1595. In these she appears well instructed in sacred history, and in theology in general; one, to her son, contains many useful maxims of manners and conduct. Her "Christian Meditations," mixed with very beautiful scraps of poetry, and concluded by a female's ode to the Almighty, were printed there. She also wrote a life of the Virgin Mary, in which are many pieces of poetry; others are found in different collections. She was well skilled in the Platonic philosophy, was generally esteemed by the literati of that age, and corresponded with many of them.

MAUPIN, N. AUBIGNY,

A CELEBRATED singer at the Paris opera. She possessed great personal courage; and, on some occasions, assumed a man's dress to avenge insults offered to her. She left the stage in 1705, and died in 1707, aged thirty-three.

MAYO, SARAH C. EDGARTON,

Was born in Shirley, Massachusetts, in 1819. She began to write when very young, and for nine years edited an annual called "The Rose of Sharon." She also edited "The Ladies' Repository," published in Boston; and wrote several works, both in prose and verse; "The Palfreys;" "Ellen Clifford;" "The Poetry of Women;" and "Memoir and Poems of Mrs. Julia H. Scott," &c. Her maiden name was Edgerton. She married, in 1846, the Rev. A. D. Mayo, of Gloucester, Massachusetts, and continued her literary pursuits with increased advantages. Had her life been prolonged, she gave promise of being one of our most distinguished female writers; but death suddenly destroyed these bright hopes of earthly usefulness. She died, July 9th, 1848. The following poems have a tenderness in their tone, and a delicate sensibility in the feelings expressed, which were characteristics of the writer.

TYPES OF HEAVEN.

Why love I the lily-bell
Swinging in the scented dell?
Why love I the wood-notes wild,
Where the sun hath faintly smiled?
Daisies, in their beds secure,
Gazing out so meek and pure?

Why love I the evening dew
In the violet's bell of blue?
Why love I the vesper star,
Trembling in its shrine afar?
Why love I the summer night
Softly weeping drops of light?

Why to me do woodland springs
Whisper sweet and holy things?
Why does every bed of moss
Tell me of my Saviour's cross?
Why in every dimpled wave
Smiles the light from o'er the grave?

Why do rainbows, seen at even,
Seem the glorious paths to heaven?
Why are gushing streamlets fraught
With the notes from angels caught?
Can ye tell me why the wind
Bringeth seraphs to my mind?

Is it not that faith hath bound
Beauties of all form and sound
To the dreams that have been given
Of the holy things of heaven?
Are they not bright links that bind
Sinful souls to Sinless Mind?

From the lowly violet sod,
Links are lengthened unto God.
All of holy — stainless — sweet —
That on earth we hear or meet,
Are but types of that pure love
Brightly realized above.

THE SHADOW-CHILD.

Whence came this little phantom
That flits about my room—
That's here from early morning
Until the twilight gloom?
For ever dancing, dancing,
She haunts the wall and floor,
And frolics in the sunshine
Around the open door.

The ceiling by the table
She makes her choice retreat,
For there a little human girl
Is wont to have her seat.
They take a dance together—
A crazy little jig;
And sure two baby witches
Ne'er ran so wild a rig!

They pat their hands together
With frantic jumps and springs,
Until you almost fancy
You catch the gleam of wings.
Shrill shrieks the human baby
In the madness of delight,
And back return loud echoes
From the little shadow sprite.

At morning by my bedside
When first the birdies sing,
Up starts the little phantom
With a merry laugh and spring.
She woos me from my pillow
With her little coaxing arms;
I go where'er she beckons—
A victim to her charms.

At night I still am haunted
By glimpses of her face;
Her features on my pillow
By moonlight I can trace.
Whence came this shadow-baby
That haunts my heart and home?
What kindly hand hath sent her,
And wherefore hath she come?

Long be her dancing image
 Our guest by night and day,
 For lonely were our dwelling
 If she were now away.
 Far happier hath our home been,
 More blest than e'er before,
 Since first that little shadow
 Came gliding through our door.

MAZARIN, HORTENSE MANCINI, DUCHESS OF,

Was the daughter of Lorenzo Mancini, a nobleman of Rome, and Jeronina Mazarin, sister of the celebrated cardinal. She was born in 1647, and in 1653 was sent to France, to be educated under the care of her uncle. She was distinguished for her beauty, her reckless vivacity, and her great wealth. In his misfortunes, Charles II. of England, was a rejected suitor for her hand. In 1660, Hortense married Armand Charles de la Porte, duke de Meilleraye and Mayenne, who, on his marriage, took the name, title, and arms of Mazarin. Mazarin died the next year, leaving his niece the sum of 1,625,000 pounds sterling. The husband of Hortense was very unsuited to her, but she lived quietly with him for six years, when she suddenly left him, and attempted to obtain a separation from him. Finding that she was likely to be unsuccessful, she determined on flight, and disguising herself and her maid in male attire, she left Paris, June, 1667, for Switzerland, and from thence rambled over most of the countries of Europe. In 1678, she arrived at London, and commenced an attack on the heart of Charles II., in which she soon succeeded. She became one of his favourites, and he gave her apartments in St. James', and a pension of £4000 a year. This was afterwards withdrawn, in consequence of a partiality she openly displayed for the prince de Monaco, but Charles soon restored it to her. She resided during the latter part of her life at Chelsea, where her house was the resort of the gay, beautiful, and intellectual. The duchess of Mazarin died at Chelsea, June 2d, 1699, in her fifty-third year. She was so much in debt at the time that her body was seized by her creditors.

MELLON, HARRIET, DUCHESS OF ST. ALBANS,

Was born in Westminster, England, about 1775. Her father was a gentleman in the service of the East India Company, but died before the birth of his daughter. Her mother afterwards married Mr. Entwistle, a professor of music, and leader of the band at the York theatre. Miss Mellon was educated for the stage, and made her debut at Drury-Lane, London, in 1793; she was considered at the head of the second-rate actresses, and was often intrusted with first-rate comic characters. In 1815, Miss Mellon married Mr. Coutts, a wealthy banker, who had long been attached to her; and, at his death, in 1822, he left her his immense fortune. Mrs. Coutts afterwards married the duke of St. Albans, a man much younger than herself. On her death, she left most of the property to Miss Burdett, daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, on the condition that the young lady should bear, in addition to Burdett, the surname and arms of Coutts.

MERCER, MARGARET,

DESERVING a place among the most distinguished of her sex, for her noble philanthropy, and efforts in the cause of female education, was born at Annapolis, Maryland, in 1791. The family of Mercer descended from an ancient English stock, transplanted to this country soon after its colonization;

the race has, in its new location, done honour to the source from whence it was derived. The father of Margaret was, at the time of her birth, governor of Maryland, a man of excellent education, refined taste, and large wealth. Retiring from public life, governor Mercer withdrew to his estate at Cedar Fork, and devoted himself to agricultural pursuits, and the training of his children. Margaret was his only daughter, and her education was conducted under his immediate care, with little assistance from other teachers: she often remarked, that she had been "brought up at her father's feet." Margaret Mercer is another example, added to the list our "Record" furnishes, of the beneficial influence which thorough mental training exercises on woman's character, by enabling her to make her moral power more respected and more effective. Scarcely an instance can be found where a father has aided and encouraged the mental improvement of his daughter, but that she has done honour to his care and kindness, and been the brightest jewel in his intellectual crown. Such was Margaret Mercer; proud as the family might well be of the name they bore, she has added its holiest lustre. "Her character," says her biographer,* in his excellent "Memoir" of this noble woman, "comprised elements apparently very diverse, and yet all combined into a perfect whole, as the varied colours of a ray of light. Gentle, and full of affection for all, and ready to sympathize with sorrow wherever met with; feelings, the evidence of which will be found scattered everywhere around these traces of her path through life, she yet possessed an energy and firmness rarely found in this connexion."

If Dr. Morris had reflected farther on the subject, how few girls are trained as Margaret Mercer was—her mental powers developed, and directed to guide and strengthen rightly those delicate moral sensibilities and tender affections peculiar to her sex, he would have found the reason of her superiority; and also he would have understood why learning—we use the term in its widest sense—is of great advantage to woman as well as to man.

In another place, after giving a sketch of her studies in botany, and love of gardening, &c., Dr. Morris says:

"But it was not upon these sportive fancies alone that her mind exerted its powers. Graver subjects occupied her attention, and performed their part in giving increased vigour to her reasoning faculties, whilst the others were adding to the already abounding stores of her fertile imagination. It has been mentioned that she had access to a choice collection of works on history and general literature: these were her familiar companions, and her mind was thoroughly stored with their contents; whilst we find her sometimes deep in mathematics, allowing herself but four hours' rest in the twenty-four, that she might bring her mind under the wholesome discipline of this parent of careful thought; at others, theological discussions asserted an unrivalled empire over her mind, and in order to drink, as she supposed, more purely from the fountain itself, with less intervention of human teaching, she devoted herself with almost undivided attention to the study of Hebrew; and a short time after, we find her carefully threading the intricate mysteries of medical science, that by the acquisition of correct knowledge on the nature of diseases and remedies, she might enlarge the sphere of her benevolent usefulness. The deep abstractions of metaphysics did not deter her from trying to fathom those abysses into which the mind plunges its line in vain, growing old in drawing up no certain token of reaching the solid foundation over which its deep waters roll so proudly. She remarks to a friend: 'I do not come on very well with metaphysics; I dislike anything so inconclusive, and should be tired of following an angel, if he talked so in a ring.' A paper of 'Thoughts on the Magnet' proves her to have given attention to natural philosophy, and at an early period to have attempted to solve some of those mysterious truths which are now but dawning upon the horizon of human knowledge. But whilst on all these subjects she could express herself with ease and eloquence, there was a simplicity and delicacy about her character which separated her as widely as can be conceived from that class of 'women of masculine understanding,' whose assumption of claims to superiority over their own sex leads them to despise the refinements and delicacy which communicate an appropriate and attractive grace to the female character. These can never be laid aside, no matter how great the positive acquirement, without a violation of the laws of nature, and a consequent shock to that unity of action which constitutes the beauty of the works of Him, who gave to each an appropriate part in the sublime harmony of the universe, which attests His wisdom and power. Never was feminine grace more beautifully illustrated than in her whole career. She never forgot that it is the peculiar province of woman to minister to the comfort, and promote the happiness, first, of those most nearly allied to her, and then of those, who by the providence of God are placed in a state of dependence upon her. To discharge these duties was her unceasing object, to the accomplishing which she devoted herself with entire singleness of purpose. Thus she writes to a friend: 'I, like every little mole toiling in his own dark passage, have been given to murmuring, and my great complaint for some time past has been, that I was cut off from every means of usefulness, and could not find anything on earth to do that might not as well remain undone; and while I am fretting at having nothing to do, you find equal discomfort in having too much. Somebody, no matter who, has said the secret of happiness was that the busy find leisure, and the idle find business, and it would seem so between us. And yet I doubt whether happiness is not a principle which belongs exclusively to God, and whether we can ever be satisfied till we wake up in his likeness. Whenever you can find that spot, sacred to religious peace and true friendship, send for me to your paradise, but remember this is the reward promised to those who have gone through the struggle of our great spiritual warfare.'

At this time her pencil, her pen, and her needle, were all put in requisition in aid of the Greeks, in their struggle for liberty.

When Margaret Mercer was about two-and-twenty, she made a public profession of religion; in a letter to a friend, she thus commemorates this important event:

"I was confirmed, and had the pious blessing of our venerable old bishop, the day before I came from home. You cannot think how humble, how penitent, how happy I feel. It seems as though I still feel the pressure of his hand on my head. He has promised to come to see me next spring. . . . I do not think I was ever made for a married woman; I feel as if I was not intended to take so great a share in worldly things. If I did, I should forget my God, perhaps; and may Providence load me with every human misery, and deprive me of every earthly good, rather than that."

And now that her fine talents had been cultivated by a liberal education and an extensive course of reading, and her naturally amiable disposition warmed and purified by true piety, she was ready for her work. Yet who that then looked upon her would have dreamed what that work was to be! Her biographer thus describes her at this period:

"In personal appearance, Miss Mercer was peculiarly attractive; her stature was originally tall, her carriage graceful, her eye beaming with intelligence, and her whole countenance expressive of the loveliest traits of female character. Disease and care set their marks upon her face in after life, and caused her form to lose its symmetry, but never quenched the beaming of the eye, nor darkened the radiance of her soul, which shone on every feature to the very last. Her appearance was indeed the embodiment of the ideal of female loveliness and worth; and it may be asserted with safety, that none ever approached her without receiving the impression of the presence of one elevated above the common grade of mortal life. There was a combination of the attractive graces with the impressiveness of superior power which is rarely met with; and while her manner was often sportive, and she could adorn the most common subjects of conversation by the most graceful turns of thought and purity of language, there was frequently an elevation of thought and force of expression, which carried those thrown into association with her, into a higher sphere than that of common every-day existence. Even those who could not sympathize with and appreciate her character, were still struck with this feature in it, and its influence was acknowledged in the fact, that none would dare to express before her sentiments or opinions which would have been uttered in conversation with other persons without restraint."

This is the true moral influence which woman, when her education is properly conducted, and her position rightly understood, will exercise over men, over society. That this moral power was held by woman, Miss Mercer felt to be true; and hence arose her distaste for the "chatter" of the vain, frivolous, accomplished young ladies, whom she met in society. Thus she writes of her visit at Washington:

"I acknowledge that there are many persons around me vastly better than I am; but I am speaking of society, not people; and I confess that the 'unidea-ed chatter of females' is past my endurance; they are very capable of better things, but what of that? Is it not yet more annoying, that they will do nothing better? And besides all this, I have more painful feelings of embarrassment in company than I had at sixteen. I am old, too; and, when I go into gay scenes, the illusion is gone, and I fancy the illuminated hall to resemble the castle of enchantment, where Armida kept all who were capable of virtue bound in the lap of pleasure. I think how a M. Fellenberg has devoted a noble spirit to a grand system of education, and given them the model. All admire, all talk of it, and no one on the wide globe follows the example. Mrs. Fry opens the prison gates—looses the bonds of the captive—carries healing into broken hearts, or plants virtue where vice was the only growth—what are all these chattering women about, that they cannot wear a simple garb, and follow her to jails and hospitals and poor-houses? No—if I cannot do good where there is so much to do, I never was and never will be a votary of folly."

She was now engaged in founding a Sunday school. Writing to a friend, she says—"When my head turns to this subject, it seems to me I want forty heads, well stored with strong sense; forty frames supported by vigorous strength and health; and a hundred hands as organs of execution for the plans and projects of my head."

Miss Mercer was to have a wider sphere for the office of teacher, which seemed her peculiar mission. Her mother died when Margaret was young. Her father's death, which took place at Philadelphia, whither she had accompanied him for his health, proved the crisis of her life. She had been accustomed to all the indulgences love and wealth can bestow. From this time, she was to prove what those endure who have only their faith in God and their own energies on which to rely. Much of her property consisted in slaves—these she liberated, provided for, and sent to Liberia. Thus Dr. Morris gives the summary:

"This emancipation of her slaves was one of a chain of acts inseparably linked together, by which she reduced herself from affluence to absolute dependence on her own exertions for maintenance; and that not ignorantly and gradually, but instantly, and with full knowledge of the inevitable result. She therefore apologizes to Mr. Gurley for doing so little for them, and remarks: 'Should any think I have not done my part by these poor creatures, I can but bear the blame silently. A formal remonstrance against my making such a disposition of my property has been addressed to me by — and —. Had it been anything but human flesh and blood, souls belonging to the God that made them, I should have yielded. But I have determined to abide the consequences.' These consequences were anxiety, toil, and poverty, endured without a murmur or regret, during twenty-five years of life enfeebled by constant disease. These sacrifices for Africa, and her efforts in behalf of the negro race, were alone sufficient to place her name high on the roll of female philanthropists."

Yes, the name of Margaret Mercer should be placed among the highest. Elizabeth Fry made few, if any, pecuniary sacrifices. Sarah Martin never descended from a high social position to aid the poor; but Margaret Mercer performed both of these self-denying deeds of heroic virtue.

And now she was to begin the world; she chose the arduous post of teacher in a school for young girls in Virginia; but her plans of charity were not given up. Thus she writes to a friend:

"I have been desiring a day or two of repose that I might devote to you and your dearest mother. But, indeed, you have very little idea of the life I lead. Saturday is as laboriously spent in working for the Liberian Society, as any other day in the week; and on Sunday we have a Sunday-school, in which I have my part, and so make out to employ every day fully. Drawing keeps me on my feet for six hours every other day; and at first it was truly bewildering to teach twenty-three children who did not know how to make a straight line. You are anxious to know all about me, and you see I am free in my communication: there are many encouraging circumstances in the mode of life I have adopted; for those very things that are most painful prove how much there is to do; and where there is much to do, steady laborious efforts to do good will doubtless be blessed, although we may in mercy be denied the luxury of seeing our work under the sun prosper. Mrs. G. is sometimes very much dispirited, at times without cause; for every little painful occurrence of misconduct in the children affords opportunity of more strenuously enforcing good principles. I never knew how to be thankful to my parents, above all to my God, for a good education, until I came to look into the state of young ladies generally."

The desire to be made instrumental in training souls for eternity was the ruling motive by which she was influenced; and, from the very first, her chief efforts were devoted to this great end, which was pursued without deviation throughout her whole career, though by no means to the neglect of those subsidiary acquirements which she esteemed as highly as any one could do, and laboured most unremittingly to communicate to her pupils.

She continued in this, her chosen profession, for about twenty-five years; established a school of her own; and her example and influence have had a most salutary and wide-spread effect on the community where she resided. This admirable woman died in the autumn of 1846, aged fifty-five years. She prepared two works for her pupils, "Studies for Bible Classes," and a volume entitled "Ethics;" in the form of lectures to young ladies, which she employed as a text-book in teaching moral philosophy. It is admirably adapted to its purpose, conveying in chaste, yet glowing language, the feelings of a sanctified heart. She adopts the word of God as the only source of knowledge, as well of the practical duties of life, as of our relations to the Author of our being, and endeavours to explain and enforce the principles there laid down for the formation of character, and the government of life. It is a work well worthy of the diligent study of every woman who desires to attain to a high degree of moral worth. We give one extract.

CONVERSATION.

"If you are conscious that the sin of idle talking prevails among you; if you are sensible of so offending individually; or, if the sad effect of this low, disgraceful, and corrupting vice disturbs the peace and serenity of your little circle, let me entreat you, as the most certain corrective of the evil, to form some common plan for promoting the perfection and happiness of your fellow-creatures. Imbue your hearts with the spirit of active charity, and the gossip of the worldly-minded will indeed sound on your ears like idle words. No conversation will then appear to you worthy of notice, but such as has some evident bearing upon the improvement or happiness of the human race. When this has once become the main object of your hopes, your fears, your labours, and your prayers, it will become the most interesting subject of your thoughts, and the favourite theme of your conversations. Imagine Mr. Howard, or Mrs. Fry, to return home at evening, with souls filled with images of the poor prisoners they had visited, hand-cuffed and chained, lying on a pile of filthy straw, perishing with cold and hunger; or, worse, in the horrid bondage of sin, blaspheming, drinking and fighting in their subterranean hole. Do you think they would be agreeably amused, if, when their efforts were directed to 'stir up the pure minds fervently,' of the young around them, to aid in their noble labours, they were called upon to join in the childish prattle of girls discussing the ribands on their hair, or the rings on their fingers; or, in the equally contemptible jargon of young men of fashion, of their hat-rims, or coat-capcs, or shoe-ties, or, still worse, the cruel, wicked custom, usual with both sexes, of dissecting characters, and speaking evil of others, merely to excite some interest in their vapid conversation? Conversation is to works what the flower is to the fruit. A godly conversation shelters and cherishes the new-born spirit of virtue, as the flower does the fruit from the cold, chill atmosphere, of a heartless world; and the beauty of holiness expanding in conversation, gives rational anticipation of noble-minded principles ripening into the richest fruits of good works. You know the tree as well by the flower as the fruit, and never need you hope to see the fig follow the thistle flower, or grapes the wild bloom of the thorn tree. Honour God, then, with your bodies and spirits, in your lives and conversations; show forth holiness out of a good conversation; for the king's daughter is all glorious within."

As we prefer giving the opinions of men respecting the distinguished of our sex, rather than expressing our own, we will end this sketch with another extract from Dr. Morris's interesting work, which should be read by every American woman.

"Miss Mercer was a patriot woman, and lived and suffered, and virtually bled and died, in the service of her country. Serving it in a sphere of action the most important, yet too commonly the least esteemed. Standing at the very fountain of influence, and casting in there the healing branch which shall cause pure waters to flow over the wide domain. It is to the mothers of her sons that our country looks for the impress that is to make them her great and her good men, her trusted and her honoured servants. To such women as Margaret Mercer would we trust the forming of the character of those who are thus to give character to our country when our part in the drama is performed, and we pass for ever from an interest in its actings. May her example stir others up to the like consecration of their powers. It is the female pass of Thermopylæ. The Salamis of a woman's ambition."

MERIAN, MARIA SIBYLLA,

A GERMAN artist, was born at Frankfort in 1647. She was the daughter of Matthew Merian, a celebrated engraver and topographer. Miss Merian became a pupil of Abraham Mingon, from whom she learned great neatness of handling, and delicacy of colour. She painted from nature, reptiles, flowers, and insects, which she studied with the most curious and minute observation. She frequently painted her subjects in water-colours on vellum, and finished an astonishing number of designs. She drew flies and caterpillars in all the variety of changes and forms in which they successively appear. She even undertook a voyage to Surinam to paint those insects and reptiles which were peculiar to that climate; and, on her return, published two volumes of engravings after her designs. Her works are still referred to by writers on etymology. She died at Amsterdam, in 1717.

METRANA, ANNA,

An Italian lady, lived in 1718, and is mentioned by Orlandi as an eminent portrait-painter.

MICHEL, RENIER GIUSTINA,

Was born 1755, in Venice. Her father, Andrea Renier, was son of the last doge, save one, and her mother, Cecilia Manin, was sister of the last; her godfather, Foscarini, had been doge himself, and was one of the principal literati of his day. The princely rank and affluence of her family, offered every possible advantage of education: from the earliest childhood she displayed a fondness for study, and a dislike for needlework, and such lady-like business. She was passionately fond of music, and devoted a great portion of time to the cultivation of that art, as well as to literary pursuits. At the age of twenty, she married Marco Michiel, a gentleman of high rank. She accompanied him to Rome, where his father resided as ambassador, and there she became acquainted with all the most distinguished geniuses of Italy. In conversing with foreigners, she felt her deficiency in the French and English languages: to these she immediately applied herself. Intimacy with professors of the university, turned her attention to natural science: she became well acquainted with geometry, physics, chemistry. She studied botany, and wrote some excellent works upon it; but her most elaborate and considerable production, is the "Feste Veneziane," a work of no little research and learning. She lived in an extended circle of society, to all of whom she was endeared by her amiable qualities and superior abilities. Albrizzi, who particularly describes her, represents her conversation and social qualities in a very charming light. She was fond of simplicity in dress, and detested affectation in manner; beyond every thing she avoided the society of tiresome and insipid persons. "For me," said she, "ennui is among the worst evils—I can bear pain better." Speaking of a person whom she had reason to condemn, "Now he is unfortunate; justice and humanity can ask no more—I forget his faults." In one of her letters she writes, "It belongs to my character to think well of people as long as it is possible."

In her latter years she became deaf, and had recourse to an ear-trumpet. Her constitutional cheerfulness turned this into an advantage. Writing to a friend, she says, "My deafness is an inestimable advantage in company; for with the stupid and gossiping I shun all communication; their nonsense passes unheeded—but I can employ my trumpet with sensible people, and often gain in that way valuable knowledge." Another of her opinions was, "The world improves people according to the dispositions they bring into it." "Time is a better comforter than reflection."

In 1808, the French government sent to the municipality of Venice a writing of the engineer Cabot, entitled "Statistic questions concerning the city of Venice." The municipality imposed the charge of answering this work to two of the most distinguished men then living, the celebrated bibliopole Morelli, and the erudite Jacopo Filiassi. These applied to Madame Michiel to aid their labour; and it was while immersed in the studies this task involved, that the idea of her "Feste Veneziane," so happily executed, was planned. She died in 1832, aged seventy-seven years. A monument was erected to her memory, with an inscription, which, though eulogistic, considering her life, character, and learning, was not superior to her merits.

MILLER, LADY,

RESIDED at Bath-Easton, near Bath, in England. She published "Letters from Italy," and also a volume of poems. She was well known as a literary lady, and a patroness of literature. Her death occurred in 1781.

MILTON, MARY,

THE first wife of the poet Milton, was the oldest daughter of Richard Powell, Esq., a magistrate of Oxfordshire. In 1643, at a very early age, she became the wife of John Milton, a connexion, for many reasons, very unsuitable. Mr. Powell was a zealous royalist, who practised the jovial hospitality of the country gentlemen of that period; and the transition from the unrestrained freedom of such a home, to the sombre restraint of Milton's dull residence, in a close and confined street of London—a constraint no doubt increased by his naturally reserved and abstracted nature, and the puritanic influences which surrounded him—so wearied the young creature, that she sought an invitation from her father, and in less than a month from her marriage, returned home on a visit. Here, as the summer passed on, she received repeated messages and letters from her husband, summoning her home, all of which were disregarded. Milton, incensed at her disobedience, viewed her conduct as a deliberate desertion, which broke the marriage contract, and determined to punish it by repudiation. This matrimonial disagreement gave rise to his treatises on the "Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce; the Judgment of Martin Bucer concerning Divorce;" and "Tetrachordon, or Expositions upon four chief Places in Scripture which treat of Marriage." Convinced by his own arguments, Milton began to pay his addresses to a lady of great accomplishments, which alarmed the parents of his wife, and, no doubt, awoke her to a sense of the impropriety of her conduct. While on a visit to a neighbour and kinsman, he was surprised by the sudden entrance of his wife, who threw herself at his feet, and expressed her penitence. After a short struggle of resentment, he again received her, and sealed the reconciliation by opening his house to her father and brothers, who had been driven from their home by the triumph of the republican arms.

Mrs. Milton died young, leaving three daughters, who severally filled the office of amanuensis and reader to their father, in his darkened old age. Milton's ill luck in his first essay, did not prevent his venturing twice, subsequently, into the marriage state; though it has obviously left its impress upon his mind, the proper subjection of woman unto man, being a subject to which he never fails to give due weight. In his Paradise Lost—which, strange to say, seems to have furnished the popular conception of Adam and Eve, to readers of the Anglo-Saxon race, rather than their true history in the Bible—he gives Eve an undue share in the "fall," investing the fact with circumstances that weigh heavily and unjustly upon her. The Scripture says, "She took of the fruit thereof, and did eat; and gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat." Man's superiority to woman is but poorly illustrated in following blindly her lead. A modern husband who stood beside his wife in a moment of imminent peril, would ill perform his duty if he did not extend to her a restraining hand, or at least warn her of her peril.

MINGOTTI, CATHARINE,

A CELEBRATED Italian singer, was born at Naples, in 1728. After the death of her father, who was a German, Catharine entered a convent, where she was instructed in music. When she was fourteen she left the convent, and some time after married Mingotti, director of the opera at Dresden. There she was very much admired, and sang at the theatre, before the king. Her reputation soon extended through Europe, and under the direction of the celebrated Farinelli, she visited most of the principal cities on the continent, and also went to London. She died at Munich, in 1807. She was a highly educated and intellectual woman.

MINUTOLI, LIVIA,

DAUGHTER to Andrea and Lucretia de Vulcano, was married to Don Louis de Silva, of the dukes of Pastrano, knight of the order of St. James, and commander of the castle of Capuano. When she became a widow, Charles V., emperor of Germany, chose her, on account of her virtue and good sense, to conduct the education of Margaret of Austria, his daughter. She lived in the sixteenth century

MNISZECH, MARINA,

CZARINA of Muscovy, was the daughter of a Polish nobleman, George Mniszech, palatine of Sandomir. He was ambitious, but without the ability to conduct his ambition, and he deserves the appellation of an intriguer rather than a politician. It has been often seen how trivial incidents sway the destinies of individuals; and a long train of events, romantic and horrible, which form the destiny of Marina, may be traced to the circumstance of a pardon granted by the palatine to an old woman condemned to death, who held the social position of a witch. This personage being introduced into the palace for the exercise of her profession, casting her eyes upon the extraordinary beauty and grace of the daughter of George, boldly predicted that she would one day occupy a throne. This prediction was taken seriously; the child was educated for her future elevation, to which she looked forward with confidence. A noble youth called Zarucki, with whom she had been educated, conceived for her a most violent passion; but her thoughts were bent upon ambitious elevation, and she received his sentiments with indifference. He will appear at another period of her life.

To enter with understanding into the incidents of her career, it is necessary to give a glance at the history of Russia. Ivan IV. was the son of the first monarch who took the title of Czar. He ascended the throne in 1555. He was a remarkable man, and had he lived at a later period, he might have acted the part of Peter: like him, he presented a strange mixture of talent and brutality. His military and political abilities were considerable; but he was savage and unsparing, and acknowledged no law but his own inclinations. Ivan IV. left two sons, Fedor and Demetrius. The first was a sickly, weak-minded young man; and the sagacity of his father, aware that he was unfit to govern, led him to establish a regency, and place at the head of it a man but too able, the boyard Bosis Godonuff. Demetrius, who was of tender years, was placed with his mother, Irene, in the city of Uglitz, on the Volga. Bosis found it an easy matter to constitute himself the efficient head of the state; but he had uneasy moments in thinking of the growing advantages of Demetrius, who was beautiful, intelligent, and adored by the people. Bosis adopted the usual expedient under barbarous and despotic administrations; after several attempts, rendered ineffectual by the vigilance of Irene, he procured assassins, who stabbed the young prince to the heart. Fedor dying naturally a few months after this, Bosis became undisputed czar of the country. Years rolled on, when rumours were heard that the young Demetrius was living—the murdered child, it was said, was a substituted victim—and that the heir had been brought up under the name of Gregory Otrepieff, protected by the family of Romanoff. For greater safety, he had entered a monastery. Hearing that Bosis had given orders for his apprehension, Gregory fled from his monastery, and after various adventures, arrived in Poland, and sought an asylum with the palatine of Sandomir.

At this period the Jesuits were extending their power, by every means, throughout the world; and a member of this society, adroit, vigilant, unscrupulous, was not wanting in Poland. Father Gaspar Sawicki was in attendance upon the prince Adam Wisniowiecki, when the pretender to the crown of Muscovy entered the palace of George Mniszech. This was a conjuncture in which the spirit of intrigue could not lie dormant. The young man happening to fall sick, demanded a priest. Sawicki had a conference with him, and communicated to the Polish grandees that this was veritably the son of Ivan. Here was the way to a throne, so long aspired to by Marina, plainly discovered. The pretender had, by numerous channels, constant communications with an extensive party who secretly intrigued for him in Russia. Matters were often and freely discussed; proofs of his identity were offered by Gregory, and accepted by the easy faith of the palatine and his daughter. A real affection between the young people appears to have cemented the political union the Jesuit and the palatine were so anxious to effect. A regular treaty was signed; Marina was to espouse the prince, in the event of his success; he was to cede to the palatine the duchy of Novogrod; and the Romish religion was to be introduced into Muscovy, at whatever cost. This last article was the origin of Demetrius' ruin.

A large army was soon organized; the king of Poland, by the powerful intercession of Mniszech, entered into secret negotiations, by which he pledged himself to support the pretender, whose bands were increased by recruits from every part of the continent. The fame of Ivan was not forgotten, his memory was dear to his subjects. The usurper, like others who have dared

"To wade through slaughter to a throne,
And shut the gates of mercy on mankind," was odious to the people, and Demetrius entered Russia not without expectations of being successful in the contest; but every thing was changed by the death of Bosis, who, like an every-day person, simply died in his bed. When Demetrius presented himself, no opposition of any consequence was offered; and his partizans, with added enthusiasm, bore him triumphantly to the throne. His success was tarnished by the brutal treatment of the widow and family of Bosis, who were consigned to the executioner—the family of Godunoff became thus extinct.

As soon as Demetrius had arrived at his elevation, he sent for his affianced bride. Marina arrived after a triumphal progress, and was solemnly crowned Czarina. The empress Irene had recognized the young monarch, and declared him her son. To this day the case is problematical. The extreme indifference of Bosis when he first heard of the claims of the pretended Demetrius, and when it would have been so easy to gain possession of his person, seems to argue an entire certainty of his insignificance. On the other hand, the tenderness manifested by Irene, who could have no object, not even that of vengeance, since the race of Bosis had perished, for supporting an impostor, is no unimportant argument in favour of the new czar. Demetrius had lived too long in more civilized regions to accommodate himself to the prejudices of the Muscovites; daily discontents arose, even from the most futile causes. He would eat veal, which to the superstitions of the country was an odious crime; he would wear the Polish garb, another heinous offence. But the most serious of his errors, the one which no doubt mainly contributed to his downfall, was the furthering the schemes of the Jesuits, and departing from the national religion. A revolution was quietly organized; on the 16th of May, 1607, the palace was entered by a mob of soldiers, and of the populace under the Boyard Tzviskey. Demetrius fell, pierced by a thousand weapons; and Marina with difficulty escaped, accompanied by her father. Basilio Tzviski placed himself on the throne of his nation; but, unwilling to incur the enmity of Sigismund, permitted all the Poles to depart uninjured. Marina, who had come to Moscow guided by love, joy, ambition, left it like a mendicant, poor, exiled, despondent. She was, however, not destined to revisit her native country. Before she left the confines of Russia, she was met by an adventurer whom she perfectly well knew to be a Jew named Jankéli, a man in every way repulsive, morally and physically; but she had quaffed the draught of ambition, and, to regain the vain title of queen, she entered into a miserable plot with this man, every way and doubly an impostor. He was to present himself as Demetrius, escaped from the blows of the assassins; already he had soldiers, had followers; it remained for her to confirm his identity, which she culpably did. The country now became a prey to civil discords, carried on by armies composed of ferocious semi-savages, and conducted by no one of talents or name to moderate or terminate such terrible contests. At length Sigismund III. determined to interfere; he assembled his forces, easily routed the disorderly partisons of Tzviski, and as easily purchased the renunciation of the false Demetrius. He brought his son Ladislaus, and seated him on the throne of Moscow.

But though the other claimants were set aside, the ambitious Marina would not give up so readily the aim of her life; she dressed herself in the garb of a general, mounted on horseback, put herself at the head of all the forces she could collect, and manfully opposed herself to Ladislaus. A powerful unwearying will, sustained by such wonderful courage, obtained many adherents. She made herself allies of the wandering Tartars and Cossacs; but the treachery of her pseudo-husband turned these into enemies, and after incredible efforts, she found herself at last in a dungeon, in the power of her opponents. Disdaining to supplicate compassion, she resigned herself to her fate. She said she did not wish to live, if she could not reign. But she had not come to the end of her adventures. One day, the quiet of her prison was broken by a noise of combatants; the doors flew open. Oh Providence! It was Zarucki, the lover of her childhood; he had become a chief of the Cossacs. After liberating her, he offered to conduct her into Poland to her father. This offer she refused. Intoxicated with the ambition of royalty, she exerted her influence over this devoted champion to incite new and fruitless attempts at recovering a sovereignty to which she had no claim. She united herself to Zarucki, over whose mind she obtained complete dominion; his Cossacs followed her with impetuosity, and like a devastating torrent poured upon the east of Russia. It was at this epoch that the patriots Kosmo, Minin, and the prince Pojarski, formed a confederacy to free their country from the foreigners, who rendered it a scene of carnage. The first to be encountered was Zarucki; their superior forces completely overpowered him; and he was forced to flee with Marina and their infant son among the snows and wildernesses. It would be difficult to describe the sufferings they encountered; for it was in the depth of winter that their wanderings began. Their fate was inevitable; they were taken by a detachment of the Russian army. Zarucki fell at the feet of his wife, staining the snow with his blood. Marina was considered by these men as the firebrand which had brought destruction upon their country. With revengeful brutality they broke the ice of the river Jaick with axes, and plunged the unfortunate creature into its cold waters!

MOMORO, SOPHIE,

GRAND-DAUGHTER of the engraver Fournier, was married, or rather united, to the celebrated Momoro. She was chosen for her beauty to enact the part of the Goddess of Reason, and appeared on the altar of one of the Parisian churches, in a costume entirely transparent, and surrounded by two hundred young girls, to receive the homage of the people, as the representative of that deity to whom alone they had declared their allegiance. Her husband was executed in 1793, and she was imprisoned, but afterwards liberated. The time of her death is not known.

MONK, THE HON. MRS.,

WAS the daughter of lord Molesworth, an Irish nobleman, and wife of George Monk, Esq. By her own unassisted efforts she learned the Spanish, Italian, and Latin languages, and the art of poetry. Her poems were not published till after her death, when they were printed under the title of "Marinda; Poems and Translations on several occasions." These writings are said to show the true spirit of poetry, and much delicacy and correctness of thought and expression. They were all written while occupied with the care of a large family, and without any assistance, excepting that of a good library. The following is an impromptu epitaph on a "Lady of Pleasure."

O'er this marble drop a tear,
Here lies fair Rosalind;
All mankind were pleased with her,
And she with all mankind."

Mrs. Monk was a lady of exemplary character, and greatly beloved by all who knew her. She died at Bath, in 1715.

MOHALBI, GARAFILIA

A GREEK girl, was born in the island of Ipsara, in 1817. Her parents were rich and respectable, and among the first people in Ipsara. When Garafilia was about seven years of age, the place of her nativity was totally destroyed by the Turks, under the usual circumstances of horror. Saved by almost a miracle from violent death, she fell into the hands of the enemy, was separated from her grandmother and sister, taken to Smyrna, and there was ransomed by an American merchant, to whose knees she clung for protection in the street. This gentleman took her home with him, and became so much engaged by her intelligence and amiableness, that he determined to send her to his relations in Boston, in order that she might receive, at his expense, an accomplished education in a free and undistracted land.

Garafilia arrived in Boston in the year 1827, was immediately domesticated in the family of her liberator's father, and very soon found her way into all their hearts. She won affections as by magic. Her protector knew no distinction, in his feelings, between her and his own daughters—he was her father—they were her sisters. She was so mild and gentle, so free from selfishness, so attentive to the wants of others, so ready to prefer their wishes to her own, so submissive and tractable, and withal so bright and cheerful; the beauty of her mind and morals harmonized so completely with the grace and truly Grecian loveliness of her person, that it was impossible to know and not become strongly attached to her. Her manners were much older than her years, and so considerate in every respect, that, so far from being a burthen, she could hardly be said to have been a care to her adopted father. Without stepping over the strictest bounds of truth, it may be asserted, that the first grief which she brought into his house, was when she sickened and died.

Her constitution had never been a strong one. Toward the close of the winter of 1830, she exhibited symptoms of a rapid decline. During her illness, the singular submissiveness of her character was remarkably developed. She uttered no complaint, was grateful for the least attention, and her only anxiety seemed to be to avoid giving trouble to any one. Her mental faculties remained clear to the last; and, till within a few days of her death, she read daily in her Bible, which she always kept close by her side or under her pillow. She died, March 17th, 1830, without a struggle, and apparently without a pang.

She was only thirteen years old at the time of her decease, yet few of her sex have ever experienced such changes or such thrilling incidents as had marked her short span. But it is not as a heroine or a martyr that she finds her place in our record. We give her history as an example for young girls. Her amiable disposition, the lovely qualities of her mind and heart, make her distinguished. Like the rose of her own island home, the beauty of the blossom was brief; but the virtues of her soul, her patience and piety, like the fragrance of the flower, give a lasting charm to her character, and make her memory a sweet blessing to the young.

MOLSA, TARQUINIA,

DAUGHTER of Camillus Molsa, knight of the order of St. James of Spain, and granddaughter of Francis Maria Molsa, a celebrated Italian poet, was one of the most accomplished ladies in the world, uniting in an extraordinary degree, wit, learning, and beauty. Her father, observing her genius, had her educated with her brothers, and by the best masters, in every branch of literature and science. Some of the most distinguished scientific men of the time were her instructors and eulogists. She was perfect mistress of Latin, Greek, and the ethics of Aristotle, Plato, and Plutarch. She also understood Hebrew and natural philosophy, and wrote her own language, the Tuscan, with ease and spirit. She played on the lute and violin, and sang exquisitely.

Tarquinia Molsa was highly esteemed by Alphonsus II., duke of Ferrara, and his whole court; and the city of Rome, by a decree of the senate, in which all her excellencies were set forth, honoured her with the title of Singular, and bestowed on her, and the whole family of Molsa, the rights of a Roman citizen, a very unusual honour to be conferred on a woman. This decree was passed December 8th, 1600. The following is a translation of the grant or patent: “As Fabius Matheus Franciscus Soricius, knight, and Dominicus Coccia, consul, have proposed to the senate to grant the freedom of the city of Rome to Tarquinia Molsa of Modena, the daughter of Camillus, the senate and people of Rome have thus decreed: Though it be new and uncommon for the senate to admit into the number of citizens women, whose merits and fame, being confined within the limits of domestic virtues, can seldom be of public utility to the commonwealth: yet if there be among them one, who surpasses not merely her own sex, but even men, in almost all the virtues, it is just and reasonable that, by a new example, new and unusual honours should be paid to new and unusual merit. Since, therefore, Tarquinia Molsa, a native of Modena, a most ancient and flourishing colony of the people of Rome, and daughter of Camillus (who, for his merits and nobility, was made knight of the order of St. James, &c.), imitates, and by her virtues resembles, those famous Roman heroines, wanting to complete her glory but the honour of a citizen of Rome; we, the senate and people of Rome, have decreed to present her with the freedom,” &c.

Molsa was married to Paulus Porrinus, but losing her husband while still very young, she would never consent to be married again. She grieved so much for his death, as to be called another Artemisia.

She retained her personal charms to an advanced period of her life, confirming the opinion of Euripides, “That the autumn of beauty is not less pleasing than its spring.” Although so courted and extolled, she avoided notice and distinction, and retained to the last her fondness for a quiet and retired life.

MONTAGU, ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER of Matthew Robinson, of Horton, Kent, in England, was a lady of great natural abilities, which were much improved under the tuition of Dr. Conyers Middleton. About 1742, she married Edward Montagu, of Allesthorpe, Yorkshire, son of Charles, fifth son of the first earl of Sandwich. By him she had one son, who died in his infancy. She devoted herself to literature, and formed a literary club, called the Blue Stocking Club, from a little incident that occurred there, and is thus explained by Madame D'Arblay:

“These parties were originally instituted at Bath, and owed their name to an apology made by Mr. Stillingfleet, in declining to accept an invitation to a literary meeting at Mrs. Vesey's. From not being, he said, in the habit of displaying a proper equipment for an evening assembly. ‘Pho!’ cried she, with her well-known, yet always original simplicity, while she looked inquisitively at him and his accoutrements, ‘Don't mind dress! come in your blue stockings!’ With which words, humourously repeating them as he entered the apartment of the chosen coterie, Mr. Stillingfleet claimed permission to appear, and these words, ever after, were fixed in playful stigma upon Mrs. Vesey's associations.

"While to Mrs. Vesey, the Bas Bleu Society owed its origin and its epithet, the meetings that took place at Mrs. Montagu's were soon more popularly known by that denomination, for though they could not be more fashionable, they were far more splendid.

"Mrs. Montagu had built a superb new house, which was magnificently fitted up, and appeared to be rather appropriate for princes, nobles, and courtiers, than for poets, philosophers, and blue-stocking votaries. And here, in fact, rank and talents were so frequently brought together, that what the satirist uttered scoffingly, the author pronounced proudly, in setting aside the original claimant, to dub Mrs. Montagu Queen of the Blues.

"But, while the same bas bleu appellation was given to these two houses of rendezvous, neither that, nor even the same associates, could render them similar. Their grandeur or their simplicity, their magnitude or their diminutiveness, were by no means the principal cause of this difference; it was far more attributable to the lady presidents than to their abodes; for though they instilled not their characters into their visitors, their characters bore so large a share in their visitors' reception and accommodation, as to influence materially the turn of the discourse, and the humour of the parties at their houses.

"At Mrs. Montagu's, the semicircle that faced the fire retained, during the whole evening, its unbroken form, with a precision that made it seem described by a Brobdingnagian compass. The lady of the castle commonly placed herself at the upper end of the room, near the commencement of the curve, so as to be courteously visible to all her guests; having the person of the highest rank or consequence, properly, on one side, and the person the most eminent for talents, sagaciously, on the other, or as near to her chair and her converse as her favouring eye, and a complacent bow of the head, could invite him to that distinction.

"Her conversational powers were of a truly superior order; strong, just, clear, and often eloquent. Her process in argument, notwithstanding an earnest solicitude for pre-eminence, was uniformly polite and candid. But her reputation for wit seemed always in her thoughts, marring their natural flow and untutored expression. No sudden start of talent urged forth any precarious opinion; no vivacious new idea varied her logical course of ratiocination. Her smile, though most generally benignant, was rarely gay; and her liveliest sallies had a something of anxiety rather than of hilarity, till their success was ascertained by applause.

"Her form was stately, and her manners were dignified; her face retained strong remains of beauty throughout life; and though its native cast was evidently that of severity, its expression was softened off in discourse by an almost constant desire to please.

"Taken for all in all, Mrs. Montagu was rare in her attainments, splendid in her conduct, open to the calls of charity, forward to provide for those of indigent genius, and unchangeably just and firm in the application of her interest, her principles, and her fortune, to the encouragement of loyalty and the support of virtue."

In 1775, the death of Mr. Montagu left Mrs. Montagu a widow with an immense property; and among the earliest acts of her munificence was the settling £100 per annum on her less affluent friend Mrs. Carter, with whom she was on terms of affectionate intimacy. Herself and her style of living at this period are described by another of her friends, who was only then beginning her subsequent career of brilliancy and utility. Hannah More, at the age of thirty, thus writes of Mrs. Montagu, who was then about fifty-five years of age:

"Mrs. Montagu received me with the most encouraging kindness; she is not only the finest genius, but the finest lady I ever saw; she lives in the highest style of magnificence; her apartments and table are in the most splendid taste; but what baubles are these when speaking of a Montagu! Her form (for she has no body) is delicate even to fragility; her countenance the most animated in the world; the sprightly vivacity of fifteen with the judgment and experience of a Nestor. But I fear she is hastening to decay very fast; her spirits are so active, that they must soon wear out the little frail receptacle that holds them."

Fortunately, in this, Hannah More did not evince herself a true prophetess, for Mrs. Montagu's life was prolonged for nearly thirty years after the date of this prediction.

In 1781, she built her magnificent house in Portman Square, and also continued her building and planting at her country residence, Sandleford. Here Mrs. Hannah More was a frequent visiter, and has given some spirited sketches of their mode of living, in her correspondence. Subsequently, Hannah More writes as follows:—

"1784, Sandleford

"I write from the delightful abode of our delightful friend. There is an irregular beauty and greatness in the new buildings, and in the cathedral aisles which open to the great gothic window, which is exceedingly agreeable to the imagination. It is solemn without being sad, and gothic without being gloomy. Last night, by a bright moonlight, I enjoyed this singular scenery most feelingly. It shone in all its glory, but I was at a loss with what beings to people it; it was too awful for fairies, and not dismal enough for ghosts. There is a great propriety in its belonging to the champion of Shakspeare, for, like him, it is not only beautiful without the rules, but almost in defiance of them.

"The fortnight spent with our friend Mrs. Montagu, I need not say to you, was passed profitably and pleasantly, as one may say of her, what Johnson said of some one else, 'that she never opens her mouth but to say something.'"

Mrs. Montagu published an "Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakspeare," which deserved and acquired great celebrity. She was an intimate friend of Lord Lyttleton, and is said to have assisted him in some of his writings. She lost the use of her sight several years before her decease, but retained her mental faculties to the last. She died August 25th, 1802, in her eighty-second year, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. The body of her infant son, who had been dead nearly sixty years, was, by her own desire, removed out of Yorkshire, and placed in her tomb; a circumstance displaying the maternal tenderness of her heart in a touching manner.

Mrs. Montagu was a woman of great talents, yet notwithstanding her high attainments in literature, benevolence was the most striking feature in her character. She was the rewarder of merit, the friend of her own sex, and the poor always found in her a liberal benefactress. For some years before her death, she had been in the habit of giving a yearly entertainment, on May-day, to the chimney-sweeps of London, who mourned her loss with great grief. Her published works are, "Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakspeare," 1799; "Four Volumes of Letters," 1809 and 1813; "Dialogues of the Dead, in part," 1760.

MONTAGU, LADY MARY WORTLEY,

WAS the oldest daughter of Evelyn, duke of Kingston, and Lady Mary Fielding, daughter of the earl of Denbigh. She was born at Thoresby, in Nottinghamshire, about the year 1690. She early gave such evidence of genius, that her father placed her under the same preceptors as her brother, and she acquired a singular proficiency in classical studies. Brought up in great seclusion, she was enabled to cultivate her mind to a degree rarely seen in women of that period. In 1712 she became the wife of Edward Wortley Montagu, and continued to live in retirement until her husband's appointment, on the accession of George I., to a seat in the treasury, which brought her to London. Introduced at court, her wit and beauty called forth universal admiration, and she became familiarly acquainted with Pope, Addison, and other distinguished writers. In 1716, Mr. Wortley was appointed ambassador to the Porte, and Lady Mary accompanied him. Here began that correspondence which has procured her such widespread celebrity, and placed her among the first of female writers in our tongue; and here, too, her bold, unprejudiced mind, led her to that important step which has made her one of the greatest benefactors of mankind. While dwelling at Belgrade, during the summer months, Lady Mary observed a singular custom prevalent among the Turks—that of engrafting, or as it is now called, inoculating, with variolous matter, to produce a mild form of small-pox, and stay the ravages of that loathsome disease. She examined the process with philosophical curiosity, and becoming convinced of its efficacy, did not hesitate to apply it to her own son, a child of three years old. On her return home, she introduced the art into England, by means of the medical attendant of the embassy; but its expediency being questioned among scientific men, an experiment, by order of the government, was made upon five persons under sentence of death, which proved highly successful. What an arduous and thankless enterprise Lady Mary's was, no one, at the present day, can form an idea. She lived in an age obstinately opposed to all innovations and improvements, and she says herself, "That if she had foreseen the vexation, the persecution, and even the obloquy which it brought upon her, she would never have attempted it." The clamours raised against it were beyond belief. The medical faculty rose up in arms, to a man; the clergy descanted from their pulpits on the impiety of seeking to take events out of the hands of Providence; thus exhibiting more narrowness than the Turks, whose obstinate faith in predestination would have naturally led them to this conclusion. Lady Mary, however, soon gained many supporters among the enlightened classes, headed by the princess of Wales, afterwards queen of George II.; and truth, as it always does, finally prevailed. She gave much of her time to advice and superintendence in the families where inoculation was adopted, constantly carrying her little daughter with her into the sick room, to prove her security from infection.

The present age, which has benefited so widely by this art and its improvements, can form but a faint estimate of the ravages of that fearful scourge, before the introduction of inoculation, when either a loathsome disease, a painful death, or disfigured features, awaited nearly every being born. This may account, in some measure, for the absence of that active gratitude which services such as hers should have called forth. Had Lady Mary Wortley lived in the days of heathen Greece or Rome, her name would have been enrolled among the deities who have benefited mankind. But in Christian England, her native land, on which she bestowed so dear a blessing, and through it, to all the nations of the earth, what has been her recompense? We read of colossal endowments by the British government, upon great generals; of titles conferred and pensions granted, through several generations, to those who have served their country; of monuments erected by the British people to statesmen, and warriors, and even to weak and vicious princes; but where is the monument to Lady Mary Wortley Montagu? Where is recorded the pension, the dignity, bestowed upon her line, as a sign to future generations that she was a benefactor to the human race, and that her country acknowledged it? In the page of history, and in the annals of medicine, her name must find its place; but there alone is the deed recorded, which beneath every roof in Christendom, from the palace to the pauper's hut, has carried a blessing!

On her return to England, Lady Mary Wortley took up her residence, at the solicitation of Pope, at Twickenham; but their friendship did not continue long after. Pope, it is asserted, made a violent declaration of love to her, which she treating with ridicule, so offended him that he never forgave her. A paper war ensued between them, little creditable to either party. Lady Mary continued to exercise considerable influence in society till 1739, when her health declining, she resolved to pass the remainder of her days in the milder climate of Italy. She was not accompanied by her husband, which has given rise to many surmises; but as he always corresponded with her, and gave repeated proofs of his confidence in her, there is no ground for believing that there was any objectionable reason for her conduct. Lady Mary's correspondence during this period of her life, is marked by the same wit, vivacity, and talents, as that of her earlier years, and is published with her collected writings. The following extract from one of her letters to her daughter will serve to show how she passed her time:

"I generally rise at six, and as soon as I have breakfasted, put myself at the head of my needlewomen, and work till nine. I then inspect my dairy, and take a turn among my poultry, which is a very large inquiry. I have at present two hundred chickens, besides turkeys, geese, ducks, and peacocks. All things have hitherto prospered under my care: my bees and silkworms are doubled. At eleven o'clock I retire to my books. I dare not indulge myself in that pleasure above an hour. At twelve, I constantly dine, and sleep after dinner till about three. I then send for some of my old priests, and either play at picquet or whist, till it is time to go out. One evening I walk in my wood, where I often sup, take the air on horseback the next, and go on the water the third. The fishing of this part of the river belongs to me, and my fisherman's little boat (to which I have a green lutestring awning) serves me for a barge." She adds, "I confess I sometimes long for a little conversation;" though, as she observes, "Quiet is all the hope that can reasonably be expected at my age, for my health is so often impaired that I begin to be as weary of it as mending old lace: when it is patched in one place, it breaks out in another."

This once brilliant court beauty was now become so indifferent to her personal appearance, that, speaking of her looks, she says, "I know nothing of the matter, as it is now eleven years since I have seen my figure in a glass, and the last reflection I saw there was so disagreeable, that I resolved to spare myself the mortification for the future."

After an absence of twenty-two years, Lady Mary returned to England, but she did not long survive the removal; she died in less than a year after, at the age of seventy-two. Of her two children, both of whom survived her, one was the eccentric and profligate Edward Wortley Montagu, who was a source of continual unhappiness to her through life; the other became the wife of the marquis of Bute, a distinguished nobleman, and was the mother of a large family.

Lady Montagu's letters were first printed, surreptitiously, in 1763. A more complete edition of her works was published, in five volumes, in 1803; and another, edited by her great-grandson, Lord Wharncliffe, with additional letters and information, in 1837. The letters from Constantinople and France have been often reprinted. An eminent British critic* thus graphically describes her works:

"The wit and talent of Lady Mary are visible throughout the whole of her correspondence, but there is often a want of feminine softness and delicacy. Her desire to convey scandal, or to paint graphically, leads her into offensive details, which the more decorous taste of the present age can hardly tolerate. She described what she saw and heard without being scrupulous; and her strong masculine understanding, and carelessness as to refinement in habits or expressions, render her sometimes apparently unamiable and unfeeling. As models of the epistolary style, easy, familiar, and elegant, no less than as pictures of foreign scenery and manners, and fashionable gossip, the letters of Lady Mary must, however, ever maintain a high place in our national literature. They are truly letters, not critical or didactic essays, enlivened by formal compliment and elaborate wit, like the correspondence of Pope."

EXTRACTS FROM THE LETTERS.

To E. W. Montagu, Esq.—In prospect of Marriage.

One part of my character is not so good, nor t'other so bad, as you fancy it. Should we ever live together, you would be disappointed both ways; you would find an easy equality of temper you do not expect, and a thousand faults you do not imagine. You think if you married me I should be passionately fond of you one month, and of somebody else the next. Neither would happen. I can esteem, I can be a friend; but I don't know whether I can love. Expect all that is complaisant and easy, but never what is fond, in me. You judge very wrong of my heart, when you suppose me capable of views of interest, and that anything could oblige me to flatter anybody. Was I the most indigent creature in the world, I should answer you as I do now, without adding or diminishing. I am incapable of art, and 'tis because I will not be capable of it. Could I deceive one minute, I should never regain my own good opinion; and who could bear to live with one they despised!

* Robert Chambers.

If you can resolve to live with a companion that will have all the deference due to your superiority of good sense, and that your proposals can be agreeable to those on whom I depend, I have nothing to say against them.

As to travelling, 'tis what I should do with great pleasure, and could easily quit London upon your account; but a retirement in the country is not so disagreeable to me, as I know a few months would make it tiresome to you. Where people are tied for life, 'tis their mutual interest not to grow weary of one another. If I had all the personal charms that I want, a face is too slight a foundation for happiness. You would be soon tired with seeing every day the same thing. Where you saw nothing else, you would have leisure to remark all the defects; which would increase in proportion as the novelty lessened, which is always a great charm. I should have the displeasure of seeing a coldness, which, though I could not reasonably blame you for, being involuntary, yet it would render me uneasy; and the more, because I know a love may be revived, which absence, inconstancy, or even infidelity, has extinguished; but there is no returning from a degout given by satiety.

To the Same—On Matrimonial Happiness.

If we marry, our happiness must consist in loving one another: 'tis principally my concern to think of the most probable method of making that love eternal. You object against living in London; I am not fond of it myself, and readily give it up to you, though I am assured there needs more art to keep a fondness alive in solitude, where it generally preys upon itself. There is one article absolutely necessary—to be ever beloved, one must be ever agreeable. There is no such thing as being agreeable without a thorough good humour, a natural sweetness of temper, enlivened by cheerfulness. Whatever natural funds of gaiety one is born with, 'tis necessary to be entertained with agreeable objects. Anybody capable of tasting pleasure, when they confine themselves to one place, should take care 'tis the place in the world the most agreeable. Whatever you may now think (now, perhaps, you have some fondness for me), though your love should continue in its full force, there are hours when the most beloved mistress would be troublesome. People are not for ever (nor is it in human nature that they should be) disposed to be fond; you would be glad to find in me the friend and the companion. To be agreeably the last, it is necessary to be gay and entertaining. A perpetual solitude, in a place where you see nothing to raise your spirits, at length wears them out, and conversation insensibly falls into dull and insipid. When I have no more to say to you, you will like me no longer. How dreadful is that view! You will reflect, for my sake you have abandoned the conversation of a friend that you liked, and your situation in a country where all things would have contributed to make your life pass in (the true volepté) a smooth tranquillity. I shall lose the vivacity which should entertain you, and you will have nothing to recompense you for what you have lost. Very few people that have settled entirely in the country, but have grown at length weary of one another. The lady's conversation generally falls into a thousand impertinent effects of idleness; and the gentleman falls in love with his dogs and his horses, and out of love with everything else. I am not now arguing in favour of the town; you have answered me as to that point. In respect of your health, 'tis the first thing to be considered, and I shall never ask you to do anything injurious to that. But 'tis my opinion, 'tis necessary, to be happy, that we neither of us think any place more agreeable than that where we are.

To Mr. Pope—Eastern Manners and Language.

ADRIANOPLE, April 1, O. S., 1717.

I no longer look upon Theocritus as a romantic writer; he has only given a plain image of the way of life amongst the peasants of his country, who, before oppression had reduced them to want, were, I suppose, all employed as the better sort of them are now. I don't doubt, had he been born a Briton, but his Idylliums had been filled with descriptions of thrashing and churning, both which are unknown here, the corn being all trodden out by oxen; the butter (I speak it with sorrow) unheard of.

I read over your Homer here with an infinite pleasure, and find several little passages explained that I did not before entirely comprehend the beauty of; many of the customs, and much of the dress then in fashion, being yet retained. I don't wonder to find more remains here of an age so distant, than is to be found in any other country; the Turks not taking that pains to introduce their own manners, as has been generally practised by other nations, that imagine themselves more polite. It would be too tedious to you to point out all the passages that relate to present customs. But I can assure you that the princesses and great ladies pass their time at their looms, embroidering veils and robes, surrounded by their maids, which are always very numerous, in the same manner as we find Andromache and Helen described. The description of the belt of Menelaus exactly resembles those that are now worn by the great men, fastened before with broad golden clasps, and embroidered round with rich work. The snowy veil that Helen throws over her face is still fashionable; and I never see half-a-dozen of old bashaws (as I do very often) with their reverend beards, sitting basking in the sun, but I recollect good king Priam and his counsellors. Their manner of dancing is certainly the same that Diana is sung to have danced on the banks of Eurotas. The great lady still leads the dance, and is followed by a troop of young girls, who imitate her steps, and, if she sings, make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them, wonderfully soft. The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her that leads the dance, but always in exact time, and infinitely more agreeable than any of our dances, at least in my opinion.

I sometimes make one in the train, but am not skilful enough to lead; these are the Grecian dances, the Turkish being very different.

I should have told you, in the first place, that the eastern manners give a great light into many Scripture passages that appear odd to us, their phrases being commonly what we should call Scripture language. The vulgar Turk is very different from what is spoken at court, or amongst the people of figure, who always mix so much Arabic and Persian in their discourse, that it may very well be called another language. And 'tis as ridiculous to make use of the expressions commonly used, in speaking to a great man or lady, as it would be to speak broad Yorkshire or Somersetshire in the drawing-room. Besides this distinction, they have what they call the sublime, that is, a style proper for poetry, and which is the exact Scripture style. I believe you will be pleased to see a genuine example of this; and I am very glad I have it in my power to satisfy your curiosity, by sending you a faithful copy of the verses that Ibrahim Pasha, the reigning favourite, has made for the young princess, his contracted wife, whom he is not yet permitted to visit without witnesses, though she is gone home to his house. He is a man of wit and learning; and whether or no he is capable of writing good verse, you may be sure that on such an occasion he would not want the assistance of the best poets in the empire. Thus the verses may be looked upon as a sample of their finest poetry; and I don't doubt you'll be of my mind, that it is most wonderfully resembling the Song of Solomon, which was also addressed to a royal bride.

The nightingale now wanders in the vines:
Her passion is to seek roses.

I went down to admire the beauty of the vines:
The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul.

Your eyes are black and lovely,
But wild and disdainful as those of a stag.*

The wished possession is delayed from day to day;
The cruel sultan Achmet will not permit me
To see those cheeks, more vermilion than roses.

I dare not snatch one of your kisses;
The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul.

Your eyes are black and lovely,
But wild and disdainful as those of a stag.

The wretched Ibrahim sighs in these verses:
One dart from your eyes has pierced through my heart.

Ah! when will the hour of possession arrive?
Must I yet wait a long time?
The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul.

Ah, sultana! stag-eyed — an angel amongst angels!
I desire, and my desire remains unsatisfied.
Can you take delight to prey upon my heart

My cries pierce the heavens!
My eyes are without sleep!
Turn to me, sultana — let me gaze on thy beauty.

Adieu — I go down to the grave.
If you call me, I return.
My heart is — hot as sulphur; sigh, and it will flame.

* Sir W. Jones, in the Preface to his Persian Grammar, objects to this translation. The expression is merely analogous to the Boopis of Homer.

Crown of my life! — fair light of my eyes!
My sultana! — my princess!
I rub my face against the earth — I am drowned in scalding tears — I rave!
Have you no compassion? Will you not turn to look upon me?

I have taken abundance of pains to get these verses in a literal translation; and if you were acquainted with my interpreters, I might spare myself the trouble of assuring you, that they have received no poetical touches from their hands.

To Mrs. S. C. — Inoculation for the Small-pox.

ADRIANOPLE, April 1, O. S., 1717.

Apropos of distempers, I am going to tell you a thing that will make you wish yourself here. The small-pox, so fatal and so general amongst us, is here entirely harmless, by the invention of ingrafting, which is the term they give it. There is a set of old women who make it their business to perform the operation every autumn, in the month of September, when the great heat is abated. People send to one another to know if any of their family has a mind to have the small-pox; they make parties for this purpose, and when they are met (commonly fifteen or sixteen together), the old woman comes with a nut-shell full of the matter of the best sort of small-pox, and asks what vein you please to have opened. She immediately rips open that you offer to her with a large needle (which gives you no more pain than a common scratch), and puts into the vein as much matter as can lie upon the head of her needle, and after that binds up the little wound with a hollow bit of shell; and in this manner opens four or five veins. The Grecians have commonly the superstition of opening one in the middle of the forehead, one in each arm, and one on the breast, to mark the sign of the cross; but this has a very ill effect, all these wounds leaving little scars, and is not done by those that are not superstitious, who choose to have them in the legs, or that part of the arm that is concealed. The children or young patients play together all the rest of the day, and are in perfect health to the eighth. Then the fever begins to seize them, and they keep their beds two days, very seldom three. They have very rarely above twenty or thirty in their faces, which never mark; and in eight days' time, they are as well as before their illness. Where they are wounded, there remain running sores during the distemper, which I don't doubt is a great relief to it. Every year thousands undergo this operation; and the French ambassador says pleasantly, that they take the small-pox here by way of diversion, as they take the waters in other countries. There is no example of any one that has died in it; and you may believe I am well satisfied of the safety of this experiment, since I intend to try it on my dear little son.

I am patriot enough to take pains to bring this useful invention into fashion in England; and I should not fail to write to some of our doctors very particularly about it, if I knew any one of them that I thought had virtue enough to destroy such a considerable branch of their revenue for the good of mankind. But that distemper is too beneficial to them, not to expose to all their resentment the hardy wight that should undertake to put an end to it. Perhaps, if I live to return, I may, however, have courage to war with them. Upon this occasion, admire the heroism in the heart of your friend, &c.

To the Same—Consoling her in Affliction.

LOUVÈRE, August 20, 1752.

My dear Child—'Tis impossible to tell you to what degree I share with you in the misfortune that has happened. I do not doubt your own reason will suggest to you all the alleviations that can serve on so sad an occasion, and will not trouble you with the commonplace topics that are used, generally to no purpose, in letters of consolation. Disappointments ought to be less sensibly felt at my age than yours; yet I own I am so far affected by this, that I have need of all my philosophy to support it. However, let me beg of you not to indulge a useless grief, to the prejudice of your health, which is so necessary to your family. Everything may turn out better than you expect. We see so darkly into futurity, we never know when we have real cause to rejoice or lament. The worst appearances have often happy consequences, as the best lead many times into the greatest misfortunes. Human prudence is very straitly bounded. What is most in our power, though little so, is the disposition of our own minds. Do not give way to melancholy; seek amusements; be willing to be diverted, and insensibly you will become so. Weak people only place a merit in affliction. A grateful remembrance, and whatever honour we can pay to their memory, is all that is owing to the dead. Tears and sorrow are no duties to them, and make us incapable of those we owe to the living.

I give you thanks for your care of my books. I yet retain, and carefully cherish, my taste for reading. If relays of eyes were to be hired like post-horses, I would never admit any but silent companions; they afford a constant variety of entertainment, which is almost the only one pleasing in the enjoyment, and inoffensive in the consequence. I am sorry your sight will not permit you a great use of it: the prattle of your little ones, and friendship of Lord Bute, will supply the place of it. My dear child, endeavour to raise your spirits, and believe this advice comes from the tenderness of your most affectionate mother.

To the Same—On Female Education.

LOUVÈRE, Jan. 28, N. S., 1753.

Dear Child—You have given me a great deal of satisfaction by your account of your eldest daughter. I am particularly pleased to hear she is a good arithmetician; it is the best proof of understanding: the knowledge of numbers is one of the chief distinctions between us and brutes. If there is anything in blood, you may reasonably expect your children should be endowed with an uncommon share of good sense. Mr. Wortley's family and mine have both produced some of the greatest men that have been born in England; I mean

Admiral Sandwich, and my grandfather, who was distinguished by the name of Wise William. I have heard Lord Bute's father mentioned as an extraordinary genius, though he had not many opportunities of showing it; and his uncle, the present Duke of Argyll, has one of the best heads I ever knew. I will therefore speak to you as supposing Lady Mary not only capable, but desirous of learning; in that case by all means let her be indulged in it. You will tell me I did not make it a part of your education; your prospect was very different from hers. As you had much in your circumstances to attract the highest offers, it seemed your business to learn how to live in the world, as it is hers to know how to be easy out of it. It is the common error of builders and parents to follow some plan they think beautiful (and perhaps is so), without considering that nothing is beautiful which is displaced. Hence we see so many edifices raised, that the raisers can never inhabit, being too large for their fortunes. Vistas are laid open over barren heaths, and apartments contrived for a coolness very agreeable in Italy, but killing in the north of Britain: thus every woman endeavours to breed her daughter a fine lady, qualifying her for a station in which she will never appear, and at the same time incapacitating her for that retirement to which she is destined. Learning, if she has a real taste for it, will not only make her contented, but happy in it. No entertainment is so cheap as reading, nor any pleasure so lasting. She will not want new fashions, nor regret the loss of expensive diversions, or variety of company, if she can be amused with an author in her closet. To render this amusement complete, she should be permitted to learn the languages. I have heard it lamented that boys lose so many years in mere learning of words: this is no objection to a girl, whose time is not so precious: she cannot advance herself in any profession, and has therefore more hours to spare; and as you say her memory is good, she will be very agreeably employed this way. There are two cautions to be given on this subject: first, not to think herself learned when she can read Latin, or even Greek. Languages are more properly to be called vehicles of learning than learning itself, as may be observed in many schoolmasters, who, though perhaps critics in grammar, are the most ignorant fellows upon earth. True knowledge consists in knowing things, not words. I would no further wish her a linguist than to enable her to read books in their originals, that are often corrupted, and are always injured, by translations. Two hours' application every morning will bring this about much sooner than you can imagine, and she will have leisure enough besides to run over the English poetry, which is a more important part of a woman's education than it is generally supposed. Many a young damsel has been ruined by a fine copy of verses, which she would have laughed at if she had known it had been stolen from Mr. Waller. I remember, when I was a girl, I saved one of my companions from destruction, who communicated to me an epistle she was quite charmed with. As she had naturally a good taste, she observed the lines were not so smooth as Prior's or Pope's, but had more thought and spirit than any of theirs. She was wonderfully delighted with such a demonstration of her lover's sense and passion, and not a little pleased with her own charms, that had force enough to inspire such elegancies. In the midst of this triumph, I showed her that they were taken from Randolph's poems, and the unfortunate transcriber was dismissed with the scorn he deserved. To say truth, the poor plagiarist was very unlucky to fall into my hands; that author being no longer in fashion, would have escaped any one of less universal reading than myself. You should encourage your daughter to talk over with you what she reads; and as you are very capable of distinguishing, take care she does not mistake pert folly for wit and humour, or rhyme for poetry, which are the common errors of young people, and have a train of ill consequences. The second caution to be given her (and which is most absolutely necessary), is to conceal whatever learning she attains, with as much solicitude as she would hide crookedness or lameness: the parade of it can only serve to draw on her the envy, and consequently the most inveterate hatred, of all he and she fools, which will certainly be at least three parts in four of her acquaintance. The use of knowledge in our sex, beside the amusement of solitude, is to moderate the passions, and learn to be contented with a small expense, which are the certain effects of a studious life; and it may be preferable even to that fame which men have engrossed to themselves, and will not suffer us to share. You will tell me I have not observed this rule myself; but you are mistaken: it is only inevitable accident that has given me any reputation that way. I have always carefully avoided it, and ever thought it a misfortune. The explanation of this paragraph would occasion a long digression, which I will not trouble you with, it being my present design only to say what I think useful for the instruction of my grand-daughter, which I have much at heart. If she has the same inclination (I should say passion) for learning that I was born with, history, geography, and philosophy will furnish her with materials to pass away cheerfully a longer life than is allotted to mortals. I believe there are few heads capable of making Sir Isaac Newton's calculations, but the result of them is not difficult to be understood by a moderate capacity. Do not fear this should make her affect the character of Lady —, or Lady —, or Mrs. —; those women are ridiculous, not because they have learning, but because they have it not. One thinks herself a complete historian, after reading Echart's Roman History; another a profound philosopher, having got by heart some of Pope's unintelligible essays; and a third an able divine, on the strength of Whitfield's sermons; thus you hear them screaming politics and controversy.

It is a saying of Thucydides, that ignorance is bold, and knowledge reserved. Indeed it is impossible to be far advanced in it without being more humbled by a conviction of human ignorance than elated by learning. At the same time I recommend books, I neither exclude work nor drawing. I think it is as scandalous for a woman not to know how to use a needle, as for a man not to know how to use a sword. I was once extremely fond of my pencil, and it was a great mortification to me when my father turned off my master, having made a considerable progress for the short time I learned. My over-eagerness in the pursuit of it had brought a weakness in my eyes, that made it necessary to leave off; and all the advantage I got was the improvement of my hand. I see by hers that practice will make her a ready writer: she may attain it by serving you for a secretary, when your health or affairs make it troublesome to you to write yourself; and custom will make it an agreeable amusement to her. She cannot have too many for that station of life which will probably be her fate. The ultimate end of your education was to make you a good wife (and I have the comfort to hear that you are one); hers ought to be to make her happy in a virgin state. I will not say it is happier, but it is undoubtedly safer, than any marriage. In a lottery, where there is (at the lowest computation) ten thousand blanks to a prize, it is the most prudent choice not to venture. I have always been so thoroughly persuaded of this truth, that, notwithstanding the flattering views I had for you (as I never intended you a sacrifice to my vanity), I thought I owed you the justice to lay before you all the hazards attending matrimony: you may recollect I did so in the strongest manner. Perhaps you may have more success in the instructing your daughter; she has so much company at home, she will not need seeking it abroad, and will more readily take the notions you think fit to give her. As you were alone in my family, it would have been thought a great cruelty to suffer you no companions of your own age, especially having so many near relations, and I do not wonder their opinions influenced yours. I was not sorry to see you not determined on a single life, knowing it was not your father's intention; and contented myself with endeavouring to make your home so easy, that you might not be in haste to leave it.

I am afraid you will think this a very long insignificant letter. I hope the kindness of the design will excuse it, being willing to give you every proof in my power that I am your most affectionate mother.

From the Poems of Lady Montagu.

LINES WRITTEN SHORTLY AFTER HER MARRIAGE.

While thirst of praise, and vain desire of fame
In every age is every woman's aim;
With courtship pleased, of silly trifles proud,
Fond of a train and happy in a crowd;
On each proud sop bestowing some kind glance,
Each conquest owing to some loose advance;
While vain coquets affect to be pursued,
And think they're virtuous, if not grossly lewd:
Let this great maxim be my virtue's guide:
In part she is to blame who has been tried.
He comes too near who comes to be denied.

REPLY TO POPE'S IMITATION OF THE FIRST SATIRE OF THE SECOND BOOK OF HORACE.

* * * * *
Thine is just such an image of his pen,
As thou thyself art of the sons of men:
Where our own species in burlesque we trace,
A sign-post likeness of the human race;
That is at once resemblance and disgrace.

* * * * *
If he has thorns, they all on roses grow,
Thine like rude thistles and mean brambles show;
With this exception, that, though rank the soil,
Weeds as they are, they seem produced by toil.
Satire should, like a polished razor keen,
Wound with a touch that's scarcely felt or seen;
Thine is an oyster-knife, that hacks and hews;

* * * * *
'Tis the gross lust of hate, that still annoys
Without distinction as gross lust enjoys:
Neither to folly nor to vice confined,
The object of thy spleen is human kind:
It preys on all who yield, or who resist,
To thee 'tis provocation to exist.

* * * * *
Not even youth and beauty can control
The universal rancour of thy soul;
Charms that might soften superstition's rage,
Might humble pride, and thaw the ice of age.
But how should'st thou by beauty's force be moved,
No more for loving made than to be loved?
It was the equity of righteous Heaven
That such a soul to such a form was given;
And shows the uniformity of fate,
That one so odious should be born to hate.
—When God created thee, one would believe
He said the same as to the snake of Eve:
"To human race antipathy declare,
'Twixt them and thee be everlasting war."
But oh! the sequel of the sentence dread,
And while you bruise their heel, beware your head.
Nor think thy weakness shall be thy defence,
The female scold's protection in offence.
Sure 'tis as fair to beat who cannot fight
As 'tis to libel those who cannot write;
And if thou draw'st thy pen against the law,
Others a cudgel or a rod may draw.
If none with vengeance yet thy crimes pursue,
Or give thy manifold affronts their due;
If limbs unbroken, skin without a stain,
Unwhipt, unblanketed, unknicked, unslain,
That wretched little carcase you retain,
The reason is, not that the world wants eyes,
But thou'rt so mean, they see and they despise
When fretted porcupine, with rancour will
From mounted back shoots many a harmless quill,
Cool the spectators stand, and all the while
Upon the angry little monster smile:
Thus 'tis with thee;—while, impotently safe,
You strike unwounding, we unhurt can laugh.
Who but must laugh, this bully when he sees,
A puny insect shivering at a breeze?
Or over-match'd by every blast of wind,
Insulting and provoking all mankind.

* * * * *
Like the first, bold assassin's, be thy lot,
Ne'er be thy guilt forgiven or forgot;
But as thou hat'st, be hated by mankind,
And with the emblem of thy crooked mind
Marked on thy back, like Cain, by God's own hand,
Wander like him accursed through the land.

EXPERIENCE LATE.

Wisdom, slow product of laborious years,
The only fruit that life's cold winter bears;
Thy sacred seeds in vain in youth we lay,
By the fierce storm of passion torn away.

Should some remain in a rich generous soil,
They long lie hid, and must be rais'd with toil;
Faintly they struggle with inclement skies,
No sooner born than the poor planter dies.

MONTANCLOS, MARIE EMILIE
MAYON, MADAME DE,

Was born^{*} at Aix, in 1736. Her first husband was Baron de Princeu, and her second, Charles-magne Cuvelier Grandin de Montanclos. Being left a widow a second time, she devoted herself to literature. She wrote comedies in one act, vaudevilles, and operas, and a periodical work called "The Ladies' Magazine." She died in 1812, aged seventy-six.

MONTÉGUT, JEANNE DE SEGLA,
MADAME DE,

Was born at Toulouse, in 1709. She was married, at sixteen, to M. de Montégut, treasurer-general of the district of Toulouse. This lady obtained three times the prize at the floral games of Toulouse, composed odes, letters, poems, and translated almost all the odes of Horace, in verse. She understood Latin, Italian, and English. Her works were published in Paris, in 1768.

MONTENAY, GEORGETTE DE,

Was still young when her father, her mother, and six servants in their house, died of the plague. She had the good fortune to escape, and Jeanne d'Albret, queen of Navarre, took her in her service as maid of honour. The reading the emblems of Alciat gave this young lady the idea of composing a hundred emblems on Christian or moral subjects, illustrated by verses of her own, which she dedicated to Jeanne d'Albret, and which were printed in 1574.

MONTMORENCY, CHARLOTTE MARGARET,

The wife of Condé, was famous for her beauty, which captivated Henry IV. of France. To escape the importunities of this powerful lover, her husband carried her off, on their wedding night, to Brussels, where she remained till Henry's assassination, in 1610. She died in 1650, aged fifty-seven. Her son was the great Condé.

MONTESPAN, ATHENAIS MORTIMER, MADAME DE,

Was wife of the Marquis de Montespan, and mistress of Louis XIV. Her husband resisted the intrigue with indignation, but banishment from Paris, and fear of despotic power, soon reconciled him to his disgrace, and 100,000 crowns purchased his wife and his silence. From 1669 to 1675 this woman exercised uncontrolled authority, by her wit and beauty, over the monarch and people of France; till satiety, and the love of Madame de Maintenon, alienated the king's regard. Still, however, Madame Montespan continued for some time at court, deprived of her influence, but treated with respect; and she passed her time between her devotions, and drawing up memoirs of whatever passed at court. She had by the king a son, the duke of Maine, and two daughters, one of whom married the grandson of the great Condé, and the other the duke de Chartres. The last years of her life were spent away from court, on a pension of a thousand louis a month. She died at Bourbon, 1717, at the age of sixty-six. Her reign was so intolerable and fatal, that the French regarded it as a judgment from heaven.

Madame de Genlis says concerning her, "Her character was false and her understanding genuine. Without sensibility, but an enthusiast, she was either passionate or indifferent; splendour seemed greatness to her; she had deep designs and trivial motives; at once insatiable and frivolous in her wishes, she desired to govern, not from ambition, but from love of display." The latter part of her life was spent in expiating the sins of her youth and middle age. She wore bracelets, garters, and a belt with iron points; her table was frugal, and her linen coarse. She dreaded death so much, that she always slept with lights burning, and surrounded by women, whom she urged constantly to talk, so that if she awoke in the night, she would have no time for reflection. She never would consent to relinquish the appearance and state of a queen, which she had once enjoyed.

MONTPENSIER, ANNE MARIE LOUISE
D'ORLEANS, DUCHESS DE,

DAUGHTER of Gaston, duke d'Orleans, brother to Louis XIII., was born 1627. She inherited boldness, intrigue, and impetuosity from her father; and during the civil wars of the Fronde, she not only embraced the party of the duke de Condé, but she made her adherents fire the cannon of the Bastille on the troops of Louis XIV. This rash step against the authority of her king and cousin, ruined her hopes, and after in vain aspiring to the hand of a sovereign prince, she, in 1669, married the count de Lauzun, a man much younger than herself. The king, though he had permitted the union, threw obstacles in the way of the lovers, and Lauzun was kept in prison for ten years; but after the cession of Dombes and Eu, of which the duchess de Montpensier was the sovereign, she was allowed to see her husband. But she was violent and jealous, and Lauzun ungrateful and faithless; and she at last forbade him to appear in her presence, and retired to a convent. She wrote two romances, and some devotional books. There is also a collection of letters to Madame de Motteville, written by Mademoiselle Montpensier, and her most important work, the "Memoirs," a farrago of curious anecdotes, valuable from the sincerity, good faith, and vivacity with which they are written. These "Memoirs" have been and will be sought for among the literary curiosities of the seventeenth century, though they contain much that is trifling, or rather, mere gossip. She was known by the name of Mademoiselle.

MONTPENSIER, JACQUELIN
LONGVIC, DUCHESS DE,

Was the youngest daughter of John de Longvic, lord of Guny, and was married, in 1538, to Louis de Bourbon, the second of the name, duke de Montpensier. She was a lady of great merit, and a favourite of Catharine de Medicis; and had she lived, she might have, by her counsels, prevented many of the cruel deeds of this princess; but she died in 1561. She openly avowed, in her last illness, what her husband had long suspected, that she was a Protestant; and two of her daughters professed the same faith.

Thuanus praises this lady for her talents, prudence, and masculine understanding. She was intelligent and skilful in the affairs of government, and always solicitous for the public tranquillity. It was to her that the archbishop of Vienna addressed himself, when, foreseeing the ruin of the princes of the blood, during the reign of Francis II., he told her that if she kept not her promise of opposing the house of Guise, all was lost. It was by her influence with Catharine de Medicis, that Michael de l'Hôpital was made chancellor of France. "Had this been the only meritorious action of her life," says Bayle, "it ought to have consecrated her memory. No other person could have afforded, in so dangerous a conjuncture, an equal support to the monarchy. The duchess also contributed to the preservation of the life of the prince de Condé.

MORATA, OLYMPIA FULVIA,

Was born at Ferrara, in 1526. Her father, preceptor to the young princes of Ferrara, sons of Alphonsus I., observing her genius, took great pains in cultivating it. Olympia was called to court for the purpose of studying belles-lettres with the princess of Ferrara, where she astonished the Italians by declaiming in Latin and Greek, explaining the paradoxes of Cicero, and answering any question that was put to her. Her father's death, and the ill health of her mother, withdrew her from court, and she devoted herself to household affairs, and the education of her three sisters and a brother. A young German, named Andrew Grunthler, who had studied medicine, and taken his doctor's degree at Ferrara, married her, and took her, with her little brother, to Germany.

They went to Schweinfurt, in Franconia, which was soon after besieged and burnt, and they barely escaped with their lives. The hardships they suffered in consequence, caused Morata's death in the course of a few months. She died in 1555, in the Protestant faith, which she had embraced on her coming to Germany. Several of her works were burnt at Schweinfurt, but the remainder were collected and published at Basil, 1558, by Cœlius Secundus Curio. They consist of orations, dialogues, letters, and translations.

MORELLA, JULIANA,

A NATIVE of Barcelona, was born in 1595. Her father being obliged to leave Spain for a homicide, fled to Lyons, where he taught his daughter so well, that at the age of twelve, she publicly maintained theses in philosophy. In her tenth year, she is said to have held a public disputation in the Jesuits' College at Lyons. She was profoundly skilled in philosophy, divinity, music, jurisprudence, and philology. She entered into the convent of St. Praxedia, at Avignon.

MORE, HANNAH,

DISTINGUISHED for her talents, and the noble manner in which she exerted them, was the fourth daughter of Mr. Jacob More; she was born February 2d, 1745, at Stapleton, Gloucestershire. Mr. More was a schoolmaster, and gave his daughters the rudiments of a classical education; but he was a narrow-minded man, and so fearful they would become learned women, that he tried by precepts to counteract the effect of his lessons. The elder daughters opened, at Bristol, a boarding-school for girls, which was for a long time very flourishing, and at this school Hannah obtained the best advantages of education she ever enjoyed. How small these were compared with the opportunities of young men! And yet what man of her nation and time was so influential for good, or has left such a rich legacy of moral lessons for the improvement of the world as Hannah More has done? Her influence has been wonderful in this our new world, as well as in her own country; our mothers were aided by her in teaching us in our infancy. "We have felt the effect of her writings ever since we began to reason; in the nursery, in the school-room, and even in college halls," says an enthusiastic American* writer. "Her looks, her cottage, her air and manner, were all enquired after by every youth who read her works; and for ourselves, we can recollect, that a favourite, pious, kind, and affectionate maiden friend of our childhood, was in the exuberance of our admiration and gratitude, compared in some infant attempts at verse, to Hannah More; we could go no higher."

In 1761 Hannah More wrote a pastoral drama, "The Search after Happiness." She was then sixteen; and though this production was not published till many years afterwards, yet she may be said to have then commenced her literary career, which till 1824, when her last work, "Spirit of Prayer," was issued, was steadily pursued for sixty-three years. The next important event of her life is thus related by Mrs. Elwood:

"When about twenty-two years of age, she received and accepted an offer of marriage from a Mr. Turner, a gentleman of large fortune, but considerably her senior. Their acquaintance had commenced in consequence of some young relations of Mr. Turner's being at the Misses More's school, who generally spent their holidays at their cousin's beautiful residence at Belmont, near Bristol, whither they were permitted to invite some of their young friends; and Hannah and Patty More, being near their own age, were generally among those invited. The affair was so far advanced that the wedding-day was actually fixed, and Hannah, having given up her share in her sister's establishment, had gone to considerable expense in making her preparations,—when Mr. Turner, who appears to have been of eccentric temper, was induced to postpone the completion of his engagement; and as this was done more than once, her friends at length interfered, and prevailed on her to relinquish the marriage altogether, though this was against the wishes of the capricious gentleman.

To make some amends for his thus trifling with her affections, Mr. Turner insisted upon being allowed to settle an annuity upon her, which she at first rejected, but subsequently, through the medium of her friend, Dr. Stonehouse, who consented to be the agent and trustee, she was at length prevailed on to allow a sum to be settled upon her, which should enable her hereafter to devote herself to the pursuits of literature.

She had soon after another opportunity of marrying, which was declined, and from this time she seems to have formed the resolution, to which she ever afterwards adhered, of remaining single."

In 1774 she became acquainted with the great tragedian, David Garrick; he and his wife soon formed a warm attachment for the young authoress, invited her to their house in London, and introduced her to the literary and fashionable world. She was there presented to Sir Joshua Reynolds, Edmund Burke, and Dr. Johnson; how highly she prized the privilege of such acquaintances may be gathered from her letters. She constantly wrote to her sisters at Bristol, describing in a style of easy elegance whatever interested her in London.

Speaking of letter-writing, she used to say, "When I want wisdom, sentiment, or information, I can find them much better in books. What I want in a letter is the picture of my friend's mind, and the common-sense of his life. I want to know what he is saying and doing." She added, "that letters among near relations were family newspapers, meant to convey paragraphs of intelligence, and advertisements of projects, and not sentimental essays."

Her first acquaintance with that much-abused class, the publishers, is thus narrated by Mrs. Elwood:

"Hannah More again visited London, in 1775, and in the course of this year the eulogiums and attentions she had received induced her, as she observed to her sisters, to try her real value, by writing a small poem and offering it to Cadell. The legendary tale of 'Sir Eldred of the Bower' was, accordingly, composed in a fortnight's time, to which she added 'The Bleeding Rock,' which had been written some years previously. Cadell offered her a handsome sum for these poems, telling her if he could discover what Goldsmith received for the 'Deserted Village,' he would make up the deficiency, whatever it might be.

Thus commenced Hannah More's acquaintance with Mr. Cadell, who was, by a singular coincidence, a native of the same village with herself; and her connexion with his establishment was carried on for forty years."

In 1782 Hannah More's "Sacred Dramas" were published, with a poem, entitled "Sensibility." As we prefer to present the opinions of acknowledged critics in literature, respecting the works of the celebrated female writers, rather than our own, whenever we think the former give a correct and impartial estimate of character and talents, we will here insert an extract from the notice of Hannah More in a late and excellent publication:*

"All her works were successful, and Johnson said he thought her the best of female versifiers. The poetry of Hannah More is now forgotten, but 'Percy' is a good play, and it is clear that the authoress might have excelled as a dramatic writer, had she devoted herself to that difficult species of composition. In 1786 she published another volume of verse, 'Florio, a Tale for Fine Gentlemen and Fine Ladies,' and 'The Bas Bleu, or Conversation.' The latter (which Johnson complimented as a great performance) was an elaborate eulogy on the Bas Bleu Club,* a literary assembly that met at Mrs. Montagu's."

The following couplets have been quoted as terse and pointed:

"In men this blunder still you find,
All think their little set mankind."

"Small habits well pursued betimes,
May reach the dignity of crimes."

Such lines mark the good sense and keen observation of the writer, and these qualities Hannah now resolved to devote exclusively to high objects. The gay life of the fashionable world had lost its charms, and having published her 'Bas Bleu,' she retired to a small cottage and garden near Bristol, where her sisters kept a flourishing boarding-school. Her first prose publication was 'Thoughts on the Importance of the Manners of the Great to General Society,' produced in 1788. This was followed, in 1791, by an 'Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World.' As a means of counteracting the political tracts and exertions of the Jacobins and levellers, Hannah More, in 1794, wrote a number of tales, published monthly, under the title of 'The Cheap Repository,' which attained to a sale of about a million each number. Some of the little stories (as the 'Shepherd of Salisbury Plain') are well told, and contain striking moral and religious lessons. With the same object, our authoress published a volume called 'Village Politics.' Her other principal works are—'Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education,' 1799; 'Hints towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess,' 1805; 'Cœlebs in Search of a Wife, comprehending Observations on Domestic Habits and Manners, Religion and Morals,' two volumes, 1809; 'Practical Piety, or the Influence of the Religion of the Heart on the Conduct of Life,' two volumes, 1811; 'Christian Morals,' two volumes, 1812; 'Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul,' two volumes, 1815; and 'Moral Sketches of Prevailing Opinions and Manners, Foreign and Domestic, with Reflections on Prayer,' 1819. The collection of her works is comprised in eleven volumes octavo. The work entitled 'Hints towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess,' was written with a view to the education of the princess Charlotte, on which subject the advice and assistance of Hannah More had been requested by queen Charlotte. Of 'Cœlebs,' we are told that ten editions were sold in one year—a remarkable proof of the popularity of the work. The tale is admirably written, with a fine vein of delicate irony and sarcasm, and some of the characters are well depicted, but, from the nature of the story, it presents few incidents or embellishments to attract ordinary novel-readers. It has not inaptly been styled 'a dramatic sermon.' Of the other publications of the authoress, we may say, with one of her critics, 'it would be idle in us to dwell on works so well known as the "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great," the "Essay on the Religion of the Fashionable World," and so on, which finally established Miss More's name as a great moral writer, possessing a masterly command over the resources of our language, and devoting a keen wit and lively fancy to the best and noblest of purposes.' In her latter days there was perhaps a tincture of unnecessary gloom or severity in her religious views; yet, when we recollect her unfeigned sincerity and practical benevolence—her exertions to instruct the poor miners and cottagers—and the untiring zeal with which she laboured, even amidst severe bodily infirmities, to inculcate sound principles and intellectual cultivation, from the palace to the cottage, it is impossible not to rank her among the best benefactors of mankind.

The great success of the different works of our authoress enabled her to live in ease, and to dispense charities around her. Her sisters also secured a competency, and they all lived together at Barley Grove, a property of some extent, which they purchased and improved. 'From the day that the school was given up, the existence of the whole sisterhood appears to have flowed on in one uniform current of peace and contentment, diversified only by new appearances of Hannah as an authoress, and the ups and downs which she and the others met with in the prosecution of a most brave and humane experiment—namely, their zealous effort to extend the blessings of education and religion among the inhabitants of certain villages situated in a wild country some eight or ten miles from their abode, who, from a concurrence of unhappy local and temporary circumstances, had been left in a state of ignorance hardly conceivable at the present day.' These exertions were ultimately so successful, that the sisterhood had the gratification of witnessing a yearly festival celebrated on the hills of Cheddar, where above a thousand children, with the members of female clubs of industry (also established by them), after attending church service, were regaled at the expense of their benefactors.

Hannah More died on the 7th of September, 1833, aged eighty-eight. She had made about £30,000 by her writings, and she left, by her will, legacies to charitable and religious institutions amounting to £10,000."

In 1834, "Memoirs of the Life and Correspondence of Mrs. Hannah More," by William Roberts, Esq., were published in four volumes. In these we have a full account by Hannah herself of her London life, and many interesting anecdotes."

From this memoir we select the estimate of Hannah More's moral character:

"Her love of her country, and her love of her species, were without any alloy of party feelings or prejudices. To her sound and correct understanding, liberty presented itself as including among its essential constituents loyalty, allegiance, security, and duty. Patriotism, in this view of it, should be placed in the front of her character, since it really took the lead of every other temporal object. All the powers of her mind were devoted to the solid improvement of society. Her aims were all practical; and it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to name a writer who has laid before the public so copious a variety of original thoughts and reasonings, without any admixture of speculation or hypothesis. To keep within this tangible barrier, without contracting the range of her imagination, or denying to truth any advantage to which it is fairly entitled, of illustration or entertainment, is a secret in the art of composition with which few, if any, have been so well acquainted. Her indefatigable pen was ever at work; kept in motion by a principle of incessant activity, never to stop but with her pulse; never to need the refreshment of change; and never to be weary in well-doing. Thus to do good and to distribute was no less the work of her head than of her hand, and the rich and the great were among the objects of her charity. The specific relief of which they stood in need she was ever forward to supply; and as she had passed so many of her earliest years among them, she knew well their wants, and how to administer to them. She was a woman of business in all the concerns of humanity, refined or common, special or general, and had a sort of righteous cunning in dealing with different cases; exposing without irritating, reproving without discouraging, probing without wounding; always placing duty upon its right motives, and showing the perversity of error by bringing it into close comparison with the loveliest forms of truth and godliness."

As the writings of this excellent woman are widely known, and probably more read in America than England, we shall give few extracts from her prose works; but there was one event of her life which should never be forgotten; we allude to the persecution she met with when she attempted to instruct the poor. The brutal ignorance and degradation which then, fifty years ago, (is it much changed now?) characterized the peasantry of England were shocking; but even these do not appear so utterly inhuman as the conduct of the rich farmers, and particularly that of the clergymen, in opposing all reforms. Miss More says, in a letter, writing of one of her schools, "It is a parish, the largest in our county or diocese, in a state of great depravity and ignorance. The opposition I have met with in endeavouring to establish an institution for the religious instruction of these people would excite your astonishment. The principal adversary is a farmer of £1000 a-year, who says, the lower class are fated to be wicked and ignorant, and that as wise as I am I cannot alter what is decreed."

She surmounted this opposition; but then began the persecutions instituted against her by the clergy. These were so vindictive that Miss More appealed to the bishop of Bath and Wells, in whose diocese she was labouring in this mission of charity. We insert a portion of her letter, which, for its masterly exposition of the subject, and firm, yet gentle tone of remonstrance against injustice to the poor, as well as to herself, deserves to be studied. We are compelled to omit the greater part.

"When I settled in this country thirteen years ago, I found the poor in many of the villages sunk in a deplorable state of ignorance and vice. There were, I think, no Sunday-schools in the whole district, except one in my own parish, which had been established by our respectable rector, and another in the adjoining parish of Churchhill. This drew me to the more neglected villages, which, being distant, made it very laborious. Not one school here did I ever attempt to establish without the hearty concurrence of the clergyman of the parish. My plan of instruction is extremely simple and limited. They learn, on week days, such coarse works as may fit them for servants. I allow of no writing for the poor. My object is not to make fanatics, but to train up the lower classes in habits of industry and piety. I knew no way of teaching morals but by teaching principles; nor of inculcating Christian principles without a good knowledge of Scripture. My own I have laboured this point diligently. My sisters and I always teach them ourselves every Sunday, except during our absence in winter. By being out about thirteen hours, we have generally contrived to visit two schools the same day, and carry them to their respective churches. When we had more schools, we commonly visited them on a Sunday. The only books we use in teaching are two little tracts called 'Questions for the Mendip Schools' (to be had of Hatchard). 'The Church Catechism' (these are framed, and half a dozen hung up in the room). The Catechism, broken into short questions, spelling-books, psalter, common prayer, testament, bible. The little ones repeat 'Watts's Hymns.' The Collect is learned every Sunday. They generally learn the Sermon on the Mount, with many other chapters and psalms. Finding that what the children learned at school they commonly lost at home by the profaneness and ignorance of their parents, it occurred to me in some of the larger parishes to invite the latter to come at six on the Sunday evening, for an hour, to the school, together with the elder scholars. A plain printed sermon and a printed prayer is read to them, and a psalm is sung. I am not bribed by my taste, for, unluckily, I do not delight in music, but observing that singing is a help to devotion in others, I thought it right to allow the practice.

"For many years I have given away, annually, nearly two hundred bibles, common prayer books, and testaments. To teach the poor to read without providing them with safe books, has always appeared to me an improper measure, and this consideration induced me to enter upon the laborious undertaking of the Cheap Repository Tracts.

"In some parishes, where the poor are numerous, such as Cheddar and the distressed mining villages of Shipham and Rowbarrow, I have instituted, with considerable expense to myself, friendly benefit societies for poor women, which have proved a great relief to the sick and lying-in, especially in the late seasons of scarcity. We have in one parish only, a saving of between two and three hundred pounds (the others in proportion); this I have placed out in the funds. The late Lady of the Manor at Cheddar, in addition to her kindness to my institutions there during her life, left, at her death, a legacy for the club, and another for the school, as a testimony to her opinion of the utility of both. We have two little annual festivities for the children and poor women of these clubs, which are always attended by a large concourse of gentry and clergy.

"At one of these public meetings, Mr. Bere declared, that since the institution of the schools he could now dine in peace; for that where he used to issue ten warrants, he was not now called on for two.

* * * * *

"My schools were always honoured with the full sanction of the late bishop; of which I have even recent testimonials. It does not appear that any one person who has written against them, except Mr. Bere, ever saw them.

* * * * *

"I need not inform your lordship why the illiterate, when they become religious, are more liable to enthusiasm than the better informed. They have also a coarse way of expressing their religious sentiments, which often appears to be enthusiasm, when it is only vulgarity or quaintness. But I am persuaded your lordship will allow that this does not furnish a reason why the poor should be left destitute of religious instruction. That the knowledge of the bible should lay men more open to the delusions of fanaticism on the one hand, or of jacobinism on the other, appears so unlikely, that I should have thought the probability lay all on the other side.

"I do not vindicate enthusiasm; I dread it. But can the possibility that a few should become enthusiasts be justly pleaded as an argument for giving them all up to actual vice and barbarism?

"In one of the principal pamphlets against me, it is asserted that my writings ought to be burned by the hands of the common hangman. In most of them it is affirmed that my principles and actions are corrupt and mischievous in no common degree. If the grosser crimes alleged against me be true, I am not only unfit to be allowed to teach poor children to read, but I am unfit to be tolerated in any class of society. If, on the contrary, the heavier charges should prove not to be true, may it not furnish a presumption that the less are equally unfounded? There is scarcely any motive so pernicious, nor any hypocrisy so deep, to which my plans have not been attributed; yet I have neither improved my interest nor my fortune by them. I am not of a sex to expect preferment, nor of a temper to court favour; nor was I so ignorant of mankind as to look for praise by a means so little calculated to obtain it; though, perhaps, I did not reckon on such a degree of obloquy. If vanity were my motive, it has been properly punished. If hypocrisy, I am hastening fast to answer for it at a tribunal, compared with which all human opinion weighs very light indeed; in view of which the sacrifice which I have been called to make of health, peace, and reputation, shrinks into nothing.

"And now, my lord, I come to what has been the ultimate object of this too tedious letter — a request to know what is your lordship's pleasure? I have too high an opinion of your wisdom and candour to suspect the equity of your determination. I know too well what I owe to the station you fill, to dispute your authority or to oppose your commands. If it be your will that my remaining schools should be abolished, I may lament your decision, but I will obey it. My deep reverence for the laws and institutions of my country inspires me with a proportionate veneration for all constituted authorities, whether in church or state. If I be not permitted to employ the short remnant of my life (which has been nearly destroyed by these prolonged attacks) in being, in any small measure and degree, actively useful, I will at least set my accusers an example of obedience to those superiors whom the providence of God has set over me, and whom, next to Him, I am bound to obey.*

EXTRACTS FROM "HINTS FOR FORMING THE CHARACTER OF A YOUNG PRINCESS."

One of the first lessons that should be inculcated on the great, is, that God has not sent us into this world to give us consummate happiness, but to train us to those habits which lead to it. High rank lays the mind open to strong temptations; the highest rank to the strongest. The seducing images of luxury and pleasure, of splendour and of homage, of power and independence, are only to be counteracted by a religious education. The world is too generally entered upon as a scene of pleasure instead of trial. The high-born are taught to enjoy the world at an age when they should be learning to know it; and to grasp the prize when they should be exercising themselves for the combat. They look for the sweets of victory when they should be enduring the hardness of the conflict. The exalted station of the young princess, by separating her from miscellaneous society, becomes her protection from many of its maxims and practices. From the dangers of her own peculiar situation she should be guarded, by being early taught to consider power and influence, not as exempting her from the difficulties of life, or ensuring to her a larger portion of its pleasures, but as engaging her in a peculiarly extended sphere of duties, and infinitely increasing the demands on her fortitude and vigilance.

FROM "FLORIO."

Exhausted Florio, at the age
When youth should rush on glory's stage,
When life should open fresh and new,
And ardent hope her schemes pursue:
Of youthful gayety bereft,
Had scarce an unbroach'd pleasure left;
He found already to his cost
The shining gloss of life was lost,
And pleasure was so coy a prude,
She fled the more, the more pursued;
Or if o'ertaken and caress'd,
He loath'd and left her when possess'd.
But Florio knew the world; that science
Sets sense and learning at defiance;

* Notwithstanding this Christian appeal, Hannah More as compelled to give up her schools.

He thought the world to him was known,
Whereas he only knew the town.
In men this blunder still you find,
All think their little set — mankind.
Though high renown the youth had gain'd,
No flagrant crimes his life had stain'd;
Though known among a certain set,
He did not like to be in debt;
He shudder'd at the dicer's box,
Nor thought it very heterodox
That tradesmen should be sometimes paid,
And bargains kept as well as made.
His growing credit, as a sinner,
Was that he liked to spoil a dinner;
Made pleasure and made business wait,
And still by system came too late;
Yet 'twas a hopeful indication
On which to found a reputation:
Small habits, well pursued, betimes
May reach the dignity of crimes;
And who a juster claim prefer'd
Than one who always broke his word?

FROM "SENSIBILITY."

* * * * *
Sweet Sensibility! thou keen delight!
Unprompted moral! sudden sense of right!
Perception exquisite! fair Virtue's seed!
Thou quick precursor of the liberal deed!
Thou hasty conscience! reason's blushing morn!
Instinctive kindness ere reflection's born!
Prompt sense of equity! to thee belongs
The swift redress of unexamined wrongs!
Eager to serve, the cause perhaps untried,
But always apt to choose the suffering side!
To those who know thee not, no words can paint,
And those who know thee know all words are vain

She does not feel thy power who boasts thy flame,
And rounds her every period with thy name;
Nor she who vents her disproportioned sighs
With pining Lesbia when her sparrow dies;
Nor she who melts when hapless Shore expires,
While real misery unrelieved retires!
Who thinks feigned sorrows all her tears deserve,
And weeps o'er Werter while her children starve.

As words are but the external marks to tell
The fair ideas in the mind that dwell,
And only are of things the outward sign,
And not the things themselves they but define,
So exclamations, tender tones, fond tears,
And all the graceful drapery Feeling wears,
These are her garb, not her, they but express
Her form, her semblance, her appropriate dress;
And these fair marks, reluctant I relate,
These lovely symbols may be counterfeit.

* * * * *
O Love divine! sole source of charity!
More dear one genuine deed performed for thee,
Than all the periods Feeling e'er could turn,
Than all thy touching page, perverted Sterne!
Not that by deeds alone this love's expressed —
If so, the affluent only were the blessed;
One silent wish, one prayer, one soothing word,
The page of mercy shall, well-pleased, record;
One soul-felt sigh by powerless pity given,
Accepted incense! shall ascend to heaven!

Since trifles make the sum of human things,
And half our misery from our foibles springs;
Since life's best joys consist in peace and ease,
And though but few can serve, yet all may please;
O let the ungentle spirit learn from hence,
A small unkindness is a great offence.
To spread large bounties though we wish in vain,
Yet all may shun the guilt of giving pain:
To bless mankind with tides of flowing wealth.
With rank to grace them, or to crown with health,
Our little lot denies; yet liberal still.
Heaven gives its counterpoise to every ill.

Nor let us murmur at our stinted powers,
 When kindness, love, and concord may be ours.
 The gift of minist'ring to other's ease,
 To all her sons impartial she decrees;
 The gentle offices of patient love,
 Beyond all flattery, and all price above;
 The mild forbearance at a brother's fault,
 The angry word suppressed, the taunting thought
 Subduing and subdued, the petty strife
 Which clouds the colour of domestic life;
 The sober comfort, all the peace which springs
 From the large aggregate of little things;
 On these small cares of daughter, wife, or friend,
 The utmost sacred joys of HOME depend:
 There, Sensibility, thou best may'st reign,
 HOME is thy true, legitimate domain.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

—A TENDER mother lives
 In many lives; through many a nerve she feels;
 From child to child the quick affections spread,
 For ever wandering, yet for ever fixed.
 Nor does division weaken, nor the force
 Of constant operation e'er exhaust
 Parental love. All other passions change
 With changing circumstance; rise or fall,
 Dependent on their object; claim returns;
 Live on reciprocation, and expire
 Unfed by hope. A mother's fondness reigns
 Without a rival, and without an end.

A GOOD CONSCIENCE.

The ostentatious virtues which still press
 For notice and for praise; the brilliant deeds
 Which live but in the eye of observation,
 These have their meed at once. But there's a joy,
 To the fond votaries of Fame unknown—
 To hear the still small voice of Conscience speak
 Its whispered plaudit to the silent soul!

FAVOUR IS FLEETING.

—Dost thou not know
 That of all fickle Fortune's transient gifts,
Favour is most deceitful? 'T is a beam,
 Which darts uncertain brightness for a moment!
 The faint, precarious, fickle shine of power,
 Given without merit, by caprice withdrawn.
 No trifle is so small as what obtains,
 Save that which loses favour; 't is a breath,
 Which hangs upon a smile! A look, a word,
 A frown, the air-built tower of Fortune shakes,
 And down the unsubstantial fabric falls!

FAITH.

O Faith! thou wonder-working principle—
 Eternal substance of our present hope,
 Thou evidence of things invisible!
 What cannot man sustain, by thee sustained!

WISDOM.

Wisdom, whose fruits are purity and peace!
 Wisdom! that bright intelligence, which sat
 Supreme, when with his golden compasses
 Th' Eternal planned the fabric of the world,
 Produced his fair idea into light,
 And said that all was good! Wisdom, best beam!
 The brightness of the everlasting light!
 The spotless mirror of the power of God!
 The reflex image of the all-perfect Mind!
 A stream translucent, flowing from the source
 Of glory infinite—a cloudless light!—
 Defilement cannot touch, nor sin pollute
 Her unstained purity. Not Ophir's gold,
 Nor Ethiopia's gems can match her price!
 The ruby of the mine is pale before her;
 And like the oil Elisha's bounty blessed,
 She is a treasure which doth grow by use,

And multiply by spending. She contains,
 Within herself, the sum of excellence.

If riches are desired, wisdom is wealth;
 If prudence, where shall keen Invention find
 Artificer more cunning? If renown,
 In her right hand it comes! If piety,
 Are not her labours virtues? If the lore
 Which sage Experience teaches, lo! she scans
 Antiquity's dark truths; the past she knows,
 Anticipates the future; not by arts
 Forbidden, of Chaldean sorcery,
 But from the piercing ken of deep Foreknowledge,
 From her sure science of the human heart,
 She weighs effects with causes, ends with means,
 Resolving all into the sovereign will.

TRUST IN GOD.

Know, God is everywhere:—
 Through all the vast infinitude of space,
 At his command the furious tempests rise—
 He tells the world of waters where to soar;
 And at his bidding winds and waves are calm.
 In Him, not in an arm of flesh, I trust;
 In Him, whose promise never yet has failed,
 I place my confidence.

MOTHER ANNA, or ANN OF SAXONY,

Was the daughter of Christian III., king of Denmark. She was born in the year 1531, and as the only daughter of her mother, Dorothea, became the idol of her heart. But the queen, convinced that the best interest of her child must be promoted by a course of education, which was calculated to make her not only fit to be called a princess, but also a housewife and a Christian, confided her religious training to the worthy chaplain, and caused her to be instructed in all domestic duties, even such as are now called menial in some circles of society.

In 1548 she married the elector August of Saxony, and became the mother of fifteen children, eleven of whom she buried before they had attained a mature age. Soon after her marriage, she devoted herself with all her energy to the mental and moral improvement of her subjects. On all occasions she set them an example of Christian faith, resignation, and patience, often sacrificing her own pleasures and comforts to the welfare and happiness of the people; and so fully were they aware of it, that they called her only the mother of the country.

But while she, unitedly with her husband, endeavoured to raise the standard of education, by multiplying schools, and that of morals, by increasing the number of the churches, she neglected not the principal condition of the people. Waste lands were cultivated by her directions, and on one occasion she headed the pioneers, with a spade in her hand, in order to encourage them in a task which was new, and apparently unpromising to them.

She devoted much of her time to the study of chemistry, natural philosophy, and botany; and endeavoured, on all occasions, to make her knowledge contribute to the happiness of her people, and the improvement of their lands. She aided her husband in welcoming and supporting the Dutch exiled cloth and cotton weavers, who had been driven from their homes by religious persecution; and they, in their turn, contributed to perfect her own manufacturers.

She accompanied her husband upon his travels, and then they were always provided with the best seed for raising fruit, which they distributed among the people. She induced her husband to pass a law, that every new-married couple must plant and graft two fruit trees during the first year of their marriage. Everywhere she established schools, apothecaries, and botanical gardens. She was also an exemplary housewife, who did not consider it beneath her to attend to the smallest matters in housekeeping. As a specimen, an anecdote is related which illustrates the feelings with which servants too often regard a mistress who "looks well to the ways of her household." The elector August arrived, one hot summer's day, at a seat where he knew his wife to be. Thirsty and weary, he asked one of the girls, who knew him not, to give him a cup of milk. The girl gave him a cup of skimmed milk, and when he complained of the inferior quality of the article, she replied, "Our old curmudgeon compels us to save the best article for herself, and so you must be satisfied." August related this to his wife, who, after she had sent for the girl, reproved her for thus speaking to a stranger: but the girl replied, "Had I known that the fellow would be such a scamp as to tell on me, after I gave him my milk, I would have held my tongue." August, who stood behind a screen, stepped forward and said laughingly,

"Then let us bear, without a grudge,
Both, the scamp and the curmudge."

She fell a victim to her benevolence and Christian duties, during the prevalence of the plague, and died on the 1st of October, 1585. The lower classes of Saxony still speak of her only by the name of Mother Anna.

MOTTE, REBECCA,

DAUGHTER of Robert Brewton, an English gentleman, who had emigrated to South Carolina, was born in 1738, in Charleston. When about twenty, she married Mr. Jacob Motte, who died soon after the commencement of the revolutionary war. Captain McPherson, of the British army, who was in command of the garrison at Fort Motte, had taken possession of the large new house of Mrs. Motte, and fortified it, so that it was almost impregnable. Mrs. Motte herself had been obliged to remove to an old farm-house in the vicinity. In order to dislodge the garrison before succours could arrive, generals Marion and Lee, who were commanding the American forces there, could devise no means but burning the mansion. This they were very reluctant to do, but Mrs. Motte willingly assented to the proposal, and presented, herself, a bow and its apparatus, which had been imported from India, and was prepared to carry combustible matter. We will conclude this scene from the eloquent description of Mrs. Ellet, to whose admirable work* we are indebted for the portrait of Mrs. Motte, and the materials for this sketch.

"Everything was now prepared for the concluding scene. The lines were manned, and an additional force stationed at the battery, to meet a desperate assault, if such should be made. The American entrenchments being within arrow-shot, McPherson was once more summoned, and again more confidently—for help was at hand—asserted his determination to resist to the last.

The scorching rays of the noon-day sun had prepared the shingle roof for the conflagration. The return of the flag was immediately followed by the shooting of the arrows, to which balls of blazing rosin and brimstone were attached. Simms tells us the bow was put into the hands of Nathan Savage, a private in Marion's brigade. The first struck, and set fire; also the second and third, in different quarters of the roof. McPherson immediately ordered men to repair to the loft of the house, and check the flames by knocking off the shingles; but they were soon driven down by the fire of the six-pounder; and no other effort to stop the burning being practicable, the commandant hung out the white flag, and surrendered the garrison at discretion.

* "Women of the American Revolution."

If ever a situation in real life afforded a fit subject for poetry, by filling the mind with a sense of moral grandeur, it was that of Mrs. Motte contemplating the spectacle of her home in flames, and rejoicing in the triumph secured to her countrymen—the benefit to her native land, by her surrender of her own interest to the public service. I have stood upon the spot, and felt that it was indeed classic ground, and consecrated by memories which should thrill the heart of every American. But the beauty of such memories would be marred by the least attempt at ornament; and the simple narrative of that memorable occurrence has more effect to stir the feelings than could a tale artistically framed and glowing with the richest hues of imagination.

After the captors had taken possession, McPherson and his officers accompanied them to Mrs. Motte's dwelling, where they sat down together to a sumptuous dinner. Again, in the softened picture, our heroine is the principal figure. She showed herself prepared, not only to give up her splendid mansion to ensure victory to the American arms, but to do her part towards soothing the agitation of the conflict just ended. Her dignified, courteous, and affable deportment adorned the hospitality of her table; she did the honours with that unaffected politeness which wins esteem as well as admiration; and by her conversation, marked with ease, vivacity and good sense, and the engaging kindness of her manners, endeavoured to obliterate the recollection of the loss she had been called upon to sustain, and at the same time to remove from the minds of the prisoners the sense of their misfortunes."

Another portion of her history is important, as illustrating her high sense of honour, her energy, and patient, self-denying perseverance. Her husband, in consequence of the difficulties and distresses growing out of our war for independence, became embarrassed in his business; and after his death, and termination of the war, it was found impossible to satisfy these claims.

"The widow, however, considered the honour of her deceased husband involved in the responsibilities he had assumed. She determined to devote the remainder of her life to the honourable task of paying the debts. Her friends and connexions, whose acquaintance with her affairs gave weight to their judgment, warned her of the apparent hopelessness of such an effort. But, steadfast in the principles that governed all her conduct, she persevered. Living in an humble dwelling, and relinquishing many of her habitual comforts, she devoted herself with such zeal, untiring industry, and indomitable resolution, to the attainment of her object, that her success triumphed over every difficulty, and exceeded the expectations of all who had discouraged her. She not only paid her husband's debts to the full, but secured for her children and descendants a handsome and unencumbered estate. Such an example of perseverance under adverse circumstances, for the accomplishment of a high and noble purpose, exhibits in yet brighter colours the heroism that shone in her country's days of peril!"

Mrs. Motte died in 1815, at her plantation on the Santee.

MOTTEVILLE, FRANCES BERTRAND DE,

WAS born in Normandy, in 1615. Her wit and agreeable manners recommended her to Anne of Austria, regent of France, who kept her constantly near her. The jealousy of cardinal Richelieu, however, caused her disgrace, and she retired, with her mother, to Normandy, where she married Nicolas Langlois, lord de Motteville, an old man, who died two years after. On the death of Richelieu, Anne of Austria recalled her to court. Here she employed herself in writing memoirs of Anne of Austria, giving an apparently correct account of the minority of Louis XIV., and the interior of a court. She died at Paris, in 1689, aged seventy five.

MURATORI, TERESA,

WAS born at Bologna, in 1662. She early evinced a taste for the fine arts, particularly music and drawing. She was the daughter of a physician, and successively the scholar of Emilio Taruffi, Lorenzo Pasinelli, and Giovanni Guiseppe dal Sole. She composed many works for the churches at Bologna, the most admirable of which are, A Dead Child restored to life, The Disbelief of St. Thomas, and the Annunciation. She died in 1708.

MUSSASA,

A WARLIKE princess, who succeeded her father Dongy, as sovereign of Congo. She dressed herself as a man, and often led her soldiers to battle and victory, and extended the bounds of her empire. She flourished in the seventeenth century.

N.

NEALE, ELIZABETH,

AN artist mentioned only in De Bie's Golden Cabinet, published in 1662. He speaks of her as painting so well as almost to rival the famous Zeghers; but he does not mention any of her works, nor whether she painted in oil or water colours.

NECKER, SUZANNE,

WAS descended, on the maternal side, from an ancient family in Provence, who had taken refuge in Switzerland on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. She was born at Grassy, her father, M. Curchod, being the evangelical minister in that little village. He was a very learned man, and trained his daughter with great care, even giving her the severe and classical education usually bestowed only on men. The young Suzanne Curchod was renowned throughout the whole province for her wit, beauty, and intellectual attainments.

Gibbon, the future historian, but then an unknown youth studying in Lausanne, met Made moiselle Curchod, fell in love with her, and succeeded in rendering his attachment acceptable to both the object of his affections and her parents. When he returned, however, to England, his father indignantly refused to hear of the proposed marriage between him and the Swiss minister's portionless daughter. Gibbon yielded to parental authority, and philosophically forgot his learned mistress. After her father's death, which left her wholly unprovided for, Suzanne Curchod retired with her mother to Geneva. She there earned a precarious subsistence by teaching persons of her own sex. When her mother died, a lady named Madame de Vermenoux induced Mademoiselle Curchod to come to Paris, in order to teach Latin to her son. It was in this lady's house that she met Necker. He was then in the employment of Thélusson, the banker, and occasionally visited Madame de Vermenoux. Struck with the noble character and grave beauty of the young governess, Necker cultivated her acquaintance, and ultimately made her his wife. Mutual poverty had delayed their marriage for several years; but it was not long ere Necker rose from his obscurity. Madame Necker had an ardent love of honourable distinction, which she imparted to her husband, and which greatly served to quicken his efforts; his high talents in financial matters were at length recognised: he became a wealthy and respected man. Shortly after her marriage, Madame Necker expressed the desire of devoting herself to literature. Her husband, however, delicately hinted to her that he should regret seeing her adopt such a course. This sufficed to induce her to relinquish her intention: she loved him so entirely, that, without effort or repining, she could make his least wish her law.

As Necker rose in the world, Madame Necker's influence increased; but it never was an individual power, like that of Madame du Deffand, or of the Maréchale de Luxembourg. Over her husband, she always possessed great influence. Her virtues and noble character had inspired him with a feeling akin to veneration. He was not wholly guided by her counsels, but he respected her opinions as those of a high-minded being, whom all the surrounding folly and corruption could not draw down from her sphere of holy purity. If Madame Necker was loved and esteemed by her husband, she may be said to have almost idolized him; and her passionate attachment probably increased the feelings of vanity and self-importance of which Necker has often been accused. This exclusive devotedness caused some wonder amongst the friends of the minister and his wife; for seldom had these sceptical philosophers witnessed a conjugal union so strict and uncompromising, and yet so touching in its very severity.

When Necker became, in 1776, Director-General of the Finances, his wife resolved that the influence her husband's official position gave her should not be employed in procuring unmerited favours for flatterers or parasites. She placed before herself the far more noble object of alleviating misfortune, and pointing out to her reforming husband some of the innumerable abuses which then existed in every department of the state. One of her first attempts was to overthrow the lottery. She pressed the point on Necker's attention; but, though he shared her convictions, he had not the power of destroying this great evil: he did, however, all he could to moderate its excesses. The prisons and hospitals of Paris greatly occupied the attention of Madame Necker during the five years of her husband's power. Her devotedness to the cause of humanity was admirable, and shone with double lustre amidst the heartless selfishness of the surrounding world. She once happened to learn that a certain Count of Lautrec had been imprisoned in a dungeon of the fortress of Ham for twenty-eight years! and that the unhappy captive now scarcely seemed to belong to human kind. A feeling of deep compassion seized her heart. To liberate a state prisoner was more than her influence could command, but she resolved to lighten, if possible, his load of misery. She set out for Ham, and succeeded in obtaining a sight of M. de Lautrec. She found a miserable-looking man, lying listlessly on the straw of his dungeon, scarcely clothed with a few tattered rags, and surrounded by rats and reptiles. Madame Necker soothed his fixed and sullen despair with promises of speedy relief; nor did she depart until she had kept her word, and seen M. de Lautrec removed to an abode where, if still a prisoner, he might at least spend in peace the few days left him by the tyranny of his oppressors.

Acts of individual benevolence were not, however, the only object of the minister's wife. Notwithstanding the munificence of her private charities, she aimed none the less to effect general good. Considerable ameliorations were introduced by her in the condition of the hospitals of Paris. She entered, with unwearied patience, into the most minute details of their actual administration, and, with admirable ingenuity, rectified errors or suggested improvements. Her aim was to effect a greater amount of good with the same capital, which she now saw grossly squandered and misapplied. The reforms which she thus introduced were both important and severe. She sacrificed almost the whole of her time to this praiseworthy task, and ultimately devoted a considerable sum to found the hospital which still bears her name. Beyond this, Madame Necker sought to exercise no power over her husband, or through his means. She loved him far too truly and too well to aim at an influence which might have degraded him in the eyes of the world. Necker was, however, proud of his noble-hearted wife, and never hesitated to confess how much he was indebted to her advice. When he retired from office, in 1781, and published his famous "Compte Rendu," he seized this opportunity of paying a high and heartfelt homage to the virtues of his wife. "Whilst retracing," he observes at the conclusion of his work, "a portion of the charitable tasks prescribed by your majesty, let me be permitted, sire, to allude, without naming her, to a person gifted with singular virtues, and who has materially assisted me in accomplishing the designs of your majesty. Although her name was never uttered to you, in all the vanities of high office, it is right, sire, that you should be aware that it is known and frequently invoked in the most obscure asylums of suffering humanity. It is no doubt most fortunate for a minister of finances to find, in the companion of his life, the assistance he needs for so many details of beneficence and charity, which might otherwise prove too much for his strength and attention. Carried away by the tumults of general affairs,—often obliged to sacrifice the feelings of the private man to the duties of the citizen, he may well esteem himself happy, when the complaints of poverty and misery can be confided to an enlightened person who shares the sentiment of his duties."

If Madame Necker has not left so remarkable a name as many women of her time; if her contemporaries, justly, perhaps, found her too cold and formal; yet she shines, at least in that dark age, a noble example of woman's virtues—devoted love, truth and purity. She died in 1794, calm and resigned through the most acute sufferings; her piety sustained her. The literary works she left, are chiefly connected with her charities, or were called forth by the events around her. Among these works are the following:—"Hasty Interments," "Memorial on the Establishment of Hospitals," "Reflections on Divorce," and her "Miscellanies." Her only child was the celebrated Madame de Stael.

NELLI, SUOR PLAUTILLA,

A FLORENTINE lady of noble extraction. A natural genius led her to copy the works of Bartolomeo di St. Marco, and she became, in consequence, an excellent painter. After taking the veil of St. Catharine at Florence, she composed the "Descent from the Cross," and her pictures possess great merit. She died in 1588, aged sixty-five.

NEMOURS, MARIE D' ORLEANS, DUCHESS DE,

DAUGHTER of the duke de Longueville, was born in 1625. She wrote some very agreeable "Memoirs of the War of the Fronde," in which she delineates in a masterly manner the principal persons concerned—describes transactions with great fidelity, and adds many anecdotes. She married, when very young, the duke de Nemours, and died in 1707. By her virtues, her prudence, and her sagacity in those trying and difficult times, her endowment and taste for polite literature, she reflected lustre on her rank and station. By her address and influence, she recalled her father, who had espoused the cause of the princes of the blood, to his allegiance, and rescued him from his dangerous position. Through all the civil contentions that raged around her, the duchess preserved her independence and neutrality.

NEUBER, CAROLINE,

WAS born in the year 1692, the daughter of a German lawyer, Weissenborn. Her father was very strict with her, and in her fifteenth year she ran away with a student, a Mr. Neuber, whom she afterwards married. They soon after organized a strolling troop of actors, with which they performed at first in Weissenfels.

Madame Neuber felt her calling to become the regenerator of the German stage; she placed herself at the head of her troop, made laws for it, and introduced better morals among its members. In 1726, she obtained a royal privilege to perform in Dresden and in Leipzig; she erected her stage in the latter place, and performed the old-fashioned tragedies of the German stage, such as King Octavius, Courtship, Fate and Death, The Golden Apple, Nero, &c. After the death of king Augustus, 1733, Madame Neuber went to Hamburg. In 1737, she returned to Leipzig, and assumed the reform of the stage, in conjunction with the celebrated author Gottsched.

The German harlequin was, after a long struggle, banished from the stage, and the victory celebrated by a piece called The Victory of Reason. Her fame spread all over the continent. In 1740, she was invited by Duke Biron, the favourite of Anne of Austria, to come to Courland, and from thence to Petersburg. On her return to Leipzig, she quarrelled with her benefactor, Gottsched, and constant and bitter recrimination was the result; she even went so far as to burlesque the person of the professor on the stage. From that time, fortune forsook her; she was compelled to disband her troop, and died in great poverty, near Dresden, in 1760.

NEWCASTLE, MARGARET CAVENDISH, DUCHESS OF,

YOUNGEST daughter of Sir Charles Lucas, was born at St. John's, near Colchester, in Essex, towards the latter end of the reign of James I. of England. She lost her father in infancy, but her mother gave her daughters a careful education. Margaret early displayed a taste for literature, to which she devoted most of her time. In 1643, she was chosen maid of honour to Henrietta Maria, wife to Charles I. The family of Lucases being loyal, Margaret accompanied her royal mistress when driven from England to her native country. At Paris, she married, in 1645, the marquis of Newcastle, then a widower, and went with him to Rotterdam, and afterwards to Antwerp, where they continued during the remainder of the exile; through which time they were often in great distress, from the failure of the rents due her husband.

On the accession of Charles II., the marquis, after sixteen years' absence, returned to England. The marchioness remained at Antwerp to settle their affairs; and having done this successfully, she rejoined her husband, and the remainder of her life was spent in tranquillity, and the cultivation of literature. She kept a number of young ladies in her house, and some of them slept near her room, that they might be ready to rise at the sound of her bell, and commit to paper any idea that occurred to her. She produced no less than thirteen folios, ten of which are in print. She says of herself, "That it pleased God to command his servant, Nature, to endow her with a poetic and philosophical genius even from her birth, for she did write some books even in that kind before she was twelve years of age."

Her speculations must at least have had the merit of originality, since she was nearly forty, she tells us, before she had read any philosophical authors. One of her maxims was, never to revise her own works, "lest it should disturb her following conceptions."

Her writings, though now almost forgotten, were received with the most extravagant encomiums, from learned bodies and men of eminent erudition. Whatever may be the foundation of this lady's pretension to philosophy, she certainly added to acuteness of mind, great imagination and powers of invention; but she was deficient in judgment, correctness, and cultivation. She composed plays, poems, orations, and philosophical discourses. Among these were, "The World's Olio," "Nature's Picture, drawn by Fancy's Pencil to the Life," "Orations of divers sorts, accommodated to divers places," "Plays," "Philosophical and Physical Opinions," "Observations upon Experimental Philosophy;" to which is added, "The Description of a New World," "Philosophical Letters," "Poems and Phancies,"

"CCXI Sociable Letters," "The Life of the thrice noble, high, and puissant prince, William Cavendish, duke, marquis, and earl of Newcastle; earl of Ogle, viscount Mansfield, and baron of Bolsover, of Ogle, Bothal, and Hepple; gentleman of his majesty's bed-chamber; one of his majesty's most honourable privy-council; knight of the most noble order of the Garter; his majesty's lieutenant in Ayre Trent North; who had the honour to be governor to our most glorious king and gracious sovereign in his youth, when he was prince of Wales; and soon after was made captain-general of all the provinces beyond the river of Trent, and other parts of the kingdom of England, with power, by a special commission, to make knights. Written by the thrice noble and excellent princess, Margaret, duchess of Newcastle, his wife."

This work, styled "the crown of her labours," was translated into Latin, and printed in 1667. She also wrote a great number of plays. The duchess died in 1673, and was buried, January 7th, 1674, in Westminster Abbey. She was graceful in her person, and humane, generous, pious, and industrious, as the multitude of her works prove. She says of herself, in one of her last works, "I imagine all those who have read my former books will say I have writ enough, unless they were better; but say what you will, it pleaseth me, and, since my delights are harmless, I will satisfy my humour."

"For had my brain as many fancies in't
To fill the world, I'd put them all in print;
No matter whether they be well or ill exprest,
My will is done, and that please woman best."

Her prose writings are too diffuse for extracts; we might give pages to find an idea worth transcribing. Her merits and peculiarities as a poetical writer may be seen in the following selections; the first from "The Pastime and Recreation of the Queen of Fairies in Fairy-land, the centre of the earth."

QUEEN MAB.

Queen Mab and all her company
Dance on a pleasant mole hill high,
To small straw pipes wherein great pleasure
They take and keep time, just time and measure;
All hand in hand, around, around,
They dance upon the fairy-ground;
And when she leaves her dancing hall,
She doth for her attendants call
To wait upon her to a bower,
Where she doth sit under a flower,
To shade her from the moonshine bright,
Where gnats do sing for her delight;
The whilst the bat doth fly about
To keep in order all the rout.
A dewy waving leaf's made fit
For the queen's bath, where she doth sit,
And her white limbs in beauty show,
Like a new fallen flake of snow;
Her maids do put her garments on,
Made of the pure light from the sun,
Which do so many colours take,
As various objects shadows make.

MIRTH AND MELANCHOLY

Is another of these fanciful personifications. The former woos the poetess to dwell with her, promising sport and pleasure, and drawing a gloomy but forcible and poetical sketch of her rival, Melancholy:—

Her voice is low, and gives a hollow sound;
She hates the light, and is in darkness found;
Or sits with blinking lamps, or tapers small,
Which various shadows make against the wall.
She loves nought else but noise which discord makes,
As croaking frogs whose dwelling is in lakes;
The raven's hoarse, the mandrake's hollow groan,
And shrieking owls which fly i' the night alone;
The tolling bell, which for the dead rings out;
A mill, where rushing waters run about;
The roaring winds, which shake the cedars tall,
Plough up the seas, and beat the rocks withal.
She loves to walk in the still moonshine night,
And in a thick dark grove she takes delight:
In hollow caves, thatch'd houses, and low cells,
She loves to live, and there alone she dwells.

Melancholy thus describes her own dwelling:—

I dwell in groves that gilt are with the sun;
Sit on the banks by which clear waters run;
In summers hot down in a shade I lie;
My music is the buzzing of a fly;
I walk in meadows, where grows fresh green grass;
In fields, where corn is high, I often pass;
Walk up the hills, where round I prospects see,
Some brushy woods, and some all champagnes be;
Returning back, I in fresh pastures go,
To hear how sheep do bleat, and cows do low;
In winter cold, when nipping frosts come on,
Then I do live in a small house alone;
Although 'tis plain, yet cleanly 'tis within,
Like to a soul that's pure, and clear from sin;
And there I dwell in quiet and still peace,
Not filled with cares how riches to increase;
I wish nor seek for vain and fruitless pleasures;
No riches are, but what the mind intreaures.
Thus am I solitary, live alone,
Yet better lov'd, the more that I am known;
And though my face ill-favour'd at first sight,
After acquaintance, it will give delight
Refuse me not, for I shall constant be;
Maintain your credit and your dignity.

NEWELL, HARRIET,

THE first American heroine of the missionary enterprise, was born at Haverhill, Massachusetts, October 10th, 1793. Her maiden name was Atwood. In 1806, while at school at Bradford, she became deeply impressed with the importance of religion; and, at the age of sixteen, she joined the church. On the 9th of February, 1812, Harriet Atwood married the Rev. Samuel Newell, missionary to the Burman empire; and in the same month, Mr. and Mrs. Newell embarked with their friends, Mr. and Mrs. Judson, for India. On the arrival of the missionaries at Calcutta, they were ordered to leave by the East India company; and accordingly Mr. and Mrs. Newell embarked for the Isle of France. Three weeks before reaching the island she became the mother of a child, which died in five-days. On the 30th of November, seven weeks and four days after her confinement, Mrs. Harriet Newell, at the age of twenty, expired, far from her home and friends. She was one of the first females who ever went from this country as a missionary; and she was the first who died a martyr to the cause of missions. That there is a time, even in the season of youth and the flush of hope, when it is "better to die than to live," even to attain our wish for this world, Harriet Newell is an example. Her most earnest wish was to do good for the cause of Christ, and be of service in teaching his gospel to the heathen. Her early death has, apparently, done this, better and more effectually, than the longest life and most arduous labours of any one of the noble band of American women who have gone forth on this errand of love and hope. In the language of a recent writer on this subject, "Heroines of the Missionary Enterprise," Harriet Newell was the great proto-martyr of American missions. She fell, wounded by death, in the very vestibule of the sacred cause. Her memory belongs, not to the body of men who sent her forth, not to the denomination to whose creed she had subscribed, but to the church, to the cause of missions. With the torch of Truth in her hand, she led the way down into a valley of darkness, through which many have followed. Her work was short, her toil soon ended; but she fell, cheering by her dying words and her high example, the missionaries of all coming time. She was the first, but not the only martyr. Heathen lands are dotted over with the graves of fallen Christians; missionary women sleep on almost every shore, and the bones of some are whitening in the fathomless depths of the ocean.

Never will the influence of the devoted woman whose life and death are here portrayed, be estimated properly, until the light of an eternal day shall shine on all the actions of men. We are to measure her glory, not by what she suffered, for others have suffered more than she did. But we must remember that she went out when the missionary enterprise was in its infancy,—when even the best of men looked upon it with suspicion. The tide of opposition she dared to stem, and with no example, no predecessor from American shores, she went out to rend the veil of darkness which gathered over all the nations of the East.

Things have changed since then. Our missionaries go forth with the approval of all the good; and the odium which once attended such a life is swept away. It is to some extent a popular thing to be a missionary, although the work is still one of hardship and suffering. It is this fact which gathers such a splendour around the name of Harriet Newell, and invests her short eventful life with such a charm. She went when no foot had trodden out the path, and was the first American missionary ever called to an eternal reward. While she slumbers in her grave, her name is mentioned with affection by a missionary church. And thus it should be. She has set us a glorious example; she has set an example to the church in every land and age, and her name will be mingled with the loved ones who are falling year by year; and if when the glad millennium comes, and the earth is converted to God, some crowns brighter than others shall be seen amid the throng of the ransomed, one of those crowns will be found upon the head of Harriet Newell."

"History is busy with us," said Marie Antoinette; and the hope that her heroic endurance of ignominy and suffering would be recorded, and ensure the pity and admiration of a future age, doubtless nerved her to sustain the dignity of a queen throughout the deep tragedy of her fate.

The noblest heroism of a woman is never thus self-conscious. The greatest souls, those who elevate humanity and leave a track of light—"as stars go down"—when passing away from earth, never look back for the brightness. A woman with such a soul is absorbed in her love for others, and in her duty towards God. She does what she can, feeling constantly how small is the mite she gives; and the worth which it is afterwards discovered to bear would, probably, astonish the giver far more than it does the world.

Harriet Newell died at the early age of twenty, leaving a journal and a few letters, the record of her religious feelings and the events of her short missionary life. These fragments have been published, making a little book. Such is her contribution to literature; yet this small work has been and is now of more importance to the intellectual progress of the world than all the works of Madame de Staël. The writings of Harriet Newell, translated into several tongues, and published in many editions, have reached the heart of society, and assisted to build up the throne of woman's power, even the moral influence of her sex over men; and their intellect can never reach its highest elevation but through the medium of moral cultivation.

NORDEN - FLEICHT, CHEDERIG CHARLOTTE DE,

A NATIVE of Stockholm, Sweden, celebrated among her countrymen for her poems. Besides an ingenious "Apology for Women," a poem, she wrote "The Passage of the Belts," two straits in the Baltic, over which, when frozen, king Charles Gustavus marched his army in 1658. She died, June 29th, 1793, aged forty-four.

NORTON, LADY FRANCES

WAS descended from the Frekes of Dorsetshire, England, and married Sir George Norton, of Somersetshire, by whom she had three children. On the death of her daughter, who had married Sir Richard Gethin, she wrote "The Applause of Virtue," and "Memento Mori, or Meditations on Death." She took for her second husband Colonel Ambrose Norton, and for her third Mr. Jones, and died in 1720, aged about seventy.

O.

OBERLIN, MADELINE SALOME,

DISTINGUISHED for her intelligence, piety, and the perfect union of soul which she enjoyed with her husband, the good and great John Frederic Oberlin, was born at Strasburg, in France. Her father, M. Witter, a man of property, who had married a relative of the Oberlin family, gave his daughter an excellent education. John James Oberlin was the pastor of Waldbach, a small village in the Ban de la Roche, or Valley of Stones, a lonely, sterile place, in the north-eastern part of France. Here he devoted himself to the duties of his holy office, doing good to all around him. Under his care and instruction, the poor ignorant peasantry became pious, industrious, and happy. In all his actions he followed what he believed to be a divine influence, or the leadings of providence; and his courtship and marriage were guided by his religious feelings. Oberlin's sister resided with him at Waldbach, and managed his house. Madeleine Witter came to visit Sophia Oberlin. Miss Witter was amiable, and her mind had been highly cultivated; but she was fond of fashion and display. Twice had Frederic Oberlin declined to marry young ladies who had been commended to him, because he had felt an inward admonition that neither of these was for him. But now, when Madeleine came before him, the impression was different. Two days prior to her intended departure, a voice seemed to whisper distinctly, "Take her for thy partner!" "It is impossible," thought he; "our dispositions do not agree." Still the secret voice whispered, "Take her for thy partner!" He slept little that night; and in his morning prayer, he earnestly entreated God to give him a sign whether this event was in accordance with the Divine will; solemnly declaring that if Madeleine acceded to the proposition with great readiness, he should consider the voice he had heard as a leading of Providence.

He found his cousin in the garden, and immediately began the conversation by saying, "You are about to leave us, my dear friend. I have received an intimation that you are destined to be the partner of my life. Before you go, will you give me your candid opinion whether you can resolve upon this step?"

With blushing frankness, Madeleine placed her hand within his; and then he knew that she would be his wife.

They were married on the 6th of July, 1768. Miss Witter had always resolved not to marry a clergyman; but she was devotedly attached to her excellent husband, and cordially assisted in all his plans. No dissatisfaction at her humble lot, no complaints of the arduous duties belonging to their peculiar situation, marred their mutual happiness

They were far removed from the vain excitements and tinsel splendour of the world; they were surrounded by the rude, illiterate peasantry; and every step in improvement was contested by ignorance and prejudice; but they were near each other, and both were near to God.

The following prayer, written soon after their union, shows what spirit pervaded their peaceful dwelling.

Prayer of Oberlin and his Wife, for the Blessing and Grace of God.

"Holy Spirit! descend into our hearts; assist us to pray with fervour from our inmost souls. Permit thy children, Oh, gracious Father, to present themselves before thee, in order to ask of thee what is necessary for them. May we love each other only in thee, and in our Saviour Jesus Christ, as being members of his body. Enable us at all times, to look solely to thee, to walk before thee, and to be united together in thee; that thus we may grow daily, in the spiritual life.

"Grant that we may be faithful in the exercise of our duties, that we may stimulate each other therein, warning each other of our faults, and seeking together for pardon in the blood of Jesus Christ. When we pray together, (and may we pray much and frequently,) be thou, O Lord Jesus, with us; kindle our fervour, O Heavenly Father, and grant us, for the sake of Jesus Christ, whatever thy Holy Spirit shall teach us to ask.

"Seeing that in this life, thou hast placed the members of our household under our authority, give us wisdom and strength to guide them in a manner conformable to thy will. May we always set them a good example, following that of Abraham, who commanded his children and his household after him, to keep the way of the Lord, in doing what is right. If thou givest us children, and preservest them to us, O grant us grace to bring them up to thy service, to teach them early to know, to fear, and to love thee, and to pray to that God who has made a covenant with them, that, conformably to the engagement which will be undertaken for them at their baptism, they may remain faithful from the cradle to the grave. O Heavenly Father, may we inculcate thy word, according to thy will, all our lives, with gentleness, love and patience, both at their rising up and lying down, at home and abroad, and under all circumstances; and do thou render it meet for the children to whom thou hast given life only as a means of coming to thee.

"And when we go together to the Holy Supper, O ever give us renewed grace, renewed strength, and renewed courage, for continuing to walk in the path to heaven; and, as we can only approach thy table four times in the year, grant that in faith we may much more frequently be there, yes, every day and every hour; that we may always keep death in view, and always be prepared for it; and if we may be permitted to solicit it of thee, O grant that we may not long be separated from each other, but that the death of the one may be speedily, and very speedily, followed by that of the other.

"Hear, O gracious Father, in the name of Jesus Christ, thy well-beloved son. And, O merciful Redeemer, may we both love thee with ardent devotion, always walking and holding communion with thee, not placing our confidence in our own righteousness and in our own works, but only in thy blood and in thy merits. Be with us; preserve us faithful; and grant, Lord Jesus, that we may soon see thee. Holy Spirit, dwell always in our hearts: teach us to lift our thoughts continually to our gracious Father; impart to us thy strength, or thy consolation, as our wants may be. And to thee, to the Father, and to the Son, be praise, honour, and glory, for ever and ever. Amen."

For sixteen years Mrs. Oberlin was a beloved friend and useful assistant to her husband. In their tastes and pursuits, in their opinions and feelings, they became entirely one. She managed his household discreetly, educated their children judiciously, and entered into all his benevolent plans with earnestness and prudence.

She died suddenly, in January, 1784, a few weeks after the birth of her ninth and last child. Her death was deeply mourned in the Ban de la Roche, for her assistance and sympathy had always been freely offered to the poor and the afflicted.

Oberlin survived his wife forty-two years; but never separated himself from her memory. He devoted several hours every day to thoughts of her; and held, as he thought, communion with her soul. Thus holy and eternal may be the true love of husband and wife.

OLDFIELD, ANNE,

A CELEBRATED English actress, was born in Pall-Mall in 1683. Her father, an officer in the army, left her poor; but the sweetness of her voice, and her inclination for the stage noticed by Farquhar, the comic writer, decided her destiny. She became the mistress of Mr. Maynwaring, and after his death, of General Churchill. But, notwithstanding these derelictions, she was humane and benevolent in the highest degree, and a real friend to the indigent Savage, on whom she bestowed an annuity, although he had not the most remote claim upon her beyond his poverty and his genius. She died in 1730, and was buried in Westminster Abbey with great pomp. She left two sons, one by each of the gentlemen with whom she lived, and to whom she behaved with the duty fidelity, and attachment of a wife.

O'NEILL, MISS,

Was born in Ireland, about 1791. Her father was the stage-manager of the Drogheda theatre; and she was introduced on the boards at an early age. When quite young she went to Dublin, where her personation of Juliet, in Shakspeare's play of Romeo and Juliet, established her reputation. She was engaged at one of the principal London theatres; and she soon became one of the most popular actresses of the day. At the time of her leaving the stage, on her marriage with W. Becher, Esq., M. P., she was in the receipt of £12,000 a year; the whole profits of which she is said to have distributed among her numerous relations.

OPIE, AMELIA,

WAS born in Norwich, England, in 1769. Her father was Dr. Alderson, a distinguished physician. She evinced her talents at a very early age, but published very little before her marriage, which took place in 1798, when she espoused Mr. Opie, the celebrated portrait-painter. In 1801, she wrote "The Father and Daughter," which went through many editions, and is still popular. In 1802, she wrote a volume of poems; and afterwards, "Adeline Mowbray, or the Mother and Daughter," "Simple Tales," "Dangers of Coquetry," and "Warrior's Return, and other Poems." Her husband died in 1808; after which, she published his lectures, with a memoir of his life, and a novel called "Temper, or Domestic Scenes." Mrs. Opie was a pleasing poetess; many of her songs attained great popularity, though now nearly forgotten. She joined the Quakers or Friends, and withdrew partially from society, after 1826; but visiting Paris, she was induced to fix her residence in that gay city. Miss Sedgwick, in her "Letters from Abroad," published in 1841, thus notices Mrs. Opie, whom she met in Paris:—

"I owed Mrs. Opie a grudge for having made me in my youth cry my eyes out over her stories; but her fair, cheerful face forced me to forget it. She long ago forswore the world and its vanities, and adopted the Quaker faith and costume; but I fancied that her elaborate simplicity, and the fashionable little train to her pretty satin gown, indicated how much easier it is to adopt a theory than to change one's habits."

In 1828, Mrs. Opie published a moral treatise, entitled "Detraction Displayed," in order to expose that "most common of all vices," which she says justly is found "in every class or rank in society, from the peer to the peasant, from the master to the valet, from the mistress to the maid, from the most learned to the most ignorant, from the man of genius to the meanest capacity." The tales of this lady have been thrown into the shade by the brilliant fictions of Scott, the stronger moral delineations of Miss Edgeworth, and the generally masculine character of our more modern literature. She is, like Mackenzie, too uniformly pathetic and tender. "She can do nothing well," says Jeffrey, "that requires to be done with formality, and therefore has not succeeded in copying either the concentrated force of weighty and deliberate reason, or the severe and solemn dignity of majestic virtue. To make amends, however, she represents admirably every thing that is amiable, generous, and gentle." Perhaps we should add to this the power of exciting and harrowing up the feelings in no ordinary degree. Some of her short tales are full of gloomy and terrific painting, alternately resembling those of Godwin and Mrs. Radcliffe. Mrs. Opie died in 1853, aged eighty-five years.

The following extract from "A Wife's Duty," gives a good idea of her style and manner of story-telling, which is the true title of her prose productions. Seymour and Helen Pendarves had married for love.

TWO YEARS OF WEDDED LIFE.

The first twelve months of my wedded life (the wife tells the story) were halcyon days; and the first months of marriage are not often such—perhaps they never are—except where the wedded couple are so young that they are not trammelled in habits which are likely to interfere with a spirit of accommodation; nor even then, probably, unless the temper is good, and yielding on both sides. It usually takes some time for the husband and wife to know each other's humours and habits, and to find what surrender of their own they can make with the least reluctance for their mutual good. But we had youth, and (I speak it not as a boast) we had good temper, also. Seymour, you know, was proverbially good-natured; and I, though an only child, had not had my naturally happy temper ruined by injudicious indulgence.

You know that Seymour and I went to Paris, and thence to Marseilles, not very long after we married, and returned in six months to complete the alterations which we had ordered to be made in our house, under the superintendence of my mother.

We found the alterations really deserving the name of improvements, and Seymour enthusiastically exclaimed, "O, Helen! never, never will we leave this enchanting place. Here let us live, my beloved, and be the world to each other."

My heart readily assented to this delightful proposition, but even then my judgment revolted at it.

I felt, I knew that Pendarves loved, and was formed for society. I was sure, that by beginning our wedded life with total seclusion, we should only prepare the way for utter distaste to it; and, concealing my own inclinations, I told him I must stipulate for three months of London every spring. My husband started with surprise and mortification at this un-romantic reply to his sentimental proposal, nor could he at all accede to it; but he complained of my passion for London to my mother, while the country, with me for his companion, was quite sufficient for his happiness.

"These are early times yet," replied my mother, coldly; and Seymour was not satisfied with the mother or the daughter.

"Seymour," said I, one day, "since you have declared against keeping any more terms, and will therefore not read much law till you become a justice of the peace, tell me how you mean to employ your time?"

"Why, in the first place," said he, "I shall read or write. But my first employment shall be to teach you Spanish. I cannot endure to think that De Walden taught you Italian, Helen."

"But you taught me to love, you know; therefore you ought to forgive it."

"No; I cannot rest till I have helped to complete your education."

"Well, but I cannot be learning Spanish all day."

"No; so perhaps I shall set about writing a great work."

"The very thing I was going to propose, though not exactly a great work. What think you of a life of poor Chatterton, with critical remarks on his poems?"

"Excellent! I will do it."

And now having given him a pursuit, I ventured to indulge some reasonable hopes that home and the country might prove as delightful to him as he fancied they would be; and what with studying Spanish, with building a green-house, with occasional writing, with getting together materials for this life, and writing the preface, time fled on very rapid pinions; and after we had been married two years, and May arrived a second time, Seymour triumphantly exclaimed—

"There, Helen! I believe that you distrusted my love for the country; but have I once expressed or felt a wish to go to London?"

"The Ides of March are come, but not gone," I replied; "and, surely, if I wish to go, you will not deny me."

"No, Helen, certainly not," said he, in a tone of mortification, "if I am no longer all-sufficient for your happiness."

Alas! in the ingenuousness of my nature, I gave way when he said this to the tenderness of my heart, and assured him that my happiness depended wholly on the enjoyment of his society; and I fear it is too true that men soon learn to slight what they are sure of possessing. Had I been an artful woman, and could I have condescended to make him doubtful of the extent of my love, by a few woman's subtleties; could I have feigned a desire to return to the world, instead of owning, as I did, that all my enjoyment was comprised in home and him, I do think that I might have been, for a much longer period, the happiest of wives; but then I should have been, in my own eyes, despicable as a woman; and I was always tenacious of my own esteem.

May was come, but not gone, when I found my husband was continually reading to me, after having read to himself, the accounts in the papers of the gaieties of London.

(And so to London they went.)

From Mrs. Opie's Poems.

THE ORPHAN BOY'S TALE.

Stay, lady, stay, for mercy's sake,
And hear a helpless orphan's tale;
Ah! sure my looks must pity wake,
'Tis want that makes my cheek so pale.
Yet I was once a mother's pride,
And my brave father's hope and joy;
But in the Nile's proud fight he died,
And I am now an orphan boy.

Poor foolish child! how pleased was I,
When news of Nelson's victory came,
Along the crowded streets to fly,
And see the lighted windows flame!
To force me home, my mother sought,
She could not bear to see my joy;
For with my father's life 'twas bought,
And made me a poor orphan boy.

The people's shouts were long and loud,
My mother, shuddering, closed her ears;
"Rejoice! rejoice!" still cried the crowd;
My mother answered with her tears.

"Why are you crying thus," said I,
"While others laugh and shout with joy?"
She kissed me — and with such a sigh!
She called me her poor orphan boy.

"What is an orphan boy?" I cried,
As in her face I look'd, and smiled;
My mother through her tears replied,
"You 'll know too soon, ill-fated child!"
And now they've toll'd my mother's knell,
And I'm no more a parent's joy;
O, lady, I have learn'd too well
What 'tis to be an orphan boy!

Oh! were I by your bounty fed!
Nay, gentle lady, do not chide—
Trust me, I mean to earn my bread;
The sailor's orphan boy has pride.
Lady, you weep!—ha!—this to me?
You 'll give me clothing, food, employ?
Look down, dear parents! look, and see,
Your happy, happy orphan boy!

SONG.

Go, youth belov'd, in distant glades,
New friends, new hopes, new joys to find
Yet sometimes deign, 'midst fairer maids,
To think on her thou leavest behind.
Thy love, thy fate, dear youth, to share,
Must never be my happy lot;
But thou mayest grant this humble prayer,
Forget me not, Forget me not!

Yet should the thought of my distress
Too painful to thy feelings be,
Heed not the wish I now express,
Nor ever deign to think of me
But oh! if grief thy steps attend,
If want, or sickness be thy lot,
And thou require a soothing friend,
Forget me not, Forget me not

SONG.

I know you false, I know you vain,
Yet still I cannot break my chain;
Though with those lips so sweetly smiling,
Those eyes so bright and so beguiling,
On every youth by turns you smile,
And every youth by turns beguile,
Yet still enchant and still deceive me,
Do all things, fatal fair, but leave me.

Still let me in those sparkling eyes
Trace all your feelings as they rise;
Still from those lips in crimson swelling,
Which seem of soft delights the dwelling,
Catch tones of sweetness which the soul
In fetters ever need control—
Nor let my starts of passion grieve thee,
'T were death to stay, 't were death to leave thee.

ORLANDINE, EMILIA OF SIENA,

Flourished in 1726. One of her sonnets is very celebrated — "Love is a Great Folly." It would seem that the poetess felt, in the depths of her soul, this bitter truth. She has left many poems, full of energy and sentiment, which are dispersed in various collections.

ORLEANS, ELIZABETH CHARLOTTE, DUCHESS OF,

ONLY daughter of the elector Charles Louis of the Palatinate, was born at Heidelberg, in 1652. She was a princess of distinguished talents and character, and lived for half a century in the court of Louis XIV. without changing her German habits or manners. She was carefully educated at the court of her aunt, afterwards the electress Sophia of Hanover, and when nineteen, married duke Philip of Orleans, from reasons of state policy. She was without personal charms, but her understanding was strong, and she was celebrated for her wit. Madame de Maintenon was her implacable enemy; but Louis XIV. was attracted by her frankness, integrity, and vivacity. She often attended him to the chase. She has described herself and her situation with much life and humour in her "German Letters." The most valuable of these are contained in the "Life and Character of the Duchess Elizabeth Charlotte of Orleans," by Professor Schütze, published at Leipzig, in 1820. Her second son was made regent, after Louis XIV.'s death. Her own death occurred in 1722.

OSGOOD, FRANCES SARGENT,

ONE of the most gifted daughters of song America has produced, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, about the year 1812. Her father, Mr. Joseph Locke, was a merchant, and her mother a woman of cultivated taste; both parents encouraged and aided the education of their children. They were a talented family; but no other one had the genius with which Frances was endowed. Her poetical faculty was an endowment of nature, not an acquired art; nor in our research through the annals of female genius have we found another instance, among the Anglo-Saxon race, of the true improvisatrice, such as Mrs. Osgood certainly was.

Mrs. Hemans studied her art passionately, and profited greatly by her learning; Miss Landon had motives, encouragements and facilities, which carried her onward in her literary career. But Mrs. Osgood never required study or encouragement; she poured out her strains as the birds carol, because her heart was filled with song, and must have utterance. Her first specimens of poetry were almost as perfect, in what are called the rules of the art, as her later productions. Rhyme, and the harmonies of language, came to her as intuitively as the warm emotions of her heart, or the bright fancies of her imagination.

Her first printed productions appeared in the "Juvenile Miscellany," a little work, but an excellent one for the young, edited by Mrs. Maria

L. Child. In 1831, Miss Locke, who had chosen "Florence" as her nom de plume, began to write for the "Ladies' Magazine,"* the first periodical established in America for ladies, and then under the care of Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, the present editor of the "Lady's Book."

In 1835, Miss Locke married Mr. S. S. Osgood, a painter by profession, who has since reached a high rank as an artist; he was also a man of literary taste, who appreciated the genius and lovely qualities of his gifted wife. The young couple went to London soon after their marriage, where Mr. Osgood succeeded well, and Mrs. Osgood made many friends, and her talents became known by her contributions to several of the English periodicals. While there, she published a small volume, "The Casket of Fate," which was much admired; and she was persuaded to collect her poems, under the title of "A Wreath of Wild Flowers from New England." This volume was published in London, 1838, and was favourably noticed by several of the leading journals in that metropolis.

In 1840, after an absence of more than four years, Mr. Osgood returned to Boston with his wife and their little daughter Ellen, (the pet of many poems,) and opened a studio in that city. Mrs. Osgood devoted her leisure to literary pursuits, and prepared several works—"The Poetry of Flowers and Flowers of Poetry," and "The Floral Offering," besides contributing to nearly all the literary magazines and the annuals of every season. She often wrote in prose, because prose was required. Many of her sketches and stories are charming, from their playful vivacity and fanciful descriptions; yet the poetical spirit always predominating, shows that she would gladly have rhymed the article, had she been permitted. Poetry was, in truth, her native language; on the wing of versification she moved gracefully as a bird, and always in a region of light and love. This healthy, hopeful, happy spirit, is the distinguishing characteristic of her productions. Dark fancies never haunted her pure mind; misanthropy never laid its cold, withering hand on her heart; nor is there a single manifestation of bitter memories and disappointed feelings in her poems. This buoyancy of disposition was her American heritage; and we agree with a discriminating writer,† that,

"Of all American female authors, Mrs. Osgood is the most truly feminine in her delineation of the affections. Without rising ever to the dignity of passion, she portrays the more tender and delicate lights and shadows of woman's heart, with an instinctive fidelity. We might instance some charming improvisations in a peculiar vein of subdued and half-capricious gayety, which can hardly be surpassed. In all her social relations, the readiness with which her buoyant and vivacious nature ran into verse, was made a source of endless amusement and pleasure. Many of her most sprightly and graceful poems were produced in this manner, with no other object than the temporary gratification of her friends, and then thrown aside and forgotten."

That with such a cheerful, kind, affectionate genius, as well as heart, Mrs. Osgood should have been tenderly beloved by her own family and familiar friends, would be expected; but she had made thousands of friends who never looked on her pleasant face; and when the tidings of her death went forth, she was mourned as a light withdrawn from many a home where her rhymed lessons had added a charm to household affections, and made more beautiful the lot of woman. Mrs. Osgood had resided for several years in the city of New York, and there she died, May 12th, 1850, of pulmonary consumption, enduring her wasting disease with sweet patience, even playful cheerfulness. The last stanza she wrote, or rather rhymed, alluded to the near approach of her fate:

"I'm going through th' Eternal Gates
Ere June's sweet roses blow;
Death's lovely angel leads me there,
And it is sweet to go."

She died a few days after, being yet young for one who had written so much—hardly thirty-eight. Two of her three daughters survive her irreparable loss: her husband returned from California to watch over her last months of sickness, but he could not save her. She was a devoted wife and mother, as lovely in her daily life as in her poems. The paper we have already quoted gives this true summary of her literary character:

"As a writer, Mrs. Osgood enjoyed, while living, the full measure of her fame. The characteristic beauties of her poems were very generally appreciated, while the careless freedom of her words were so interwoven with subtle and exquisite cadences of sound, that the critical reader forgot her want of constructive power. We do not think that more severe study would have enabled her to accomplish better or more lasting things. Her nature found its appropriate expression, and any reaching after the higher forms of poetry would have checked that child-like spirit which was its greatest charm. Some of our present female writers may be awarded loftier honours, but no one, we think, will win a wider circle of friends, or leave behind a more cherished memory."

In 1849, the poems of Mrs. Osgood, superbly illustrated, in one volume, were published in Philadelphia.

In order to mark the progress of Mrs. Osgood's mind, we give, first, some poems of her girlhood, then of her motherhood, and last, a few of those which are more purely imaginative; the same grace of expression and delicacy of moral feeling pervades all she ever wrote.

First Part.

MAY-DAY IN NEW ENGLAND.

Can this be May? Can this be May?
We have not found a flower to-day!
We roamed the wood—we climbed the hill—
We rested by the rushing rill—
And lest they had forgot the day,
We told them it was May, dear May!

We called the sweet, wild blooms by name—
We shouted, and no answer came!
From smiling field, or solemn hill—
From rugged rock, or rushing rill—
We only bade 'he petty pets
Just breathe from out their hiding-places'
We told the little, light coquettes
They needn't show their bashful faces,—
"One sigh," we said, "one fragrant sigh,
We'll soon discover where you lie!"
The roguish things were still as death—
They wouldn't even breathe a breath.
Alas! there's none so deaf, I fear,
As those who do not choose to hear!
We wandered to an open place,
And sought the sunny buttercup,
That, so delighted, in your face
Just like a pleasant smile looks up.
We peeped into a shady spot,
To find the blue "Forget-me-not!"
At last a far-off voice we heard,
A voice as of a fountain-fall,
That softer than a singing-bird,
Did answer to our merry call!
So wildly sweet the breezes brought
That tone in every pause of ours,
That we, delighted, fondly thought
It must be talking of the flowers!
We knew the violets loved to hide
The cool and lulling wave beside:—
With song, and laugh, and bounding feet,
And wild hair wandering on the wind,
We swift pursued the murmurs sweet;
But not a blossom could we find;—
The cowslip, crocus, columbine,
The violet, and the snow-drop fine,
The orchis 'neath the hawthorn tree,
The blue-bell and anemone,
The wild-rose, eglantine, and daisy,
Where are they all?—they must be lazy!
Perhaps they're playing "Hide and seek!"—
Oh, naughty flowers! why don't you speak?
We have not found a flower to-day,—
They surely cannot know 'tis May!

You have not found a flower to-day!—
What's that upon your cheek, I pray?
A blossom pure, and sweet, and wild,
And worth all Nature's blooming wealth;
Not all in vain your search, my child!—
You've found at least the rose of health!
The golden buttercup, you say,
That like a smile illumines the way,
Is nowhere to be seen to-day.
Fair child! upon that beaming face
A softer, lovelier smile I trace;
A treasure, as the sunshine bright,—
A glow of love and wild delight!
Then pine no more for Nature's toy—
You've found at least the flower of joy.
Yes! in a heart so young, and gay,
And kind as yours, 'tis always May!
For gentle feelings, love, are flowers
That bloom thro' life's most clouded hours!
Ah! cherish them, my happy child,
And check the weeds that wander wild!
And while their stainless wealth is given,
In incense sweet, to earth and heaven,
No longer will you need to say—
"Can this be May? Can this be May?"

STANZAS.

When the warm blessed spirit that lightens the sky
Hath darkened his glory, and furled up his wing,
And Nature forgets the sweet smile, that her eye
Was wont on that radiant spirit to fling,—

I turn from the world without, calm and content,
And find in my own heart a day-dream as bright;
And dearer, far dearer than that which is lent
To illumine creation with glory and light.

There's a thought in that heart it can never forget—
 There's a ray in that heart that will lighten my doom;
 Through many a sorrow they linger there yet,
 And, holy and beautiful, smile through the gloom.

But they say that the garland Affection is wreathing,
 Will fade ere the morrow has wakened its bloom—
 They say the wild blossoms where young Hope is breathing,
 Their beauty, their fragrance are all for the tomb.

They tell me the vision of Bliss that is "glinting,"
 My heart's star of promise in gloom will decline;
 And the far scene that Fancy, the fairy, is tinting,
 Will lose all its sunny glow ere it is mine.

Oh! if Love and Life be but a fairy illusion,
 And the cold future bright but in Fancy's young eye,
 Still, still let me live in the dreamy illusion,
 And, true and unchanging, hope on till I die!

LINES

On a picture of a young girl weighing Cupid and a butterfly:—the winged boy rises, as he should, and the motto beneath is, "Love is the lightest."

"LOVE THE LIGHTEST."

Silly maiden! weigh them not;
 Butterflies are earthly things:
 Thou forget'st their lowly lot,
 Gazing on their glittering wings.

Find a star-beam from the sky—
 Find a glow-worm in the grass—
 Will the earth-lamp rise on high?
 Will that heaven-ray downward pass?

Love—ethereal, holy love,
 Light, perchance, and proud, and free,
 Maiden—see! it soars above
Worldly pride and vanity!

Drooping to its native earth,
 Sinks the gilded insect-fly:
 Love, of holier, heavenlier birth,
 Rises towards his home on high.

Maiden, throw the scales away!
 Never weigh poor Love again:
 Even the doubt has dimmed the ray
 On his pinions with its stain!

See! he lifts his wondering eye,
 Half reproachfully to thee—
 "Measured with a butterfly!"
I'd try my wings, if I were he

THE STAR OF PROMISE.

When kneeling sages saw of yore
 Their orb of promise rise for them,
 How Learning's lamp grew dim, before
 The heaven-born Star of Bethlehem,—
 How faltered Wisdom's haughty tone,
 When, led by God's exulting choir,
 His radiant herald glided on,
 The darkling heathen's beacon-fire!

When sweet, from many an angel voice,
 While rung the viewless harps of heaven,
 He heard the song of love—"Rejoice,
 For peace on earth and sins forgiven!"
 The Chaldean flung his scroll aside,
 The Arab left his desert-tent—
 Their hope, their trust—that silver guide—
 Till low at Mary's feet they bent!

Ay! Asia's wisest knelt around,
 Forgetting Fame's too earthly dream,
 While, bright upon the hallowed ground,
 Their golden gifts—a mockery—gleam.
 There vainly too, their censers breathed;
 Oh! what were incense—gems—to Him,
 Around whose brow a glory wreathed,
 That made their sun-rod's splendour dim!

To Him o'er whose blest spirit came
 The fragrance of celestial flowers,
 And light from countless wings of flame
 That flashed thro' heaven's resplendent bowers
 To "kneeling Faith's" devoted eye,
 It shines—that "star of promise," now,
 Fair, as when, far in Asia's sky,
 It lit her sage's lifted brow!

No sparkling treasure we may bring,
 No "gift of gold," nor jewel-stone:
 The censer's sweets we may not fling,
 For incense round our Saviour's throne.
 But when, o'er sorrow's clouded view,
 That planet rises to our prayer,
We, where it leads, may follow too,
 And lay a contrite spirit there!

Second Part.

THE BABY OF SIX MONTHS OLD BLOWING BACK
THE WIND.

The breeze was high, and blew her sun-brown tresses
 About her snowy brow and violet eyes;
 And she—my Ellen—brave and sweetly wise,
 In gay defiance of its rough caresses,
 With rosy, pouting mouth, essayed at length
 To blow the rude wind back, that mocked her baby-strength

Ah! thus when Fortune's storms assail thy soul,
 Yield not, nor shrink! but bear thee bravely still Against their fury! With thine own sweet will
 And childlike faith, oppose their fierce control,
 So shalt thou bloom at last, my treasure'd flower,
 Unharm'd by tempest-shock, in Heaven's calm summer bower!

ELLEN'S FIRST TOOTH.

Your mouth is a rose-bud,
 And in it a pearl
 Lies smiling and snowy,
 My own little girl!
 Oh! pure pearl of promise!
 It is thy first tooth—
 How closely thou shuttest
 The rose-bud, forsooth!
 But let me peep in it,
 The fair thing to view—
 Nay! only a minute—
 Dear Ellen! now do!
 You won't? little miser,
 To hide the gem so!
 Some day you'll be wiser,
 And show them, I know!
 How dear is the pleasure—
 My fears for thee past—
 To know the white treasure
 Has budded at last!
 Fair child! may each hour
 A rose-blossom be,
 And hide in its flower
 Some jewel for thee!

THE LITTLE SLUMBERER.

The child was weary, and had flung herself
 In beautiful abandonment, to rest,
 Low on the gorgeous carpeting, whose hues
 Contrasted richly with her snow-white robe:
 One dimpled arm lay curving o'er the head,
 Half buried in its glossy, golden curls,
 Moist and disordered by her graceful play:
 The other pressed beneath her cheek, did make
 With small round fingers dimples in the rose,—
 Where lashes soft as floss were darkly drooping,—
 Her red lips parted slightly, while the breath,
 Pure as a blossom's sigh, came sweet and still;
 Loosely the robe from one white shoulder fell;
 And so she lay, and slumbered 'mid the hues,
 The orient richness of the downy carpet,—
 Like a young flower, drooping its dewy head,
 And shutting its soft petals on the breast
 Of summer-mantled earth.

THE CHILD PLAYING WITH A WATCH.

Art thou playing with Time in thy sweet baby-glee?
 Will he pause on his pinions to frolic with thee?
 Oh, show him those shadowless, innocent eyes,
 That smile of bewildered and beaming surprise;
 Let him look on that cheek where thy rich hair reposes,
 Where dimples are playing "bopeep" with the roses:
 His wrinkled brow press with light kisses and warm,
 And clasp his rough neck with thy soft wreathing arm.
 Perhaps thy bewitching and infantine sweetness
 May win him, for once, to delay in his fleetness—
 To pause, ere he rifle, relentless in flight,
 A blossom so glowing of bloom and of light:
 Then, then would I keep thee, my beautiful child,
 With thy blue eyes unshadowed, thy blush undefiled—
 With thy innocence only to guard thee from ill,
 In life's sunny dawning, a lily-bud still!
 Laugh on, my own Ellen! that voice, which to me
 Gives a warning so solemn, makes music for thee;
 And while I at those sounds feel the idler's annoy,
 Thou hear'st but the tick of the pretty gold toy;
 Thou seest but a smile on the brow of the churl—
 May his frown never awe thee, my own baby-girl.
 And oh, may his step, as he wanders with thee,
 Light and soft as thine own little fairy tread be!
 While still in all seasons, in storms and fair weather,
 May Time and my Ellen be playmates together.

LITTLE CHILDREN.

"Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

And yet we check and chide

The airy angels as they float about us,
 With rules of so-called wisdom, till they grow
 The same tame slaves to custom and the world.
 And day by day the fresh frank soul that looked
 Out of those wistful eyes, and smiling played
 With the wild roses of that changing cheek,
 And modulated all those earnest tones,
 And danced in those light foot-falls to a tune
 Heart-heard by them, inaudible to us,
 Folds closer its pure wings, whereon the hues
 They caught in heaven already pale and pine,
 And shrinks amazed and scared back from our gaze.
 And so the evil grows. The graceful flower
 May have its own sweet way in bud and bloom—
 May drink, and dare with upturned gaze the light,
 Or nestle 'neath the guardian leaf, or wave
 Its fragrant bells to every roving breeze,
 Or wreath with blushing grace the fragile spray
 In bashful loveliness. The wild wood-bird
 May plume at will his wings, and soar or sing;
 The mountain brook may wind where'er it would,
 Dash in wild music down the deep ravine,
 Or, rippling drowsily in forest haunts,
 Dream of the floating cloud, the waving flower,
 And murmur to itself sweet lulling words
 In broken tones so like the faltering speech
 Of early childhood: but our human flowers,
 Our soul-birds, caged and pining—they must sing
 And grow, not as their own but our caprice
 Suggests, and so the blossom and the lay
 Are but half bloom and music at the best.
 And if by chance some brave and buoyant soul,
 More bold or less forgetful of the lessons
 God taught them first, disdain the rule—the bar—
 And, wildly beautiful, rebellious rise,
 How the hard world, half startled from itself,
 Frowns the bright wanderer down, or turns away
 And leaves her lonely in her upward path.
 'Thank God! to such his smile is not denied.

Third Part.

TO MY PEN.

Dost know, my little vagrant pen,
 That wanderest lightly down the paper,
 Without a thought how critic men
 May carp at every careless caper?

Dost know, twice twenty thousand eyes,
 If publishers report them truly,
 Each month may mark the sportive lies
 That track, oh shame! thy steps unruly?

Now list to me, my fairy pen,
 And cou the lessons gravely over;
 Be never wild or false again,
 But "mind your Ps and Qs," you rover!

While tripping gayly to and fro,
 Let not a thought escape you lightly,
 But challenge all before they go,
 And see them fairly robed and rightly.

You know that words but dress the frame,
 And thought 's the soul of verse, my fairy!
 So drape not spirits dull and tame,
 In gorgeous robes or garments airy.

I would not have my pen pursue
 The "beaten track"—a slave for ever;
 No! roam as thou wert wont to do,
 In author-land, by rock and river.

Be like the sunbeam's burning wing,
 Be like the wand in Cinderella—
 And if you touch a common thing,
 Ah, change to gold the pumpkin yellow!

May grace come fluttering round your steps
 Where'er, my bird, you light on paper,
 And music murmur at your lips,
 And truth restrain each truant caper.

Let hope paint pictures in your way,
 And love his seraph-lesson teach you;
 And rather calm with reason stray,
 Than dance with folly—I beseech you

In Faith's pure fountain lave your wing,
 And quaff from feeling's glowing chalice
 But touch not falsehood's fatal spring,
 And shun the poisoned weeds of malice.

Firm be the web you lightly spin;
 From leaf to leaf, though frail in seeming,
 While Fancy's fairy dew-gems win
 The sunbeam Truth to keep them gleaming

And shrink not thou when tyrant wrong
 O'er humble suffering dares deride thee:
 With lightning step and clarion song,
 Go! take the field, with Heaven beside thee.

Be tuned to tenderest music, when
 Of sin and shame thou'rt sadly singing;
 But diamond be thy point, my pen,
 When folly's bells are round thee ringing!

And so, where'er you stay your flight,
 To plume your wing or dance your measure,
 May gems and flowers your pathway light,
 For those who track your tread, my treasure

But what is this? you've tripped about,
 While I the mentor grave was playing;
 And here you've written boldly out
 The very words that I was saying!

And here, as usual, on you've flown
 From right to left—flown fast and faster,
 Till even while you wrote it down,
 You've missed the task you ought to master.

THE SOUL'S LAMENT FOR HOME.

As 'plains the homesick ocean-shell
 Far from its own remembered sea,
 Repeating, like a fairy spell
 Of love, the charmed melody
 It learned within that whispering wave,
 Whose wondrous and mysterious tone
 Still wildly haunts its winding cave
 Of pearl, with softest music-moan—

Asks my homesick soul below,
For something loved, yet undefined;
So mourns to mingle with the flow
Of music, from the Eternal Mind;
So murmurs, with its childlike sigh,
The melody it learned above,
To which no echo may reply,
Save from thy voice, Celestial Love!

NEW ENGLAND'S MOUNTAIN CHILD.

Where foams the fall—a tameless storm—
Through Nature's wild and rich arcade,
Which forest trees, entwining, form,
There trips the mountain maid.

She binds not her luxuriant hair
With dazzling gem or costly plume,
But gayly wreathes a rosebud there,
To match her maiden bloom.

She clasps no golden zone of pride
Her fair and simple robe around;
By flowing riband, lightly tied,
Its graceful folds are bound.

And thus attired—a sportive thing,
Pure, loving, guileless, bright, and wild—
Proud Fashion! match me in your ring,
New England's mountain child!

She scorns to sell her rich, warm heart
For paltry gold or haughty rank,
But gives her love, untaught by art,
Confiding, free, and frank.

And, once bestowed, no fortune change
That high and generous faith can alter;
Through grief and pain, too pure to range,
She will not fly or falter.

Her foot will bound as light and free
In lowly hut as palace hall;
Her sunny smile as warm will be,
For love to her is all.

Has seen where in our woodland gloom
The rich magnolia proudly smiled?—
So brightly doth she bud and bloom,
New England's mountain child!

MUSIC.

The Father spake! In grand reverberations
Through space rolled on the mighty music-tide,
While to its low, majestic modulations,
The clouds of chaos slowly swept aside.

The Father spake—a dream, that had been lying Hushed from eternity in silence there,
Heard the pure melody and low replying,
Grew to that music in the wondering air—

Grew to that music—slowly, grandly waking,
Till bathed in beauty—it became a world!
Tis by his voice, its spheric pathway taking,
While glorious clouds their wings around it furled.

Nor yet has ceased that sound—his love revealing,
Though, in response, a universe moves by!
Throughout eternity, its echo pealing—
World after world awakes in glad reply!

And wheresoever, in his rich creation,
Sweet music breathes—in wave, or bird, or soul—
Tis but the faint and far reverberation
Of that great tune to which the planets roll!

GARDEN GOSSIP,

ACCOUNTING FOR THE COOLNESS BETWEEN THE LILY AND VIOLET.

"I will tell you a secret," the honeybee said,
To a violet drooping her dew-laden head;
"The lily's in love! for she listened last night,
While her sisters all slept in the holy moonlight,
To a zephyr that just had been rocking the rose,
Where hidden, I hearkened in seeming repose.

"I would not betray her to any but you;
But the secret is safe with a spirit so true—
It will rest in your bosom in silence profound."
The violet bent her blue eye to the ground:
A tear and a smile in her loving look lay,
While the light-winged gossip went whirling away.

"I will tell you a secret," the honeybee said,
And the young lily lifted her beautiful head—
"The violet thinks, with her timid blue eye,
To pass for a blossom enchantingly shy;
But for all her sweet manners, so modest and pure,
She gossips with every gay bird that sings to her.

"Now let me advise you, sweet flower, as a friend,
Oh, ne'er to such beings your confidence lend;
It grieves me to see one, all guileless like you,
Thus wronging a spirit so trustful and true:
But not for the world, love, my secret betray!"
And the little light gossip went buzzing away.

A blush in the lily's cheek trembled and fled:
"I'm sorry he told me," she tenderly said;
"If I may n't trust the violet, pure as she seems,
I must fold in my own heart my beautiful dreams."
Was the mischief well managed? fair lady is't true?
Did the light garden gossip take lessons of you!

THE UNEXPECTED DECLARATION.

"Azure-eyed Eloise, beauty is thine,
Passion kneels to thee, and calls thee divine;
Minstrels awaken the lute with thy name;
Poets have gladdened the world with thy fame;
Painters, half holy, thy loved image keep;
Beautiful Eloise, why do you weep?"
Still bows the lady her light tresses low—
Fast the warm tears from her veiled eyes flow.

"Sunny-haired Eloise, wealth is thine own;
Rich is thy silken robe—bright is thy zone;
Proudly the jewel illumines thy way;
Clear rubies rival thy ruddy lip's play;
Diamonds like star-drops thy silken braids deck;
Pearls waste their snow on thy lovelier neck;
Luxury softens thy pillow for sleep;
Angels watch over it: why do you weep?"
Bows the fair lady her light tresses low—
Faster the tears from her veiled eyes flow

"Gifted and worshipped one, genius and grace
Play in each motion, and beam in thy face:
When from thy rosy lip rises the song,
Hearts that adore thee the echo prolong;
Ne'er in the festival shone an eye brighter,
Ne'er in the mazy dance fell a foot lighter.
One only spirit thou'st failed to bring down:
Exquisite Eloise, why do you frown?"
Swift o'er her forehead a dark shadow stole,
Sent from the tempest of pride in her soul.

"Touched by thy sweetness, in love with thy grace,
Charmed by the magic of mind in thy face,
Bewitched by thy beauty, e'en his haughty strength,
The strength of the stoic, is conquered at length:
Lo! at thy feet—see him kneeling the while—
Eloise, Eloise, why do you smile?"
The hand was withdrawn from her happy blue eyes,
She gazed on her lover with laughing surprise;
While the dimple and blush, stealing soft to her cheek
Told the tale that her tongue was too timid to speak.

BEAUTY'S PRAYER.

Round great Jove his lightning shone,
Rolled the universe before him,
Stars, for gems, lit up his throne,
Clouds, for banners, floated o'er him.

With her tresses all untied,
Touched with gleams of golden glory,
Beauty came, and blushed, and sighed,
While she told her piteous story.

"Hear oh, Jupiter! thy child:
Right my wrong, if thou dost love me!
Beast and bird, and savage wild,
All are placed in power above me.

"Each his weapon thou hast given,
Each the strength and skill to wield it
Why bestow — Supreme in heaven!
Bloom on me with naught to shield it?

"Even the rose — the wild-wood rose,
Fair and frail as I, thy daughter,
Safely yields to soft repose,
With her lifeguard thorns about her."

As she spake in music wild,
Tears within her blue eyes glistened,
Yet her red lip dimpling smiled,
For the god benignly listened.

"Child of Heaven!" he kindly said,
"Try the weapons Nature gave thee;
And if danger near thee tread,
Proudly trust to them to save thee.

"Lance and talon, thorn and spear:
Thou art armed with triple power,
In that blush, and smile and tear!
Fearless go, my fragile flower.

"Yet dost thou, with all thy charms,
Still for something more beseech me? —
Skill to use thy magic arms?
Ask of Love — and Love will teach thee!"

SONG.

Should all who throng, with gift and song,
And for my favour bend the knee,
Forsake the shrine they deem divine,
I would not stoop my soul to thee!

The lips, that breathe the burning vow,
By falsehood base unstained must be;
The heart, to which mine own shall bow,
Must worship Honour more than me.

The monarch of a world wert thou,
And I a slave on bended knee,
Though tyrant chains my form might bow,
My soul should never stoop to thee!

Until its hour shall come, my heart
I will possess, serene and free;
Though snared to ruin by thine art,
'T would sooner break than bend to thee!

TO THE SPIRIT OF POETRY.

Leave me not yet! Leave me not cold and lonely,
Thou dear idol of my pining heart!
Thou art the friend — the beautiful — the only,
Whom I would keep, though all the world depart.
Thou, that dost veil the frailest flower with glory,
Spirit of light, and loveliness, and truth!
Thou that didst tell me a sweet, fairy story,
Of the dim future, in my wistful youth;
Thou, who canst weave a halo round the spirit,
Through which naught mean or evil dare intrude,
Resume not yet the gift, which I inherit
From Heaven and thee, that dearest, holiest good
Leave me not now! Leave me not cold and lonely,
Thou starry prophet of my pining heart!
Thou art the friend — the tenderest — the only,
With whom, of all, 't would be despair to part.

Thou that cam'st to me in my dreaming childhood,
Shaping the changeful clouds to pageants rare,
Peopling the smiling vale and shaded wildwood
With airy beings, faint yet strangely fair;
Telling me all the seaborne breeze was saying,
While it went whispering thro' the willing leaves,

Bidding me listen to the light rain playing
Its pleasant tune about the household caves;
Tuning the low, sweet ripple of the river,
Till its melodious murmur seemed a song,
A tender and sad chant, repeated ever,
A sweet, impassioned plaint of love and wrong —
Leave me not yet! Leave me not cold and lonely,
Thou star of promise o'er my clouded path!
Leave not the life that borrows from thee only
All of delight and beauty that it hath.

Thou, that when others knew not how to love me,
Nor cared to fathom half my yearning soul,
Didst wreath thy flowers of light around, above me,
To woo and win me from my grief's control:
By all my dreams, the passionate and holy,
When thou hast sung love's lullaby to me,
By all the childlike worship, fond and lowly,
Which I have lavished upon thine and thee;
By all the lays my simple lute was learning,
To echo from thy voice, stay with me still!
Once flown — alas! for thee there's no returning
The charm will die o'er valley, wood, and hill.
Tell me not Time, whose wing my brow has shaded,
Has wither'd spring's sweet bloom within my heart!
Ah, no! the rose of love is yet unfaded,
Though hope and joy, its sister flowers, depart.

Well do I know that I have wronged thine altar
With the light offerings of an idler's mind,
And thus, with shame, my pleading prayer I falter.
Leave me not, spirit! deaf, and dumb, and blind:
Deaf to the mystic harmony of Nature,
Blind to the beauty of her stars and flowers;
Leave me not, heavenly yet human teacher,
Lonely and lost in this cold world of ours.
Heaven knows I need thy music and thy beauty
Still to beguile me on my weary way,
To lighten to my soul the cares of duty,
And bless with radiant dreams the darkened day
To charm my wild heart in the worldly revel,
Lest I, too, join the aimless, false, and vain;
Let me not lower to the soulless level
Of those whom now I pity and disdain.

A WEED.

When from our northern woods pale summer, flying,
Breathes her last fragrant sigh — her low farewell —
While her sad wild flowers' dewy eyes, in dying,
Plead for her stay, in every nook and dell,

A heart, that loved too tenderly and truly,
Will break at last — and in some dim, sweet shade,
They'll smooth the sod o'er her you prized unduly,
And leave her to the rest for which she prayed.

Ah! trustfully, not mournfully, they'll leave her,
Assured that deep repose is welcomed well;
The pure, glad breeze can whisper naught to grieve her
The brook's low voice no wrongful tale can tell.

They'll hide her where no false one's footstep, stealing,
Can mar the chastened meekness of her sleep:
Only to Love and Grief her grave revealing,
And they will hush their chiding then — to weep!

And some — for though too oft she erred, too blindly
She was beloved, how fondly and how well! —
Some few, with faltering feet, will linger kindly,
And plant dear flowers within that silent dell.

I know whose fragile hand will bring the bloom
Best loved by both — the violet — to that bower;
And one will bid white lilies bless the gloom;
And one, perchance, will plant the passion-flower!

Then do thou come, when all the rest have parted —
Thou, who alone dost know her soul's deep gloom
And wreath above the lost, the broken-hearted,
Some idle weed — that knew not how to bloom

SILENT LOVE.

Ah! let our love be still a folded flower,
A pure, moss rosebud, blushing to be seen,
Hoarding its balm and beauty for that hour
When souls may meet without the clay between!

Let not a breath of passion dare to blow
Its tender, timid, clinging leaves apart;
Let not the sunbeam, with too ardent glow,
Profane the dewy freshness at its heart!

Ah! keep it folded like a sacred thing—
With tears and smiles its bloom and fragrance nurse;
Still let the modest veil around it cling,
Nor with rude touch its pleading sweetness curse.

Be thou content, as I, to know, not see,
The glowing life, the treasured wealth within—
To feel our spirit flower still fresh and free,
And guard its blush, its smile, from shame and sin!

Ah, keep it holy! once the veil withdrawn—
Once the rose blooms—its balmy soul will fly,
As fled of old in sadness, yet in scorn,
Th' awakened god from Psyche's daring eye:

CAPRICE.

Reprove me not that still I change
With every changing hour,
For glorious Nature gives me leave
In wave, and cloud, and flower.

And you and all the world would do—
If all but dared—the same;
True to myself—if false to you,
Why should I reck your blame.

Then cease your carping, cousin mine,
Your vain reproaches cease;
I revel in my right divine—
I glory in caprice!

Yon soft, light cloud, at morning hour,
Looked dark and full of tears:
At noon it seemed a rosy flower—
Now, gorgeous gold appears.

So yield I to the deepening light
That dawns around my way:
Because you linger with the night,
Shall I my noon delay?

No! cease your carping, cousin mine—
Your cold reproaches cease;
The chariot of the cloud be mine—
Take thou the reins, Caprice!

'Tis true you played on Feeling's lyre
A pleasant tune or two,
And oft beneath your minstrel fire
The hours in music flew;

But when a hand more skilled to sweep
The harp, its soul allures,
Shall it in sullen silence sleep
Because not touched by yours?

Oh, there are rapturous tones in mine
That mutely pray release;
They wait the master-hand divine—
So tune the chords, Caprice!

Go—strive the sea-wave to control;
Or, wouldst thou keep me thine,
Be thou all being to my soul,
And fill each want divine:

Play every string in Love's sweet lyre—
Set all its music flowing;
Be air, and dew, and light, and fire,
To keep the soul-flower growing.

Be less—thou art no love of mine.
So leave my love in peace;
'Tis helpless woman's right divine—
Her only right—caprice!

And I will mount her opal car,
And draw the rainbow reins,
And gayly go from star to star,
Till not a ray remains;

And we will find all fairy flowers
That are to mortals given,
And wreath the radiant, changing hours,
With those "sweet hints" of heaven.

Her humming-birds are harnessed there—
Oh! leave their wings in peace;
Like "flying gems" they glance in air—
We'll chase the light, Caprice!

ASPIRATIONS.

I waste no more in idle dreams
My life, my soul away;
I wake to know my better self—
I wake to watch and pray.
Thought, feeling, time, on idols vain,
I've lavished all too long:
Henceforth to holier purposes
I pledge myself, my song!

Oh! still within the inner veil,
Upon the spirit's shrine,
Still unprofaned by evil, burns
The one pure spark divine,
Which God has kindled in us all,
And be it mine to tend
Henceforth, with vestal thought and care,
The light that lamp may lend.

I shut mine eyes in grief and shame
Upon the dreary past—
My heart, my soul poured recklessly
On dreams that could not last:
My bark was drifted down the stream,
At will of wind or wave—
An idle, light, and fragile thing,
That few had cared to save.

Henceforth the tiller Truth shall hold
And steer as Conscience tells,
And I will brave the storms of Fate
Though wild the ocean swells.
I know my soul is strong and high,
If once I give it sway:
I feel a glorious power within,
Though light I seem and gay.

Oh, laggard Soul! unclothe thine eyes—
No more in luxury, soft
Of joy ideal waste thyself:
Awake, and soar aloft!
Unfurl this hour those falcon wings
Which thou dost fold too long;
Raise to the skies thy lightning gaze
And sing thy loftiest song!

LABOUR.

Pause not to dream of the future before us.
Pause not to weep the wild cares that come o'er us;
Hark, how Creation's deep, musical chorus,
Unintermitting, goes up into Heaven!
Never the ocean-wave falters in flowing;
Never the little seed stops in its growing;
More and more richly the Roseheart keeps glowing,
Till from its nourishing stem it is riven.

"Labour is worship!"—the robin is singing:
"Labour is worship!"—the wild bee is ringing:
Listen! that eloquent whisper upspringing,
Speaks to thy soul from out nature's great heart.

From the dark cloud flows the life-giving shower;
 From the rough sod blows the soft breathing flower;
 From the small insect, the rich coral bower;
 Only man, in the plan, shrinks from his part.

Labour is life!—"T is the still water faileth;
 Idleness ever despaireth, bidenailth;
 Keep the watch wound, for the dark rust assaileth!
 Flowers droop and die in the stillness of noon.
 Labour is glory!—the flying cloud lightens;
 Only the waving wing changes and brightens;
 Idle hearts only the dark future frightens:
 Play the sweet keys, wouldst thou keep them in tune!

Labour is rest—from the sorrows that greet us;
 Rest from all petty vexations that meet us,
 Rest from sin-promptings that ever entreat us,
 Rest from world-syrens that lure us to ill.
 Work—and pure slumbers shall wait on thy pillow;
 Work—thou shalt ride over Care's coming billow;
 Lie not down wearied 'neath Wo's weeping willow!
 Work with a stout heart and resolute will!

Labour is health—Lo! the husbandman reaping,
 How through his veins goes the life-current leaping!
 How his strong arm in its stalwart pride sweeping,
 True as a sunbeam the swift sickle guides.
 Labour is wealth—in the sea the pearl growth;
 Rich the queen's robe from the frail cocoon floweth;
 From the fine acorn the strong forest bloweth;
 Temple and statue the marble block hides.

Droop not though shame, sin and anguish are round thee!
 Bravely fling off the cold chain that hath bound thee!
 Look to yon pure heaven smiling beyond thee:
 Rest not content in thy darkness—a clod!
 Work—for some good, be it ever so slowly;
 Cherish some flower, be it ever so lowly:
 Labour!—all labour is noble and holy:
 Let thy great deeds be thy prayer to thy God.

OSTERWYK, MARIA VAN,

A DUTCH artist, gave such early proofs of her genius, that her father was induced to place her under the direction of John David de Heem, at Utrecht. She studied nature attentively, and improved so much by her master's precepts, that, in a short time, her works rivalled his. Her favourite subjects were flowers and still-life, which she painted in a delicate manner, and with great freedom of hand. She had so much skill as to adapt her touch to the different objects she imitated. She grouped her flowers with taste, and imitated their freshness and bloom admirably. Louis XIV. was exceedingly pleased with her performances, and honoured one with a place in his cabinet; as also did the emperor and empress of Germany, who sent to this artist, their own miniatures set in diamonds, as a mark of their esteem. King William III. gave her nine hundred florins for one picture, and she was much more highly rewarded for another by the king of Poland. As she spent a great deal of time over her works, she could finish but few comparatively, which has rendered her paintings extremely scarce and valuable.

P.

PAKINGTON, LADY DOROTHY,

DAUGHTER of Lord Coventry, and wife of Sir John Pakington, was eminent for her learning and piety, and ranked among her friends several celebrated divines. "The Whole Duty of Man" was ascribed to her at first, though the mistake has been discovered. Her acknowledged works are, "The Gentlemen's Calling," "The Ladies' Calling," "The Government of the Tongue," "The Christian's Birthright," and "The Causes of the Decay of Christian Piety." Her theological works are strictly orthodox, and evince ardent piety of feeling. She was, at the time of her decease, engaged in a work entitled "The Government of the Thoughts," which was praised, in high terms, by Dr. Fell; but this work she did not finish. Lady Pakington had received a learned education, which was not at that time uncommon to give to women of high rank; that she used her talents and learning wisely and well, we have this testimony in the writings of Dr. Fell. He says of her, "Lady Pakington was wise, humble, temperate, chaste, patient, charitable, and devout; she lived a whole age of great austerities, and maintained in the midst of them an undisturbed serenity." She died May 10th, 1679.

PALADINI, ARCHANGELA,

AN Italian historical painter, was born at Pisa, in 1599, and died in 1622, aged twenty-three. She was the daughter of Filippo Paladini, an eminent artist of that city, who instructed her in the art. She attained great excellence in portrait-painting, and also excelled in embroidery and music, and sang exquisitely. These uncommon talents, united with an agreeable person, procured her the friendship of Maria Magdalena, arch-duchess of Austria, who lived at Florence, and in whose court this artist spent the last years of her life.

PANZACCHIA, MARIA ELENA,

WAS born at Bologna, in 1668, of a noble family. She learned design under Emilio Taruffi, and in a few years acquired great readiness in composition, correctness of outline, and a lovely tint of colouring. Besides history, she also excelled in painting landscapes; and by the beauty of her situations and distances, allured and entertained the eye of every beholder. The figures which she inserted had abundance of grace; she designed them with becoming attitudes, and gave them a lively and natural expression. Her merit was incontestably acknowledged, and her works were so much prized as to be exceedingly scarce, few being found out of Bologna. She died in 1709.

PAOLINI, MASSIMI PETRONELLA,

OF Tagliacozzo, a province of Aquila, was born in 1663. She passed her life principally at Rome, and dedicated it to the cultivation of letters. She wrote in prose and in verse with equal facility and elegance. She has been eulogized by Crescimbini, by Muratori, and by Salvini, and was a member of the Arcadia, under the name of Fidelma Partenide. She died 1726. Her remaining works are two dramas, "Tomici," and "La Donna Illustre." She produced beside many canzonets and sonnets, and poems in various collections.

PARADIES, MARIA THERESA,

BORN at Vienna, 1753, equally as remarkable for her life as for her distinguished musical talent. At the early age of four years and eight months, she was, by a rheumatic apoplexy, totally deprived of her eyesight. When seven years old, she was taught on the piano and in singing; and three years after, she sang the Stabat Mater of Pergalesi, in the church of St. Augustin, at Vienna, accompanying herself on the organ. The empress, Maria Theresa, who was present at the performance, gave her immediately an annuity of two hundred florins. Soon the young musician advanced so far, as to play sixty concertos with the greatest accuracy. In the year 1784, she set out on a musical journey, and wherever she appeared, but especially in London, (1785), she excited, by her rare endowments, as well as by her misfortune, admiration and interest. She often moved her audience to tears by a cantate, the words of which were written by the blind poet Pfeffel, in which her own fate was depicted. Her memory was astonishing; she dictated all her compositions note by note. She was also well versed in other sciences, as geography, arithmetic. In company, she was cheerful, entertaining, witty, and highly interesting. During the latter part of her life she presided over an excellent musical institution in Vienna.

PARTHENAY, ANNE DE,

A LADY of great genius and learning, who lived in the sixteenth century. She married Anthony de Pons, count of Marennes, and was one of the brightest ornaments of the court of Ferrara. She was a Calvinist.

Her mother was Michelli de Sorbonne, a lady of Bretagne, a woman of uncommon talents, lady of honour to Anne of Bretagne, wife to Louis XII., by whom she was appointed governess to her daughter, Renata, duchess of Ferrara. Anne, under the superintendence of her mother, received a learned education, and made great progress in the knowledge of the languages, and in theology, and was also skilled in music. She had so great an influence over her husband, that while she lived he was distinguished as a lover of truth and virtue, and instructed himself, his officers and subjects at Pons, in the Scriptures; but after her death, he married one of the pleasure-loving ladies of the court, and became, from that time, an enemy and persecutor of the truth.

PARTHENAY, CATHARINE DE,

NIECE to Anne de Parthenay, and daughter and heiress of John de Parthenay, lord of Soubise, inherited her father's devotion to the cause of Calvinism. She published some poems in 1572, when she was only eighteen; and is thought to be the author of an "Apology for Henry IV.," a concealed but keen satire, which is considered an able production. She also wrote tragedies and comedies; her tragedy of "Holofernes" was acted in Rochelle, in 1574. In 1568, when only fourteen, she was married to Charles de Quellence, baron de Pont, in Brittany, who, upon this marriage, took the name of Soubise. He fell a sacrifice to his religion, in the general massacre of the Protestants, at Paris, on St. Bartholomew's day, 1571.

In 1575, his widow married Renatus, viscount Rohan; who dying in 1586, when she was only thirty-two, she resolved not to marry again, but to devote herself to her children. Her eldest son was the celebrated duke de Rohan, who maintained the Protestant cause with so much vigour during the civil wars in the reign of Louis XIII. Her second son was the duke de Soubise. She had also three daughters; Henriette, who died unmarried; and Catharine, who married a duke de Deux-ponts, 1605. It was this lady who made the memorable reply to Henry IV., when, attracted by her beauty, he declared a passion for her; "I am too poor, sire, to be your wife, and too nobly born to be your mistress." The third daughter was Anne, who never married, but lived with her mother, and bore with her all the calamities of the siege of Rochelle. The mother was then in her seventy-fifth year, and they were reduced, for three months, to living on horse-flesh and four ounces of bread a day; yet she wrote to her son, "not to let the consideration of their extremity, prevail on him to do anything to the injury of his party, how great soever their sufferings might be." She and her daughter refused to be included in the articles of capitulation, and were conveyed prisoners to the castle of Niort, where she died in 1631, aged seventy-seven.

PEARSON, MARGARET,

WAS an English lady, daughter of Samuel Paterson, an eminent book-auctioneer. She discovered early a taste for the fine arts; and on marrying Mr. Pearson, a painter on glass, she devoted herself to that branch of the art, in which she attained peculiar excellence. Among other fine specimens of her skill were two sets of the cartoons of Raphael, one of which was purchased by the Marquis of Lansdowne, and the other by Sir Gregory Page Turner. She died in 1823.

PENNINGTON, LADY,

WIFE of Sir Joseph Pennington, was separated, by family misunderstandings, from her children, for whose benefit she wrote "An Unfortunate Mother's Advice to her Absent Daughters," a work of great merit. She died in 1783.

PETIGNY, MARIA-LOUISA ROSE LEVÊSQUE

WAS born at Paris in 1768. Her father, Charles Peter Levêsque, was a well-known French writer on history and general literature, and became a member of the National Institute. His daughter, educated by him, displayed a genius for poetry; her "Idylles" and fugitive pieces were highly praised by Palesot and Florian. Gessner called her his "petite fille." She married M. Petigny, of Saint-Romain. The time of her death is not mentioned. The following piece is fanciful and pretty:—

LE PAPILLON.

Que ton sort est digne d'envie,
Papillon heureux et léger!
Le désir seul règle ta vie,
Et comme lui tu peux changer.

La fleur qui reçoit ton hommage
Te cède son plus doux trésor,
Et jamais un dur esclavage
N'arrête ton joyeux essor.

Je sais qu'une lueur trompeuse
T'attire souvent à la mort;
Que ton imprudence amoureuse
Dès le soir va finir ton sort.

Mais sans crainte, sans prévoyance,
Tu vis jusqu'au dernier soupir,
Et, dans ton heureuse ignorance,
Sans le savoir, tu vas mourir.

PERCY, ELIZABETH,

Was the only child and heir of Jocelyn Percy, last Earl of Northumberland. Her mother was Elizabeth Wriothesly, the sister of Lady Rachel Russel. Upon the death of her husband, she married Mr. Montague; and the young Elizabeth was given in charge to her paternal grandmother, but with the pledge that she was not to contract any marriage without the consent of her mother, who entered into a similar engagement with the grandmother. Notwithstanding these promises, at the age of eleven, Elizabeth Percy was, in 1679, made the wife of Henry Cavendish, Earl of Ogle, only son of the last Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, without the knowledge of her mother. The youthful husband died the following year, leaving her again an object of intrigue and speculation. She had scarcely been a widow a twelvemonth, when she was again, through the management of her grandmother, married to Thomas Thynne, Esq., of Longleat, remarkable for his large fortune. Though still a child in the nursery, the little beauty had learned to have a will of her own; and while she was made the tool of others, conceived so violent a dislike to her future husband, that she made her escape to Holland. Young as she was, the fame of her beauty, as well as her great wealth, attracted universal attention. Admiration and cupidity combined, caused a plan to be laid to set her free from the trammels that bound her, and leave her at liberty to make a new choice. The celebrated Count Koningsmark, whose beauty and daring had made him the theme of conversation and scandal from one end of Europe to the other, cast his eyes on the fair Elizabeth, and marked her for his own. He hired three bravos, and to these he gave commission to assassinate Mr. Thynne. This audacious project they boldly carried into execution. While their victim was driving through Pall-Mall, they stopped his horses, and fired at him through the carriage-window. The first shot was fatal; five balls entered his body, and he expired in a few hours. The heiress, now a second time a widow, though still little more than fifteen, was again disposed of; her third husband being Charles Seymour, commonly called the proud Duke of Somerset, of whom the tale is told of his repressing the familiarity of his second wife, Lady Charlotte Finch, when she tapped him upon the shoulder with her fan, "Madam," he said, turning haughtily round to the presuming beauty, with a frowning brow, "my first wife was a Percy, and she never took such a liberty." The Duke of Somerset was, at the period of his marriage, just twenty, handsome, commanding in his person, and with many good qualities. Nothing appears to have interrupted this marriage, or its subsequent harmony. The period of the Duchess of Somerset's death is unrecorded. The Duke's marriage with his second wife took place in 1726. The Duchess of Somerset was Groom of the Stole to Queen Anne. She succeeded the Duchess of Marlborough in that office, and was henceforward an object of dislike and vituperation to that power-loving duchess, who possessed in an eminent degree the quality so commended by Doctor Johnson, being "a good hater."

PHILIPS, CATHARINE,

Was the daughter of Mr. Fowler, a merchant of London, and was born there in 1631. She was educated at a boarding-school in Hackney, where she distinguished herself by her poetical talents. She married James Philips, Esq., of the Priory of Cardigan; and afterwards went with the viscountess of Dungannon into Ireland. She translated from the French, Corneille's tragedy of Pompey, which was acted several times in 1663 and 1664. She died in London of the small-pox, in 1664, to the regret of all; "having not left," says Langbaine, "any of her sex her equal in poetry." Cowley wrote an ode on her death; and Dr. Jeremy Taylor addressed to her his "Measures and Offices of Friendship." She wrote under the name of Orinda; and, in 1667, her works were printed as "Poems by the most deservedly admired Mrs. Catharine Philips, the matchless Orinda. To which is added several translations from the French, with her portrait."

AGAINST PLEASURE — AN ODE.

There's no such thing as pleasure here,
'Tis all a perfect cheat,
Which does but shine and disappear,
Whose charm is but deceit;
The empty bribe of yielding souls,
Which first betrays and then controls.

'Tis true, it looks at distance fair;
But if we do approach,
The fruit of Sodom will impair,
And perish at a touch;
It being than in fancy less,
And we expect more than possess.

For by our pleasures we are cloyed
And so desire is done;
Or else, like rivers, they make wide
The channels where they run;
And either way true bliss destroys,
Making us narrow, or our joys.

We covet pleasure easily,
But ne'er true bliss possess;
For many things must make it be,
But one may make it less;
Nay, were our state as we could choose,
'T would be consumed by fear to lose it.

What art thou, then, thou winged air,
More weak and swift than fame!
Whose next successor is despair,
And its attendant shame.
Th' experienced prince then reason had,
Who said of Pleasure—"It is mad."

A COUNTRY LIFE.

How sacred and how innocent
A country life appears,
How free from tumult, discontent,
From flattery or fears!

This was the first and happiest life,
When man enjoyed himself,
Till pride exchanged peace for strife,
And happiness for pelf.

'Twas here the poets were inspired,
Here taught the multitude;
The brave they here with honour fired,
And civilized the rude.

That golden age did entertain
No passion but of love:
The thoughts of ruling and of gun
Did ne'er their fancies move.

Them that do covet only war,
A cottage will suffice;
It is not brave to be possessed
Of earth, but to despise.

Opinion is the rate of things,
From hence our peace doth flow
I have a better fate than kings,
Because I think it so.

When all the stormy world doth roar
How unconcerned am I!
I cannot fear to tumble lower,
Who never could be high.

Secure in these unenvied walls,
I think not on the state,
And pity no man's ease that falls
From his ambition's height.

Silence and innocence are safe;
A heart that's nobly true,
At all these little arts can laugh,
That do the world subdue!

PICHLER, CAROLINE,

Was born in Vienna, in 1769. This very prolific and elegant writer has left an autobiography, under the title of "Review of my Life;" from this source have been gleaned the facts which form this sketch. As a specimen of her turn of thought, and style, the introductory remarks to her "Review," &c., are translated.

"A hundred times has life been compared to a journey, a pilgrimage, and the comparison sustained poetically, and sometimes unpoetically. Without pursuing this allegory in its details, I may be allowed to adopt the idea of man as a traveller, who often, from weariness, stops a day to recruit, or from the desire to pause on some beautiful spot, lingers an hour. At such stages he naturally turns back his thoughts to the places he has passed through; the persons he has encountered; the days of pleasure, and also the inconveniences, the storms, the difficulties, which have varied his route. Certain epochs arrive in life answering to these stages of the traveller, when it seems natural and salutary to throw a glance back upon the path we have traversed, and take an account of the schoolings of our minds, and the conduct we have pursued. The fiftieth year appears to be such an anniversary, when it is time to turn the thoughts backwards, and review the circumstances gone by. With heartfelt enjoyment the matron goes back to the days when she as a maiden, as a bride, as a young wife, has, with God's blessing, tasted so much good. With tender regret she reverently recalls many lost and distant affections, and thanks Providence even for those dark hours, which, like the shades in a picture, rather heighten the bright tints of her life's picture—clouds that have taught her to estimate the sunshine. What she has done and felt as a daughter, wife, and mother, can only interest the circle whose affection draws them close around her; but an account of the progress of her career as an author may be not uninteresting to the reading public, and may, without impropriety, be adjoined to this last collected edition of her works."

Her mother was the orphan of an officer who died in the service of the empress Maria Theresa, who took very gracious notice of the young lady, gave her a good education, and retained her near her person as a reader, until she was very respectably and happily married to an aukick counsellor. After their marriage, their tastes being congenial, they drew round them a circle of musical and literary celebrities; and their position at court being an elevated one, their house became the centre of the best society, in every sense of the word. Caroline, from her babyhood, breathed an atmosphere of literature; she was accustomed to hear the first men in science and in politics discuss interesting subjects, and converse upon elevated topics. Among many German professors and poets whose names are less familiar to the English reader, Maffei and Metastasio may be mentioned as intimates of this family. When it became time to give their son a Latin master, the parents of Caroline were assailed by the savants who visited their house, with the assurance that the little girl must share in this advantage—they had perceived the intelligence of her mind, and were desirous of cultivating it. The discussion ended by these gentlemen offering to teach her themselves, and the most eminent men of Vienna vied with one another in awakening the intellect and training the understanding of this fortunate young lady. After studying the classic tongues, she acquired the French, Italian, and English. Even in ornamental accomplishments she enjoyed very extraordinary advantages; for the great Mozart, who visited them frequently, though he gave lessons to nobody, condescended, from friendship, to advise and improve Caroline. Her brother appears to have partaken of the family taste for literature, though his sister's superiority has alone redeemed him from oblivion. He associated himself in a literary club of young men, who amused themselves with producing a sort of miscellany, made up of political essays, poems, tales, or whatever was convenient. To this Caroline contributed anonymously, and derived great benefit from the exercise in composition which it demanded. It was through this association that she became acquainted with her husband, one of its members. She was married in 1796, and lived for forty years in the enjoyment of a happy union. It was her husband who induced her to come before the public as a writer: he was proud of her abilities, and argued with her that her productions might be of service to her own sex. In 1800, she appeared in the republic of letters, and was received with much applause. Klopstock and Lavater both wrote her complimentary and encouraging letters. She describes her celebrated novel "Agathocles" to have been written after her perusal of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall," the sophistry and unfairness of which, with respect to Christianity, roused her indignation, and urged her to attempt a work in which a true picture of the early Christians should be portrayed according to really authentic accounts.

The disasters which attended the house of Austria at this period affected her powerfully. Animated with feelings of loyalty and patriotism, she determined to undertake a tragedy, which should breathe the German spirit of resistance to foreign invasion. "Heinrich von Hohenstaufen" appeared in 1812. It was received with warm enthusiasm, and procured for the author the acquaintance of several literary ladies—Madame von Baumberg, Madame Weisenthurn, and some others. Madame Pichler had but one child, a daughter, to whom she was tenderly devoted, and who rewarded her maternal cares by her goodness and filial piety. Caroline Pichler died in 1843.

As some of her best works we mention her "Agathocles," "The Siege of Vienna," "Dignity of Woman," and "The Rivals." Her works recommend themselves, by warm feeling, pure morals, and well-digested thoughts, as well as by a perfect style, and vivid descriptive powers. We would particularly mention "Agathocles," which is considered the most important on account of the matter, its subject being the struggles of new-born Christianity against the religion of Rome and Greece.

PIENNE, JOAN DE HALLUIN,

MAID of honour to Catharine de Medicis, was passionately beloved by Francis de Montmorenci, eldest son of the constable, Aun de Montmorenci. He engaged himself to her, but his parents opposed it, as they wished him to marry the widow of the duke de Castro, Henry's natural daughter. They sent to pope Paul IV., to obtain a dissolution of the engagement, which he would not grant, as he wished the duchess de Castro to marry a nephew of his. Henry II. then published an edict declaring clandestine marriages null and void, and ordered the lady de Pienne to be shut up in a monastery, and Francis de Montmorenci married the duchess. The lady de Pienne was married some time after, to a man inferior in rank to her first lover.

PILKINGTON, LETITIA,

Was the daughter of Dr. Van Lewen, a Dutch gentleman, who settled in Dublin, where she was born, in 1712. She wrote verses when very young, and this, with her vivacity, brought her many admirers. She married the Rev. Matthew Pilkington; but, she says, that soon after their marriage he became jealous of her abilities, and her poetical talents. However, it is said, that she gave him other and strong grounds for jealousy; so that, after her father's death, having no farther expectation of a fortune by her, Mr. Pilkington took advantage of her imprudence to obtain a separation from her.

She then came to London, where, through Colley Cibber's exertions, she was for some time supported by contributions from the great; but at length these succours failed, and she was thrown into prison. After remaining there nine weeks, she was released by Cibber, who had solicited charity for her; and, weary of dependence, she resolved to employ her remaining five guineas in trade; and, taking a shop in St. James' street, she furnished it with pamphlets and prints. She seems to have succeeded very well in this occupation; but she did not live long to enjoy her competence, for she went to Dublin, and died there, in her thirty-ninth year.

She wrote besides poems, her own memoirs, a comedy called "The Turkish Court, or London Apprentice," and a tragedy called "The Roman Father."

PINCKNEY, MARIA.

THIS lady (in every sense of the venerated title) was the eldest daughter of Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, of South Carolina; her mother, a sister of the Hon. Arthur Middleton, of Middleton Place, South Carolina, another of the signers of American independence. Education, together with excellent natural abilities, combined to form Miss Pinckney's very superior character; while the promptings of a truly benevolent heart always directed her hand to relieve the necessitous, and in every instance, to promote the comfort and welfare of others, making generous allowance for all human frailty. Warm were her friendships, and never did a shadow of caprice disturb their harmony, or mar the happiness of domestic life. Religiously and morally, she was a bright example unto death. Miss Pinckney was peculiarly impressed with love of country, but more especially her native state; she therefore deeply felt and weighed every movement derogatory, in her opinion, to its interests; so that, when South Carolina exhibited nullification principles, she took a strong and leading stand in favour of those principles, presenting to the public a very energetic and well-written work upon the subject. Its point was so full of effect as to cause an eminent statesman at Washington to exclaim, "That the nullification party of South Carolina was consolidated by the nib of a lady's pen."

Perhaps Miss Pinckney might have fairly taken for the motto of her publication—viewing the partial imposition of certain taxation in the light in which the party and herself beheld it—her father's never-to-be-forgotten, patriotic sentiment, in reply to the unjust demand made upon the United States by France—"Millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute." Miss Pinckney died a few years ago.

PINELLA, ANTONIA,

Was born at Bologna, and obtained the knowledge which she possessed of the art of painting from Lodovico Caracci, to whose style she adhered. Her principal works are in the different churches of her native city. She died there, in 1640.

PIOZZI, or THRALE, ESTHER LYNCH,

DISTINGUISHED for her intimacy with Dr. Johnson, was the daughter of John Salusbury, Esq., of Bodvel, in Carnarvonshire, England, where she was born, in 1739. In 1763, she married Henry Thrale, an opulent brewer in Southwark. Her beauty, vivacity and intelligence, made her house the resort of nearly all the literati of her time, and Dr. Samuel Johnson was almost domesticated with them. The following is Mrs. Thrale's own account of the manner in which they became acquainted with the author of the "Rambler":

"The first time I ever saw this extraordinary man was in the year 1764, when Mr. Murphy, who had long been the friend and confidential intimate of Mr. Thrale, persuaded him to wish for Johnson's conversation, extolling it in terms which that of no other person could have deserved, till we were only in doubt how to obtain his company, and find an excuse for the invitation. The celebrity of Mr. Woodhouse, a shoemaker, whose verses were at that time the subject of common discourse, soon afforded a pretence, and Mr. Murphy brought Johnson to meet him, giving me general cautions not to be surprised at his figure, dress, or behaviour. What I recollect best of the day's talk was his earnestly recommending Addison's works to Mr. Woodhouse as a model for imitation. 'Give nights and days, sir,' said he, 'to the study of Addison, if you mean either to be a good writer, or, what is more worth, an honest man.' When I saw something like the same expression in his criticism on that author, lately published, I put him in mind of his past injunctions to the young poet, to which he replied, 'That he wished the shoemaker might have remembered them as well.' Mr. Johnson liked his new acquaintance so much, however, that, from that time, he dined with us on every Thursday through the winter, and, in the autumn of the next year, he followed us to Brighthelmstone, whence we were gone before his arrival; so that he was disappointed and enraged, and wrote us a letter expressive of anger, which we were desirous to pacify, and to obtain his company again if possible. Mr. Murphy brought him back to us again very kindly, and from that time his visits grew more frequent, till, in the year 1766, his health, which he had always complained of, grew so exceedingly bad, that he could not stir out of his room in the court he inhabited for many weeks together—I think months. * * *

"Mr. Thrale's attentions and my own now became so acceptable to him, that he often lamented to us the horrible condition of his mind, which he said was nearly distracted. * * *

"Mr. Thrale went away soon after, leaving me with him, and bidding me prevail on him to quit his close habitation in the court, and come to us at Streatham, where I undertook the care of his health, and had the honour and happiness of contributing to its restoration."

Dr. Johnson appears to have enacted the mentor as well as the friend at Streatham, perhaps rather oftener than was quite agreeable to his lively hostess, who has, however, with perfect candour, mentioned some instances of his reproofs, in her amusing anecdotes of his life, even when the story told against herself. On one occasion, on her observing to a friend that she did not like goose,— "One smells it so while it is roasting," said she.

"But you, madam," replied the doctor, "have been at all times a fortunate woman, having always had your hunger so forestalled by indulgence, that you never experienced the delight of smelling your dinner beforehand."

On another occasion, during a very hot and dry summer, when she was naturally but thoughtlessly wishing for rain, to lay the dust, as they drove along the Surrey roads. "I cannot bear," replied he, with some asperity, and an altered look, "when I know how many poor families will perish next winter for want of that bread which the present drought will deny them, to hear ladies sighing for rain, only that their complexions may not suffer from the heat, or their clothes be incommoded by the dust. For shame! leave off such foppish lamentations, and study to relieve those whose distresses are real."

Mr. Thrale died in 1781, and his widow retired with her four daughters to Bath. In 1784, she married Gabriel Piozzi, an Italian music-master; and this caused a complete rupture between her and Johnson, who had tried in vain to dissuade her from this step. After Johnson's death, Mrs. Piozzi published, in 1786, a volume, entitled "Anecdotes of Dr. Samuel Johnson, during the last Twenty Years of his Life." Many things in this work gave great offence to Boswell and other friends of Johnson. But Mrs. Piozzi, notwithstanding, soon published another work, called "Letters to and from Johnson."

But though seemingly devoted to literature and society, she never neglected her children. In a letter to Miss Burney she says, "I have read to them the Bible from beginning to end, the Roman and English histories, Milton, Shakspeare, Pope, and Young's works from head to heel; Warton and Johnson's Criticisms on the Poets; besides a complete system of dramatic writing; and classical—I mean the English classics—they are most perfectly acquainted with. Such works of Voltaire, too, as were not dangerous, we have worked at; Rollin des Belles Lettres, and a hundred more."

A friend, who, in an agreeable little work, called "Piozziana," has recorded several interesting anecdotes of the latter days of this celebrated lady, has given the following account of Mrs. Piozzi, quite late in life:

"She was short, and, though well-proportioned, broad, and deep-chested. Her hands were muscular and almost coarse, but her writing was, even in her eightieth year, exquisitely beautiful; and one day, while conversing with her on the subject of education, she observed that 'All misses now-a-days write so like each other, that it is provoking;' adding, 'I love to see individuality of character, and abhor sameness, especially in what is feeble and flimsy.' Then spreading her hand, she said, 'I believe I owe what you are pleased to call my good writing to the shape of this hand, for my uncle, Sir Robert Cotton, thought it too manly to be employed in writing like a boarding-school girl; and so I came by my vigorous, black manuscript.'"

From this "Piozziana" we will give a few anecdotes, which paint the character of Mrs. Piozzi better than would an elaborate description.

At Bath, she sat to Roche for her portrait, requiring him to make the painting in all respects a likeness; to take care to show her face deeply rouged, which it always was; and to introduce a trivial deformity of the lower jaw on the left side, where she had been severely hurt by her horse treading on her, as she lay prostrate, after being thrown in Hyde Park. This miniature her friend states to be, "in the essential of resemblance, perfect; as all who recollect the original, her very erect carriage, and most expressive face, could attest."

When looking at "her little self," as she called the picture, she would speak drolly of what she once was, as if talking of some one else. One day, turning to her friend, she said, "No; I never was handsome, I had always too many strong points in my face for beauty."

"I ventured to express a doubt of this," continues the narrative, "and said that Dr. Johnson was certainly an admirer of her personal charms. She replied, she believed his devotion was at least as warm towards the table and the table-talk at Streatham. I was tempted to observe that I thought, as I still do, that Johnson's anger on the event of her second marriage was excited by some feeling of disappointment, and that I suspected he had formed hopes of attaching her to himself. It would be disingenuous on my part to attempt to repeat her answer; I forget it; but the impression on my mind is, that she did not contradict me."

On her friend's telling her, he wondered she should so far sacrifice to fashion, as to take the trouble of wearing rouge, which she carefully put on her cheeks every day before she went out, and generally before she would admit a visitor, her answer was, "that her practice of painting did not proceed from any silly compliance with Bath fashion, or any fashion; still less, if possible, from the desire of appearing younger than she was; but from this circumstance, that in early life she had worn rouge, as other young persons did in her day, as a part of dress; and after continuing the habit for some years, she discovered that it had introduced a dead yellow into her complexion, quite unlike that of her natural skin, and that she wished to conceal the deformity."

In defiance of the prevailing weaknesses among old people, that of supposing every thing worse now than it was formerly, she always maintained that "nothing but ignorance or forgetfulness of what our grandfathers and grandmothers generally did and suffered, not politically, but in matters of dress, behaviour, &c., could incline any one to entertain a doubt as to the fact of modern improvement in most of the essentials of life. This," she would say, "was especially true with regard to our habiliments;" and she used to expatiate very agreeably, not only on the absurdities of the habits usually worn in her early days, but on the consequent embarrassment in which the artists of the age were involved.

"Mrs. Piozzi's nature was one of kindness," observes her friend; "she derived pleasure from endeavouring to please; and if she perceived a moderate good quality in another, she generally magnified it into an excellence; whilst she appeared blind to faults and foibles which could not have escaped the scrutiny of one possessing only half her penetration. But, as I have said, her disposition was friendly. It was so; and to such an extent, that during several years of familiar acquaintance with her, although I can recite many instances, I might say, hundreds, of her having spoken of the characters of others, I never heard one word of vituperation from her lips, of any person who was the subject of discussion, except once when Baretti's name was mentioned. Of him, she said that he was a bad man; but on my hinting a wish for particulars, after so heavy a charge, she seemed unwilling to explain herself, and spoke of him no more."

She preserved, unimpaired to the last, her strength and her faculties of body and mind. When past eighty, she would describe minute features in a distant landscape, or touches in a painting, which even short-sighted young persons failed to discover till pointed out to them.

When her friends were fearful of her over-exciting herself, she would say, "This sort of thing is greatly in the mind, and I am almost tempted to say the same of growing old at all, especially as it regards those of the usual concomitants of age, viz., laziness, defective sight, and ill-temper: sluggishness of soul and acrimony of disposition, commonly begin before the encroachments of infirmity; they creep upon us insidiously, and it is the business of a rational being to watch these beginnings, and counteract them."

On the 27th of January, 1820, Mrs. Piozzi gave a sumptuous entertainment at the Town Assembly Rooms, Bath, to between seven and eight hundred friends, whom, assisted by Sir John and Lady Salusbury, she received with a degree of ease, cheerfulness, and polite hospitality, peculiarly her own. This fête, given upon the completion of her eightieth year, was opened by herself in person dancing with Sir John Salusbury, with extraordinary elasticity and dignity, and she subsequently presided at a sumptuous banquet, supported by a British Admiral of the highest rank on each side, "with her usual gracious and queen-like deportment."

A friend calling on her one day by appointment, she showed him a number of what are termed pocket-books, and said she was sorely embarrassed on a point on which she requested his advice.

"You see in this collection," said she, "a diary of mine of more than fifty years of my life: I have scarcely omitted anything which occurred to me during the time I have mentioned; my books contain the conversation of every person of almost every class with whom I have held intercourse; my remarks on what was said; downright facts, and scandalous on dits; personal portraits, and anecdotes of the character concerned, criticisms on the publications and authors of the day, &c. Now I am approaching the grave, and agitated by doubts as to what I should do—whether burn my manuscripts, or leave them to posterity? Thus far, my decision is to destroy my papers; shall I, or shall I not?"

The advice given was by no means to do an act which, when done, could not be amended—to keep the papers from prying eyes, and to trust them to the discretion of survivors. Whereupon, she replaced the numerous volumes in her cabinet, observing, that "for the present they were rescued from destruction."

If this diary has not been destroyed, there would, doubtless, be found portions of it well worth publishing. Dr. Johnson said of Mrs. Piozzi, that "she was, if not the wisest woman in the world, undoubtedly one of the wittiest."

Mrs. Piozzi died May 2d, 1821, aged eighty-one years. Her last words were, "I die in the trust and in the fear of God." Her remains were conveyed to North Wales, and interred in the burial-place of the Salusbury family. The following are her published works:—"Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson's Life;" "Travels," two volumes; "Letters to and from the late Samuel Johnson, LL.D.," two volumes; "British Synonymy," two volumes; "Retrospection, or Review of the Most Striking and Important Events which the last Eighteen Hundred Years have Presented," &c., two volumes.

Her first printed piece has been considered by many critics her best. We subjoin it.

THE THREE WARNINGS.

The tree of deepest root is found
Least willing still to quit the ground;
'Twas therefore said by ancient sages,
That love of life increased with years
So much, that in our latter stages,
When pains grow sharp, and sickness rages,
The greatest love of life appears.
This great affection to believe,
Which all confess, but few perceive.
If old assertions can't prevail,
Be pleased to hear a modern tale.

When sports went round, and all were gay
On neighbour Dodson's wedding-day,
Death called aside the jocund groom
With him into another room,
And looking grave—"You must," says he,
"Quit your sweet bride, and come with me."
"With you! and quit my Susan's side?
With you!" the hapless husband cried;
"Young as I am, 'tis monstrous hard!
Besides, in truth, I'm not prepared:
My thoughts on other matters go;
This is my wedding-day, you know."

What more he urged I have not heard,
His reasons could not well be stronger;
So death the poor delinquent spared,
And left to live a little longer.
Yet calling up a serious look,
His hour-glass trembled while he spoke—
"Neighbour," he said, "farewell! no more
Shall Death disturb your mirthful hour:
And farther, to avoid all blame
Of cruelty upon my name,
To give you time for preparation,
And fit you for your future station,
Three several warnings you shall have,
Before you're summoned to the grave;
Willing for once I'll quit my prey,
And grant a kind reprieve;
In hopes you'll have no more to say;
But, when I call again this way,
Well pleased the world will leave"
To these conditions both consented,
And parted perfectly contented.

What next the hero of our tale befell,
How long he lived, how wise, how well,
How roundly he pursued his course,
And smoked his pipe, and stroked his horse,
The willing muse shall tell:
He chaffered, then he bought and sold,
Nor once perceived his growing old,
Nor thought of Death as near:
His friends not false, his wife no shrew,
Many his gains, his children few,
He passed his hours in peace.
But while he viewed his wealth increase
While thus along life's dusty road,
The beaten track content he trod,
Old Time, whose haste no mortal spares,
Uncalled, unheeded, unawares,
Brought on his eightieth year.
And now, one night, in musing mood,
As all alone he sate,
The unwelcome messenger of Fate
Once more before him stood

Half-killed with anger and surprise,
"So soon returned!" old Dodson cries.
"So soon d'ye call it?" Death replies:
"Surely, my friend, you're but in jest!
Since I was here before
'Tis six-and-thirty years at least,
And you are now fourscore."

"So much the worse," the clown rejoined;
 'To spare the aged would be kind:
 However, see your search be legal;
 And your authority—is't regal?
 Else you are come on a fool's errand,
 With but a secretary's warrant.
 Beside, you promised me Three Warnings,
 Which I have looked for nights and mornings;
 But for that loss of time and ease,
 I can recover damages."

"I know," cries Death, "that at the best,
 I seldom am a welcome guest;
 But don't be captious, friend, at least;
 I little thought you'd still be able
 To stump about your farm and stable:
 Your years have run to a great length;
 I wish you joy, though, of your strength!"

"Hold," says the farmer, "not so fast!
 I have been lame these four years past."
 "And no great wonder," Death replies:
 "However, you still keep your eyes;
 And sure to see one's loves and friends,
 For legs and arms would make amends."
 "Perhaps," says Dodson, "so it might,
 But latterly I've lost my sight."
 "This is a shocking tale, 'tis true;
 But still there's comfort left for you:
 Each strives your sadness to amuse;
 I warrant you hear all the news."
 "There's none," cries he; "and if there were,
 I'm grown so deaf, I could not hear."
 "Nay, then," the spectre stern rejoined,
 These are unjustifiable yearnings;
 If you are lame, and deaf, and blind,
 You've had your Three sufficient Warnings;
 So come along, no more we'll part."
 He said, and touched him with his dart.
 And now Old Dodson, turning pale,
 Yields to his fate—so ends my tale.

From her "Character of Dr. Johnson" we select a few hints:

Of Mr. Johnson's erudition the world has been the judge, and we who produce each a score of his sayings, as proofs of that wit which in him was inexhaustible, resemble travellers who, having visited Delhi or Golconda, bring home each a handful of Oriental pearl to evince the riches of the Great Mogul. May the public condescend to accept my ill-strung selection with patience at least, remembering only that they are relics of him who was great on all occasions; and, like a cube in architecture, you beheld him on each side, and his size still appeared undiminished.

As his purse was ever open to almsgiving, so was his heart tender to those who wanted relief, and his soul susceptible of gratitude, and of every kind impression; yet though he had refined his sensibility, he had not endangered his quiet by encouraging in himself a solicitude about trifles, which he treated with the contempt they deserve.

* * * * *

His veracity was, indeed, from the most trivial to the most solemn occasions, strict, even to severity; he scorned to embellish a story with fictitious circumstances, which, he used to say, took off from its real value. "A story," says Johnson, "should be a specimen of life and manners; but if the surrounding circumstances are false, as it is no more a representation of reality, it is no longer worthy our attention."

For the rest,—that beneficence which, during his life, increased the comforts of so many, may after his death be perhaps ungratefully forgotten but that piety which dictated the serious papers in the Rambler, will be for ever remembered;—for ever, I think, revered. That ample repository of religious truth, moral wisdom, and accurate criticism, breathes indeed the genuine emanations of its great author's mind, expressed too in a style so natural to him, and so much like his common mode of conversing, that I was myself but little astonished when he told me, that he had scarcely read over one of those inimitable essays before they went to the press.

I have spoken of his piety and his charity, his truth and the delicacy of his sentiments; and when I search for shadow to my portrait, none can I find but what was formed by pride.

PISCOPIA, CORNARO ELENE,

Was born at Venice, 1646. This lady was remarkable for her learning. Her erudition was very highly appreciated by the scholars of that age, and there are many records of great praise being offered her by distinguished men. She understood Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Spanish, French, and Arabic. She was a professor of philosophy, mathematics, theology, and astronomy. She was presented with the wreath and dignity of laureate, in the Duomo of Padua, in 1678. To these grave acquirements she added skill in music and poetry, with a talent for improvisation. Early in childhood she announced a determination against matrimony, in which she persevered, though greatly opposed by her parents, who were desirous and urgent that she should form some illustrious connexion; but the duties of the married life she thought would be incompatible with her engrossing love for study. She possessed sincere piety, a little too much tinctured with ascetic superstition as regarded herself, but drawing forth most benevolent and kindly dispositions towards her relations, dependants, and the indigent populace. For the most part of her life she was a patient martyr to acute disease, and died in 1684.

Her works which remain are, "Eulogiums on several illustrious Italians," written in Latin, Latin epistles, academical discourses in the vernacular tongue, a translation from the Spanish of Lanspergio, besides a volume of poems.

PIX, MARY,

By birth Mary Griffith, was the daughter of a clergyman, and was born in Yorkshire, in the reign of William III. of England. She was a contemporary of Mrs. Manley and Mrs. Cockburne, and was satirized with them in a little dramatic piece, called the "Female Wits." She was the author of a number of plays, published between 1696 and 1705.

PIZZOLI, MARIA LUIGIA,

Was born at Bologna, in 1817, the only offspring of Luigi Pizzoli, a gentleman of that city. Her parents perceiving early indications of uncommon abilities, gave her every means of instruction within their reach; these she improved to such advantage that she soon became quite noted for the extent of her information, and the variety of her accomplishments. The most learned men in the society she frequented, would appeal to her in any "historic doubts," and so clear was her knowledge on such points, and so accurate her memory in dates, that she never was at fault in deciding the question. But far from assuming any unseemly arrogance, her manners were distinguished by an amiable simplicity. Her predominant passion was music; her father gave her as a master Pilotti, an excellent professor of counterpoint; he was, in a short time, so struck with the talents of his scholar, that drawing her father aside, "Sir," said he, "your daughter is a genius; the love I bear to my art makes me entreat you to allow me to instruct her in counterpoint; her success is infallible." This business undertaken, Luigia applied herself with the tenacity that is inspired by the passionate love of the science. As a pianist she soon ranked among the first; but a much higher praise awaited her as a composer. In 1836 the newspaper of Bologna published the following paragraph:

"The very beautiful symphony written by the young amateur Luigia Pizzoli, was executed by our orchestra, and received most favourably. It is calculated to please all persons of taste, for combined with much learning, and studied elaborations, we find that gracious melody the Italian ear demands."

Soon after this she was invited by the musical academy of Bologna, to accompany the greatest harpist of Italy at a musical festival. She made her first appearance, not only as a performer, but as a composer; for besides accompanying the harp in a most admirable manner, she played a sonata for four hands, composed by herself; the well-known Corticelli took the bass. The following day the papers abounded with panegyrics on this young lady. In the midst of her rising fame, consumption, with which she had once been threatened, came to tear this beloved and charming girl from the arms of her parents. Her last illness presented a model of Christian piety and resignation, together with the utmost cheerfulness, and tender efforts to soften the blow to her wretched father and mother. In her dying state, she was still an artist; her last wishes and acts were to encourage and improve the art she so loved. She obtained from her father permission to endow a perpetual foundation for a yearly prize, to be given by the Philharmonic Society of Bologna, to any of the young students, not excluding women, who shall produce the best fugue; the decision to rest with the presiding professors of counterpoint.

Three days after, the 10th of January, 1838, Luigia expired. The number of her works, in so short a period, is a reproach to those who live long, and accomplish nothing. An edition of these was printed at Milan, in 1840. After her death, her symphony was executed by the professors of that city.

PLUMPTRE, ARABELLA,

NIECE of the Rev. Dr. Plumptre, for many years president of Queen's College, Cambridge, wrote a number of books for the young, which were well received. Among these were, "The Mountain Cottage," a tale; "The Foresters," a drama; "Domestic Stories from various Authors;" "The Guardian Angel," a tale, translated from the German of Kotzebue; "Montgomery, or Scenes in Wales," two volumes; "Stories for Children," &c.

PLUNKETT, MRS.,

Whose maiden name was Gunning, an English writer, acquired considerable celebrity as an ingenious novelist. She published "The Packet," four volumes; "Lord Fitzhenry," three volumes; "The Orphans of Snowden," three volumes; "The Gipsy Countess," four volumes; "The Exiles of Erin," three volumes; "Dangers through Life," three volumes; "The Farmer's Boy," four volumes; "Malvina," three volumes; "Family Stories for Young Persons," two volumes; "The Village Library for the Use of Young Persons," three volumes; and "Memoirs of a Man of Fashion."

POCAHONTAS,

THE daughter of Powhatan, a celebrated Indian chief of Virginia, was born about the year 1594. According to a custom common among the Indians, of bestowing upon their children several symbolic names, she was sometimes called Matoaka. When the well-known and adventurous Captain John Smith came to this continent, for the purpose of promoting its settlement by the English, while exploring the James river, he was taken prisoner by some of the warriors of the tribes under Powhatan, and brought before this powerful chief to be disposed of. The fame and exploits of Smith had reached Powhatan, and he was considered too dangerous an enemy to be permitted to live. A council was called, and his fate decided; he was condemned to be bound and placed upon the earth, with his head upon a stone, and his brains beaten out with clubs. Pocahontas, though but a child of twelve or thirteen years, was present at this council, and heard the sentence; but when it was about to be executed, yielding to the generous impulses of her nature, she flung herself upon the body of Smith, beneath her father's uplifted club, and protected his life at the risk of her own. Touched by this act of heroism, the savages released their prisoner, and he became an inmate of the wigwam of Powhatan, who soon after gave him his liberty.

About two years later, the Indians, alarmed at the extraordinary feats of Smith, and fearing his increasing influence, began to prepare for hostilities, and laid a plan for entrapping him. When on the eve of effecting their object, while Smith was on a visit to Powhatan for the purpose of procuring provisions, he was preserved from this fate by the watchful care of Pocahontas, who ventured through the woods more than nine miles, at midnight, to apprise him of his danger. For this service, Smith offered her some trinkets, which, to one of her age, sex, and nation, must have been strongly tempting; but she refused to accept any thing, or to partake of any refreshment, and hurriedly retraced her steps, that she might not be missed by her father or his wives.

For three or four years after this, Pocahontas continued to assist the settlers in their distresses, and to shield them from the effects of her father's animosity. Although a great favourite with her father, he was so incensed against her for favouring the whites, that he sent her away to a chief of a neighbouring tribe, Jopazaws, chief of Potowmac, for safe keeping; or, as some suppose, to avert the anger of her own tribe, who might be tempted to revenge themselves upon her for her friendship to the English. Here she remained some time, when Captain Argall, who ascended the Potomac on a trading expedition, tempted the chief by the offer of a large copper kettle, of which he had become enamoured, as the biggest trinket he had ever seen, to deliver her to him as a prisoner; Argall believing, that by having her in his possession as a hostage, he could bring Powhatan to terms of peace. But Powhatan refused to ransom his daughter upon the terms proposed; he offered five hundred bushels of corn for her, but it was not accepted.

Pocahontas was well treated while a prisoner, and Mr. Thomas Rolfe, a pious young man, and a brave officer, who had undertaken to instruct her in English, became attached to her, and offered her his hand. The offer was communicated to Powhatan, who gave his consent to the union, and she was married to Rolfe, after the form of the church of England, in presence of her uncle and two brothers. This event relieved the colony from the enmity of Powhatan, and preserved peace for many years between them.

In the year 1616, Pocahontas accompanied her husband to England, where she was presented at court, and became an object of curiosity and interest to all classes; her title of princess causing her to receive much attention. Though the period of her conversion is disputed, it is generally believed that she was baptized during this visit to England, when she received the name of Rebecca. In London, she was visited by captain Smith, whom, for some unknown purpose, she had been taught to believe was dead. When she first beheld him, she was overcome with emotion; and turning from him, hid her face in her hands. Many surmises have been hazarded upon the emotion exhibited by Pocahontas in this interview. The solution of the mystery, however, is obvious; the dusky maiden had no doubt learned to love the gallant soldier whom she had so deeply benefited; and upon his abandonment of the country, both the colonists and her own people, aware of her feelings, and having some alliance in view for her to the furthering of their own interests, had imposed upon her the tale of his death. Admitting this to be the case, what could be more natural than her conduct, and what more touching than the picture which this interview presents to the imagination?

Captain Smith wrote a memorial to the queen in her behalf, setting forth the services which the Indian princess had rendered to himself and the colony, which secured her the friendship of the queen. Pocahontas survived but little more than a year after her arrival in England. She died in 1617, at Gravesend, when about to embark for her native land, at the age of twenty-two or three. She left one son, who was educated in England by his uncle, and afterwards returned to Virginia, where he became a wealthy and distinguished character, from whom have descended several well-known families of that state.

Pocahontas has been the heroine of fiction and of song; but the simple truth of her story is more interesting than any ideal description. She is another proof to the many already recorded in this work, of the intuitive moral sense of woman, and the importance of her aid in carrying forward the progress of human improvement.

Pocahontas was the first heathen who became converted to Christianity by the English settlers; the religion of the Gospel seemed congenial to her nature; she was like a guardian angel to the white strangers who had come to the land of the red men; by her the races were united; thus proving the unity of the human family through the spiritual nature of the woman; ever, in its highest development, seeking the good and at "enmity" with the evil; the preserver, the inspirer, the exemplar of the noblest virtues of humanity.

POICTIERS, DIANA DE, DUCHESS OF VALENTINOIS,

Was born March 31st, 1500. When her father, the count of St. Vallier, was condemned to lose his head for favouring the escape of the constable Bourbon, Diana obtained his pardon by throwing herself at the feet of Francis I. St. Vallier was, however, sentenced to perpetual confinement; and the horror he experienced at this fate brought on a fever, of which he died.

Diana de Poitiers married, in 1521, Louis de Breze, grand-marshal of Normandy; by him she had two daughters, whom she married very advantageously. She must have been at least thirty-five years of age, when the duke of Orleans, afterwards Henry II. of France, at the age of seventeen became deeply attached to her; and she maintained her ascendancy over him till his death, in 1559.

Henry seemed to delight in giving testimonies of his attachment, both in public and private. The palaces, public edifices, and his own armour, were all ornamented with "the moon, bow and arrows," the emblems and device of his mistress. Her influence, both personal and political, was carried to an unbounded extent. She may be said to have divided the crown with her lover, of whose council she was the directing principal, and of whose attachment she was the sole object. The young queen, Catharine de Medicis, not inferior in genius, taste, and beauty, to Diana, was obliged to act a subordinate part.

Diana was made duchess de Valentinois in 1549. In 1552, she nursed the queen in a dangerous illness, notwithstanding their bitter feeling towards each other. She preferred the interest of the state to the aggrandizement of her family; and she loved the glory of her king. Her charities were immense; and every man distinguished for genius was sure of her support. Yet she did not always make a good use of her power; for she persuaded Henry to break the truce with Spain, which was the source of many evils to France. She did this at the instigation of the cardinal of Lorraine; but he, with the rest of the Guises, no sooner saw the result, than they leagued with Catharine de Medicis to ruin Diana, if she would consent to the marriage of their niece, Mary, queen of Scotland, to the dauphin. This was done, and the duchess remained without support; but she did not lose her firmness; the king promised to inform her of all the plots of her enemies; but he died soon after of a wound he received in a tournament, where he had worn her colours, black and white, as usual.

Catharine sent her an order to deliver up the royal jewels, and retire to one of her castles. "Is the king dead?" asked she. "No, Madame," replied the messenger, "but he cannot live till night." "Then," said Diana, "I have as yet no master. When he shall be no more, should I be so unfortunate as to survive him long, I shall be too wretched to be sensible of their malice."

Catharine, however, was persuaded not to persecute the duchess, who, in return for being allowed to retain the superb gifts of the king, presented her with a magnificent palace. Diana retired to Anet, a palace built for her by Henry II.; but was recalled, in 1561, by Catharine, to detach the constable de Montmorency from his nephews, the Chatillons, which service her great influence over him enabled her to perform.

She died in 1566, at the age of sixty-six, retaining her beauty to the last.

Miss Pardoe, in her History of Francis I., thus describes Diana:—"Her features were regular and classical; her complexion faultless; her hair of a rich purple-black, which took a golden tint in the sunshine; while her teeth, her ankles, her hands and arms, and her bust, were each in their turn the theme of the court poets. That the extraordinary and almost fabulous duration of her beauty was in a great degree due to the precautions which she adopted, there can be little doubt, for she spared no effort to secure it; she was jealously careful of her health, and in the most severe weather bathed in cold water; she suffered no cosmetic to approach her, denouncing every compound of the kind as worthy only of those to whom nature had been so niggardly as to compel them to complete her imperfect work; she rose every morning at six o'clock, and had no sooner left her chamber than she sprang into the saddle; and after having galloped a league or two, returned to bed, where she remained until midday engaged in reading. The system appears a singular one, but in her case it undoubtedly proved successful, as, after having enslaved the duke d'Orleans in her thirty-fifth year, she still reigned in absolute sovereignty over the heart of the king of France when she had nearly reached the age of sixty! It is certain, however, that the magnificent Diana owed no small portion of this extraordinary and unprecedented constancy to the charms of her mind and the brilliancy of her intellect."

"Six months before her death," says Brantôme, "I saw her so handsome, that no heart of adamant could have been insensible to her charms, though she had some time before broken one of her limbs upon the paved stones of Orleans. She had been riding on horseback, and kept her seat as dexterously and well as she had ever done. One would have thought that the pain of such an accident would have made some alteration in her lovely face; but this was not the case; she was as beautiful, graceful, and handsome in every respect, as she had ever been."

She was the only mistress whose medal was struck. This was done by the city of Lyons, where the duchess was much beloved. On one side was her effigy, with this inscription: Diana, Dux Valentiniarum Clarissima; and on the reverse, Omnium Victorum Vici: "I have conquered the conqueror of all;" alluding to Henry II. The king had another medal struck in 1552, where she is represented as Diana, with these words: Nomen ad Astra. The H.'s and D.'s cyphered in the Louvre, are still greater proofs of the passion of the prince. She told Henry, when he wished to acknowledge a daughter he had by her, "I was born of a family, the old counts of Poitiers, which entitled me to have legitimate children by you; I have been your mistress, because I loved you; but I will not suffer any arrêt to declare me so." This reply proves her sense of the superior dignity of virtue over vice. She would not glory in her shame; she felt she had degraded the race from which she sprang.

POLLEY, MARGARET,

WAS one of those who suffered martyrdom for their religious opinions in the reign of Mary, queen of England. She was burned at Tunbridge, July, 1555.

POMPADOUR, JEANNE ANTOINETTE POISSON, MARCHIONESS DE,

THE celebrated mistress of Louis XV., was the illegitimate daughter of a financier, and early distinguished for her beauty and talents. She was married to a M. d'Étiolles, when she attracted the king's notice, and becoming his mistress, was created marchioness de Pompadour, in 1745. She had great influence over the king, and she employed it at first in patronizing arts and literature. But when her charms began to fade, she turned her attention to state affairs, and produced many of those evils which afterwards contributed to bring on the revolution of 1792. She was the chief instigator of the war between France and Prussia, to ~~cause~~ which, Maria Theresa of Austria wrote her a letter with her own hand. Madame de Pompadour died in 1764, at the age of forty-four, little regretted, even by the king.

POOL, RACHEL VAN,

Was born at Amsterdam, in 1664. Her father was the famous professor of anatomy, Ruysch, and her instructor in the art of painting was William Van Aelst, whom she soon equalled in the representation of flowers and fruit. She studied nature so closely, and imitated her so well, that she was thought almost a prodigy, and allowed to be the most able artist of her time in that line. Her choice of subjects was judicious; her manner of painting them exquisite; and she contrasted them in all her compositions with unusual beauty and delicacy; and they appeared so natural, that every plant, flower, or insect, would deceive the eye with the semblance of reality. Her reputation extended all over Europe, and she was appointed painter to the elector palatine, who, as a testimony of respect, sent her a complete set of silver for her toilette, consisting of twenty-eight pieces, and six candlesticks. He also engaged the greater part of her works, paying for them with princely generosity. In early life she married Juria Van Pool, an eminent portrait-painter, with whom she lived very happily. She continued to paint to the last period of a long life; and her pictures, at the age of eighty, were as neatly and carefully worked as when she was thirty. Her paintings are uncommonly rare, being treasured up as curiosities in Holland and Germany. She died at Amsterdam, in 1750, at the age of eighty-six. She was as highly esteemed for her character as her talents. Her genius developed itself very early, and she had become somewhat celebrated for it before she received any instruction.

POPE, MARIA,

An actress, was the daughter of Mr. Campion, a respectable merchant of Waterford, Ireland. The family being left in reduced circumstances by Mr. Campion's death, Maria went on the stage, and soon, as a tragic actress, attained great eminence, especially by her personation of Juliet. In 1798, she married Mr. Pope, the actor.

POPELINIÈRE, MADAME DE,

Was the daughter of an actress. Her mother educated her for the stage; but M. de Popelinière, an opulent financier, fascinated by her beauty and elegant wit, made her his mistress. Mademoiselle Daucour represented herself to Madame de Tencin as having been seduced by her lover, and so interested her protectress, that she mentioned her case to the prime minister. The act of openly keeping a mistress was a luxury as yet scarcely authorized among the bourgeoisie: vice was still considered the privilege of the noble and great. Fleury exacted that M. de Popelinière should marry Mademoiselle Daucour, on pain of a withdrawal of the lease which he held from the king, of farmer-general. M. de Popelinière complied, but he never forgave his mistress the means she had taken to secure the rank of his wife. Madame de Popelinière soon became one of the most admired women of the Parisian world. She adapted herself to her new position with singular ease and tact. Men of the world mingled with singers, musicians, painters, and poets, in her drawing-room. Her wit and taste became celebrated; the latter quality was especially displayed in the judgments which she passed on all works of art or literature submitted to her; she was soon thought infallible in such matters. The success of Madame de Popelinière was short-lived. She engaged in an intrigue with the duke of Richelieu, which her husband discovered. He made her a handsome allowance, but would no longer suffer her to reside under his roof. Madame de Popelinière was thus excluded for ever from that elegant society over which she had ruled with so much grace. A painful illness cut her off in the flower of her youth.

PORTER, ANNA MARIA,

Was the daughter of an Irish officer, who died soon after her birth, leaving a widow and several children, with but a small patrimony for their support. Mrs. Porter took her family to Scotland soon after, and there, with her only and elder sister, Jane, and their brother, Sir Robert Ker Porter, she received the rudiments of her education. Sir Walter Scott, when a student at college, was intimate with the family, and, we are told, "was very fond of either teasing the little female student when very gravely engaged with her book, or more often fondling her on his knees, and telling her stories of witches and warlocks, till both forgot their former playful merriment in the marvellous interest of the tale." Mrs. Porter removed to Ireland, and subsequently to London, chiefly with a view to the education of her children.

Anna Maria became an authoress at the age of twelve. Her first work was called "Artless Tales," and was published in 1793. "Don Sebastian, or the House of Braganza," is considered her best novel. Some of her others are, "The Lake of Killarney," "A Sailor's Friendship and a Soldier's Love," "The Hungarian Brothers," "Ballad Romances, and other Poems," "The Recluse of Norway," "The Knight of St. John," "Roche Blanche," and "Honour O'Hara." Miss Porter died at Bristol, while on a visit to her brother, Dr. Porter, on the 21st of June, 1832, aged fifty-two.

The number of her novels is really astonishing, more than fifty volumes were the product of her pen. In all her works, Miss Anna Maria Porter portrays the domestic affections, and the charms of benevolence and virtue, with that warmth and earnestness which interests the feelings; but in "Don Sebastian" we have an interesting plot, and characters finely discriminated and drawn. The author has, therefore, shown a higher order of genius in this novel than in her others, because she has displayed more constructive power.

PORTER, JANE,

Was sister of the preceding, and the oldest of the two, though she did not commence her career of authorship so early, nor did she write such a multitude of novels as her sister, yet she has succeeded in making a deeper impression of her genius on the age. She was the first who introduced that beautiful kind of fiction, the historical romance, which has now become so popular. Her "Thaddeus of Warsaw" was published in 1803, and "The Scottish Chiefs" in 1810; both were highly popular, but "Thaddeus of Warsaw" had unprecedented success. It was translated into most of the Continental languages, and Poland was loud in its praise. Kosciusko sent the author a ring, containing his portrait. General Gardiner, the British minister at Warsaw, could not believe that any other than an eye-witness had written the story, so accurate were the descriptions, although Miss Porter had not then been in Poland. She was honoured publicly by having the title of Chanoiness of the Polish order of St. Joachim conferred upon her after the publication of "Thaddeus of Warsaw."

In regard to the "Scottish Chiefs," that this romance was the model of the historical class, is beyond doubt; Sir Walter Scott acknowledged that this work was the parent in his mind of the Waverly Novels. In a letter, written by Miss Porter about three months previous to her death, she thus alludes to these works:—

"I own I feel myself a kind of sibyl in these things; it being full fifty years ago since my 'Scottish Chiefs' and 'Thaddeus of Warsaw' came into the then untrodden field. And what a splendid race of the like chroniclers of generous deeds have followed, brightening the track as they have advanced! The author of 'Waverley,' and all his soul-stirring 'Tales of my Landlord,' &c. Then comes Mr. James, with his historical romances on British and French subjects, so admirably uniting the exquisite fiction with the fact, that the whole seems equally verity. But my feeble hand" (Miss Porter was ailing when she wrote the letter) "will not obey my wish to add more to this host of worthies. I can only find power to say with my trembling pen, that I cannot but esteem them as a respected link with my past days of lively interest in all that might promote the virtue and true honour of my contemporaries from youth to age."

Miss Porter's last work was "The Pastor's Fireside;" and she also wrote, in conjunction with her sister, "Tales round a Winter's Hearth." She contributed to many periodicals; and her "Biographical Sketch of Colonel Denham, the African Traveller," in the "Naval and Military Journal," was much admired. The genius of both these ladies was similar in kind; they described scenery vividly, and in appeals to the tender and heroic passions, were effective and successful; but their works want the permanent interest of real life, variety of character, and dialogue.

The career of Miss Porter was not marked by any striking event; she won her celebrity by her genius, and the excellence of her character brightens the picture, and makes her fame a blessing to her sex. Miss Porter died May 24th, 1850, at the residence of her brother, Dr. Porter, (the last survivor of the family,) in Bristol. She was nearly seventy-four years of age. The following is a vivid description of the first meeting between William Wallace and Helen Mar:—

FROM "THE SCOTTISH CHIEFS."

They proceeded in silence through the curvings of the dell, till it opened into a most hazardous path along the top of a far extending cliff which overhung and clasped in the western side of a deep loch. As they mounted the pending wall of this immense amphitheatre, Helen watched the sublime uprise of the king of light issuing from behind the opposite citadel of rocks, and borne aloft on a throne of clouds that streaked the whole horizon with floating gold. The herbage on the cliffs glittered with liquid emeralds as his beams kissed their summits; and the lake beneath spar kled like a sea of molten diamonds. All nature seemed to rejoice at the presence of this magnificent emblem of the Most High. Her heart swelled with devotion, and a prompt thanksgiving to God breathed from her lips.

Such, thought she, O Sun, art thou!—The resplendent image of the Giver of All Good. Thy cheering beams, like His All-cheering Spirit, pervades the very soul, and drives thence the despondency of cold and darkness. But, bright as thou art, how does the similitude fade before god-like man, the true image of his Maker! how far do his protecting arms extend over the desolate; how mighty is the power of his benevolence to dispense succour, and to administer consolation!

As she thus mused, her eyes fell on the noble mien of the knight, who, wrapped in his dark mantle of mingled greens, his spear in his hand, led the way with a graceful but rapid step along the shelving declivity. Turning suddenly to the left, he struck into a broad defile between the prodigious craggy mountains, whose brown cheeks trickled with ten thousand rills from the recent rains, seemed to weep over the deep gloom of the valley beneath. Scattered fragments of rocks from the cliffs above covered with their huge and almost impassable masses the surface of the ground. Not an herb was to be seen; all was black, barren, and terrific. On entering this horrid pass, where no trace of human footstep was to be seen, Helen would have shuddered had she not placed implicit confidence in her conductor.

As they advanced, the vale gradually narrowed, and at last shut them in between two beetling rocks, that seemed just separated a-top to admit a few rays of the sun. A small river flowed at the bottom, amid which the bases of the mountains showed their union by the malignity of many a rugged cliff projecting upwards in a variety of strange and hideous forms. Among this chaos of nature, the men who carried Helen with difficulty found a safe footing. However, after frequent stops and unremitted caution, they at last extricated themselves from the most intricate path, and more lightly followed their chief into a less gloomy part of this valley of stones. The knight stopped, and approaching the bier, told Helen they had arrived at the end of their journey.

"In the heart of that cliff," said he, "is the hermit's cell; a desolate shelter, but a safe one. Old age and poverty yield no temptations to the enemies of Scotland."

As he spoke, the venerable man, who had heard voices beneath, appeared on the rock; and while his tall and majestic figure, clad in grey, moved forward, and his long silver beard flowed from his saintly countenance, and streamed upon the air, he seemed the bard of Morven, issuing from his cave of shells to bid a hero's welcome to the young and warlike Oscar.

"Bless thee, my son," cried he, as he descended, "what good or evil accident hath returned thee so soon to these solitudes?"

The knight briefly replied, "After I left you yester-night, and had again gained the heights over Hay's cottage, I was leading my men along their brow, when I heard a woman scream. I listened for a moment; the shrieks were redoubled. The sound proceeded from the other side of the chasm; I remembered having in the morning seen a felled tree over it, and now rushing across, by Heaven's assistance freed this lady from a ravisher; and I bring her to you for protection."

Helen stepped off the bier; the hermit took her by the hand, and graciously promised her every service in his power. He then preceded the knight, whose firmer arm supported her up the rock, to the outer apartment of the cell.

A holy awe struck her as she entered this place, dedicated wholly to God. A stone altar stood before her, supporting a wooden crucifix, and a superb illuminated missal which lay open upon it. In a basin cut in a rock, was the consecrated water, with which every night and morn this pious man, in emblem of the purifying blood of Christ, (the Living Fountain of Salvation,) was accustomed, with mingled tears of penitence, to wash away the sins of the day. Helen bowed and crossed herself as she entered. And the hermit observing her devotion, blessed her, and bade her welcome to the abode of peace.

"Here, daughter," said he, "has one son of persecuted Scotland found a refuge. There is nought alluring in these wilds to attract the spoiler. The green herb is all the food they afford, and the limpid water the best beverage."

"Ah!" returned Helen, with grateful animation, "I would to heaven that all who love the freedom of Scotland were now within this glen! The herb and the stream would be to them the sweetest luxuries, when tasted in liberty and hope. My father, his friend"—she stopped, suddenly recollecting that she had almost betrayed the secrecy she meant to maintain, and looking down, remained in confused silence. The knight gazed on her, and much wished to penetrate what she concealed; but delicacy forbade him to urge her again. He spoke not; but the hermit being ignorant of her reluctance to reveal her family, resumed.

"I do not express wonder, gentle lady, that you spake in terms which tell me that even your sex feels the galling chains of Edward. Who is there in Scotland that does not? The whole country groans beneath the weight of his oppressions; and the cruelty of his agents makes its rivulets run with blood. Six months ago I was abbot of Scone; and because I refused to betray my trust, and resign the archives of the kingdom, lodged there by our devout king David, Edward, the rebel anointed-of-the-Lord, the profaner of the sanctuary, sent his emissaries to sack the convent; to tear the holy pillar of Jacob from its shrine, and to wrest from my grasp records I refused to deliver. All was done as the usurper commanded. I and my brethren were turned out upon the waste. We retired to the monastery of Cambus-Kenneth: but there the tyrant found us. Cressingham, his treasurer, having seized on other religious houses, determined to make the plunder of this convent swell the hoards of his spoil. In the dead of night his men attacked it: the brethren fled, but not until the ferocious wolves, though glutted with useless slaughter, had slain several, even at the very foot of the altar. All being dispersed, I knew not whither to go. But determined to fly far from the tracks of men, I took my course over the hills, discovered this valley of stones; and finding it fit for my purpose, have for two months lived alone in this wilderness."

"Unhappy Scotland!" ejaculated Helen. Her eyes had followed the chief, who during this narrative leaned against the open entrance of the cave. His eyes were cast upwards with an expression that made her heart vibrate with the exclamation which had just escaped her. The knight turned towards her, and approached. "You hear from the lips of my venerable friend," said he, "a direful story; happy then am I, gentle lady, that you and he have a shelter, though a rough one. The hours wear away, and I must tear myself from this tranquillity to scenes better befitting a younger son of the country he deplores. To you, my good father," continued he, addressing the hermit in a lowered voice, "I commit this sacred charge; Heaven sent me to be her temporary guardian; and since she allows me to serve her no farther, I confide her to you."

Helen felt unable to answer. But the Abbot spoke: "Then am I not to see you any more?"

"That is as heaven wills," replied he; "but as it is not likely on this side the grave, my best pledge of friendship is this lady. To you she may reveal what she has withheld from me; but in either case she is secure in your goodness."

"Rely on my faith, my son; and may the Almighty's shield hang on your steps!"

The knight kissed the reverend man's hand; and turning to Helen, "Farewell, sweet lady!" said he. She trembled at the words, and hardly conscious of what she did, held out her hand to him. He took it, and drew it towards his lips, but checking himself, he only pressed it; and in a mournful voice added—"In your prayers, sometimes remember the most desolate of men!"

A mist seemed to pass over the eyes of lady Helen. She felt as if on the point of losing something most precious to her. "My prayers for my preserver and my father's," hardly articulated she, "shall ever be mingled. And, if ever it be safe to remember me—should heaven indeed arm the patriot's hand—then my father may be proud to know and thank the brave deliverer of his child."

The knight paused, and looked with animation upon her. "Then your father is in arms, and against the tyrant! Tell me where? and you see before you a man who, with his followers, is ready to join him, and lay down his life in the just cause!"

At this vehement declaration, lady Helen's full heart gave way, and she burst into tears. He drew towards her, and in a moderated voice continued—"My men, though few, are brave; they are devoted to their country, and are willing for her sake to follow me unto victory or death. As I am a knight, I am sworn to defend the cause of right; and where shall I so justly find it as on the side of bleeding, wasted Scotland? How shall I so well begin my career, as in the defence of her injured sons? Speak, gentle lady! trust me with your noble father's name, and he shall not have cause to blame the confidence you repose in a true, though wandering Scot!"

"My father," replied Helen, weeping afresh, "is not where your generous services can reach him. Two brave chiefs, one a kinsman of my own, and the other his friend, are now colleagued to free him. If they fail, my whole house falls in blood; and to add another victim to the destiny which in that case will overwhelm me, the thought is beyond my strength." Faint with agitation and the fears which now awakened, struck her with consternation, she stopped; and then added in a suppressed voice, "Farewell."

"Not till you hear me further," replied he. "I repeat, I have now a scanty number of followers; but I leave these mountains to gather more. Tell me then where I may join these chiefs you speak of; give me a pledge to them that I come from you; and, whoever may be your father, be he but a true Scot, I will compass his release or die in the attempt."

"Alas! generous stranger," cried she, "to what would you persuade me? You have kindred, you say! What right have I to dispose of a life that must be so dear to them? Alas, you know not the peril that you ask!"

"Nothing is perilous to me," replied he, with a heroic smile, "that is to serve my country. I have no interest, no joy but in her. Give me, then, the only happiness of which I am capable, and send me to serve her by freeing one of her defenders."

Helen hesitated. The tumult of her mind dried her tears.

She looked up with all these inward agitations painted on her cheeks. His beaming eyes were full of patriotic ardour, while his fine countenance, composed into a heavenly calmness by the sublime sentiments of unselfish bravery which occupied his soul, made him appear to her, not as a man, but as a god.

"Fear not, lady," said the hermit, "that you plunge your deliverer into any extraordinary danger, by involving him in what you might call a rebellion against the usurper. He is already outlawed by Edward's representative; and knowing that, fear not to confide your father's fate to him."

"He too, outlawed!" exclaimed she; "wretched indeed is my country when her noblest spirits are denied the right to live! Unhappy are her children, when every step they take to regain what has been torn from them only involves them in deeper ruin!"

"No country is wretched, sweet lady," returned the knight, "till by a dastardly acquiescence it consents to its own slavery. Bonds and death are the utmost of our enemy's malice; the one is beyond their power to inflict, when a man is determined to die or live free; and for the other, which of us will think that ruin which leads us into the blessed freedom of paradise?"

Helen looked on the chief as she used to look on her cousin, when expressions of virtuous enthusiasm burst from his lips; but now it was rather with the gaze of admiring awe, than the exultation of one youthful mind sympathizing with another. "You would teach confidence to despair herself," returned she; "again I hope, for God does not create in vain! You shall know my father; but first, generous stranger, let me apprise you of every danger with which that knowledge is surrounded. He is hemmed in by enemies. Alas, how closely are they connected with him! Not the English only are leagued against him, but the most powerful of his own countrymen join in the confederation. My unhappy self is the victim of a horrid coalition between a Southron chief and two rebel Scots; rebels to their country! for they sold my father to captivity and perhaps death; and I, wretched I, was the price. To free him, the noblest of Scottish knights is now engaged; but such hosts impede him, that hope hardly dares hover over his tremendous path."

"Then," cried the stranger, "send me to him. Let my arm be second to his in the great achievement. My heart yearns to meet a brother in arms who feels for Scotland what I do; and with such a coadjutor as you speak of, I dare promise your father liberty, and that the power of England shall be shaken."

Helen's heart beat violently at these words. "I would not refuse the union of two such minds; go then to the remotest point in Cartlane craigs. But alas! how can I direct you?" cried she, hastily interrupting herself; "the passes are beset with English; and heaven knows whether at this moment the brave Wallace survives to be again the deliverer of my father!"

PORTSMOUTH, LOUISE DE QUÉ-ROUALLE, DUCHESS OF,

ONE of the mistresses of Charles II. of England, was of a noble family in Lower Brittany, and accompanied the duchess of Orleans from France, when she went to visit the court of her brother in 1670. Louise was at this time about twenty-five, and very beautiful. Her appearance, agreeable manners, and her wit, soon fascinated Charles; and she remained with him, ostensibly as his mistress, but in reality as a spy on his factions in the French interests. There is no disgraceful action in the last years of her royal lover, in which she does not appear as a principal mover. She was raised to the highest honours of the land by Charles, while the French king also bestowed on her the duchy of Aubigné in France. Her pensions and profits were enormous. In 1675, her young son was created duke of Richmond and Lennox. Her influence over the heart and politics of Charles continued unshaken to the last. On his death, in 1685, the duchess went to Paris, where her extravagance finally ruined her, and she had to depend for subsistence on a pension from the French government. She died at Aubigné in France, 1794, in her ninetyeth year; a long life of sin and shame, in which not an act is recorded that excites our pity or admiration.

POZZO, ISABELLA DAL,

WAS a native of Turin, where, in the church of St. Francesco, is a picture painted by her, representing the Virgin and Child, with several Saints. The date of this piece is 1666 and it is highly esteemed.

PRIE, N. DE BERTELOT, MARCHIONESS DE,

WAS mistress to the duke of Bourbon, kinsman and prime minister to Louis XV. The passions of this prince were stronger than his judgment; they had rendered him the slave of his beautiful mistress, who governed in his name. Madame de Prie's ambition had first induced her to endeavour to fascinate the regent; but on learning that he allowed his mistresses no political influence, she directed all her powers of seduction towards the duke of Bourbon. Jealous of the influence of Fleury, bishop of Frejus, over his pupil, the young Louis XV., she induced her lover to remove him from the court. Louis fell into a deep melancholy when he discovered that his beloved preceptor was gone; but upon being reminded by a courtier that he could recall him, the king took the hint, and Fleury returned from exile. Prompted by his personal fears, as well as by a sense of duty, Fleury exposed to his pupil the conduct of the duke of Bourbon and his mistress, and they were sent to different places of exile. Madame de Prie survived her exile only one week. She died in 1727, according to Voltaire of ennui; according to other accounts of poison, administered by her own hand.

PRITCHARD, HANNAH,

AN eminent English actress, whose maiden name was Vaughan, was born about 1711. She went on the London stage when very young, and excelled in both tragedy and comedy, especially the latter. She died in 1768.

R.

RADCLIFFE, ANN,

A CELEBRATED romance writer, whose genius and amiability adds lustre to the glory of her sex, was born in London, July 9th, 1764. She was the only child of respectable parents, William and Ann Wood; and in her twenty-third year married Mr. William Radcliffe, who was brought up to the bar, but subsequently became proprietor and editor of the English Chronicle. The peculiar bent of the genius of Mrs. Radcliffe was not manifested till after her marriage; though she had, from childhood, displayed extraordinary powers of mind. That her husband encouraged and promoted her literary pursuits is probable, indeed certain; with her love of home and delicacy of moral sentiment, she would never have pressed onward in a career of public authorship which he did not approve. Her first, "The Castles of Athlin and Dunbayne," was published in 1789, two years after her marriage. This romance did not indicate very high talent; but "The Sicilian Romance," published the following year, showed a decided development of intellectual power. It excited deep interest, attracting by its romantic and numerous adventures, and its beautiful descriptions of scenery. The "Romance of the Forest" appeared in 1791; and "The Mysteries of Udolpho" in 1794. This was the most popular of her performances, and is generally considered her best. "The Italian" was published in 1797.

In examining these varied productions, all written in the course of ten years, we are struck with the evident progress of her mind, and the gradual mastery her will obtained over the resources of her imagination. She had invented a new style of romance, equally distinct from the old tales of chivalry and magic, and from modern representations of credible incidents and living manners. Her works exhibit, in part, the charms of each species of composition, interweaving the miraculous with the probable in consistent narrative, and breathing a tenderness and beauty peculiarly her own. She occupies that middle region between the mighty dreams of the heroic ages and the realities of her own, which remained to be possessed, filled it with glorious imagery, and raised it to the sublimity of Fancy's creative power by the awe of the supernatural, which she, beyond any writer of romances, knew how to inspire.

One of her biographers had well observed, that "her works, in order to produce their greatest impression, should be read first, not in childhood, for which they are too substantial; nor at mature age, for which they may seem too visionary; but at that delightful period of youth, when the soft twilight of the imagination harmonizes with the luxurious and uncertain light cast on their wonders. By those who come at such an age to their perusal, they will never be forgotten."

In the summer of 1794, she made a tour, in company with her husband, through Holland and the western frontier of Germany, returning down the Rhine. This was the first and only occasion on which she quitted England, though the vividness of her descriptions of Italy, Switzerland, and the south of France, in which her scenes are principally laid, induced a general belief that she had visited those countries. After their return from the continent, she made a tour to the English lakes, and published her notes in a quarto volume, which met with a favourable reception.

The great and almost universal popularity of her writings, never inflated the vanity of Mrs. Radcliffe; her private life seems to have been peculiarly calm and sequestered. Declining the personal notoriety that usually attaches in the society of London to literary merit, she sought her chief pleasures and occupations in the bosom of her family. After the publication of her last novel, "The Italian," in 1797, she retired from the world of letters, and for the remainder of her life persisted in refusing to write, or at any rate to publish another. The report that she was deranged, in consequence of an excited imagination, was founded simply on her love of home and quietude. She was beautiful in her person, and much beloved by those who were favoured by her intimacy. Educated in the principles of the church of England, she was pious and sincere in her attachment to the services of religion. During the last twelve years of her life, she suffered much from a spasmodic asthma, which gradually undermined her health. She died February 7th, 1823, aged fifty-eight.

The poetic richness of Mrs. Radcliffe's genius has been acknowledged by many literary names of eminence. In her own time, the author of "The Pursuits of Literature," a critic usually very sparing of praise, gave her the very highest tribute of admiration, pronouncing her a poetess the Florentine muses would have honoured; and Sir Walter Scott, in quoting this eulogium, confirms it with his own opinion. Lord Byron, speaking of his early poetical associations with Venice, puts her in the same line with the most illustrious bards—

"And Otway, Radcliffe, Schiller, Shakspeare's art,
Had stamped her image in me."

But Lord Byron paid her a still higher compliment than this; he adopted some of her images, and incorporated them in Childe Harold; and in that beautiful poem, the passages inspired by Mrs. Radcliffe are not the least to be admired. Whoever will read the account of Emily's arrival at Venice, and then will turn to the opening of the fourth canto of Childe Harold, will see how the romance has "stamped" its impressions on the author of the "Romaunt."

Let us cite from the very first stanza:

"I saw from out the wave her structures rise,
As from the stroke of an enchanter's wand."

Now from the "Mysteries of Udolpho:"

"Its terraces, crowned with airy yet majestic fabrics, appeared as if they had been called up from the ocean by the wand of an enchanter."

STANZA TWENTY-SEVEN.

"The moon is up, and yet it is not night—
Sunset divides the day with her; a sea
Of glory streams along the Alpine height
Of blue Friuli's mountains:"

* * * * *

Byron's exquisite description is too well known to need the entire transcription; but after his admirable picture of "contending day and night," he says:

"Gently flows

The deep-dyed Brenta, where their hues instil
The odorous purple of a new-born rose,
Which streams upon her stream, and glassed within it glows—

* * * * *

Filled with the face of heaven, which, from afar,
Comes down upon the waters; all its hues,
From the rich sunset to the rising stars,
Their magical variety diffuse,
And now they change; a paler shadow strews
Its mantle o'er the mountains. Parting day—" &c. &c.

"The sun sinking in the west, tinted the waves and lofty mountains of Friuli, which skirt the northern shores of the Adriatic, with a saffron glow, while on the marble porticos and colonnades of St. Mark were thrown the rich lights and shades of evening."

* * * * *

"The shadow of the earth stole gradually over the waves, and then up the towering sides of the mountains, till it extinguished even the last upward beams that had lingered on their summits, and the melancholy purple of evening drew over them like a thin veil. How deep, how beautiful was the tranquillity that wrapped the scene! All nature seemed to repose!"—Mysteries of Udolpho, chap. 15.

The poetical thought of a landscape seen by the dying day and rising eve, was due to Mrs. Radcliffe, the localities being the same with those of Byron. Unquestionably his picture is more rich in imagery, more glowing and more detailed, and has the added charm of rhythm; but Mrs. Radcliffe suggested the train of fancy, and her passage may be allowed pretty well for a woman.

DESCRIPTION OF THE CASTLE OF UDOLPHO.

Towards the close of the day, the road wound into a deep valley. Mountains, whose shaggy steeps appeared to be inaccessible, almost surrounded it. To the east vista opened, and exhibited the Apennines in their darkest horrors; and the long perspective of retiring summits rising over each other, their ridges clothed with pines, exhibited a stronger image of grandeur than any that Emily had yet seen. The sun had just sunk below the top of the mountains she was descending, whose long shadow stretched athwart the valley; but his sloping rays, shooting through an opening of the cliffs, touched with a yellow gleam the summits of the forest that hung upon the opposite steeps, and streamed in full splendour upon the towers and battlements of a castle that spread its extensive ramparts along the brow of a precipice above. The splendour of these illumined objects was heightened by the contrasted shade which involved the valley below.

"There," said Montoni, speaking for the first time in several hours, "is Udolpho."

Emily gazed with melancholy awe upon the castle, which she understood to be Montoni's; for, though it was now lighted up by the setting sun, the Gothic greatness of its features, and its mouldering walls of dark grey stone, rendered it a gloomy and sublime object. As she gazed, the light died away on its walls, leaving a melancholy purple tint, which spread deeper and deeper as the thin vapour crept up the mountain, while the battlements above were still tipped with splendour. From these, too, the rays soon faded, and the whole edifice was invested with the solemn duskiness of evening. Silent, lonely, and sublime, it seemed to stand the sovereign of the scene, and to frown defiance on all who dared to invade its solitary reign. As the twilight deepened, its features became more awful in obscurity, and Emily continued to gaze till its clustering towers were alone seen rising over the tops of the woods, beneath whose thick shade the carriages soon after began to ascend.

The extent and darkness of these tall woods awakened terrific images in her mind, and she almost expected to see banditti start up from under the trees. At length the carriages emerged upon a heathy rock, and soon after reached the castle gates, where the deep tone of the portal bell, which was struck upon to give notice of their arrival, increased the fearful emotions that had assailed Emily. While they waited till the servant within should come to open the gates, she anxiously surveyed the edifice; but the gloom that overspread it allowed her to distinguish little more than a part of its outline, with the massy walls of the ramparts, and to know that it was vast, ancient, and dreary. From the parts she saw, she judged of the heavy strength and extent of the whole. The gateway before her, leading into the courts, was of gigantic size, and was defended by two round towers, crowned by overhanging turrets, embattled, where, instead of banners, now waved long grass and wild plants that had taken root among the mouldering stones, and which seemed to sigh, as the breeze rolled past, over the desolation around them. The towers were united by a curtain, pierced and embattled also, below which appeared the pointed arch of a huge porteullis surmounting the gates; from these the walls of the ramparts extended to other towers, overlooking the precipice, whose shattered outline, appearing on a gleam that lingered in the west, told of the ravages of war. Beyond these all was lost in the obscurity of evening.

From "The Italian."

ENGLISH TRAVELLERS VISIT A NEAPOLITAN CHURCH.

Within the shade of the portico, a person with folded arms, and eyes directed towards the ground, was pacing behind the pillars the whole extent of the pavement, and was apparently so engaged by his own thoughts as not to observe that strangers were approaching. He turned, however, suddenly, as if startled by the sound of steps, and then, without farther pausing, glided to a door that opened into the church, and disappeared.

There was something too extraordinary in the figure of this man, and too singular in his conduct, to pass unnoticed by the visitors. He was of a tall thin figure, bending forward from the shoulders; of a sallow complexion and harsh features; and had an eye which, as it looked up from the cloak that muffled the lower part of his countenance, was expressive of uncommon ferocity.

The travellers, on entering the church, looked round for the stranger who had passed thither before them, but he was nowhere to be seen; and through all the shade of the long aisles only one other person appeared. This was a friar of the adjoining convent, who sometimes pointed out to strangers the objects in the church which were most worthy of attention, and who now, with this design, approached the party that had just entered.

When the party had viewed the different shrines, and whatever had been judged worthy of observation, and were returning through an obscure aisle towards the portico, they perceived the person who had appeared upon the steps passing towards a confessional on the left; and as he entered it, one of the party pointed him out to the friar, and enquired who he was. The friar, turning to look after him, did not immediately reply; but on the question being repeated, he inclined his head as in a kind of obeisance, and calmly replied, "He is an assassin."

"An assassin!" exclaimed one of the Englishmen; "an assassin, and at liberty?"

An Italian gentleman who was of the party smiled at the astonishment of his friend.

"He has sought sanctuary here," replied the friar; "within these walls he may not be hurt."

"Do your altars, then, protect a murderer?" said the Englishman.

"He could find shelter nowhere else," answered the friar meekly.

* * * *

"But observe yonder confessional," added the Italian, "that beyond the pillars on the left of the aisle, below a painted window. Have you discovered it? The colours of the glass throw, instead of a light, a shade over that part of the church, which perhaps prevents your distinguishing what I mean."

The Englishman looked whither his friend pointed, and observed a confessional of oak, or some very dark wood, adjoining the wall, and remarked also that it was the same which the assassin had just entered. It consisted of three compartments, covered with a black canopy. In the central division was the chair of the confessor, elevated by several steps above the pavement of the church; and on either hand was a small closet or box, with steps leading up to a grated partition, at which the penitent might kneel, and, concealed from observation, pour into the ear of the confessor the consciousness of crimes that lay heavy at his heart.

"You observe it?" said the Italian.

"I do," replied the Englishman; "it is the same which the assassin had passed into, and I think it one of the most gloomy spots I ever beheld; the view of it is enough to strike a criminal with despair."

"We in Italy are not so apt to despair," replied the Italian, smilingly.

"Well, but what of this confessional?" inquired the Englishman. "The assassin entered it."

"He has no relation with what I am about to mention," said the Italian; "but I wish you to mark the place, because some very extraordinary circumstances belong to it."

"What are they?" said the Englishman.

"It is now several years since the confession which is connected with them was made at that very confessional," added the Italian; "the view of it, and the sight of the assassin, with your surprise at the liberty which is allowed him, led me to a recollection of the story. When you return to the hotel I will communicate it to you, if you have no pleasanter mode of engaging your time."

"After I have taken another view of this solemn edifice," replied the Englishman, "and particularly of the confessional you have pointed to my notice."

While the Englishman glanced his eye over the high roofs and along the solemn perspectives of the Santa del Pianto, he perceived the figure of the assassin stealing from the confessional across the choir, and, shocked on again beholding him, he turned his eyes and hastily quitted the church.

The friends then separated, and the Englishman soon after returning to his hotel, received the volume. He read as follows.

After such an introduction, who could fail to continue the perusal of the story? Scott has said that one of the fine scenes in "The Italian," where Schedoni the monk (an admirably-drawn character) is "in the act of raising his arm to murder his sleeping victim, and discovers her to be his own child, is of a new, grand, and powerful character; and the horrors of the wretch who, on the brink of murder, has just escaped from committing a crime of yet more exaggerated horror, constitute the strongest painting which has been produced by Mrs. Radcliffe's pencil, and form a crisis well fitted to be actually embodied on canvass by some great master." This has been done by an American artist, the late Washington Allston. The picture is one of great merit, effect, and beauty.

RAMBOUILLET, CATHARINE DE VIVONNE, MARCHIONESS DE,

WAS the wife of Charles d'Angennes, marquis de Rambouillet. She was virtuous and intellectual, and her house the resort of all men of learning. There the great Corneille read his tragedies, and there Bossuet, at the age of sixteen, displayed those oratorical talents for which he afterwards became so celebrated. She lived in the seven-teenth century.

RAMSAY, MARTHA LAURENS,

WAS born in Charleston, S. C., November 3d, 1759. She was the daughter of Henry Laurens, whose ancestors were Huguenots. She spent ten years in England and France, during the latter part of which time she resided at Paris with her father, who was acting there as minister plenipotentiary from this country. While there, her father gave her five hundred guineas, the greater part of which she employed in purchasing French Testaments for distribution, and in establishing a school. She returned to Charleston in 1785, and in 1787 married Dr. David Ramsay. Mrs. Ramsay was a woman of piety, learning, and great benevolence. She assisted her husband in his literary pursuits, fitted her sons for college, and performed all her domestic duties in the most exemplary manner, showing herself a pattern for her sex, and proving how salutary the enlightened moral influence of woman may become. She died in June, 1811, aged fifty-one.

From her published correspondence, we give a few

LETTERS TO HER SON AT COLLEGE.

June 13, 1810.

An open, candid disposition endears a young person much to his friends, and must make him very comfortable to himself. That sort of reserve which arises from a consciousness of having wasted the time which ought to have been devoted to study; and being consequently unprepared for answering any questions proposed; or from a sullen, unyielding temper, which shrinks from investigation, except when, proceeding from tutors and masters, it cannot be avoided, is a reserve so unlovely that I witness it with pain, and I do most earnestly beseech you to strive against such a temper, which, if unresisted and unsubdued, will show itself on a thousand occasions besides that specified above. Even an incorrect answer, if given in an amiable tone of voice, indicating a desire to be set right if found in error, is preferable to silence, or to an unwilling reply, even if a correct one. God has given you an excellent understanding. Oh, make use of it for wise purposes; acknowledge it as his gift; and let it regulate your conduct, and harmonize your passions. Be industrious; be amiable. Every act of self-denial will bring its own reward with it, and make the next step in duty and in virtue easier and more pleasant than the former.

TO THE SAME.

July 18, 1810.

From the tenor of your last letter, it may be fairly inferred that you are dissatisfied with the strictness of a collegiate course; and if you should not go through a collegiate course, what then? Can you go through any virtuous course without economy, industry, and self-denial? Can you fit yourself for usefulness on earth, or happiness in heaven, in any other way than doing your duty in the station in which God has placed you? And if your chief ambition is, without caring whether you are as wise or good, to wish at least to be richer than your father and mother, will not a diligent attention to collegiate studies and duties be the readiest method to fit you for such eminence, in whatever profession you choose, as shall enable you to attain this golden treasure? I assure you, many young men with less means than you have, or are likely to have, (for nothing really necessary or comfortable, I trust in Providence, shall be wanting to you,) have felt it a great privilege to go through a collegiate course, and have afterward come to be eminent, respectable, and wealthy.

I would never wish my judgment to be warped by my feelings, especially by offended feelings, to do any thing harsh. I would rather even have it blinded by such affection for my dear children, as would make my tenderness overstep, perhaps, the exact bound of maternal prudence; both extremes would be best avoided. "Give me thine heart, my son," is the language of Scripture; and where there is any heart worth giving or worth having, I believe it is seldom refused to the authors of our being, the protectors of our infancy; to the father, whose fond ambition it is to see his son distinguished in life; the mother, who, with a throbbing heart and moistened eye, is continually addressing the throne of heaven for the welfare of her dear child; and to the sisters, ever ready to reciprocate the tender charities of domestic endearment, and ever cheerfully sacrificing something of their own convenience for the advancement of their brothers. I pray God to bless you, and to give you grace to make a good use of an understanding, which I am sure you possess, to give a right bias to energies and sensibilities, which, wrongly directed, will make you foolish and miserable. With sincere prayers for your improvement in wisdom and virtue, wishing you an affectionate heart and industrious habits, I remain your faithful friend, your tender mother.

FROM SEVERAL LETTERS TO THE SAME.

Your vacation is now at no great distance. I hope you are not trifling away this prime of your days, content with such attainments as will excuse you from censure; but emulous of ranking with the most studious, most prudent, and most virtuous of your companions. I wish I could inspire you with a laudable ambition, and with feelings that would make you avoid any unnecessary intercourse with the bucks, the fops, the idlers of college; and think that the true intention of going to a seminary of learning is to attain science, and fit you hereafter to rank among men of literary and public consequence.

* * * *

Could you know my anxiety about you, independently of nobler motives, I think even a spirit of compassion for an afflicted friend would make you conduct yourself wisely. In the course of a life, not yet very long, I have seen many young persons, with every possible advantage for cultivating their talents, improving their minds, and becoming estimable members of society, lost to themselves, a disgrace to their friends, plagues to society, or mere cyphers in it, from indolence, a slight manner of pursuing their studies, smoking, drinking, an excessive love of finery, of trifling company, or some similar evil indulged in, between the age of fifteen and twenty. Oh, how I shudder, and what a death-like faintness and oppression seizes my poor heart, at the thoughts of how I stand in the persons of sons exposed to such a calamity! With bended knees and streaming eyes, I pray my God send me help, and ward off such a stroke. I have also seen those who, with very scanty means, and almost under every possible disadvantage, have, under the smiles of heaven, been friends, money, advice to themselves and have risen to shine as lights in the world. Others, again, I have seen, who, not having to struggle like these last, constantly against wind and tide, and supported only by their own efforts, but situated like yourself under happier circumstances, have repaid the labours of a father, and the tender exertions of a mother, by doing their part well, and returning home from their different seminaries of education, just such as their parents could wish. Oh, my God, grant that this may be the case with us.

* * * *

Your time for improvement will be quickly past; if it is not improved, you will find yourself grown up with the pride of what you call a gentleman; you will have no patrimony to lean upon; your natural talents will be of comparatively little consequence to you, and you will have no talents so cultivated, and ready to be brought into action, as to make you capable of building up a fortune for yourself; and of all the mean objects in creation, a lazy, poor, proud gentleman, especially if he is a dressy fellow, is the meanest; and yet this is generally the character of young men of good family and slender fortunes, unless they take an early turn to learning and science.

* * * * *

I could wish to write you many little local and domestic matters of news or amusements, but terrified as I am by hearing nothing from you—nothing from you, and interpreting this, no news from a cherished son, as bad news—my mind is quite out of tune for any thing of the lighter kind. I was so much attached to my father, and to the uncle and aunt who brought me up, that I lived in the habit of the greatest intimacy with them; your sisters can hardly enjoy a girlish note, or a party of pleasure, unless mamma shares in it or knows all about it; and this is so generally the case with virtuous and affectionate children, that wherever there is silence, I dread lest there should be also mystery. I shall rejoice to find it otherwise in your case; and longing to hear from you, and committing the guidance of your youthful steps to that God to whom I pray for you by day and by night.

RANCOURT, SOPHIE,

AN eminent French actress, the daughter of an actor, was born at Nancy, 1756. She appeared at Paris in 1772, and soon acquired great celebrity in her profession. She was imprisoned during the French revolution, in 1793, for six months. After Napoleon's accession to power, he took her under his protection. She died January 15th 1815.

RAVIRA, FELETTA ELEONORA, OF CASALE,

WAS the wife of George Feletto, counsellor of Villa and lord of Melazzo. She was very much praised by contemporary authors, and has left many small poems, remarkably well written. She flourished in 1559; but no dates of the events of her life are to be obtained.

READ, CATHARINE,

WAS an English lady, who distinguished herself by portrait-painting, both in oil and crayons. One of her first and best performances, was the likeness of Queen Charlotte, painted immediately after her arrival in England. Another remarkable portrait of her painting, was that of the female historian, Mrs. Macaulay, represented in the character of a Roman matron, weeping over the lost liberties of her country. About 1770, Miss Read went to the East Indies, where she resided some years; but on her return, still continued to exercise her profession to extreme old age. She died about 1786.

RECAMIER, JEANNE FRANÇOISE JULIE ADELAIDE BERNARAL,

WAS born at Lyons in 1778, and was probably the most beautiful and graceful woman of her day.

She married in 1795, M. Recamier, a man of large fortune. Her house, at that time, was resorted to by all the marked characters of Europe; and her drawing-room celebrity is perhaps the first of the age. Her father was imprisoned for some treasonable dealings with the Chouans, in his capacity of administrator of the ports. Madame Recamier solicited his pardon from Napoleon, who granted his acquittal, but refused to reinstate him. This fascinating woman was accustomed to obtain everything she asked for, and she never could forgive Bonaparte for resisting her, though on a point where, what her party termed his severity, seemed reasonable and necessary. Her friends deny this statement, and declare that she never demanded more than her father's liberty; and that the real origin of the animosity manifested by her to the hero was an ill-conditioned jealousy on his part, which made him vexed at all admiration bestowed on others, even when a pretty woman was its object. Madame Recamier was fondly attached to the celebrated Madame de Stael, and courageously proved her friendship by going to Coppet at a time when it was intimated to her that this measure would prevent her returning to Paris; as Napoleon included the friends of Madame de Stael among his own enemies. It was at Coppet that prince Augustus of Prussia, brother of the late king, became violently enamoured of the beautiful Frenchwoman; he even attempted to persuade her to obtain a divorce from M. Recamier, that she might become his princess. Her religious principles would not allow her to listen with approval to this proposal. After leaving Coppet, Madame Recamier resided at Lyons two years. As she determined to take no steps for the repeal of her exile, she decided upon a journey to Italy. There, as everywhere else, she was received with universal and lively admiration. Painters copied her loveliness; Canova has perpetuated her features in marble. Madame Recamier's sentence of banishment was never reversed. She returned to Paris with the Bourbons. After the death of Madame de Stael she took up her residence at the abbaye aux Bois, where, though out of the tumult of dissipated society, she enjoyed the intimate friendship and constant visits of an extended circle of literary and otherwise distinguished persons. Among these may be mentioned Châteaubriand and Guizot. For some years before her death she became blind, an affliction which she bore with the most gracious serenity; never complaining of it, except as it prevented her attentions to her friends. She died on the 10th of May, 1849, of the cholera. Her distinguishing traits were an extreme sweetness of disposition and tenderness of heart, which obtained her the affection of all about her. It should be noted that she was quite unspoiled by the homage that was always paid to her extraordinary beauty.

REEVE, CLARA,

A NOVELIST, born in 1738, at Ipswich, was the daughter of a clergyman, who gave her a good education. Her first work was a translation of Barclay's "Argenis," published in 1772. Her subsequent productions are, "The Old English Baron;" "The Two Mentors;" "The Progress of Romance;" "The Exile;" and "Memoirs of Sir Roger de Clarendon." Her novels are all marked by good sense and pure morality, and were well received at the time they were written, especially "The Old English Baron," on which her fame now almost exclusively rests.

Mr. Chambers asserts that an early admiration of "The Castle of Otranto," induced Miss Reeve to imitate it in her "Gothic Story." He adds—"In some respects the lady has the advantage of Walpole; her supernatural machinery is better managed, so as to produce a mysteriousness and effect; but her style has not the point or elegance of her prototype." Passing strange it would have been, had this retired country maiden, who had only an imperfect education, the few works and opportunities of knowledge accessible to a woman in a provincial town, equalled Horace Walpole in the art of composition, which he had studied and practised with all appliances and means men of station and wealth can command, from his youth till he was nearly fifty, before he produced "The Castle of Otranto." That she has not failed, but rather excelled him, where genius only was concerned, is sufficient to ensure her fame. She was much respected and beloved, and led a very retired quiet life. She died in 1803.

REISKE, ERNESTINE CHRISTINE,

Whose maiden name was Müller, was the wife of Johann Jacob Reiske. She was born, April 2d, 1735, at Kumberg, a small town near Wittemberg, in Prussian Saxony. In 1755, she became acquainted with Reiske at Leipzig, where she was making a visit. Her beauty, modesty, goodness, and love of literature, attracted the eminent scholar, and, although he was twenty years her senior, they became very much attached to each other; but, owing to the war then raging in Saxony, they were not married till 1764. In order to help her husband in his literary labours, Christine acquired under his instructions a thorough knowledge of Latin and Greek, which rendered her of the greatest assistance to him. She copied and collated his manuscripts, arranged the various readings that he had collected, and read and corrected the proof-sheets of his works. Her attachment for him and her respect for his memory are strongly shown in the supplement to his autobiography, which she completed from the 1st of January, 1770, till his death on the 14th of August, 1774. The gratitude of Reiske, and the ardour of his affection, are not less strongly expressed, both in the autobiography just mentioned and in the prefaces to some of his works. After the death of Reiske, his wife published several works that he had left unfinished, and also two works of her own, one called "Hellas," in 1778; and the other, entitled "Zur Moral: aus dem Griechischen ubersatz von E. C. Reiske;" a work containing translations from the Greek to the German. After her husband's death she lived successively at Leipzig, Dresden, and Brunswick; and died at Kamberg, July 27th, 1798, aged sixty-three.

RENARD, CECILE.

THE history of this young girl exhibits the moral phenomenon of the apathy to all that human nature usually shrinks from, which may be produced by living in the constant atmosphere of danger and dismay. Her fate and conduct somewhat, at first sight, resemble those of Charlotte Corday; but upon examination, nothing can be more different. Charlotte Corday, enthusiastic, animated, energetic, set about her purpose in the most sanguine hopes of sacrificing herself for her country; while the aimless act of Cecile seemed produced by disgust of life, and despair of improvement in public affairs. She was born at Paris, the daughter of a stationer. She and her eldest brother occupied themselves in the business of the shop, while the two others were enlisted in the army. Without possessing remarkable beauty, her appearance was very striking and agreeable. She was twenty years of age when she stepped out of the obscurity of private life, and brought herself into the history of Robespierre. It has been said that her hatred to the latter arose from his causing the execution of a young man to whom she was attached; this is an anecdote that wants confirmation, and it is impossible to admit it as a fact. The truth is, she was educated in an aversion to the terrible order of things then prevalent; her imagination was struck with the torrents of blood, the frightful shocks, that daily occurred; and her family, attached to the royalist party, made its losses, and the horrors of the existing government, a constant theme of their private conversations. Her fancy became morbid, her reason perverted, until she considered life an insufferable burden; and she resolved to free herself from it, in a way that should manifest her opinions. With this object, on the 23d of May, 1794, she went to the house of Robespierre, carrying a bundle. When they told her he was out, she declared he neglected his duties, and that for her part she would give all she possessed to have a king. This, in those days, was enough to have cost her a hundred lives, if she had had them. She was taken to the comité, and asked what she wanted with Robespierre? "I wanted to see how a tyrant looks." Why she wanted a king? "Because we have five hundred tyrants, and I prefer one king." Why she carried a bundle? "Because, as I expected to go to prison, I wanted a change of clothes." Two knives were found in her bundle—she was asked if she intended to assassinate Robespierre? She said, "No; that she always carried a knife, and in this case had taken the second by mistake; but that they might think as they pleased about it." Being asked who were her accomplices, she denied having any, or the existence of any plot. An old aunt of Cecile, an ex-nun, together with her father and brothers, were involved in her condemnation. Cecile, dragged to the scaffold, never wavered an instant in her firmness; this girl of twenty met death with the resolution and unmoved demeanour of a stoic.

RENÉE DE FRANCE, DUCHESS OF FERRARA,

BORN at Blois, in 1510, was the daughter of Louis XII. and Anne of Brittany. She was married, in 1527, to Hercules II. of Este, duke of Ferrara. She was a princess of great capacity and thirst of knowledge, and much interested in the religious controversies of the times. Calvin, who went in disguise from France to Italy to see her, brought her over to his opinions, and her court at Ferrara became the refuge of all those suspected of heresy. Her conduct so displeased the court of France, that the king, Henry II., sent the following instructions to the duke of Ferrara;

"If the duchess persists in her errors, she must be separated from all conversation; her children must be taken from her; and all her domestics, who are greatly suspected of heresy, must be prosecuted. With regard to the princess herself, the king refers to the prudence of her husband."

Her four children were, therefore, successively taken from her and brought into France, to be educated in the Roman Catholic faith. After the duke's death, in 1559, the princess returned to France, to reside in her castle of Montargis. The duke of Guise having summoned her to deliver up some Protestants who had taken refuge with her, she replied, "That she would not deliver them, and that if he should attack the castle, she would be the first to place herself in the breach, to see if he would dare to kill a king's daughter." She was obliged to send away four hundred and sixty persons, to whom she had given asylum; she parted from them in tears, after providing for the expenses of their journey. This princess died at Montargis, in 1575. She was slightly deformed in her person, but elegant manners, and graceful eloquence, more than compensated for this disadvantage.

RICCOBONI, MARIE LABORAS-MEZIERES,

WAS born at Paris, in 1714. She married Luigi Riccoboni, an actor, and also an author of several successful comedies, and of various works on the literature of the drama. He was considered the first among the Italian comedians, but he retired from the stage, owing to religious scruples. His wife contributed, by her taste and her advice, to the success of his productions. Before Madame Riccoboni, the novels of the abbé Prevost enjoyed a great reputation; doubtless these gave the impulse to this lady when she timidly presented to the public works of the same description, but which were destined entirely to eclipse the tedious commonplaces and unnatural incidents which make up the "Dean of Coleraine," the "Adventures of a Man of Quality," &c.

Madame Riccoboni has written quite a numerous collection of fictitious histories, the least interesting of which would not suffer in comparison with any of the contemporary novels; the best is usually considered to be "Juliette de Catesby;" it is written with grace and vivacity, the thoughts are true and well expressed and the details natural and interesting. She also translated Fielding's "Amelia," and made a continuation of Marivaux's "Mariane," with a most successful imitation of the style and manners of that author. Madame Riccoboni died in poverty, at the age of sixty-eight, in 1762. With her abilities, her worth, and her amiable disposition, she deserved a happier fate.

RICH, FRANCES,

YOUNGEST daughter of Oliver Cromwell, was born in December, 1638. She was probably handsome, as she received many splendid offers of marriage; among others, one from Charles II. himself, then in exile. Cromwell refused, saying that "Charles would never forgive the death of his father." The duke d'Enghien, eldest son of the prince de Condé, was another suitor of Frances Cromwell. On the 11th of November, 1657, she married Robert Rich, grandson and heir to Robert, earl of Warwick, the protector settling £15,000 on his daughter. Mr. Rich died three months after the marriage, and some time after, Mrs. Rich married Sir John Russel, by whom she had several children. She died Jan. 27th, 1721, at the age of eighty-four.

RICHMOND, DUCHESS OF,

A BEAUTIFUL and noble lady, who lived during the reign of James I., was the daughter of the earl of Binden. Her two grandfathers, the duke of Norfolk and duke of Buckingham, had both lost their lives for aspiring to the throne. She fell in love with a vintner, of the name of Prannel, and married him. He died in a few years after their marriage, leaving her a beautiful and wealthy widow. She was next engaged to Sir George Rodney, but dismissing him for the earl of Hertford, Sir George committed suicide. This, however, had little effect upon her. Her conduct was marked with great levity, and she was suspected of several intrigues. After the death of the earl, she married the duke of Richmond; and after his death she aspired but unsuccessfully, to the hand of James I.

RIEDELSE, FREDERICA, BARONESS DE,

WAS the daughter of Masson, the Prussian minister of state, and was born in Brandenburg, in 1746. In 1763, she married lieutenant-colonel Baron de Riedesel, who was appointed, in 1777, to the command of the Brunswick forces in the British service in America, and his wife accompanied him to this country with her three young children. She was with that part of the army commanded by General Burgoyne, during all their disasters, till the defeat at Saratoga, exposed often to privations and dangers from which many of the soldiers would have shrunk. After the capitulation of Burgoyne, Riedesel, who was taken prisoner, was sent to Cambridge, and afterwards to Virginia, but in 1779, was allowed to go to New York. His wife accompanied him in all his wanderings. In 1780, General Riedesel was exchanged; in 1781, they went to Canada; and in 1783, they returned to Germany, where the husband died, in 1800. After this event, the baroness resided in Berlin, where she died, in 1808. She founded there an asylum for military orphans, and an alms-house for the poor in Brunswick.

ROCHE, MARIE SOPHIE DE LA,

A VERY talented German authoress, was born on the 6th of December, 1731, at Kaufbeuren. Her father, Von Gutermann, a very learned physician, educated her with great care. When she was only five, Sophie had read the Bible through. Von Gutermann removed from Kaufbeuren to Augsburg, where he was appointed town-physician, and dean of the medical faculty, when his daughter was sixteen. Here she had a better opportunity to cultivate her mind, in which attempt she received great assistance from Dr. Biancani, of Bologna, physician to the prime bishop of Augsburg. He became very much attached to, and wished to marry her; but the father of Sophie opposed the match, on account of the difference of religious opinions, Biancani being a Roman Catholic and Von Gutermann a Lutheran. This disappointment so affected Sophie, that she wished to enter a convent, but was prevented by her father. From this time, she devoted herself to study and reading, and soon after, with her two sisters and her brother, she went to Riberach, to reside with her grandfather, a senator in that city. After his death, she removed to the house of Wieland, a relation of hers, then curate of St. Maria Magdalena, but afterwards senior of the ministry.

Here Sophie became acquainted with young Wieland, who drew her attention to German literature. A strong attachment sprung up between them, and they became engaged. He went to Switzerland, to obtain some employment that might enable them to marry, and was obliged to remain there eight years. During this long absence, misunderstandings, arising from the noblest motives, estranged them; and when, in 1760, Wieland returned to Riberach to assume his new office of counsellor, he found Sophie the wife of M. de la Roche, counsellor of state, in Maine, and superintendent of the estates of Count Stadion. The friendship of Wieland and Sophie was resumed, and continued uninterrupted till their death, a period of more than fifty years. She also continued her studies with unabated zeal.

La Roche, after the death of Count Stadion, removed to Coblenz, where he lived for ten years as counsellor of state. From some unknown cause, perhaps some letters on monkery, of which La Roche was said to be the author, he fell into disgrace; and from that time they lived a very retired life, first at Speier, afterwards at Offenbach, where M. de la Roche died, in 1789. In 1791, Madame de la Roche lost a son, Francis, whose death caused her the deepest sorrow. She herself survived till 1807.

Sophie was a tender and an affectionate wife and mother, and a warm philanthropist. She wrote a number of works, which showed her to be a woman of intellect, knowledge, and experience. Her favourite studies were philosophy and the abstruse sciences. In writing, however, she succeeded best in romances, in which she showed great powers of imagination and knowledge of the human heart. Her principal works are, "History of the Lady of Sternberg," to which Wieland wrote a preface; "Letters of Rosalie," "My Writing-Desk," "Pomona," "Rosalie and Cleeborg," "Letters to Lina," "Letters on Mannheim," "History of Miss Leni," "Apparitions on Lake Oneida," "More! Stories," "New Stories," "Fanny and Julia," "The Beautiful Picture of Resignation," "Love Cottages," "Autumn Days;" the last work she published, is called "Melusina's Summer-Night." She then shut up her desk, that she might not survive herself as an authoress. Wieland also wrote a preface to this work; having introduced her in the commencement of her literary career, he accompanied her to the close.

ROCHES, MESDAMES DES,

WERE two celebrated ladies of Poitiers, in France, who lived in the sixteenth century. The elder was named Madeleine Neveu, wife of André Fradonet, seigneur Des Roches, and her daughter, Catharine. They were very learned, wise, and virtuous. Madame des Roches became a widow fifteen years after her marriage, and devoted herself entirely to the education of her daughter, in whom she found a very dear friend, and a rival who excelled her. They devoted themselves principally to writing poetry; and their verses show their great attachment to each other, and also that they met with many sorrows. Catharine was so attached to her mother, that she would never marry, although she had many worthy suitors. They express, in their writings, a strong desire not to survive each other; and their wish was gratified; for they died the same day, of a plague that ravaged Poitiers, in 1587. Madame des Roches was born in 1531.

ROHAN, ANNE DE,

DAUGHTER of Catharine de Parthenai, heiress of the house of Soubise, was born in 1562, and acquired, like her mother, a high reputation in the literary world. She would have been one of the greatest poetesses of her age, but her devoted piety turned her talent into another channel. She died unmarried, in 1646. She was a Protestant, and was celebrated for her courage, as well as her learning.

ROHAN, FRANCES DE, LADY DE LA GARNACHE,

WAS daughter to Renatus de Rohan and Isabella d'Albret, daughter of John d'Albret, king of Navarre, and was, consequently, cousin-german to Joan d'Albret, mother to Henry IV. She was betrothed to the duke de Nemours, by whom she had a son; but he becoming tired of her, obtained from the pope a dissolution of his engagement, as the lady de Rohan had declared herself a Protestant, and married the widow of the duke of Guise. The lady de la Garnache, or the duchess de Loudonnois, as she was sometimes called, maintained herself dexterously in her estate during the civil wars.

ROHAN, MARIE ELEONORE DE,

CELEBRATED for her piety and talents, was the daughter of Hercule de Rohan-Guémén, duke de Montbazou. She was born in 1628, and educated in a convent. Of high birth and fortune, beautiful and accomplished, Eleonore, at the age of eighteen, notwithstanding the tears of her father, and the entreaties of her friends, resolved to enter a convent. She became a member of the Benedictine convent at Montargis, and was soon after named abbess La Trinité de Caen. This dignity she wished to decline, but was compelled to accept it. She fulfilled all the duties of this office with gentleness, propriety, and wisdom. She gave singular proofs of her mild firmness in maintaining the rights and privileges of the abbey.

Her health obliged her to remove to Malnoue, near Paris; and in 1669, she was solicited to take upon herself also the government of another community. In the intervals of her duties, she applied herself to study. She composed a paraphrase on the Proverbs, called "Morale de Solomon;" "A Discourse on Wisdom," and several other tracts. To the modesty and gentleness of her own sex, she united the wisdom and learning of the other. She died in 1681.

ROLAND, MARIE JEANNE,

WIFE of the celebrated patriot of that name, was born at Paris, in 1754. Her father, M. Philipon, was an engraver of much talent, her mother was a woman of an uncommonly elevated character. The little Manon, as Madame Roland was called when a child, showed her peculiarly ardent and enthusiastic temperament very early. Happily for her, she was surrounded from her youth by those pure and religious influences which, notwithstanding the skepticism of the age, still linger in the humble home of the bourgeoisie. Naturally reserved, though animated and eager, she required constant occupation; she never remembered having learned to read; by the time she was four, all the trouble of her education was over; it was only necessary to keep her well supplied with books. Flowers were the only thing that could make her voluntarily give up her reading. But her mother, to prepare her for her future duties, often required her to leave her studies, and assist her in all the household occupations. Dancing, music, drawing, geography, and even Latin, she acquired readily; and rising at five in the morning, she stole, half dressed, to her studies. As to books, none came amiss to her. She devoured alike, the Bible, romances, Lives of the Saints, or "Memoirs of Mademoiselle de Montpensier."

But Plutarch was her chief delight; at the age of nine, she carried it to church with her secretly, and from that time she dated her first republican feelings and opinions. When she was about eleven, she became very religious; and at the time of her first communion, always a ceremony of necessity and importance in the Roman Catholic church, she was so carried away by her religious emotions, that she threw herself at her parents' feet, and with torrents of tears, begged them to allow her to go to a convent to prepare for the great event. Her request was granted; and her gravity, her devotion, and her great quickness in learning, soon made her a favourite among the community in which she was placed. Upon the day when she was to take the sacrament for which she had prepared, by her seclusion, long prayers, and meditation, her excited imagination, and her excessive devotion, made it necessary for her to be almost carried to the altar by one of the nuns. In this retreat, she formed a friendship with a young girl of her own age, Sophie Canet, which lasted during her whole life. Though the religious sentiments she then experienced yielded at a later period to the skepticism of the age, their purifying influence is to be traced through every stage of her existence. The philosophic and popular spirit which had been gradually descending through every class of the nation, began to pervade the bourgeoisie, and, in spite of the obscurity of her birth and station, Manon could not feel indifferent to the welfare of her country; she adopted eagerly the popular doctrines of equality and brotherhood.

She was not insensible to the charms of pomp and splendour, but she was indignant that its chief object was to elevate still higher persons already too powerful, and who had nothing commendable in themselves. In a visit she paid to the court, she became soon disgusted with it. "If I remain much longer," said she to her mother, while urging her to depart, "I shall soon detest the people I see so much, that I shall not be able to control my hatred." "What injury have they done you?" "They make me feel their injustice and their absurdity." These republican sentiments increased the stoical nature of her character; she looked upon life as a struggle and a duty. Her beauty attracted many admirers, but she refused all offers; her superiority to those of her own rank rendering her naturally repugnant to marriage.

M. Philipon was not kind to his wife. The ascendancy which his daughter had over him, enabled her to control his ebullitions of temper, so that after she was grown, her mother was in a great measure protected from them. In 1775, she lost this adored mother, and her grief on the occasion nearly cost her her life. For two weeks she lay in terrible convulsions, struggling all the time with a sense of suffocation. A letter from her friend, Sophie Canet, at length enabled her to weep, an effect the physicians had been trying in vain to produce, and she recovered.

After her mother's death, her father became careless and dissipated, and nearly ruined himself. Mademoiselle Philipon took refuge in her books from her troubles; the works of Rousseau especially interested her. At the same time, Sophie Canet wrote to her often about a man whom she had met in the society near Amiens, where she resided; and when this gentleman, M. Roland, went to Paris, she gave him a letter to Mademoiselle Philipon. They were mutually pleased with each other, and corresponded from that time till their marriage, five years after, in 1789.

M. Roland was a manufacturer of Lyons, a grave, severe man, then on the verge of fifty. Reserved and abrupt in his manners, few would have thought him likely to fascinate a young and beautiful woman. Nor was it love that attracted her to him. Love she looked upon—it was thought through the influence of some youthful disappointment—as a beautiful chimera. Beneath the austere aspect of Roland, she saw and admired a soul, in its stern and unyielding virtues, worthy of an ancient philosopher. In her enthusiasm, she overrated his qualities; he proved a selfish, exacting husband; but her sense of duty, and the high esteem she felt for his qualities, enabled her to bear her lot with cheerfulness.

The opening of the French revolution drew her from the retirement of private life. She accompanied her husband, in 1791, to Paris, upon his being sent there by the municipality of Lyons. Her beauty, enthusiasm, and eloquence, soon exercised a powerful fascination over her husband's friends. Péthion, Buzot, Brissot, and Robespierre, met constantly at her house, and she was a deeply interested observer of all that passed. Madame Roland had little faith in constitutional monarchy; her aspirations were for a republic, pure, free, and glorious as her ideal. Without seeking it, she found herself the nucleus of a large and powerful party. The singular and expressive beauty of her face and person, the native elegance and dignity of her manners, her harmonious voice and flowing language, and above all, the fervour and eloquence of her patriotism, seemed to mark her out for the part which had been instinctively assigned to her. She presided over political meetings with so much tact and discretion as to appear a calm spectator; whilst she, in reality, imbued with her own fervent enthusiasm, all those who came near her. This enthusiasm she had imparted to the colder mind of her husband, and the prominent part which he took in the important events of the period, may unquestionably be attributed to her. In 1792, when the Girondist ministry was formed, Roland was named minister of the interior; and in her new and elevated position,

Madame Roland influenced not only her husband, but the entire Girondist party. Dismissed from his post, in consequence of his celebrated letter of remonstrance to the king—which letter was, in fact, written by his wife—Roland, upon the downfall of the monarchy, was recalled to the ministry. This triumph was but short-lived. The power which had been set in motion could not be arrested in its fearful course—the Girondist party fell before the influence of their blood-thirsty opponents. Protesting against the Reign of Terror, they fell its victims. Madame Roland, whose opposition to the massacres had influenced her party, drew down upon her husband and herself the hatred of Marat and Danton, and their lives were soon openly threatened. Roland, who was kept in concealment by a friend, escaped; but Madame Roland was arrested, and thrown into prison. Here during a confinement of several months, she prepared her memoirs, which have since been given to the world.

On the 10th of November, 1793, she was removed to the Conciergerie, and her trial, as a Girondist, commenced. She was closely questioned, not only about herself, but her husband. She refused to say anything that might criminate him, or give them a clue as to his present hiding-place. She was condemned to death, and November 10th, 1793, she ascended the fatal cart, dressed in white, as an emblem of her purity of mind, and went calmly through the crowd which followed the procession. The mass of the people, moved by pity and admiration, were generally silent, but some of the more furious ones cried out, "To the guillotine! to the guillotine!" "I shall soon be there," said Madame Roland; "but those who send me there will follow themselves ere long. I go there innocent, but they will go as criminals; and you, who now applaud, will also applaud then." When she arrived in front of the statue of liberty, she bent her head to it, exclaiming, "Oh liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" At the foot of the scaffold, she said to her companion, an old and timid man, whom she had been encouraging on the way, "Go first; I can at least spare you the pain of seeing my blood flow." She died at the age of thirty-nine.

She had predicted that her husband would not survive her: her prediction was fulfilled. The body of Roland was found seated beneath a tree, on the road to Rouen, stabbed to the heart. Fastened to his dress was a paper, upon which a few lines were inscribed, asserting that "upon learning the death of his wife, he could not remain a day longer in a world so stained with crime." That M. Roland was unable to survive his wife, is the strongest proof of the powerful influence which she exercised over him. It has been aptly said, that of all modern men, Roland most resembled Cato. It was to his wife that he owed his courage, and the power of his talents.

They left one daughter, Eudora, who was brought up by Madame Champayneux, a friend of Madame Roland; and the son of this friend married Eudora.

ROPER, MARGARET,

ELDEST daughter of Sir Thomas More, was a woman of fine mind and charming disposition, the delight and comfort of her celebrated father. The greatest care was taken in her education; and she became learned in Greek, Latin, many of the sciences, and music. Erasmus wrote a letter to her, as a woman famous not only for virtue and piety, but for solid learning. Cardinal Pole was so delighted with the elegance of her Latin style, that he could not believe it was the production of a woman. She married William Roper, Esq., of Well-hall, in the parish of Eltham, in Kent; she died in 1544, and was buried at St. Dunstan's church, in Canterbury, with her father's head in her arms; for she had procured it after it had remained fourteen days on London bridge, and had preserved it in a leaden box, till there was an opportunity of conveying it to Canterbury, to the burial-place of the Ropers. She had five children, one of whom, Mary, was nearly as famous as herself.

Mrs. Roper wrote, in reply to Quintilian, an oration in defence of the rich man, whom he accuses of having poisoned, by venomous flowers in his garden, the poor man's bees. This performance is said to have rivalled Quintilian's in eloquence. She also wrote two declamations, and translated them into Latin, and composed a treatise "Of the Four Last Things," in which she showed so much strong reasoning and justness of thought, as obliged Sir Thomas to confess its superiority to a discourse in which he was himself employed on the same subject. The ecclesiastical history of Eusebius was translated by this lady from the Greek into Latin.

ROSALBA, CARRIERA,

WAS born in 1675, at Chiozza, near Venice; and was instructed by Giovanni Diamantini, from whom she learned design, and also the art of painting in oil. In that kind of colouring, she copied several of the works of the best masters; but at last applied herself to miniature with extraordinary diligence, being ambitious to arrive at such a degree of perfection in it as might enable her to contribute to the support of her parents. She succeeded to her wish; but after practising miniature-painting with great reputation, she quitted it for crayons, which art she carried to a degree of perfection that few artists have ever been able to attain. In 1709, Frederic IV., king of Denmark, passing through Venice, sat to Rosalba for his portrait, of which, by his order, she made several copies, very highly finished. Soon after, the same monarch employed her to paint twelve portraits of Venetian ladies, which she performed so much to his satisfaction, that he showed her particular marks of his favour, and, besides gifts of great value, paid her with a truly royal munificence. She visited France in company with Pelligrini, who had married her sister; and at Paris had the honour to paint the royal family, with most of the nobility, and other persons of distinction. During her residence there, she was admitted into the academy, to which she presented a picture of one of the muses. On her return to Venice, she continued her profession until she was seventy, when, by incessant application, she lost her sight. She died in 1757. The portraits of Rosalba are full of life and spirit, exceedingly natural, with an agreeable resemblance to the persons represented. Her colouring is soft, tender, and delicate; her tints clear and well united; and she generally gave a graceful turn to the heads, especially to those of her female figures.

ROSA, ANNA DI,

SURNAMED Annella de Massina, from the name of her master, painted historical pieces with the greatest success. She perished at the age of thirty-six, a victim to the unjust jealousy of her husband.

ROSE, SUSAN PENELOPE,

AN English portrait-painter, was born in 1652. She was the daughter of Gibson the dwarf, and painted in water-colours with great freedom. The ambassador from Morocco sat to her and to Sir Godfrey Kneller at the same time. She also painted Bishop Burnet in his robes, as Chancellor of the Garter. She died in 1700, aged forty-eight.

ROWE, ELIZABETH,

WAS the daughter of Mr. Walter Singer, a dissenting minister, and was born at Ilchester, in Somersetshire, England, September 11th, 1674. Her father possessed an estate near Frome in that county; but he married and settled at Ilchester. Miss Singer gave early promise of genius, and began to write verses when she was only twelve, and also excelled in music and painting. She was very pious, and at the request of bishop Ken, wrote her paraphrase on the 38th chapter of Job. In 1696, she published a volume of poetry, entitled, "Poems on Several Occasions, by Philomela."

Her merit and personal attractions procured her many admirers, among whom was Prior the poet; but she married, in 1709, Mr. Thomas Rowe, and for five years lived with him very happily. He died in 1715, at the age of twenty-eight, and Mrs. Rowe retired to Frome, and spent the remainder of her life in the greatest seclusion. Here she composed most of her works; some of which were "Friendship in Death, or Letters from the Dead to the Living." The intention of this work is to impress the idea of the soul's immortality, without which all virtue and religion, with their temporal and eternal consequences, must fall to the ground. About three years afterwards she published "Letters, Moral and Entertaining;" "The History of Joseph," a poem; and, after her death, in 1736, the Rev. Dr. Watts, agreeably to her request, revised and published a work she left, called "Devout Exercises of the Heart, in Meditation and Soliloquy, Praise and Prayer."

She possessed a sweetness and serenity of temper that nothing could ruffle, and great benevolence and gentleness of character. She was unassuming and lovely in her deportment; and her charities bordered on excess. She died, February 20th, 1787, aged sixty-three.

After her death, there were found in her room several letters addressed to her most intimate friends, with this affecting superscription—"Not to be delivered until after my death." These letters breathed those sentiments of piety and affection, that peculiarly marked every action of her life. In them she expressed a hope of enjoying eternal happiness through the mediation and intercession of Jesus Christ. Her person is thus described by a relative:—"Her stature was moderate; her hair of a fine auburn; her eyes dark grey, rather inclinable to blue, full of sweetness and expression; her complexion naturally fair; and her countenance animated by a beautiful bloom. She spoke gracefully, and her voice was at once harmonious and sweet, suited to the language which flowed from her lips. The softness and benevolence of her aspect were beyond all description; it at once inspired veneration and love; and it was impossible to behold her without feeling regard and esteem."

Mrs. Rowe was exemplary in all her relations; but in her deportment as a wife and an author, she is worthy of especial regard. She felt it no disparagement to her mind, but rather an increase of glory, when she honoured her husband. Her esteem and affection appeared in all her conduct to Mr. Rowe; and by the most gentle and obliging manners, and the exercise of every social virtue, she confirmed the empire she had gained over his heart. She made it her duty to soften the anxieties, and heighten all the satisfactions, of his life. Her capacity for superior things did not tempt her to neglect the less honourable cares which the laws of custom and decency impose on the female sex, in the connubial state; and much less was she led by a sense of her own merit, to assume anything to herself inconsistent with that duty and submission which the precepts of Christian piety so expressly enjoin.

From "Meditations."

"With every sacrament let me remember my strength, and with the bread of life receive immortal vigour. Let me remember thy vows, O God! and, at my return to the world, let me commit my ways to thee. Let me be absolutely resigned to thy providence, nor once distrust thy goodness and fidelity. Let me be careful for nothing, but with prayer and supplication make my wants known to thee. Let the most awful sense of thy presence dwell on my heart, and always keep me in a serious disposition. Let me be merciful and just in my actions, calm and regular in my thoughts; and O do thou set a watch on my mouth, and keep the door of my lips! let me speak evil of no man; let me advance the reputation of the virtuous, and never be silent in the praise of merit. Let my tongue speak the language of my heart, and be guided by exact truth and perfect sincerity. Let me open my hands wide to the wants of the poor, in full confidence that my heavenly father will supply mine, and that the high possessor of heaven and earth will not fail to restore, in the hour of my distress, what I have parted with for his sake. O let thy grace be sufficient for me, and thy strength be manifest in weakness! Be present with me in the hour of temptation, and confirm the pious resolutions thou hast enabled me to perform."

From "Poems."

ODE TO LOVE.

Assist my doubtful muse, propitious Love,
Let all my soul the sacred impulse prove:
For thine's a holy unpolluted flame,
Howe'er the libertines profane thy name;
Howe'er with impious cant, hypocrisy
And senseless superstition blemish thee,
The pure result of sober reason thou;
Thy laws the strictest honour must allow;
Thy laws each vicious thought control:
From thee devotion takes its flaming wings:
Thou giv'st the noblest motion to the soul,
And govern'st all its springs.

To great attempts thou gen'rous minds dost move,
And only such are privileged to love;
Th' heroic race, the brightest names of old,
Were all thy glorious votaries enrolled.

Without thee, human life

A tedious round of circling cares would be,
A cursed fatigue, continual strife,
And tiresome vanity.

Thy charms our restless griefs control,
And calm the stormy motions of the soul:
Before thee pride and enmity,
With all infernal passions, fly.

And couldst thou in the realms below,
But once display thy beauteous face,
The damned a short redress might know,
And ev'ry terror fly the place.

From thee one bright unclouded smile
Would all the torments there beguile;
Thy smiles th' eternal tempests could assuage,
And make the damned forget their rage;

The sulph'rous waves would cease to roar,
And calmly glide along the silent shore.

No fabled Venus gave thee birth,
At Cyprus yet the goddess was not named,
Nor at Idalia, nor at Paphos famed;

Nor yet was feigned from foaming seas to rise;
For yet no seas appeared, or fountains flowed:
Nor yet distinguished in the skies,

Her radiant planet glowed.

But thou wast long ere motion sprung its race,
Ere chaos, and immeasurable space
Resigned their useless rights to elemental place;

Before the sparkling lamps on high
Were kindled up, and hung around the sky!
Before the sun led on the circling hours,
Or vital seeds produced their active powers;
Before the first intelligences strung
Their golden harps, and soft preludiums sung
To Love, the mighty cause whence their existence sprung,

Th' ineffable DIVINITY,

His own resemblance meets in thee.

By this thy glorious lineage thou dost prove
Thy high descent; for GOD himself is Love.

ROWSON, SUSANNAH,

Was the daughter of Lieutenant Haswell, of the British navy, who was sent to New England in 1769, when his daughter was about seven years old. On the breaking out of the revolution, lieutenant Haswell returned to London with his family, where, in 1786, Miss Haswell was married to William Rowson. While in England she published several novels, of which the only one that is now known is the one entitled "Charlotte Temple." Mrs. Rowson returned to the United States in 1793, and was engaged as an actress in the theatres of Boston and Philadelphia for the next three years; and was also diligently occupied with her literary pursuits. In 1797, she opened a school for girls in Boston, which succeeded extremely well. She died in that city in 1824. She was considered a poetess as well as a novelist, though but few of her poems are now known. Her writings are very voluminous.

ROZEE, MADEMOISELLE.

THIS extraordinary lady was born at Leyden in 1632. Konbraken says he cannot tell how she managed her work, nor with what instruments; but that she painted on the rough side of the panel, in such tints, and in such a manner, that, at a competent distance, the picture had all the effect of the neatest pencil and high finishing. Other writers, however, affirm, that she neither used oil nor water-colours in her performances; and only worked on the rough side of the panel with a preparation of silk floss, selected with great care, and disposed in different boxes, according to the several degrees of bright and dark tints, out of which she applied whatever colour was requisite for her work; and blended, softened, and united them with such inconceivable art and judgment, that she imitated the warmth of flesh with as great a glow of life as could be produced by the most exquisite pencil in oil. Nor could the nicest eye discern, at a proper distance, whether the whole was not the work of the pencil. But by whatever art her pictures were wrought, they were exquisitely beautiful, and perfectly natural. Her portraits were remarkably faithful, and every object was a just imitation of the model, whether the subject was animal life, architecture, landscape, or flowers. As her manner of working could not well be accounted for, she was distinguished by the name of the Sorceress. One of her landscapes is said to have been sold for five hundred florins; and though the subject was only the trunk of an old tree covered with moss, and a large spider finishing its web among the leaves and branches, every part appeared with so great a degree of force of relief and expression, that it was beheld with astonishment. One of her principal performances is in the cabinet at Florence, and is considered a singular curiosity in that collection. She died in 1680.

RUSSEL, LADY ELIZABETH,

DAUGHTER of Sir Anthony Cook, married Sir Thomas Hobbey, and afterwards Lord John Russell, son and heir of Francis, second Earl of Bedford. She was a woman of well-cultivated mind, and translated from the French a religious book on the Sacrament. She died about 1600, aged seventy-one. She lived to write the epitaphs in Greek, Latin, and English, for both her husbands.

RUSSELL, LADY RACHEL,

SECOND daughter of Thomas Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, was born in 1636. She married first, Lord Vaughan; and after his death she married, in 1669, William, Lord Russell, third son of William, first duke of Bedford. One son and two daughters were the fruits of this union, which was a very happy one, though Lady Rachel was four or five years older than her husband. Lord Rus sell, being implicated in a conspiracy with the duke of Monmouth, natural son of Charles II., Algernon Sidney, John Hampden, grandson to the celebrated patriot of that name, Essex, and Howard, to prevent the succession of the duke of York to the throne, was arrested and sent to the Tower. Monmouth fled; Howard saved himself by revealing his accomplices; and Essex, Sidney, and Hampden, were apprehended on his evidence. They were also accused of conspiring against the life of Charles II., which was not true. The Protestant succession, and the prevention of encroachments on the liberties of the people, were their chief objects.

The day previous to the trial of Lord Russell, he had asked leave of the court that notes of the evidence might be taken for his use. He was informed that he might have the assistance of one of his servants. "I ask no assistance," said he, "but that of the lady who sits by me." The spectators, seeing the daughter of the virtuous Southampton thus assisting her husband in his distress, melted into tears. The duke of Bedford offered the duchess of Portsmouth one hundred thousand pounds to procure her interest with the king for the pardon of his son. But every application proved vain. The independent spirit, patriotism, popularity, courage, talents, and virtues of the prisoner, were his most dangerous offences, and became so many arguments against his escape.

Lady Russell threw herself at the feet of the king, and pleaded with tears the merits and loyalty of her father, as an atonement for her husband's offences. But Charles remained unmoved, and even rejected her petition for a respite of a few weeks. On finding every effort fruitless for saving the life of her husband, she collected her courage, and fortified her mind for the fatal stroke, confirming by her example the resolution of her husband. His courage never appeared to falter, but when he spoke of his wife; his eyes would then fill with tears, and he appeared anxious to avoid the subject. When parting from Lady Russell, they mutually preserved a solemn silence; and when she left him, he said, "The bitterness of death was past." He then expressed his gratitude to Providence that had given him a wife who, to birth, fortune, talents, and virtue, united sensibility of heart; and whose conduct, in this trying crisis, had even surpassed all her other virtues.

Lord Russell was executed, July 21st, 1683. His widow proved the faithful guardian of his honour, a wise and active mother to his children, and the friend and patroness of his friends.

Her letters, written after her husband's death, give a touching picture of her conjugal affection and fidelity; but no expression of resentment or traces of a vindictive spirit mingle with the sentiment of grief by which they are pervaded.

Her only son, Wriothesley, duke of Bedford, died in 1711, of the small-pox; and soon after her daughter, the duchess of Rutland, died in childhood. Her other daughter, the duchess of Devonshire, was also in childhood at the time of her sister's death; and Lady Russell again was called upon to give new proofs of her self-control. After beholding one daughter in her coffin, she went to the chamber of the other with a tranquil countenance. The duchess of Devonshire earnestly inquiring after her sister, Lady Russell calmly replied, "I have seen your sister out of bed to-day."

Some years after her husband's death, she was under apprehensions of an entire loss of sight; but this was prevented by an operation. Lady Russell died, September 29th, 1723, aged eighty-seven. About fifty years afterwards her letters were collected and published, which established her fame in literature as one of the most elegant writers of her time. In whatever light we consider her character, its moral excellence appears perfect. Such an example shows the power of female influence to promote good and resist evil. Even the noble Lord Russell was made better by his union with her. Amiable and prudent, as well as lovely, she was the means of reclaiming him from some youthful follies into which he had plunged at the time of the Restoration. With such a guardian angel by his side, no wonder he was strengthened to act his lofty part, and die a patriot martyr. His widow wore her weeds to the close of her life; their conjugal union of hearts was never broken, as the following extracts from her letters will show:

TO DR. FITZWILLIAM—ON HER SORROW.

I am sure my heart is filled with the obligation, how ill soever my words may express it, for all those hours you have set apart (in a busy life) for my particular benefit, for the quieting my distracted thoughts, and reducing them to a just measure of patience for all I have or can suffer. I trust I shall with diligence, and some success, serve those ends they were designed to. They have very punctually, the time you intended them for, the last two sheets coming to my hands the 16th of this fatal month; it is the 21st completes my three years of true sorrow, which should be turned rather into joy; as you have laid it before me, with reasons strongly maintained, and rarely illustrated. Sure he is one of those has gained by a dismissal from a longer attendance here: while he lived, his being pleased led me to be so too, and so it should do still; and then my soul should be full of joy; I should be easy and cheerful, but it is sad and heavy; so little we distinguish how, and why we love, to me it argues a prodigious fondness of one's self; I am impatient that is hid from me I took delight in, though he knows much greater than he did here. All I can say for myself is, that while we are clothed with flesh, to the perfectest, some displeasure will attend a separation from things we love. This comfort I think I have in my affliction, that I can say, unless thy law had been my delight, I should have perished in my trouble. The rising from the dead is a glorious contemplation, doctor! nothing raises a drooping spirit like it; his Holy Spirit, in the mean time, speaking peace to our consciences, and through all the gloomy sadness of our condition, letting us discern that we belong to the election of grace, that our persons are accepted and justified. But still I will humble myself for my own sins, and those of our families, that brought such a day on us.

I have been under more than ordinary care for my eldest girl; she has been ill of St. Anthony's fire, as we call it, and is not yet free from it. I had a doctor down with her, but he found her so likely to do well he stayed only one day. I have sent you these Gazettes, and will send no more, for I reckon you will be in your progress of visits.

I wish with you Lord Campden would marry; but I want skill to prevail by what I can say. I hope I need employ none to persuade Dr. Fitzwilliam that I am very acknowledging, and very sincerely, &c.

TO THE SAME.

* * * * *

If I could contemplate the conducts of Providence with the uses you do, it would give ease indeed, and no disastrous events should much affect us. The new scenes of each day make me often conclude myself very void of temper and reason, that I still shed tears of sorrow and not of joy, that so good a man is landed safe on the happy shore of a blessed eternity; doubtless he is at rest, though I find none without him, so true a partner he was in all my joys and griefs; I trust the Almighty will pass by this my infirmity; I speak it in respect to the world, from whose enticing delights I can now be better weaned. I was too rich in possessions whilst I possessed him: all relish is now gone, I bless God for it, and pray, and ask of all good people (do it for me from such you know are so) also to pray that I may more and more turn the stream of my affections upwards, and set my heart upon the ever-satisfying perfections of God; not starting at his darkest providences, but remembering continually either his glory, justice, or power is advanced by every one of them, and that mercy is over all his works, as we shall one day with ravishing delight see: in the mean time, I endeavour to suppress all wild imaginations a melancholy fancy is apt to let in; and say with the man in the gospel, "I believe, help thou my unbelief."

TO THE SAME.

Never shall I, good Doctor, I hope, forget your work (as I may term it) of labour and love: so instructive and comfortable do I find it, that at any time, when I have read any of your papers, I feel a heat within me to be repeating my thanks to you anew, which is all I can do towards the discharge of a debt you have engaged me in; and though nobody loves more than I do to stand free from engagements I cannot answer, yet I do not wish for it here; I would have it as it is; and although I have the present advantage, you will have the future reward; and if I can truly reap what I know you design me by it, a religious and quiet submission to all providences, I am assured you will esteem to have attained it here in some measure. Never could you more seasonably have fed me with such discourses, and left me with expectations of new repasts, in a more seasonable time, than these my miserable months, and in those this very week in which I have lived over again that fatal day that determined what fell out a week after, and that has given me so long and so bitter a time of sorrow. But God has a compass in his providences, that is out of our reach, and as he is all good and wise, that consideration should in reason slacken the fierce rages of grief. But sure, Doctor, 't is the nature of sorrow to lay hold on all things which give a new ferment to it, then how could I choose but feel it in a time of so much confusion as these last weeks have been, closing so tragically as they have done; and sure never any poor creature, for two whole years together, has had more awakers to quicken and revive the anguish of its soul than I have had; yet I hope I do most truly desire that nothing may be so bitter to me, as to think that I have in the least offended thee, O my God! and that nothing may be so marvellous in my eyes as the exceeding love of my Lord Jesus: that heaven being my aim, and the longing expectations of my soul, I may go through honour and dishonour, good report and bad report, prosperity and adversity, with some evenness of mind. The inspiring me with these desires is, I hope, a token of his never-failing love towards me, though an unthankful creature for all the good things I have enjoyed, and do still in the lives of hopeful children by so beloved a husband.

TO THE EARL OF GALWAY—ON FRIENDSHIP.

I have before me, my good lord, two of your letters, both partially and tenderly kind, and coming from a sincere heart and honest mind (the last a plain word, but, if I mistake not, very significant), are very comfortable to me, who, I hope, have no proud thoughts of myself as to any sort. The opinion of an esteemed friend, that one is not very wrong, assists to strengthen a weak and wiling mind to do her duty towards that Almighty Being, who has, from infinite bounty and goodness, so chequered my days on this earth, as I can thankfully reflect I felt many, I may say many years of pure, and, I trust, innocent, pleasant content, and happy enjoyments as this world can afford, particularly that biggest blessing of loving and being loved by those I loved and respected; on earth no enjoyment certainly to be put in the balance with it. All other are like wine, intoxicates for a time, but the end is bitterness, at least not profitable. Mr. Waller (whose picture you look upon) has, I long remember, these words:

All we know they do above
Is, that they sing, and that they love.

The best news I have heard is, you have two good companions with you, which, I trust, will contribute to divert you this sharp season, when, after so sore a fit as I apprehend you have felt, the air even of your improving pleasant garden cannot be enjoyed without hazard.

TO LADY SUNDERLAND—ON HEALTH, FRIENDSHIP, LOVE.

Your kind letter, madam, asks me to do much better for myself and mine, than to scribble so insignificantly as I do in a piece of paper; but for twenty several reasons you must have the advantage you offer me with obliging earnestness a thousand times greater than I deserve, or there can be cause for, but that you have taken a resolution to be all goodness and favour to me. And indeed what greater mark can you almost give than remembering me so often, and letting me receive the exceeding advantage of your doing so, by reading your letters, which are all so edifying? When I know you are continually engaged in so great and necessary employments as you are, and have but too imperfect health, which to any other in the world but Lady Sunderland would unfit for at least so great despatches as you are charged with. These are most visible tokens of Providence, that every one that aims to do their duty shall be enabled to do it.

I hope your natural strength is so great, that it will in some time, if you do your part, master what has been accidentally in the disorder of it. Health, if one strictly considers, is the first of earthly blessings; for even the conversation of friends, which as to spiritual profits, as you excellently observe, is the nearest approach we can make to heaven while we live in these tabernacles of clay; so it is in a temporal sense also, the most pleasant and the most profitable improvement we can make of the time we are to spend on earth. But, as I was saying, if our bodies are out of tune, how ill do we enjoy what in itself is so precious? and how often must we choose, if we can attain it, a short slumber, that may take off our sense of pain, than to accept what we know in worth excels almost to infiniteness? No soul can speak more feelingly than my poor self on this subject; who can truly say, my friendships have made all the joys and troubles of my life; and yet who would live and not love? Those who have tried the insipidness of it would, I believe, never choose it. Mr. Waller says—"T is (with singing) all we know they do above." And it is enough; for if there is so charming a delight in the love, and suitableness in humours, to creatures! what must it be to our clarified spirits to love in the presence of God! Can there be a greater contemplation to provoke to diligence for our preparation to that great change, where we shall be perfected, and so continue for ever! I see I have scribbled a great deal of paper; I dare not read it, lest I should be sorry Lady Sunderland should; and yet can now send her nothing if not this, for my eyes grow ill so fast, I resolve to do nothing of this sort by candle-light.

RUYSCH, RACHEL,

A CELEBRATED artist, was born at Amsterdam, in 1664. She excelled in painting flowers and fruits. She died in 1750.

RYVES, ELIZA,

AN Irish lady, known for her literary abilities. Having lost her property by a lawsuit, she subsisted by the labours of her pen. She wrote the "Hermit of Snowden," a novel; besides some translations from the French, and frequent contributions to the annual registers. She died in London, in 1797.

S.

SABLIÈRE, MADAME DE LA,

A FRENCH poetess, was the friend and benefactress of La Fontaine, who lived in her house for twenty years. Her husband was also a poet, and she is said to have assisted him in his writings. She was not, however, always faithful to her husband; but she expiated this sin, in the opinion of her contemporaries, by retiring to a convent, and consecrating the rest of her life to taking care of the sick. She died at Paris in the latter part of the seventeenth century.

ST. LEGER, HON. ELIZABETH,

THE only female that ever was initiated into the mystery of freemasonry, was the daughter of Lord Doneraile, a very zealous freemason. She obtained this honour by contriving to place herself so as to watch the manner in which a new member was initiated. Being discovered just before the termination of the ceremonies, she was at first threatened with death, but saved by the entreaties of her brother, on condition that she would go through the whole of the solemn ceremonies. This she consented to, and sometimes afterwards joined in their processions. This lady was a cousin to General Anthony St. Leger, and married Richard Aldworth, Esq., of New Market.

SAINTE-NECTAIRE, MAGDALENE DE,

WIDOW of Guy de St. Exuperi, was a Protestant heroine, who distinguished herself in the civil wars of France. After the death of her husband, she retired to her château at Miremont, in the Limousin, where, with sixty young men, well armed, she was accustomed to make excursions on the Catholic armies in her neighbourhood. In 1575, M. Montal, governor of the province, having had his detachments often defeated by Madame de Sainte-Nectaire, resolved to besiege her in her château, with fifteen hundred foot and fifty horse. Sallying out upon him, she defeated his troops; but finding, on her return, her château in possession of the enemy, she galloped to Turenne, a neighbouring town, to procure a reinforcement. Montal awaited her in a defile, but was vanquished and mortally wounded by her troops. The time of her death is not recorded.

SAINTE-PHALIER, FRANÇOISE THÉRÈSE AUMILE DE,

A FRENCH lady, who wrote "The Confident Rival," a comedy, and some other poetical pieces. She died at Paris in 1757.

SALVIONI, ROSALBA MARIA,

WAS born at Rome in 1658. She studied the art of painting under Sebastian Conea, but devoted herself wholly to portraiture, in which she excelled. She died in 1708.

SAMSON, DEBORAH,

WAS the child of very poor parents, of Plymouth, Massachusetts. She was received into a respectable family, where she was kindly treated, but where her education was entirely neglected. She, however, contrived to teach herself to read and write; and, as soon as she was able, earned money enough to pay for her own schooling for a short time. When she was about twenty, the Revolutionary war in America commenced; and Deborah, disguising herself in man's apparel, and going to the American camp, enlisted, in 1778, for the whole term of the war, under the name of Robert Shirtliffe. Accustomed to out-door labour, she was enabled to undergo the same fatigues and exercises as the other soldiers. Her fidelity and zeal gained her the confidence of the officers, and she was a volunteer in several hazardous enterprises. She was twice wounded, at first in the head, and afterwards in the shoulder; but she managed to preserve the secret of her sex unsuspected. However, she was seized with a brain-fever in Philadelphia, and the physician who was attending her discovered her sex, and took her to his own house. When her health was restored, her commanding officer, to whom the physician had revealed his discovery, ordered her to carry a letter to General Washington. Certain now of a fact of which she had before been doubtful, that her sex was known, she went with much reluctance to fulfil the order. Washington, after reading the message with great consideration, without speaking a word, gave her her discharge, together with a note containing a few words of advice, and some money. She afterwards married Benjamin Gan nett, of Sharon, Massachusetts. She received a pension, with a grant of land, for her services as a revolutionary soldier.

SARTE, DAUPHINE DE,

A FRENCH lady, wife of the Marquis de Robias, wrote treatises on philosophy, and was distinguished for her mathematical knowledge. She excelled in music, and had a particular talent for composing it. She died at Arles, in 1685.

SCALIGERI, LUCIA,

WAS born at Venice in 1637. She became distinguished by her knowledge of the learned languages, and her skill in music and painting. Several of her pictures are in the churches of Venice, where she died in 1700.

SCHOPENHAUER, JOHANNA FROSINA,

BORN in the year 1770, at Dantzic, where her father, Henry Frosino, was senator, showed at an early age a decided talent for drawing and painting, as well as for languages. After having received in her parental home a careful education, and enjoyed a happy youth, she married Henry Flaris Schopenhauer, who accompanied his young wife through Germany to France, thence to London, where they remained a long time; and afterwards through Brabant, Flanders, and Germany, back to Dantzic. There she lived until the capture of this free city by the Prussians, in 1793. The next ten years she spent with her husband in Hamburg. In 1803, they visited Holland, the North of France, England, Scotland, and went from Holland to Paris. There she had the good fortune to be thoroughly taught, by the celebrated Augustin, in miniature painting, which had always been her favourite occupation. From Paris, the travellers went over the South of France to Ghent, wandered through Switzerland, saw Munich, Vienna, (where they remained some time,) Presburg, Silesia, Bohemia, Saxony, Brandenburg, touched Dantzic, and after three years came back to Hamburg, where a sudden death snatched away Mr. Schopenhauer. She then fixed (1806) her abode in Weimar, where a highly refined social circle surrounded her, to which Goethe, Wieland, Henry Meier, Fernow, Bertuch, Falk, Fr. Mayer, and many literary women, belonged, of whom this city may well be proud. Every suitable foreigner was her welcome guest. Between her and Fernow (of whom she learned the Italian language) existed an ideal friendship, which death interrupted two years after. G. V. Kgelgen had at that time arrived in Weimar to take Goethe's, Wieland's, Schiller's, and Herder's portraits. A description of these four portraits, and of several oil-paintings by the landscape painter Frederic, were the first publications of which Mrs. S. acknowledged herself to be the authoress. She was induced by Cotter to write Fernow's life. This work appeared in 1810. Two years later, she published "Remembrances of a Tour through England;" 1816, followed a volume of "Novels;" 1817, the "Trip to the Rhine and its Nearest Environs;" and 1818, the "Journey through the South of France." The writer has obtained a just approval for her nice observations, joined to an easy and graceful style. Her last work is the popular novel, "Gabrielle."

Her novels show great powers of observation, and a thorough knowledge of the world and men.

Madame Schopenhauer died at Jena, in April, 1838.

SCOTT, LADY ANNE,

WAS the only daughter of Francis, Earl of Buccleugh, and the greatest heiress in the three kingdoms. When she was but thirteen, she was selected by Charles II. to be the wife of his son, the unfortunate duke of Monmouth, who was only a year older than his bride. These early marriages were the vice of the times, and rarely produced satisfactory results; and this one was not an exception. Brave to a fault, exquisitely handsome, courted, flattered, caressed by the court, and adored by the people, Monmouth ran, even in his boyish days, a career of vice and profligacy which appears to have been the almost inevitable consequence of his bringing up. Anne Scott possessed many estimable qualities, but she was unable to attach the heart of her fickle husband. She was a woman of taste and accomplishments; the encourager of learning and genius; and the patroness of men of letters. Without possessing beauty, she had an agreeable countenance; and her wit, virtue, and good sense, rendered her attractive. The turbulence of her husband, the dangers he was continually hurrying into, imposed upon the duchess a life of anxiety, privation, and sorrow. She was for ever at her post as mediator with Charles II. and king James; and to the last strove to interpose her influence for his safety. When he was condemned to death, she visited him in the Tower. He exonerated her from all blame or knowledge of his rebellious schemes, paid a just tribute to her virtues and excellence, and recommended their children to her care; but exhibited no tenderness towards her, his whole affections being absorbed in his romantic attachment to Lady Henrietta Wentworth, who he professed to consider his wife in the eyes of God. His duchess he said he had married when a child; she was his wife by the law of the land; the other was his true wife in the sight of heaven.

The duchess of Buccleugh was the mother of six children, three of whom died in infancy. Her oldest son inherited the title and estates, which had been confirmed to the children of Monmouth by James II. The present duke of Buccleugh is a lineal descendant of the neglected duchess and her ill-fated lord. Three years after the death of Monmouth, the duchess became the second wife of Charles, third Lord Cornwallis. By this marriage she was the mother of three children, who all died unmarried. The duchess died on the 6th of February, 1732, in her eighty-first year.

SCHROEDER, SOPHIA,

ENGAGED at the Imperial theatres of Vienna, was born in Paderborn, in 1781. Her father's name was Burger. Her mother, after the death of her first husband, married the celebrated actor Keilholz, and went with her daughter to St. Petersburg. Sophia had not been destined for the stage; yet, as the company of players in St. Petersburg was very limited, and by the death of Mrs. Stallmers the juvenile parts had become vacant, she yielded to the entreaties of the director, and began her theatrical course in the charming little opera, "The Red Cap." When fourteen years old, she married the actor Stallmers. In Reval, she was introduced to Kotzebue, by whose recommendation she received an engagement at the theatre of Vienna. She performed exclusively comic and naïf parts, and was much applauded as Margaret in the "Affinities." After twelve months, she left Vienna to go to Breslau, where she was engaged for the opera. In the part of Hulda, in the "Nymph of the Danube," she was very successful. In 1801, she was invited to Hamburg. There she entered on a new career, in which she shone like a star of the first magnitude; for she devoted herself entirely to tragedy. Domestic grief had turned her cheerful spirits into melancholy; and the slumbering spark of her genius kindled into a mighty blaze. In 1804, she married her second husband, Schroeder, (director of the Hamburg theatre,) and lived twelve years in Hamburg, under the most favourable auspices, until the warlike events of 1813 compelled her to leave this city. After having made a journey, on which she everywhere gained laurels, she accepted an engagement in Prague, where she remained two years. When the time of her contract had elapsed, she returned to Vienna. Her characters of Phedra, Lady Macbeth, Merope, Sappho, Johanna von Montfaucan, are masterly performances, and excited unbounded admiration.

SCHURMAN, ANNA MARIA,

A MOST extraordinary German lady, was the daughter of parents who were both descended from noble Protestant families, and was born at Cologne in 1607. At six years of age she could cut with her scissors all kinds of figures out of paper, without any model; and at eight, she learned in a few days to draw flowers admirably; two years after, she was but three hours in learning to embroider. Afterwards, she was taught vocal and instrumental music, painting, sculpture, and engraving; and succeeded equally well in all these arts. Her handwriting in all languages was inimitable; and some curious persons have preserved specimens of it in their cabinets. She painted her own portrait, and made artificial pearls so like natural ones, that they could be distinguished only by pricking them with a needle.

The powers of her understanding were not inferior to her dexterity; for, at eleven, when her brothers were examined in their Latin, she often prompted them in whispers, though she had only heard them say their lessons en passant. Her father, observing this, applied himself to the cultivation of her mind; and the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages became so familiar to her, that she not only wrote but spoke them in a manner which surprised the most learned men. She made great progress also in several Oriental languages, as the Syriac, Chaldee, Arabic, and Ethiopic; she also understood, and spoke readily, French, English, and Italian. She was well versed in geography, astronomy, philosophy, and the sciences; but, not satisfied with these acquisitions, she turned her attention to the study of theology, and became very religious.

Her father had settled at Utrecht when she was an infant; and afterwards removed to Francker for the more convenient education of his children, where he died in 1623. His widow then returned to Utrecht, where Anna Maria continued her studies. Her devotion to her intellectual and religious cultivation undoubtedly prevented her marrying; as Mr. Cats, a celebrated poet, and several others, proposed to her. Her modesty, which equalled her acquirements, made her shrink from notoriety; but Rivetus, Spanheim, and Vossius, brought her into notice contrary to her own inclination. Salmasius, Beverovicius, and Huygens, also maintained a literary correspondence with her; and by showing her letters, spread her fame into foreign countries. At last she became so celebrated that persons of the highest rank visited her; and cardinal Richelieu showed her marks of esteem.

About 1650, she made a great alteration in her religious system. She no longer attended church, but performed her devotions in private, and attached herself to Labadie, the famous religious enthusiast, accompanying him wherever he went. She lived some time with him at Altena, in Holstein; and after his death, in 1677, she retired to Wivert, in Friesland, where William Penn visited her. She died there in 1678.

She wrote "De Vitæ Humanæ Terminis;" "Dissertatio de ingenii muliebris ad doctrinam et meliores literas aptitudine." These two essays, with letters in French, Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, to her learned correspondents, were printed in 1648. She wrote afterwards, "Eukleria, seu melioris partis electio." This is a defence of her attachment to Labadie. She chose for her device the words of St. Ignatius, "Amor meus crucifixus est." "My love is crucified."

SCUDERI, MAGDALEINE DE,

A WOMAN of more wit and talent than taste, was born in 1607, at Havre de Grace. She went when very young to Paris, where her brother, George de Scuderi, also an eminent French writer, was living; and her wit and acquirements soon gained her admission into the best literary society of that day. Being obliged to support herself, she resolved to do so by her pen; and the taste of that age being for romances, she turned her attention that way, and succeeded wonderfully. Her books were eagerly sought, and her reputation became very great. She was chosen to succeed the learned Helena Cornaro, by the celebrated academy of the Ricovrati at Padua. Several great personages gave her many marks of their regard; among others, Christina of Sweden often wrote to her, settled on her a pension, and sent her her picture: Cardinal Mazarin left her an annuity by his will; and, in 1683, Louis XIV., at the solicitation of Madame de Maintenon, settled a good pension on her.

Mademoiselle de Scuderi corresponded with many learned men; and her house at Paris was a kind of little court, to which all persons of genius, learning, or wit, were accustomed to resort. At her death, two churches contended fiercely for the honour of possessing her remains. She was a very voluminous writer, and obtained the first prize of eloquence bestowed by the academy of Paris. Her principal romances were entitled "Almahide;" "Artamenes;" "Clelia;" "Le Grand Cyrus;" and "Ibrahim." She also wrote fables and poetry, and a work called "Conversations." Her narratives are tedious and prolix; but the praise of ingenuity, of elevated sentiment, and of purifying and ennobling the particular species of writing to which she devoted herself, cannot be denied to her. She was very plain in person, and this, joined with her wit, gained for her the name of Sappho.

A curious incident happened to this lady in a journey she took with her brother. At a great distance from Paris, their conversation one evening, at an inn, turned upon a romance they were jointly composing, the hero of which they had called Prince Mazare. "What shall we do with Prince Mazare?" said Mademoiselle Scuderi; "is it not better that he should die by poison than the sword?"

"It is not yet time," replied her brother, "for that business; when it is necessary, we can despatch him as we please; but at present we have not quite done with him."

Two merchants, in the next room, overhearing this conversation, concluded they had conspired to murder some prince, whose real name was concealed under that of Mazare. They imparted their suspicions to the host, who sent for the officers of the police. M. and Mademoiselle Scuderi were arrested, and sent back under a strong escort to Paris, where, after much trouble and expense, they procured their liberty. Mademoiselle Scuderi died in 1701, aged ninety-four.

SEGUIER, ANNE DE,

DAUGHTER to Pierre Seguiet, whose family gave to France so many illustrious magistrates, married Francis du Prat, baron de Thiers, by whom she had two daughters, Anne and Philippine, who were educated in the court of Henry III. of France. Anne de Seguiet was a celebrated poetess; she was living in 1573. Her daughters, also, were distinguished for their literary attainments, and for their skill in the Greek and Latin languages.

SEIDELMANN, APOLLONIA,

THE wife of James Seidelmann, Professor of the Fine Arts at the academy of Dresden. In Venice, her native city, she had received instructions in drawing, and afterwards perfected herself in this accomplishment under the direction of her husband. In the year 1790, she went with him to Italy, where she devoted herself for three years to miniature painting, assisted by the celebrated Teresa Maron, sister of Raphael Mengs. After her return to Dresden, she painted more after the manner of her husband, and showed herself a rare artist, by her fine copies of the best pictures of the academy. One of her master copies is the Madonna of Raphael. The eminent talent of this artistic couple for conversation deserves to be mentioned likewise; their soirées, which they gave abroad and at home, and to which their charming daughter, Luise Seidelmann, aided greatly by her musical powers, were the delight of all who loved genius and art.

SERMENT, LOUISE ANASTASIE,

BORN at Grenoble in 1642, was admitted to the academy of the Ricovrati at Padua, and acquired great celebrity by her learning. She also wrote poems in French and Latin; and it was said that all the best part of the operas of Quinault was her work. She died in 1692.

SESSI, MARIANNE and ANNA MARIA,

BORE a name well known in the annals of modern music, and celebrated by several vocalists of Italian origin. Of five sisters of this name, Marianne Sessi was the oldest. She was engaged, in 1793, at the opera seria of Vienna, went in 1804 to Italy, and then for a longer period to London. In 1817 and 1818, she visited the north of Germany, Leipzig, Dresden, Berlin, Hamburg, &c., and went finally from Copenhagen to Stockholm, where she remained. The second of the sisters, Imperatrice Sessi, has acquired the greatest reputation of all. Her talent was cultivated in Vienna. In 1804 she went to Venice, where, during the carnival, she enjoyed the highest triumph. She enchanted the audience so much, that sonnets of all colours and shapes were thrown on the stage; her likeness was handed around among the spectators; a bouquet in a richly decorated golden vase was presented to her; and at the close she was crowned with a wreath of laurel. She died in October, 1808, in her twenty-eighth year, of consumption, at Florence, deeply mourned by all lovers of music. The talent of her younger sister, Anna Maria Sessi, developed itself early. She was born at Rome in 1793, but came to Vienna in the first year of her existence, where she modelled her art after that of her sisters. In Florence, she devoted herself still more thoroughly to the cultivation of her voice; and there laid the foundation of a true Italian singer. In 1813, she was married at Vienna; and on all her subsequent travels was welcomed everywhere as a rare phenomenon of song. It is said, that in the recitative she had no rival, even among the Italians.

The fourth and fifth of these sisters, Vittoria and Caroline, of whom the former was married in Vienna, and the latter in Naples, are less generally known. A cousin of the above-named sisters, Maria Theresa Sessi, was also noted for her talent in music.

SETURNAN, MADAME,

A NATIVE of Cologne, excelled in the arts, and acquired a wide reputation. She was a painter, musician, engraver, sculptor, philosopher, geometer, and a theologian. She understood and spoke nine languages.

SÉVIGNÉ, MARIE DE RUBUTIN CHANTAL, MARCHIONESS OF,

DAUGHTER of the baron de Chantal, was born, in 1627, at Bourbilly, in Burgundy, and was early left an orphan. Her maternal uncle, Christopher de Coulanges, brought her up, and she was taught by Menage and Chapelain. At the age of eighteen she married the Marquis de Sévigné, who was killed in a duel seven years afterwards. Left with a son and daughter, she devoted herself entirely to their education. To her daughter, who, in 1669, married the Count de Grignan, governor of Provence, she was particularly attached; and to her was addressed the greater part of those letters which have placed the Marchioness de Sévigné in the first rank of epistolary writers. This illustrious lady was acquainted with all the wits and learned men of her time; and she is said to have decided the famous dispute between Perrault and Boileau, concerning the preference of the ancients to the moderns, saying, "the ancients are the finest, and we are the prettiest."

"Her letters," says Voltaire, "filled with anecdotes, written with freedom, and in a natural and animated style, are an excellent criticism upon studied letters of wit; and still more upon those fictitious letters, which aim to imitate the epistolary style, by a recital of false sentiments and feigned adventures to imaginary correspondents." She died in 1696, in her seventy-first year, at her daughter's residence in Provence, of a fever brought on in consequence of the anxiety she had endured during a dangerous illness of Madame de Grignan.

Tenderness and sensibility are characteristic of her letters, and were displayed by her during her whole life. "The true mark of a good heart," says Madame de Sévigné, "is its capacity for loving."

Letter 11.

TO M. DE COULANGES.

PARIS, Monday, 15 Dec., 1670.

I am going to tell you a thing that is the most astonishing, the most surprising, the most marvellous, the most miraculous, the most supreme, the most confounding, the most unheard, the most singular, the most extraordinary, the most incredible, the most unforeseen, the greatest, the least, the rarest, the most common, the most public, the most private, till to-day; the most brilliant, the most to be envied; in short, a thing of which there has been but one example for ages past, and that not a just one neither; a thing that we cannot believe at Paris; how then will it gain credit at Lyons? A thing which makes every body cry, Lord have mercy upon us! a thing which causes the greatest joy to Madame de Rohan and Madame de Hauterive; a thing, in fine, which will be done on Sunday next, when those who are present at it will think they see double. A thing which will be done on Sunday, and yet perhaps not finished on Monday. I cannot bring myself to tell it you: can't you guess? I give you three times to do it in. What, not a word to throw at a dog? Well then, I find I must tell it you. Monsieur de Lauzun is to be married next Sunday at the Louvre, to — guess whom! I give you four times to do it in, I give you six, I give you a hundred. Says Madame de Coulanges, it is really very hard to guess: perhaps it is Madame de la Valiere. Indeed, Madame, it is not. It is Mademoiselle de Retz, then. No, nor yet her; you are violently provincial. Lord bless me, says you, what stupid wretches we are; it is Mademoiselle de Colbert all the while. Nay, now you are still further from the mark. Why then it must certainly be Mademoiselle de Creguy. You have it not yet: well, I find I must tell you at last. He is to be married next Sunday, at the Louvre, with the king's leave, to Mademoiselle, Mademoiselle de . . . Mademoiselle — guess her name. He marries Mademoiselle, the great Mademoiselle; Mademoiselle, daughter of the late MONSIEUR; Mademoiselle, grand-daughter of Henry IV.; Mademoiselle d'Eu, Mademoiselle de Dombes, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, Mademoiselle d'Orleans, Mademoiselle, the king's cousin-german; Mademoiselle, destined to the throne; Mademoiselle, the only match that was worthy of MONSIEUR. Here is a glorious matter for talk. If you should cry out, if you are beside yourselves, if you say we have told you a lie, that it's all false, that we are making a jest of you, that it is a very pretty joke indeed! that the invention is dull and flat, in short, if you abuse us, we shall think you quite in the right; for we have done just the same ourselves. Farewell; you will find from the letters you receive this post whether we tell you the truth or not.

Letter 12.

TO THE SAME.

PARIS, Friday, 19 Dec., 1670.

What is called falling from the clouds, or from a pinnacle, happened last night at the Thuilleries: but I must take things farther back. You have already shared in the joy, the transport, and ecstasies of the princess and her happy lover. It was just as I told you; the affair was made public on Monday. Tuesday was passed in talking, astonishment, and compliments. Wednesday, Ma femoiselle made a deed of gift to Monsieur de Lauzun, investing him with certain titles, names, and dignities, necessary to be inserted in the marriage-contract, which was drawn up that day. She gave him then, till she could give him something better, four duchies; the first was that of count d'Eu, which entitles him to rank as first peer of France; the dukedom of Montpensier, which title he bore all that day; the dukedom de Saint Fargeau; and the dukedom de Chatellerault; the whole valued at twenty-two millions of livres. The contract was then drawn up, and he took the name of Montpensier. Thursday morning, which was yesterday, Mademoiselle was in expectation of the king's signing the contract, as he had said he would; but about seven o'clock in the evening, the queen, Monsieur, and several old dotards that were about him, had so persuaded his majesty that his reputation would suffer in this affair, that, after sending for Mademoiselle and Monsieur de Lauzun into his presence, he declared unto them, before the prince, that he absolutely forbade them to think any farther about this marriage. Monsieur de Lauzun received this order with all the respect, all the submission, all the firmness, and, at the same time, all the despair, that could be expected in so great a reverse of fortune. As for Mademoiselle, being under no restraint, she gave a loose to herself, and burst forth into tears, cries, lamentations, and the most violent expressions of grief; she keeps her bed all day long, and takes nothing within her lips but a little broth. What a fine dream is here! what a glorious subject for a tragedy, or a romance, but especially for an eternity of talk and reasoning! This is what we do day and night, morning and evening, without end or ceasing: we hope you do the like. E frâ tanto vi baccio le mani.

Letter 138.

TO MADAME DE GRIGNAN.

PARIS, Tuesday, 4 March, 1672.

You say then, my dear child, that you cannot possibly keep hatred alive for so long a time. You are in the right of it: it is much the same with me; but then guess what I do in the room of it: why I can love as strongly, and for as long a time, a certain person that you know. You seem to give way to a negligence that gives me a deal of concern. You seldom want an excuse for it, it is so much your natural inclination; but you know I always found fault with you for it, and do so still. One might make an excellent mean of Madame du Fresnoy and you: both of you are in the extreme; but certainly yours may be better borne with than hers. I wonder, sometimes, at the many nothings that drop from my pen: I never curb it, but am extremely happy that such trifles amuse you. They would be very disagreeable to many people; but I beg you will not regret the want of them when you have me with you, or I shall grow jealous of my own letters.

The dinner that M. de Valavoire gave, entirely eclipsed ours: not for the quantity, but extreme delicacy of the dishes. My dear child, how you look! Madame de Lafayette will scold you without mercy. For God's sake, dress your head tomorrow; excessive negligence eclipses beauty; and you carry your dullness beyond bounds. I have made your compliments; those that are sent you in return surpass in number the stars of the sky. A propos of stars: La Gouville was the other day at Madame de St. Lou's, who has just lost her old page. La Gouville, among other things, was talking of her star; and her star did this, and her star did that: and at length Segrais, who was there, rousing himself, as if he had been asleep, says to her, "Dear Madam, do you think you have a star to yourself? I hear nothing but people talking about their stars. Why, do you know, Madam, that there are but one thousand and twenty-two in all? How then do you think every one can have a star to himself?" This was spoken in such a comical manner, and with so serious a countenance, that it put an end to all their sorrow in a trice. Your letters were given to Madame de Vaudemont by d'Hacqueville. To tell you the truth, I see him very seldom now. The great fish swallow up the little ones, you know. Farewell, my dearest love: I am getting Bajazet and la Fontaine's Fables, to send you for your amusement.

Letter 159.

TO THE SAME.

PARIS, Friday, 30 May, 1672.

I had no letter from you yesterday, my dear child: your journey to Monaco had put you quite out of sorts: I was afraid of some such accident. I now send you news from M. de Pomponne: the fashion of being wounded is begun already: my heart is very heavy with the fears of this campaign. My son writes by every opportunity; he is hitherto in good health.

My aunt is still in a deplorable condition; and yet we have the courage to think of appointing a day for parting hence, assuming a hope which in reality we cannot entertain. I cannot yet forbear thinking there are certain things not ranged in good order, among the various events of life; they are, as it were, rugged stones lying across our way, too unwieldy to be removed, and which we must get over as we can, though it is not without pain and difficulty.

We have a very tragical history to communicate to you from Livri. Do you remember that pretended devoté, who walked so steadily, without turning his head, that you would have thought he was carrying a vessel full of water? His devotion has turned his brain. One night he gave himself five or six stabs with a knife, and fell on his knees in his cell, all naked, and weltering in his blood. They come in, and find him in this posture. "Brother, what have you done? Who has left you in such a condition?" He replies very calmly, "Father, I am doing a little penance." He faints away; they lay him on a bed; they dress his wounds, which are found very dangerous; he is recovered with much difficulty, and sent to his friends.

If you do not think such a head sufficiently disordered, tell me so, and you shall have, instead of it, that of Madame Paul, who is fallen desperately in love with a great booby, whom she had taken as her gardener. This lady has managed her affairs admirably; she has married him. The fellow is a mere brute, and has not common sense; he will beat her soon, and has already threatened to do it; no matter, she was resolved to have him. I have never seen so violent a passion; there is all the fine extravagance of sentiments imaginable, were they but rightly applied: it is like the rough sketch of an ill painting; all the colours are there; they want only to be properly disposed. I am extremely diverted with the caprices of love; but really I tremble for myself, when I reflect on such an attempt as this. What insolence was it in this passion, to attack Madame Paul? that is, to attack rigid, austere, antiquated virtue herself in person. Alas! where can we hope to find security? This is a pleasant piece of news indeed, after the agreeable relations you have given us. I beg you not to forget M. de Harouis, whose heart is a master-piece of perfection, and who adores you. I am very impatient to hear of you and your little son. The weather must be extremely hot in the climate you are in: I fear this season for him, and for you much more; for I have never yet had any reason to think it possible to love anything besides, in an equal degree with you.

SEWARD, ANNA,

DAUGHTER of the Rev. Thomas Seward, was born, in 1747, at Eyam, in Derbyshire. Very early in life she manifested a talent for poetry, which her father in vain tried to discourage. She acquired considerable reputation as a poet; and also wrote "A Life of Dr. Darwin," in which she claims the first fifty lines of his "Botanic Garden" as her own.

In 1754, Mr. Seward removed with his family to Lichfield, the birth-place of Johnson and Garrick, and the residence of Dr. Darwin; and Miss Seward continued to live there till her death in 1809. Her only sister dying in 1764, just as she was on the eve of marrying Dr. Porter, step-son to Dr. Johnson, Anna found her society so indispensable to her parents, that she rejected all offers of matrimony on their account; although, being young, beautiful, and an heiress, she was of course much sought. She was remarkable for the ardour and constancy of her friendships, as well as for her filial devotion.

Her sonnets have procured her the greater part of her celebrity as a poetess; though her poetical novel, entitled "Louisa," was very favourably received at the time of its publication. Miss Seward died in 1809, aged sixty-two years. Among her publications were six volumes of "Letters." The "Description of the Life of an English Country Clergyman some eighty or ninety years ago," is a fair specimen of her prose, which we think is superior to her poetry.

FROM A LETTER DATED 1767.

The convenient old parsonage is uncommonly light and cheerful. Its fire-places have odd little extra windows near them, which are the blessings of employment in cold or gloomy days. A rural walk encircles the house. In its front, a short flagged walk divides two grass-plots, and leads to a little wicket gate, arched over with ivy, that opens into the fold-yard. A narrow gravel-walk extends along the front of the house, and under the parlour-windows. Opposite them, and on the larger grass-plot, stands the venerable and expansive mulberry-tree. * * * We rise at seven. At eight, my aunt and cousin, my mother, Honora, and myself, meet at our neat and cheerful breakfast. That dear, kind-hearted saint, my uncle, has his milk earlier, and retires, for the morning, to his study. At nine, we adjourn to my aunt's apartment above stairs, where one reads aloud to the rest, who are at work. At twelve, my uncle summons us to prayers in the parlour. When they are over, the family disperses, and we young ones either walk or write till dinner. That appears at two. At four, we resume my aunt's apartment. * * * When we quit this dear apartment to take an evening walk, it is always with a degree of reluctance. At half-past ten, he calls in his servants to join our vesper devotions, which close the peaceful and unvaried day, resigning us to sleep as tranquil as itself. * * * The village has no neighbourhood, and in itself no prospect. The roads are deep and dirty, in winter scarce passable. My fair cousin, Miss Marten, is completely buried through the dreary months. * * * She tells us she weeps for joy at the sight of the first daisy, and welcomes and talks to and hails the little blessed harbinger of brighter days, her days of liberty as well as of peace.

SEYMOUR, ANNE, MARGARET, and JANE,

DAUGHTERS of Edward, duke of Somerset, were known for their poetical talents. Their one hundred and four Latin distichs on the death of Margaret of Valois, queen of France, were translated into French, Greek, and Italian, and printed in Paris in 1551, but possess little merit. Anne married the Earl of Warwick, and afterwards Sir Edward Hunter. Margaret and Jane died single. Jane was maid of honour to queen Elizabeth of England, and died in 1560, at the age of twenty.

SEYMOUR, JANE,

WAS married to Henry VIII., in May, 1536, the day after Anne Boleyn was beheaded, and died, October, 1537, two days after the birth of her son, Edward VI. Henry is said to have been very much attached to her during their brief union; but she seems to have been cold and insipid in her character, retaining his affections more by her yielding disposition, than by any other quality. She never interfered in state affairs. She was maid of honour to Anne Boleyn at the time that Henry fell in love with her; and witnessed Anne's fall and death without the slightest appearance of sensibility.

SFORZA, BONA,

QUEEN of Poland, was born in Naples, in 1501. She was the daughter of Isabella of Aragon, and of Servanni Galeazzo Sforza, nephew of the founder of the Sforza dynasty in Milan. She lost her father in very tender infancy, and was brought up with great care by her mother. In 1518, she was married by proxy to Sigismund I., king of Poland, over whom she obtained the greatest influence, which she used to advantage in prompting and causing to be executed, plans for the prosperity of the kingdom. She inspired the administration with an activity unknown before in Poland; and while she resided there, was a patron of many useful and magnificent undertakings. On the death of her husband, she became disgusted with a matrimonial misalliance contracted by her son, the reigning monarch. She returned to her native country, where she was received with the highest honours. In her little sovereignty of Bar, she occupied herself with useful establishments, according to her means, and took particular delight in the society and encouragement of men of letters. She died in 1557.

SFORZA, CRISTIerna, DUCHESS OF MILAN,

Was the daughter of Christian II., king of Denmark, a prince who was expelled by his subjects, and died in exile. Her mother was Isabella, sister of Charles V. Left an orphan in infancy, she was tenderly educated by her aunt, the dowager queen of Hungary, and, by her beauty and pleasing manners, having gained the favour of Charles V., was adopted by that sovereign, who carried her with him to the court of Madrid. In 1530, she espoused Francesco Sforza, duke of Milan. His death, which took place three years afterwards, left her a young and beautiful widow, richly endowed with the gifts of fortune. Among many suitors, she selected Francesco I., duke of Lorena; refusing the proposals of Henry VIII., of England, who had demanded her hand of Charles V. At the end of four years of domestic happiness, death deprived her of Francesco, and after that she refused to enter into any new matrimonial connexion, but devoted herself to the care of her children and of the Lorenese states, of which she had been left regent. Here it is that she merits other praise than that of a good mistress of a family: for she evinced so much sagacity, so much good feeling and activity, that, by judicious management, she rendered Lorena the most flourishing and prosperous duchy in that province. But no wisdom, no courage, could defend this little state from the rapacity of a mighty monarch, who had cast upon it a covetous eye. Henry II., king of France, partly by craft, and partly by force, found means to seize upon the government. The heir was taken to Paris, and the regent banished. Ambition was not her master passion, and she willingly retired into private life, when an opportunity occurred for revealing great force of character, joined with tact, intelligence, and many other admirable qualities, and in a way peculiarly congenial to a woman. She perceived that France and Spain, wearied of the long turbulence and continual war in which they had been engaged, were both inclined to peace, and needed only some mediator to bring about that blessing. Inspired by a generous wish to benefit her fellow-creatures, she undertook this affair; active, industrious, eloquent, persuasive, she made repeated journeys between Paris and Madrid, and rested not till she had obtained from the two monarchs a promise that they would meet in a congress. In 1555, Charles and Henry had an interview at Chateau Cambresis; and then the lady overpowered every body by her ready wit, her seducing eloquence, and her profound views of policy. Peace was the result of her efforts.

Cristierna passed the rest of her life in a modest seclusion, where she exhibited all the virtues of private life. She died of paralysis, in the city of Tortona, in the year 1590.

SHEREEN, or SCHIRIN, or SIRA,

Was an Armenian princess, second wife of Chosroes II., king of Persia in the seventeenth century. She was very beautiful, intellectual, and accomplished, and is the heroine of many of the Turkish and Persian romances. Her husband was murdered by his own son by a former wife, and Shereen killed herself on his tomb to escape the love of the murderer.

SHERIDAN, FRANCES,

WIFE of Thomas Sheridan, M. A., was born in Ireland, in 1724, but descended from a good English family, which had removed there. Her maiden name was Chamberlaine. She wrote a little pamphlet at the time of a violent party-dispute about the theatre in which Mr. Sheridan had just embarked his fortune. He, by accident, discovered his defender, and soon afterwards married her. She was a very charming woman, and fulfilled all her duties with the greatest propriety. She died at Blois, in France, in 1767. Her "Sydney Bidulph," is a very well-written novel; and her little romance called "Nourjahad," shows a very fertile imagination. She also wrote two comedies, entitled "The Discovery," and "The Dupe."

Although not handsome, Mrs. Sheridan is described as having had an intelligent countenance, fine dark eyes and hair, with a particularly fair complexion.

In her dress Mrs. Sheridan was somewhat plain, though she did not affect that negligence which was adopted by some of the literary ladies of that day, who were accused of studiously neglecting the Graces to pay homage to the Muses.

Mrs. Sheridan was as much beloved in her own family as she was admired by her contemporaries; and she was even more famed for her colloquial powers than for her literary talents. Her temper was good, though warm, of which infirmity she was herself aware. From her works, it is evident she had a strong sense of religion; and in her principal performance, "Sidney Biddulph," she portrays it as the only consolation her heroine receives during her misfortunes.

SHREWSBURY, ELIZABETH, COUNTESS OF,

Was the daughter of John Hardwick, of Hardwick, a gentleman of ancient family and fortune in Derbyshire. At a very early age she married, not without some suspicions of interested motives, a gentleman of fortune, named Barlow, in delicate health. Before his marriage, to prove his devotion, he made a will, in which he secured to her, and her heirs, almost the whole of his vast estates. A short time after their marriage he died. She soon contracted a second marriage, with Sir William Cavendish, to whom she appears to have been really attached. He was a widower for the third time when he married her, and seems to have returned her affection sincerely, denying her nothing, and anticipating her wishes. To gratify her, he sold his estates in the south of England, and purchased lands in her native county; and here he began, by her desire, the building of Chatsworth, a mansion, since one of the most magnificent and celebrated in the kingdom, on which a mine of wealth has been spent at different times. Her great passion seems to have been to erect great mansions in every part of her large estates; as Chatsworth, Hardwick, Oldcotes, and others, prove. Tradition has preserved a prophecy that she would not die while she continued to build. Sir William Cavendish did not live to see the finishing of his splendid mansion. Upon his widow this task devolved, as well as the bringing up of their six children, to whom she was fondly attached, and to whose interests she was devoted. Through these children, she became the ancestress of more than one noble and distinguished family. Her oldest son died childless; the second, William, became the first earl of Devonshire; the third, Charles, was the ancestor of the dukes of Newcastle. Her oldest daughter, Frances, married Sir Henry Pierrepont, ancestor of the dukes of Kingston, by which alliance we perceive that "old Bess of Hardwick" was an ancestress of lady Mary Wortley Montague. Elizabeth, the second daughter, married Charles Stuart, duke of Lennox, brother of Darnley, who became father of the unfortunate Arabella Stuart, the victim of state policy. Mary, the third daughter, married Gilbert, the oldest son of Elizabeth's fourth husband, and arrived at the same dignity of Countess of Shrewsbury.

With a splendid fortune, and unimpaired beauty, the attractive widow retained her liberty some time, till at length she was prevailed upon to change her state again, in favour of Sir William St. Lo, of Tormarton, in Gloucestershire, captain of the guard to queen Elizabeth, and grand butler of England. He was wealthy, and had broad lands in Gloucestershire; and these circumstances weighed with the acute widow and careful mother, who determined, before she ventured to alter her position, to secure as much as possible of his possessions to herself and children. She was successful, and Sir William settled the whole of his fortune upon her and her heirs, to the exclusion of his children by a former marriage. The enamoured captain did not survive long to enjoy his happiness. Elizabeth was for the third time left a widow, with a fortune considerably increased, and no heirs of St. Lo to take any thing from her family of Cavendish.

Wealth had been her object in her last match, and as her appetite seemed to "grow with what it fed on," she resolved to give the reins, not only to her desire of gain, but to the ambition which led her step by step till she had established herself in the precincts of the court. It was not long before she made a new selection. George, earl of Shrewsbury, was no longer a young man, but he was rich, of exalted rank, and the greatest subject in the realm; high in favour with the queen, and trusted beyond any other noble in her court, independent, magnificent, and powerful, and a widower, with sons and daughters unmarried. In an evil day for him, the earl of Shrewsbury submitted his fate to the guidance of the successful widow. A magnificent jointure was settled upon the bride, and it was agreed, not only that her eldest son should espouse his daughter, but that her youngest daughter, Mary, should become the wife of his heir, Gilbert. The earl of Shrewsbury's good genius must have forsaken him at this eventful period of his life: for soon after his marriage he voluntarily undertook the guardianship of Mary, queen of Scots, who, in May, 1568, landed in England, and threw herself upon the protection of queen Elizabeth, who immediately made her a state prisoner: an act of treachery that has found a parallel in English history of modern times. It appears that both the earl and countess eagerly sought the office of head jailers to the unfortunate Mary.

At this period of their married life, the earl and countess seemed to live on terms of affectionate confidence; but from the first entrance of the queen of Scots into their family, disturbances began to occur. What the ambitious and dangerous schemes of the countess may have been, cannot now, with certainty, be known; but it is likely that she endeavoured to secure Mary as her friend, in case of a failure with Elizabeth; or, in modern parlance, she deemed it wisest, in the game she was playing, to "hedge!" The earl was accused of a tender leaning towards his captive; "a scandal" which he has himself recorded in his own epitaph. That his wary mistress, queen Elizabeth, distrusted him somewhat, is evident from the part which she afterwards played when the earl and countess began to quarrel. In 1574, the countess took the daring step of marrying her daughter Elizabeth to the earl of Lennox, brother of Darnley. This alliance with the family of the royal captive, gave great offence to the queen, and we find the earl of Shrewsbury writing to her and protesting his ignorance of this act of his wife's. The object of this turmoil, Elizabeth Cavendish, seems to have derived little happiness from her marriage; blamed, imprisoned, persecuted, and reproached, she had small cause to congratulate herself on the dangerous elevation to which her mother's ambition had raised her; and, after a brief space, the husband, on whom so many hopes were fixed, fell a victim to sickness or sorrow, and she became a widow, with one child, Arabella, the heiress of her griefs and all the misfortunes of the devoted race of Stuart.

The earl of Shrewsbury's office of custodian to the royal Mary was prolific of troubles; the queen's suspicions aroused, his wife's jealousy excited, his own liberty necessarily restrained, a responsible office, and expensive establishment, for which he was inadequately paid, to support, all combined to render his situation little to be envied. In the year 1577, the first shade is evident that appears to have clouded the domestic sky of the earl and countess, and henceforth their disunion increased till it amounted to open revilings. The earl's children sided with their step-mother, whose resolute will gave her unbounded sway over all within her influence. Notwithstanding that, the earl accuses her of a desire to gain possession of his estates and revenues for the benefit of her own children. The poor earl seems to have been sorely ill treated by both the women who ruled him; for we find him making application to the queen, "for the hundreth time," for payment of his just dues in keeping the queen of Scots. At length, the sorrows and troubles of the earl of Shrewsbury were brought to a close. He died in November, 1590. During the following seventeen years of widowhood, Elizabeth of Shrewsbury devoted herself to building; and there is no knowing how many more mansions she would have erected if her life had been spared.

The story goes, that in 1607 a hard frost set in, which obliged her workmen to stop suddenly; "the spell was broken, the astrologer's prediction verified, Elizabeth of Hardwick could build no longer, and she died." Her death occurred at Hardwick Hall, in February, 1607, in the 87th year of her age. During the latter part of her life, the affection which the countess entertained for her grand-daughter, Arabella Stuart, was one of the master passions of her mind. It was well for her proud spirit that she was spared the pain of witnessing the downfall of her ambitious hopes, and the melancholy fate of one so dear to her.

This countess of Shrewsbury is a remarkable instance of the worldly-wise woman, approaching, both in the powers of her intellect and the manner in which she directed her talents, very nearly the masculine type of mind. Calm, prudent, energetic, but politic, selfish, hard, she stands out from our pictures of true feminine character like an oak among laurels, willows and magnolias. Happily, for the moral welfare of our race, there are few women like "Bess of Hardwick."

SIDDONS, SARAH,

THE most eminent English tragic actress, was born, in 1755, at Brecknock, and was the daughter of Roger Kemble, manager of a company of itinerant players. At the age of fifteen she became attached to Mr. Siddons; and her parents refusing their consent to her marriage, she went to reside with Mrs. Greathead, of Guy's Cliff, as an humble companion. In her eighteenth year she married Mr. Siddons, and returned to the stage. In 1775, she made her first appearance on the London boards, but was unsuccessful. Time, however, matured her powers; and, after an absence of seven years, spent partly at Bath, where she was much admired, she reappeared at Drury Lane in 1782; and from that time her course was a perpetual triumph. In 1812, having acquired an ample fortune, she withdrew into private life. She died, June 9th, 1831. Mrs. Siddons possessed considerable talents as a sculptor. A medallion of herself, and a bust of her brother, John Kemble, are among her works. Her character was irreproachable.

SIRANI, ELISABETTA,

WAS born in Bologna, in 1638. Her father, Gian Andrea Sirani, was a painter of some reputation, and had been a favourite scholar of Guido, and successful imitator of his style. The manifestations of real genius are usually to be discovered at the earliest age; and Elisabetta, when almost an infant, excited attention by her attempts at drawing. These baby pencillings, though they attracted the notice of her father, did not give him the idea of instructing her, because she was a girl. Fortunately, a visitor at the house, count Canonico Malvasia, a man of cultivated mind and enlarged views, used his influence with Sirani, and represented to him the culpability of stifling the rare talent that was developing itself in the little maiden. From this time she was educated for her future profession, and every study was attended to that could be useful to improve her genius. Her delight in intellectual cultivation was only equalled by her conscientious industry; the most complete success crowned her application. As a painter, her works take place among the best Italian masters. She has also left some very excellent engravings, and displayed no mean ability in modelling in plaster. Before she had attained her eighteenth year, she had painted many large historical pieces, which were regarded with admiration, and obtained an honourable situation in the various churches. Besides this, the young artist was a very excellent musician, singing beautifully, and playing with grace upon the harp. She was as remarkable for her plain good sense and amiable disposition, as for her talents. The solace and support of her invalid father, she put into his hands all the money she received for her pictures. Her mother having become paralytic, the household affairs devolved upon her; and her attention to the minutiae of inferior occupations, as well as her motherly care of her younger sisters, proved that the brilliant exercise of the most refined accomplishments and the most intellectual attainments is by no means incompatible with the perfect discharge of those menial employments to which the wisdom of some Solomons would limit the faculties of woman.

It would be impossible to enumerate the works of this indefatigable artist. She was admired and visited by the great of that day, who vied with one another in the desire to obtain specimens of her pencil. At one time, a committee appointed to order a large picture of the baptism of Jesus, to be placed opposite a Holy Supper in the church of the Certosini, called upon her. Radiant with inspiration, the girl, then scarcely twenty, took a sheet of paper, and, before the eyes of the astonished beholders, with the utmost promptness, drew in Indian ink, that composition so rich in figures, so spirited in its details, and so grand in its ensemble. As soon as it was finished, it was hung where it now stands, and drew an immense concourse of admiring spectators. The drawing, the colouring, the harmony of the parts, have obtained the praise and enthusiastic tributes of all succeeding artists. Her fame was spread throughout Italy, and foreign courts became desirous of extending to her their patronage. A large picture was bespoken by the empress Eleonora, widow of Ferdinand III., when she was assailed by a disease of the stomach, which, after a few months of slight indisposition, attacked her so violently, that in less than twenty-four hours she was reduced to extremity. She received the sacrament, and died on the 28th of August, her birth-day. She was twenty-seven years of age. As she was apparently robust and of good constitution, suspicions arose of poison having been administered to her; but, upon a post mortem examination, no conclusive evidence could be found; and as the suspected individual (a servant) was acquitted in the legal scrutiny which took place, we are not warranted in the idea that her death was otherwise than a natural one.

There was a universal mourning among her fellow-citizens; all funeral honours were given to her remains, which were deposited near those of Guido, in the church of San Domenico.

SIRIES, VIOLANTE BEATRICE,

Was born at Florence, in 1710. She was a pupil of Giovanna Fratellini, who at that time lived in high esteem in Florence; by whose instruction she made an extraordinary proficiency in water-colour and crayon painting, till she was sixteen, when she went, with her father, to Paris, where he was appointed goldsmith to the king of France. Here she continued for five years, and studied under an eminent Flemish artist. She painted portraits of several of the nobility with such beauty and fidelity, that she was invited to take likenesses of the royal family; but she was under the necessity of declining this honour, as she was about to return with her father to Florence, where he had a very lucrative employment conferred on him by the Grand Duke.

The Grand Duke professed great esteem for this artist, and ordered her portrait to be placed in the gallery of artists at Florence. To perpetuate her father's memory, she introduced his portrait with her own, giving at once a proof of her filial piety and distinguished merit. She painted equally well in oil and with crayons; but most of her works are in oil, and are principally from historical subjects. She also painted fruit and flowers; and executed every subject with extraordinary taste, truth, and delicacy. She died in 1760.

SMITH, CHARLOTTE,

ELDEST daughter of Nicholas Turner, Esq., of Surrey, in England, was born in London, May 4th, 1749. She lost her mother when she was only three years old, and the charge of her education devolved on her aunt. Miss Turner was carefully instructed in all the accomplishments of the day, but she afterwards regretted that her attention had not been directed more to the solid branches of learning. She began to write when very young, and was always extravagantly fond of reading, especially poetry and romances. At the early age of twelve she left school, and from that time was accustomed to frequent public amusements with her family, and even appear in society with them. She was beautiful, animated, and attractive, and appeared so much older than she really was, that at fourteen she received proposals of marriage, which were refused, and at fifteen she was married to Mr. Smith, son of Richard Smith, a West India merchant, and Director of the East India Company.

Mr. Smith's great inferiority to his wife, both in mind and principles, was more and more apparent every year, which Mrs. Smith felt keenly as she grew older; yet never to her most confidential friends did she allow a complaint or severe remark to escape her lips. Her father-in-law fully appreciated her, and often employed her pen on matters of business, and confided to her all his anxieties. He often remarked that she could expedite more business in an hour, from his dictation, than any one of his clerks could perform in a day. This affords a strong instance of the compass of her mind, which could adapt itself with equal facility to the charms of literature and the dry details of commerce.

In 1776, the death of her father-in-law, who left an incomprehensible will which kept them for some time involved in law-suits, occasioned the final ruin of their fortunes. Their estate in Hampshire was sold, and they removed to Sussex. Mrs. Smith never deserted her husband for a moment during the period of his misfortunes. While suffering from the calamities he had brought on himself and his children, she exerted herself with as much energy as though his conduct had been unexceptionable, made herself mistress of his affairs, and finally succeeded in settling them.

Mr. Smith found it expedient, in 1783, to retire to the continent, where his wife joined him with their children. They resided near Dieppe; and here her youngest son was born. She translated while there the novel called "Manon l'Escaut." In 1785, she returned to England; and soon after published "The Romance of Real Life," a translation of some of the most remarkable trials, from "Les Causes Célèbres."

In 1786, Mrs. Smith, finding it impossible to live longer with any degree of comfort with her husband, resolved to separate from him; and, with the approbation of all her most judicious friends, she settled herself in a small house near Chichester. Her husband, becoming involved in fresh difficulties, again retired to the continent, after some ineffectual attempts to induce her to return to him. They sometimes met after this, and constantly corresponded, Mrs. Smith never relaxing her efforts to afford him assistance, or bring the family affairs to a final arrangement; but they never afterwards resided together.

In her seclusion at Wyhe, her novels of "Emmeline," "Ethelinde," and "Celestina," were written. These were very successful. In 1791, she went to reside near London; and, during the excitement caused by the French revolution, she wrote "Desmond," which was severely censured for its political and moral tendency. "But she regained public favour," says Mr. Chambers, "by her tale, the 'Old Manor House,' which is the best of her novels. Part of this work was written at Eartham, the residence of Hayley, during the period of Cowper's visit to that poetical retreat. "It was delightful," says Hayley, "to hear her read what she had just written; for she read, as she wrote, with simplicity and grace." Cowper was also astonished at the rapidity and excellence of her composition. Mrs. Smith continued her literary labours amidst private and family distress. She also wrote a "History of England," and a "Natural History of Birds," in 1807; "Conversations," and several other works. Her first publication was a volume of elegiac "Sonnets" and other Essays, in 1784. She died at Tilford, October 28th, 1806, in her fifty-eighth year. Her husband had died the preceding year. As a mother, she was most exemplary.

Mr. Chambers thus sums up his opinion of her writings:—"The poetry of Mrs. Smith is elegant and sentimental, and generally of a pathetic cast. She wrote as if 'melancholy had marked her for her own.' The keen satire and observation evinced in her novels do not appear in her verse; but the same powers of description are displayed. Her sketches of English scenery are true and pleasing."

Sir Walter Scott also gives "high praise to the sweet and sad effusions of Mrs. Smith's pen;" but observes, "We cannot admit that by these alone she could ever have risen to the height of eminence which we are disposed to claim for her as authoress of her prose narratives."

From "Poems."

FLORA'S HOROLOGE.

In every copse and sheltered dell,
Unveiled to the observant eye,
Are faithful monitors who tell
How pass the hours and seasons by.

The green-robed children of the spring
Will mark the periods as they pass,
Mingle with leaves Time's feathered wing,
And bind with flowers his silent glass.

Mark where transparent waters glide,
Soft flowing o'er their tranquil bed;
There, cradled on the dimpling tide,
Nymphæa rests her lovely head.

But conscious of the earliest beam,
She rises from her humid nest,
And sees, reflected in the stream,
The virgin whiteness of her breast.

Till the bright day-star to the west
Declines, in ocean's surge to lave;
Then, folded in her modest vest,
She slumbers on the rocking wave.

See Hieracium's various tribe,
Of plummy seed and radiate flowers,
The course of Time their blooms describe,
And wake or sleep appointed hours.

Broad o'er its imbricated cup
The goatsbeard spreads its golden rays,
But shuts its cautious petals up,
Retreating from the noontide blaze.

Pale as a pensive cloistered nun,
The Bethlem star her face unveils,
When o'er the mountain peers the sun,
But shades it from the vesper gales.

Among the loose and arid sands
The humble arenaria creeps;
Slowly the purple star expands,
But soon within its calyx sleeps.

And those small bells so lightly rayed
With young Aurora's rosy hue,
Are to the noontide sun displayed,
But shut their plaits against the dew

On upland slopes the shepherds mark
The hour when, as the dial true,
Cichorium to the towering lark
Lifts her soft eyes serenely blue.

And thou, "Wee crimson-tipped flower,"
Gatherest thy fringed mantle round
Thy bosom at the closing hour,
When night-drops bathe the turfy ground.

Unlike silene, who declines
The garish noontide's blazing light;
But when the evening crescent shines,
Gives all her sweetness to the night.

Thus in each flower and simple bell,
That in our path betridden lie,
Are sweet remembrancers who tell
How fast their winged moments fly.

THE CRICKET.

Little inmate, full of mirth,
Chirping on my humble hearth;
Wheresoe'er be thine abode,
Always harbinger of good,
Pay me for thy warm retreat
With a song most soft and sweet;
In return thou shalt receive
Such a song as I can give.

Though in voice and shape they be Formed as if akin to thee,
Thou surpassesst, happier far,
Happiest grasshoppers that are;
Their's is but a summer-song,
Thine endures the winter long,
Unimpaired, and shrill and clear,
Melody throughout the year.

Neither night nor dawn of day
Puts a period to thy lay,
Then, insect! let thy simple song
Cheer the winter evening long;
While, secure from every storm,
In my cottage stout and warm,
Thou shalt my merry minstrel be,
And I delight to shelter thee.

SONNETS.

On the Departure of the Nightingale.

Sweet poet of the woods, a long adieu!
Farewell soft minstrel of the early year!
Ah! 'twill be long ere thou shalt sing anew,
And pour thy music on the night's dull ear.
Whether on spring thy wandering flights await,
Or whether silent in our groves you dwell,
The pensive muse shall own thee for her mate,
And still protect the song she loves so well.
With cautious step the love-lorn youth shall glide
Through the lone brake that shades thy mossy nest,
And shepherd girls from eyes profane shall hide
The gentle bird who sings of pity best:
For still thy voice shall soft affections move,
And still be dear to sorrow and to love!

Written at the Close of Spring.

The garlands fade that Spring so lately wove;
Each simple flower, which she had nursed in dew,
Anemones that spangled every grove,
The primrose wan, and harebell mildly blue
No more shall violets linger in the dell,
Or purple orchis variegate the plain,
Till Spring again shall call forth every bell,
And dress with humid hands her wreaths again.
Ah, poor humanity! so frail, so fair,
Are the fond visions of thy early day,
Till tyrant passion and corrosive care
Bid all thy fairy colours fade away!
Another May new buds and flowers shall bring;
Ah! why has happiness no second Spring?

TO NIGHT.

I love thee, mournful sober-suited night,
When the faint moon, yet lingering in her wane,
And veiled in clouds, with pale uncertain light
Hangs o'er the waters of the restless main.
In deep depression sunk, th' enfeebled mind
Will to the deaf, cold elements complain,
And tell th' embosomed grief, however vain,
To sullen surges and the viewless wind;
Though no repose on thy dark breast I find,
I still enjoy thee, cheerless as thou art;
For in thy quiet gloom th' exhausted heart
Is calm, though wretched; hopeless, yet resigned,
While to the winds and waves its sorrows given,
May reach—though lost on earth—the ear of Heaven.

TO TRANQUILLITY.

In this tumultuous sphere, for thee unfit,
How seldom art thou found—Tranquillity!
Unless 't is when with mild and downcast eye
By the low cradles thou delight'st to sit
Of sleeping infants, watching the soft breath.
And bidding the sweet slumberers easy lie,
Or sometimes hanging o'er the bed of death,
Where the poor languid sufferer hopes to die
O beauteous sister of the halcyon peace!
I sure shall find thee in that heavenly scene
Where care and anguish shall thy power resign;
Where hope alike and vain regret shall cease;
And Memory, lost in happiness serene,
Repeat no more—that misery has been mine!

SMITH, ELIZABETH,

Was born, in 1776, at the family seat of Burnhall, in the county of Durham. She understood mathematics, drawing, Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, Persian, Greek, Latin, Italian, Spanish, German, and French. Her "Fragments," "Translation of Job," and "Translation of the Life of Klopstock," have been published. She also wrote poetry. She died in 1806, aged thirty years.

SMITH. SARAH LOUISA P.,

WAS born at Detroit, in 1811, while her maternal grandfather, Major-General William Hull, so well known for his patriotism and his misfortunes, was governor of the territory of Michigan. Her father's name was Hickman; he died when Louisa was an infant; and her mother, returning to her own home at Newton, Massachusetts, there educated her two daughters. The uncommon quickness of talent exhibited by Louisa, soon attracted the attention of her instructors. She had a most wonderful memory, and gathered knowledge without any apparent effort—yet was she ever among the most active in mental pursuits. And the ease with which she acquired information was not more remarkable than the modesty which accompanied her superiority. She began to write when a mere child, and these juvenile productions were often so excellent, as to elicit great commendations from her family and their confidential friends; yet this praise never fostered pride or self-confidence in the youthful poetess. She wrote from the spontaneous overflowing of her own heart, which seemed filled with thoughts of beauty, and all tender and sweet emotions. By the persuasion of her friends, she was induced to send some of her effusions, anonymously, to different periodicals. These were greatly admired, and often reprinted. Before she was fifteen, her name had become known, and she was distinguished as a young lady of uncommon powers of intellect. She was soon an object of attention. Her personal appearance was very prepossessing. She had a countenance bright with the "light of mind," a soft and delicate complexion, a "large loving eye," and a head of that fine "spiritual form," which at once impresses the beholder with the majesty and purity of the mind within.

In 1828, Miss Hickman was married to Mr. S. J. Smith, then the editor of a literary periodical in Providence. Soon after her marriage, her husband published a volume of her poems; some collected from the literary journals, and others written as the book was passing through the press. She was then but "careless seventeen," as she says of herself; and it was a hazardous experiment to give a volume of poetry, which must have been, however highly imbued with genius, more fraught with the feelings and sentiments of others, than with those teachings of truth and nature which experience in the real world can only bestow. But the book was popular; and though she would, had she lived till the maturity of her powers, no doubt greatly excelled her early writings, yet, as the blossoms of an original and extraordinary genius, these poems will ever be admired.

And yet it is not as an authoress that she is remembered and lamented by her intimate friends, or by those who had the pleasure of a brief personal acquaintance. "Any literary reputation that she might have acquired, could never have been thought of in her presence," is the testimony of one who knew her. "It was the confiding sincerity of her manners, the playfulness of her conversation, her enthusiastic and devoted assiduity to those she loved, which made her presence a perpetual delight." In her own home she was a model of discretion, cheerfulness and kindness. Her husband was always her lover, and her two little sons she cherished with that peculiar tenderness which only those endowed with the finest sensibilities can feel. Yet, amid all her maternal and household cares, her mind was rapidly gathering strength for higher literary pursuits. She was, at the time of her decease, engaged in reviewing her early opinions on literature, and her early productions, pointing out, and acknowledging her errors and deficiencies, with the most frank honesty; and preparing by study and reflection to make her genius the faithful interpreter of nature and the human heart. What she has written is marked by ease, grace, and that intuitive perception of the beautiful and good, which shows that her imagination was a blessing to herself, as well as a pleasure to others. And with the refinement of taste and warmth of affections which Mrs. Smith possessed, was united pure, ardent, and unaffected piety. The hope of immortality was to her a glorious hope; and the benevolence which the Gospel inculcates, was her cherished feeling.

She died, February, 1832, in the twenty-first year of her age.

The following are considered among her best poems:—

THE HUMA.

"A bird peculiar to the East. It is supposed to fly constantly in the air and never touch the ground."

Fly on! nor touch thy wing, bright bird,
Too near our shaded earth,
Or the warbling, now so sweetly heard,
May lose its note of mirth.
Fly on—nor seek a place of rest
In the home of "care-worn things;"
"T would dim the light of thy shining crest
And thy brightly burnished wings,
To dip them where the waters glide
That flow from a troubled earthly tide.

The fields of upper air are thine,
Thy place where stars shine free:
I would thy home, bright one, were mine,
Above life's stormy sea.
I would never wander, bird, like thee,
So near this place again,
With wing and spirit once light and free—
They should wear no more the chain
With which they are bound and fettered here,
For ever struggling for skies more clear.

There are many things like thee, bright bird,
Hopes as thy plumage gay;
Our air is with them for ever stirred,
But still in air they stay.
And happiness, like thee, fair one,
Is ever hovering o'er,
But rests in a land of brighter sun,
On a waveless, peaceful shore,
And stoops to lave her weary wings,
Where the fount of "living waters" springs.

THE HEART'S TREASURES.

Know ye what things the heart holds dear
In its hidden cells?
'T is never the beam of careless smiles,
Nor riches wafted from far-off isles;
The light that cheers it is never shed
From the jewelled pomp of a regal head,
Not there it dwells.

Gay things, the loved of worldly eyes.
 Enchain it not;
 It suns its blossoms in fairer skies,
 The dewy beam of affection's eyes;
 The spell is there that can hold it fast,
 When earthly pride in its pomp is past,
 And all forgot.

Thoughts that come from their far, dim rest,
 Woke by a smile—
 The memory sweet of a youthful hour,
 The faded hue of a cherished flower,
 Or parting tones of a far-off friend,
 It loves in melody soft to blend
 With him the while.

Know ye what things the heart holds dear:
 Its buried loves!
 Those that have wrung from it many a tear,
 Gone where the leaves never fall or sear,
 Gone to the land that is sought in prayer,
 The trace of whose step is fairest, where Fond memory roves.

The sound of music at even-fall,
 Filling its springs
 With a flow of thought, and feeling sweet
 As summer winds, when at eve they meet,
 And lips that are loved, breathe forth the song,
 When day with its troubled sounds is gone—
 To these it clings.

And nature's pleasant murmurings,
 So sweet to hear;
 Her bowers of beauty, and soft-shed gleams
 Of light and shadow on forest streams,
 Her mossy rocks and places rude,
 The charm of her breathing solitude—
 These it holds dear.

TRUST IN HEAVEN.

For He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

Yes, He hath said, whose word hath power,
 Nor may his children fear
 The clouds that on their pathway lower,
 With this high promise near.

When He, whose arm sends o'er the deep
 The shades of falling night,
 And calls the morning sun to steep
 The isles of earth in light,

Is o'er their path, and guarding still
 Those whom he knows are frail;
 When gathering clouds of worldly ill
 Cause human strength to fail.

The spirit hath a chord that clings
 To lights that must grow dim,
 And places trust in fragile things,
 That should be placed on Him.

But when that hold is severed—then,
 In sorrow's hour of night—
 When the plant has lost its earthly stem,
 He sends his own clear light.

And in those words of truth and power
 Is the sacred promise given:
 Which has lifted many a drooping flower
 To the still clear air of heaven.

SMITH, SARAH LANMAN,

Was born in Norwich, Connecticut, June 18, 1802. Her father was Jabez Huntington, Esq. Her biographer, Rev. Edward W. Hooker, says of her early years, after describing her sufferings from ill health during childhood, and also from the severity of a school-mistress, which circumstances, added to the death of her mother, had the effect to bring out great decision and sometimes wilfulness of character:

"But with these things in childhood, showing that she was a subject of that native depravity in which all the human race are 'guilty before God,' she exhibited, as she was advancing in the years of youth, many of the virtues which are useful and lovely; and probably went as far in those excellences of natural character on which many endeavour to build their hope of salvation, as almost any unconverted persons do; carrying with her, however, the clear and often disturbing conviction, that the best virtues which she practised were not holiness, nor any evidence of fitness for heaven.

She was exceedingly attached to her friends. Her father was almost her idol. The affection for her mother, who was so early removed by death, she transferred, with exemplary tenderness, to her step-mother; and it is believed the instances are rare in which the parties are uniformly happier in each other, in that relation, than were Mrs. Huntington and this daughter. Her warmth and tenderness of affection as a sister were also peculiar and exemplary. Her childhood and youth were marked with great delicacy of mind and manners; diligence, promptitude, and efficiency in her undertakings; love of system and fondness for study, improvement, and the acquirement of useful knowledge, joined with a great desire to answer the wishes and expectations of her friends. Dutifulness and respect for her parents and grandparents; reverence for her superiors generally; readiness to receive advice or admonition; a just appreciation of the good influence of others, and a spirit of cautiousness respecting whatever might be injurious to her own character, were also prominent traits in her habits. Disinterestedness and self-denial for the benefit of others were conspicuous. Long before she became a subject of divine grace, she took an interest in various objects of benevolence, particularly Sabbath schools; and exhibited that spirit of enterprise, patience, and perseverance, in aiding the efforts of others, which constituted so prominent an excellence in her chaacter in the later years of her life. Self-government; economy in the use of her time and pocket-money; tastefulness in dress, without extravagance; and a careful and conscientious consideration of her father's resources, also were observable in her early habits. These traits are not mentioned because they are not found in many other young persons, but because they appeared in her in an uncommon degree."

The virtues and graces of character enumerated do not, it is true, constitute the holiness of a Christian—that is, the especial gift of the Holy Spirit, to sanctify the heart; but they do show a state of feeling naturally inclined to the moralities of life, to which sin, acted out, would have been at "enmity." Her "moral sense" was refined and enlightened; she only needed the breath of divine grace to turn her heart to God; all her ways were in harmony with his laws; while converted men have, usually, the whole inner course of their lives to alter, or at least to put off the "old man with his deeds;" which is the struggle of a carnal nature women do not often have to undergo. Mrs. Smith is a true and lovely illustration of the noblest type of feminine nature. She commenced her office as teacher in a Sunday-school, at the age of fourteen, before she was a convert to Jesus; that is, before she had yielded her will to the convictions of her reason and the promptings of her best feelings, and determined to live the life of duty, and seek her own happiness in doing good to others. This change took place when she was about eighteen years old; from that time all was harmony in her soul; she had found the true light, and she followed it till she entered heaven. In 1833, Miss Huntington was married to the Rev. Eli Smith, of the American mission at Beyroot, Syria; and she went to that remote region as the "help meet" for a humble missionary. She was singularly fitted for this important station, having been a voluntary missionary to the miserable remnant of a tribe of the Mohegan Indians; she had thus tested her powers and strengthened her love for this arduous work in the cause of doing good. Her letters to her father and friends, while reflecting on this important step of a foreign mission, will be intensely interesting to those who regard this consecration of woman to her office of moral teacher as among the most efficient causes of the success of the Gospel. The literary merits of her writings are of a high order; we venture to say, that, compared with the "Journals" and "Letters" of the most eminent men in the missionary station, those of Mrs. Smith will not be found inferior in merits of any kind. Her intellect had been cultivated; she could, therefore, bring her reasoning powers, as well as her moral and religious sentiments, to bear on any subject discussed; the following is proof in point. The powerful competition which the missionary cause held in Miss Huntington's affections, with her home and all its pleasant circumstances, may be learned from two or three sentences in one of her letters, written a few months before she left her country. "To make and receive visits, exchange friendly salutations, attend to one's wardrobe, cultivate a garden, read good and entertaining books, and even attend religious meetings for one's own enjoyment; all this does not satisfy me. I want to be where every arrangement will have unreserved and constant reference to eternity. On missionary ground I expect to find new and unlooked-for trials and hinderances; still it is my choice to be there. And so far from looking upon it as a difficult task to sacrifice my home and country, I feel as if I should 'flee as a bird to her mountain.'"

Such are the helpers Christian men may summon to their aid, whenever they will provide for the education of woman and give her the office of teacher, for which God designed her.

Mrs. Smith accompanied her husband to Beyroot, and was indeed his "help" and good angel. She studied Arabic; established a school for girls; exerted her moral and Christian influence with great effect on the mixed population of Moslems, Syrians, Jews; visiting and instructing the mothers as well as the children; working with all her heart and soul, mind and might; and the time of her service soon expired. She died September 30th, 1836, aged thirty-four; a little over three years from the time she left her own dear land.—She died at Boojah, near Smyrna; and in the burial-ground of the latter her precious dust reposes, beneath a monument which does honour to America, by showing the heroic and holy character of her missionary daughters. We must give some extracts from her "Journal" and excellent "Letters," collected and published since her decease:

From "Letters," written before her Marriage.

INFLUENCE OF THANKFULNESS AND CHEERFULNESS.

When is your Thanksgiving? Do you recollect that our ancestors, after appointing a number of fasts, in the midst of their perplexities, resolved that they would appoint a day of thanksgiving, to acknowledge their mercies, as well as deplore their misfortunes, and it seemed to be accepted? Do, my dear sister, strive to keep from despondency, and enjoy, with your husband and children, the domestic blessings which surround you. It may prove a permanent injury to your children, if the sunshine of a mother's face, which often furnishes such delightful associations, is clouded by depressed feelings. Once, since my return home, when an unconscious shade passed over my face, Elizabeth came to me and scrutinized my countenance with much intension. I was led to feel that children notice the expression very readily; their own is moulded by that of others with whom they associate constantly.

SATISFACTION IN EMPLOYMENT.

I am happy and cheerful in the attempted discharge of duty; and have no time to cultivate morbid sensibility. And at night, when I lay my weary head upon the pillow of repose, my rest is rendered doubly sweet by a busy day.

WRITINGS OF JANE TAYLOR.

I agree fully with Mrs. C. in regard to Jane Taylor's writings. She is so natural and simple.

Have you seen "Display," a tale by her, which is truly experimental? She does not give, like Mrs. Sherwood, such importance to personal beauty, in heroines. All Mrs. Sherwood's are conspicuous for that, while Miss Taylor attaches but little importance to it, and seldom gives a novelist's description of beauty. As young people attach so much value to it, to the neglect of other graces, I have admired the manner in which Miss Taylor treats the subject. Still I am a great admirer of Mrs. Sherwood.

QUIET USEFULNESS.

A well-regulated mind will never form plans which require the agitation of hurry in their execution. I am anxious to fill up life with usefulness, that God may be honoured, and my fellow-creatures not be the worse for my existence; and by curtailing my own wants, in the pursuance of a systematic plan, I try to avoid that bustling course which is so uncomfortable to surrounding persons, and distracting to one's self. I know of no better preparation for life or for death. From the midst of usefulness, I wish to be called to the reward which is "of grace, not of debt."

EXCITEMENT.

The old-fashioned quietude of domestic life, in this region at least, seems much interrupted by the bustle and excitement of the present day. Do you not think that it is injurious to the character to live upon excitement? I think, if I had any superintendence of girls, I should strive to have it avoided in their education. It produces an artificial stimulus, which, sooner or later, must end in reaction, leaving the character tame and spiritless. Fixed principles of action, having their foundation in truth, will animate the soul sufficiently, and give permanent cheerfulness, instead of being lost by effervescence. Excitement, however, is the order of the day, and I do not consider myself free from its injurious influence.

SELFISHNESS.

It is useful to go abroad occasionally; but if we fix our thoughts, habitually, upon the interests of Christ's kingdom, which are occupying the heavenly world, we cannot be "selfish;" and for myself, I do not wish to be in any place where these are not the predominant subjects. Did you ever notice particularly, that in the Lord's prayer the petitions relative to his kingdom are placed before our own individual wants? Would it not be profitable to follow this arrangement in our closet duties, and thus in our prayers "seek first the kingdom of God?" and possibly it might have an effect to weaken our attachment to the things of the world, and to our private interests.

A THOUGHT IN BROADWAY.

New York seems pleasant to me, and quite like home. In Broadway it seems as if people were hurrying to eternity, as fast as possible. Each one seems intent upon something, nobody can tell what, as though it were the last day of existence. And I hurry on, in the same apparently selfish manner.

ANXIETY RESPECTING PUBLIC INTERESTS.

Do you not tremble for our country? My heart sickens with apprehension. A crisis seems to be approaching; and statesmen as well as Christians seem to fear. The whole earth seems to "reel to and fro like a drunken man." Personal interests seem to dwindle to insignificance in the contrast. I never perused newspapers with such eagerness as I do now; and I find matter enough for prayer; and oh! for a wrestling spirit!

SIDEBOARD ORNAMENTS.

I have taken pains to adorn the sideboard with flowers—ornaments which the God of nature has provided to our hands, without expense or anxiety. I believe you will not think me visionary when I say that, in the Millennium, his works will be admired more than those of art—nor call it very improperly odd, if I try to turn our thoughts from the last, to the contemplation of his glorious works.

EXPENSIVE CHURCHES.

I have been for some time decidedly of the opinion, that while Christ's last command remains unfulfilled, splendid churches are not an acceptable offering to Him. The temple of Solomon has probably been a criterion, while it seems to have been forgotten that its magnificence was typical.

MEANS OF HAPPINESS.

All our years would be happier, if we could make the service of God continually our supreme delight, our meat and our drink. Trials we must have, for our Master had them.

SELF-INDULGENCE.

At our preparatory lecture, last evening, I was much struck with the 27th hymn—

"Cold mountains and the midnight air
Witnessed the fervour of thy prayer;
The desert thy temptation knew,
Thy conflict and thy victory too."

Shame upon the Christian who would prefer his own ease to the honour and service of his Saviour. And yet this is too much the case with us all. My earnest petition is, "Deliver me from self."

BEING OF GOD.

I was this morning contemplating the BEING OF GOD. For a moment I felt bewildered with the incomprehensibility of the subject, and all finite things appeared unworthy of a thought. But I soon felt that these were more suited to the strength of our minds than the secret things which belong to God only; and I felt that I ought to be grateful to Him, that my attention was divided between things real and spiritual; or rather things earthly and heavenly. We could not bear an uninterrupted meditation on these great subjects; we should soon be in —'s case. Our minds are prone to speculate, and sometimes unprofitably.

CONTENTMENT.

I have thought, to-day, of the text, "Godliness with contentment is great gain." It does not say riches, or honour, or pleasure with contentment, but "godliness." Let us live for God's glory, rise above trifles as far as possible, (and all things merely worldly are trifles,) and exercise strong faith. "Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous; and again I say, Rejoice."

HABITS OF THOUGHT RESPECTING CHRIST.

I am sensible that I do not regard Christ as much as I ought; and I wish you would pray for me, that he may be more clearly revealed to my soul.

HEAVEN.

I am trying to learn that earthly hopes and dependences have no permanence; and whenever I part with Christian friends, I console myself with the anticipation of time and opportunity in heaven.

I am overwhelmed with cares and burdens, because I am pleased to undertake considerable. But the burdens and cares of this life will make heaven sweet. There, dear sister, we shall unite, without separation. Let us live for this end, and be happy.

I do love to think of heaven. I seem to feel a spirit within me that says, there is unmingled happiness in store for the immortal mind. Oh! how soon, if faithful, shall we find ourselves upon those happy shores, disembodied, disenthralled, and holding converse with Christ, with angels, with our departed ones!

"Letters" from abroad.

STATE OF WOMEN IN SYRIA.

These weak-minded Syrian females are not attentive to personal cleanliness; neither have they a neat and tasteful style of dress. Their apparel is precisely such as the apostle recommended that Christian females should avoid; while the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit is thrown wholly out of the account. They have no books, and no means of moral or intellectual improvement. It is considered a disgrace for a female to know how to read and write, and a serious obstacle to her marriage, which is the principal object of the parent's heart. This abhorrence of learning in females, exists most strongly in the higher classes. Nearly every pupil in our school is very indigent. Of God's word they know and understand nothing; for a girl is taken to church perhaps but once a year, where nothing is seen among the women but talking and trifling; of course, she attaches no solemnity to the worship of God. No sweet domestic circle of father, brother, mother, and sister, all capable of promoting mutual cheerfulness and improvement, greets her in her own house. I do not mean to imply, that there exists no family affection among them, for this tie is often very strong; but it has no foundation in respect, and is not employed to promote elevation of character. The men sit and smoke their pipes in one apartment, while in another the women cluster upon the floor, and with loud and vociferous voices gossip with their neighbours. The very language of the females is of a lower order than that of the men; which renders it almost impossible for them to comprehend spiritual and abstract subjects, when first presented to their minds. I know not how often, when I have attempted to converse with them, they have acknowledged that they did not understand me, or have interrupted me by alluding to some mode or article of dress, or something quite as foolish.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR AN AMERICAN FEMALE MISSIONARY.

Strength of character, discipline of mind, steadiness of faith, patience, perseverance, and self-denial, are the requisite qualifications. I need not remind you that ardent piety lies at the foundation of the whole. This you must cultivate upon the altar of devotion in your closets. Commune with God there, respecting your feelings and purposes, more than any where else. He will feed and cause them to grow and expand; and in due time will furnish you with a sphere in which to exercise them. You need not wait to get upon missionary ground, before becoming an accepted missionary with God. Ere I left my father's house, I was convinced of the truth, and am now confirmed in it, that within the walls of her own dwelling, a young lady may cultivate and exhibit all the qualifications of a devoted missionary. As a daughter, sister, friend, she may be so faithful, humble, obliging, and self-denying, and may acquire such self-control, that even should she die before entering upon a wider sphere, she would merit the commendation, "She hath done what she could." Therefore be not impatient and uneasy, while you are providentially detained, amid every-day duties, within a narrow circle; but "whatever your hand findeth to do there, do it," at the same time cherishing the determination to assume greater responsibilities, and more self-denial, whenever God shall give the opportunity.

Next to piety, the most important qualification for active usefulness, is habitual self-control. "He that ruleth his own spirit, is greater than he that taketh a city." Perhaps you are exposed to some trials of temper now; but on missionary ground they will be increased a hundred fold, where every thing is crooked and wrong; where ignorance, stupidity, insolence, and deceit, provoke the corresponding emotions of pride, impatience, contempt, imperiousness, and dislike.

Avoid all habits of particularity and daintiness, which will prevent your assimilating readily to new and unlooked-for circumstances in which you may be placed, prove a source of uneasiness to yourselves, and interfere with your usefulness to others. Learn the happy, yet difficult art of forgetting yourselves, in all unimportant things. Much general knowledge and discipline of mind are essential in preparing you to do good to your fellow-beings; but if you choose a foreign station, the first mental qualification necessary, is a taste for acquiring languages, and the knowledge of several. This accomplishment, and valuable qualification, has been too much overlooked by young ladies in America, and I hope to hear of a change in this respect. The greatest obstacle and most painful discouragement on missionary ground, arises from the want of language by which to express the common sympathies of our nature, and to impart instruction in a thousand nameless ways, aside from formal exhortation and preaching.

SOMMERY, N. FONTELLE DE,

A LADY whose parentage is unknown, as she was secretly entrusted to the care of a convent. She possessed great powers of mind, with inoffensive gaiety. Her society was sought by philosophers and men of letters. She died about 1792, at an advanced age. She wrote, "Doutes sur les Opinions reçues dans la Société," and "L'Oreillo," an Asiatic romance.

SOPHIA OF WOLFENBUTTEL,

BAPTIZED Carolina Christina Sophia, distinguished for her sufferings and her beautiful feminine traits of character, sister of the wife of Charles VI., emperor of Germany, was united in marriage to the prince Alexis, son and presumptive heir of Peter the Great, czar of Muscovy. In her were mingled the fairest gifts of nature and education: lovely, graceful, with a penetrating and cultivated mind, and a soul tempered and governed by virtue; yet with all these rare gifts, which softened and won every other heart, she was nevertheless an object of aversion to Alexis, the most brutal of mankind. More than once the unfortunate wife was indebted for her life to the use of antidotes to counteract the insidious poisons administered to her by her husband. At length the barbarity of the prince arrived at its climax. By an inhuman blow she was left for dead. He himself fully believed that which he so ardently desired, and tranquilly departed for one of his villas, calmly ordering the funeral rites to be duly celebrated.

But the days of the unfortunate princess were not yet terminated. Under the devoted care of the countess of Konigsmark, her lady of honour, who had been present at the horrible event, she slowly regained health and strength, while her fictitious obsequies were magnificently performed and honoured throughout Muscovy, and nearly all the European courts assumed mourning for the departed princess. This wise and noble countess of Konigsmark, renowned as the mother of the brave marshal of Saxony, perceived that by not seconding the fortunate deceit of the prince Alexis, and the nation in general, and by proclaiming her recovery, the unhappy princess Sophia would expose herself to perish sooner or later by a more certain blow. She therefore persuaded her wretched mistress to seek refuge in Paris, under the escort of an old man, a German domestic. Having collected as much money and jewellery as she was able, the princess set out with her faithful servant, who remained with her in the character of father, which he sustained during his life; and truly he possessed the feelings and tenderness, as well as the semblance, of a parent.

The tumult and noise of Paris, however, rendered it a place of sojourn ill adapted to Sophia, and her desire of concealment. Her small establishment having been increased by a single maidservant, she accordingly embarked for Louisiana, where the French, who were then in possession of this lovely portion of America, had formed extensive colonies. Scarcely was the young and beautiful stranger arrived at New Orleans, than she attracted the attention of every one. There was in that place a young man, named Moldask, who held an office in the colony; he had travelled much in Russia, and believed that he recognised the fair stranger; but he knew not how to persuade himself that the daughter-in-law of the czar, Peter, could in reality be reduced to so lowly a condition; and he dared not betray to any one his suspicions of her identity. He offered his friendship and assistance to her supposed father; and soon his attentive and pleasing manners rendered him so acceptable to both, that a mutual intimacy induced them to join their fortunes, and establish themselves in the same habitation.

It was not long before the news of the death of Alexis reached them through the public journals. Then Moldask could no longer conceal his doubts of the true condition of Sophia; and finding that he was not deceived, he offered with respectful generosity to abandon his pursuits, and to sacrifice private fortune, that he might reconduct her to Moscow. But the princess, whose bitterest moments had been there passed, preferred to live far from the dazzling splendour of the court, in tranquillity and honourable obscurity. She thanked the noble-hearted Moldask; but implored him, instead of such splendid offers, to preserve her secret inviolable, so that nothing might trouble her present felicity. He promised, and he kept his promise; his heart ardently desired her happiness, in which his own felicity was involved. Living under the same roof, in daily communion, their equal age and ardent feelings kindled in the young man's soul a livelier flame than mere friendship; but respect controlled it, and he concealed his love in his own bosom.

At length the old domestic, who, in the character of father, had shielded the princess, died, and was followed to the tomb by the sincere grief of his grateful mistress — a just recompense for such fidelity. Propriety forbade that Moldask and Sophia should inhabit together the same dwelling after this event. He loved her truly, but loved her good fame more, and explained to her, not without grief, that it was necessary he should seek another abode, unless that she, who had already renounced all thoughts of pride and rank, were content to assume a name dearer and more sacred still than that of friend. He gave her no reason to doubt that vanity, instead of love, was the origin of this proposal, since the princess herself was firm in her desire to remain happy in private life. With all delicacy he sought to assure her that he could not but remember, in case of a refusal, that it was scarcely undeserved. Nor could he ever forget how much was exacted from him, by the almost regal birth of her to whose hand he thus dared aspire.

Love, and her desolate and defenceless condition, induced the princess willingly to consent; and, in constituting his felicity, she increased her own.

Heaven blessed so happy a union; and, in due time, an infant bound still closer the marriage tie. Thus, the princess Sophia, born of noble blood, destined to enjoy grandeur, homage, even a throne, having abandoned the magnificence of her former state, in private life fulfilled all the duties of nature and of society.

Years passed happily on, until Moldask was attacked with disease, which required the aid of a skilful surgeon. Sophia was unwilling to confide a life so precious and beloved to the care of surgeons of doubtful skill, and therefore resolved to visit Paris. She persuaded her husband to sell all their possessions and embark. The medical skill of Paris restored Moldask to health. Being now perfectly cured, the husband sought to obtain employment in the island of Bourbon, and was successful.

Meanwhile, the wife was one day walking with her graceful little girl in a public garden, as was her wont. She sat down on a green bank, and conversed with her child in German, when the marshal of Saxony passing by, was struck with the German accent, and stayed to observe them. She recognised him immediately; and, fearing the same from him, bent her eyes to the ground. Her blushes and confusion convinced the marshal that he was not mistaken; and he cried out, "How, Madame? What do I see? Is it possible?" Sophia suffered him not to proceed, but drawing him aside, she declared herself, praying him to keep sacred the needful secret, and to return with her to her dwelling, where she might with greater care and security explain her situation. The marshal was faithful to his promise; visited the princess many times, though with all due precaution, and heard and admired her history. He wished to inform the king of France, that this august lady might be restored to her rightful honours and rank, and that he himself might thus complete the good work begun by his mother, the countess of Konigsmark. He did inform the empress, Maria Theresa, who wished to restore her to her former rank. Sophia refused all these suggestions and offers. "I am so used," she said to the officer who proposed to reconduct her to the court—"I am so used to this domestic and private life, that I will never change it. Neither to be near a throne, nor to receive the greatest homage, nor to enjoy riches, nor even to possess the universe, would give me the shadow of the pleasure and delight I feel at this moment." So saying, she tenderly embraced the one and the other of her dear family.

She lived long with her husband and daughter, serene and contented, dividing her cares and occupations between assisting and amusing the one, and educating the mind and the heart of the other. Death snatched from her, within a short interval, these two beloved ones, who had filled her heart with sweet emotions; and for a long time that heart was a prey to one only sentiment of the deepest grief. Yet not even this sorrow affected her so much, but that she believed the unhappiness of grandeur to be still greater. She constantly refused the repeated invitations to Vienna; and, accepting only a small pension from the liberality of the empress, she retired to Vitry, near Paris, where she wished still to pass under the name of Madame Moldask; but it was impossible any longer to conceal her high birth and illustrious ancestry. Notwithstanding this, she never abandoned her accustomed simplicity and retirement of life, in which alone she had begun to find, and found to the last, true felicity.

SOUTHCOTT, JOANNA,

A FANATIC, was born, in April, 1750, in the west of England. Her parents were poor, and she was for many years a servant. Early in life she indulged in visionary feelings; but when she was forty-two, she claimed the character of a prophetess. For more than twenty years from that time, she continued to pour forth unintelligible rhapsodies, by which she succeeded in making many dupes. At length, mistaking disease for pregnancy, she announced that she was to be the mother of the promised Shiloh; and great preparations were made for his reception by her deluded followers. She, however, died of the malady, December 27, 1814. Her sect is not even yet extinct.

SOUZA, MARIA FLAHAULT DE,

WAS born at Paris. She married the Chevalier de Souza, ambassador from Portugal to the court of France, and editor of a fine edition of Camoens. Madame de Souza, at that time a widow, was among the noble emigrants who sought shelter in England, from the revolutionary storms of 1789. She had been admired as a brilliant woman of fashion; and it has been said of her, that it was only "necessity, the mother of invention," that had converted her into a successful author.

Her earliest work, "Charles and Marie," was published, by subscription, in London, and was, in point of time, one of the very first fictions noticed by the Edinburgh Review. Madame de Souza, being on terms of intimacy with Talleyrand, obtained permission to return to France. On being presented to Napoleon, he graciously asked which among her works was her favourite. "Mon meilleur ouvrage, sire, le voici," she replied, introducing her son, the handsome and animated Charles de Flahault, who was soon afterwards appointed aid-de-camp to the emperor, and accompanied him through all his campaigns. The most esteemed of Madame de Souza's novels are, "Eugène de Rothelin," and "Adèle de Senange," both distinguished for moral purity, and a particular delicacy of thought; these books were much admired by the celebrated Charles James Fox. Madame de Souza was educated at that period preceding the revolution, when ladies of rank were taught, at their convents, very little more than to shine in a drawing-room. Madame de Genlis relates, in her entertaining memoirs, the pains she took to induce the duchess de Chartres, and some other court dames, to learn a little orthography. Their expressions were choice, and their style in speaking faultless; but alas! they could not spell. Madame de Souza used, ingenuously, to avow that this defect of her early education she had never been able to remedy. At the same time, the critics allow that her French is a model of ease and purity. She died in 1836, at her hotel, Faubourg St. Honoré, surrounded by many attached friends and relatives, having lived to see her grand-children grown up, and her son reinstated in his rank, at the court of the Tuileries.

SPIILBERG, ADRIANA,

WAS born at Amsterdam, in 1646. She was taught painting by her father, John Spilberg, an eminent historical and portrait painter. Her best works were portraits in crayon, though she sometimes painted in oil. Her eminent abilities caused her to be invited to the court of the electress, at Dusseldorp, where she was received with marks of respect and honour. She married the celebrated painter, Eglon Vander Neer.

SPIILIMBERGO, IRENE DI,

WAS of a noble family at Venice, and is said to have been instructed by Titian, whose style she certainly followed. She painted merely for amusement; and flourished about 1560. Titian, who lived on terms of friendship with her family, drew her portrait.

STAAL, MADAME DE,

WHOSE maiden name was De Launai, was born, in 1693, at Paris, and was the daughter of an artist. She received an excellent education in the convent of St. Sauveur, in Normandy, and displayed precocious talents. For many years she was waiting-woman to the duchess of Maine; and having been privy to some of the duchess's political intrigues, which she refused to betray to the government, she was, for two years, imprisoned in the Bastille; for which honourable fidelity she was but ill rewarded. She married the baron de Staal, and died in 1750. She wrote her own memoirs, letters, and two comedies.

STAEL, ANNE LOUISE GERMAIN, MADAME DE,

WAS born, April 22d, 1766, at Paris. She was the daughter of the well-known French financier, Necker. Her parents being protestants, instead of receiving her education, like most young ladies of the period, in the seclusion of a convent, she was reared at home, and allowed to mingle freely with the talented guests who assembled in her mother's drawing-room. Already a precocious child, this produced in her a premature development of intellect. Some of the gravest men who visited Madame Necker, when her daughter had scarcely emerged from childhood, discerned her intellectual power, and found pleasure in conversing with her; the acuteness of her judgment already revealing what she would one day become. From her mother she imbibed a strong religious feeling, which never abandoned her; Necker imparted to her his ambitious love of political popularity; and the society in which she was brought up strengthened her passion for literature, and fed the burning flame of her genius. Her life and writings bear deep traces of these three powerful principles. As a talker she has never perhaps been surpassed. Clear, comprehensive, and vigorous, like that of man, her language was also full of womanly passion and tenderness. Her affection for her father was enthusiastic, and her respect for him bordered upon veneration. The closest and most unreserved friendship marked their intercourse through life. Mademoiselle Necker was heir to immense wealth; and at the age of twenty, through the interposition of Marie Antoinette, a marriage was brought about between her and the baron de Staël Holstein, then Swedish ambassador at the court of France. M. de Staël was young, handsome, and cultivated; he had no fortune, but he was a Lutheran; and as M. Necker had no inclination to see his fortune pass into the hands of a catholic, his consent was easily obtained.

Neither the disposition or situation of Madame de Staël would allow her to remain indifferent to the general agitation which prevailed in France. Enthusiastic in her love of liberty, she gave all the weight of her influence to the cause. Her father's banishment in 1787, and his triumphant return in 1788, deeply affected her; and when he was obliged to retire from public life, it was a source of deep grief and disappointment to her. During Robespierre's ascendancy, she exerted herself, at the hazard of her life, to save his victims, and she published a powerful and eloquent defence of the queen. On the 2d of September, when the tocsin called the populace to riot and murder, she fled from Paris, with great difficulty, and took refuge with her father, at Coppet. When Sweden recognised the French republic, she returned to Paris with her husband, who was again appointed Swedish ambassador. Her influence, social, literary, and political, was widely extended. On Talleyrand's return from America, in 1796, she obtained, through Barras, his appointment to the ministry of foreign affairs. To this period also belongs two political pamphlets, containing her views respecting the situation of France in 1795, which express the remarkable opinion that France could arrive at limited monarchy only through military despotism

In 1798, M. de Staël died; her connexion with her husband had not been a happy one. When she became desirous of saving her children's property from the effects of his lavish expenditure, a separation took place; but when his infirmities required the kind offices of friends, she returned to him, and was with him when he died.

Madame de Staël first saw Napoleon in 1797. His brilliant reputation excited her admiration, but this sentiment soon gave way to fear and aversion; her opposition offended Napoleon, and she was banished from Paris. She resided with her father at Coppet, where she devoted herself to literature. After the death of her father, in 1803, she visited Italy and Germany; which visits produced her two most remarkable works, "Corinne," and "Germany." The latter, when printed in Paris, was seized and destroyed by the minister of police; and her exile from Paris was extended to banishment from France. During her residence on her father's estate, Madame de Staël contracted a marriage with a young officer, in delicate health, by the name of de Rocca, which continued a secret till her death. Notwithstanding she was twice the age of her husband, this marriage was very happy. M. de Rocca loved her with romantic enthusiasm; and she realized, in his affection, some of the dreams of her youth. He survived her only six months. Banished from France, Madame de Staël wandered over Europe; her sufferings she has embodied in her "Ten Years of Exile." In 1814 she returned to Paris, and was treated with great distinction by the allied princes. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, she retired to Coppet. It is said that he invited her to return to Paris, and that she refused to do so. After the restoration, she received from the government two millions of francs; the sum which her father had left in the royal treasury. Surrounded by a happy domestic circle, esteemed and courted by the most eminent men of the capital, Madame de Staël resided in Paris till her death, which took place in July, 1817. Madame de Staël has been called the greatest female writer of all ages and countries. She was certainly the most distinguished for talents among the women of her age. Since Rousseau and Voltaire, no French writer has displayed equal power. Her works are numerous—"Corinne," "Delphine," "Germany," "Ten Years of Exile," and "Considerations on the French Revolution," are the most noted. In making selections from this distinguished writer, we have chosen that which we consider her greatest work; its moral tone elevates its philosophy, while the religious sentiment adds a refinement to the speculations which might otherwise be thought too bold for a woman.

From "Germany."

WOMAN.

Nature and society give to woman a habit of endurance; and I think it can hardly be denied that, in our days, they are generally worthier of moral esteem than the men. At an epoch when selfishness is the prevailing evil, the men, to whom all positive interests have relation, must necessarily have less generosity, less sensibility, than the women. These last are attached to life only by the ties of the heart; and even when they lose themselves, it is by sentiment that they are led away; their selfishness is extended to a double object, while that of man has himself only for its end. Homage is rendered to them according to the affections which they inspire, but those which they bestow are almost always sacrifices. The most beautiful of virtues, self-devotion, is their enjoyment and their destiny; no happiness can exist for them but by the reflection of another's glory and prosperity; in short, to live independently of self, whether by ideas or by sentiments, or, above all, by virtues, gives to the soul an habitual feeling of elevation.

In those countries where men are called upon, by political institutions, to the exercise of all the military and civil virtues which are inspired by patriotism, they recover the superiority which belongs to them; they reassume, with dignity, their rights, as masters of the world; but when they are condemned, in whatever measure, to idleness or to slavery, they fall so much the lower as they ought to rise more high. The destiny of women always remains the same; it is their soul alone which creates it; political circumstances have no influence upon it. When men are either ignorant or incapable of the means of employing their lives with dignity or propriety, Nature revenges herself upon them for the very gifts which they have received from her; the activity of the body contributes only to the sloth of the mind; the strength of soul degenerates into coarseness; and the day is consumed in vulgar sports and exercises, horses, the chase, or entertainments which might be suitable enough in the way of relaxation, but seem merely degrading as occupations. Women, the while, cultivate their understanding; and sentiment and reflection preserve in their souls the image of all that is free and generous.

CONVERSATION.

It seems to me an acknowledged fact that Paris is, of all cities of the world, that in which the spirit and taste for conversation are most generally diffused; and that disorder which they call the mal du pays, that undefinable longing for our native land, which exists independently even of the friends we have left behind there, applies particularly to the pleasure of conversation which Frenchmen find nowhere else in the same degree as at home. Volney relates, that some French emigrants began, during the revolution, to establish a colony and clear some lands in America; but they were continually quitting their work to go and talk, as they said, in town—and this town, New Orleans, was distant six hundred leagues from their place of residence. The necessity of conversation is felt by all classes of people in France: speech is not there, as elsewhere, merely the means of communicating, from one to another, ideas, sentiments, and transactions; but it is an instrument on which they are fond of playing, and which animates the spirits, like music among some people, and strong liquors among others.

That sort of pleasure which is produced by an animated conversation, does not precisely depend on the nature of that conversation; the ideas and knowledge which it develops do not form its principal interest; it is a certain manner of acting upon one another, of giving mutual and instantaneous delight, of speaking the moment one thinks, of acquiring immediate self-enjoyment, of receiving applause without labour, of displaying the understanding in all its shades, by accent, gesture, look; of eliciting, in short, at will, the electric sparks which relieve many by the very excess of their vivacity, and serve to awaken others out of a state of painful apathy.

The spirit of conversation is sometimes attended with the inconvenience of impairing the sincerity of character; it is not a combined, but an unpremeditated deception. The French have admitted into it a gaiety which renders them amiable; but it is not the less certain that all that is most sacred in this world has been shaken to its centre by grace, at least by that sort of grace that attaches importance to nothing, and turns all things into ridicule.

EDUCATION.

Education, conducted by way of amusement, dissipates the reasoning powers: pain, in all the concerns of life, is one of the great secrets of nature: the understanding of the child should accustom itself to the efforts of study, as our soul accustoms itself to suffering. It is a labour which leads to the perfection of our earlier, as grief to that of our later age: it is to be wished, no doubt, that our parents, like our destiny, may not too much abuse this double secret; but there is nothing important in any stage of life but that which acts upon the very central point of existence, and we are too apt to consider the moral being in detail. You may teach your child a number of things with pictures and cards, but you will not teach him to learn; and the habit of amusing himself, which you direct to the acquirement of knowledge, will soon follow another course when the child is no longer under your guidance.

POETRY.

The gift of revealing by speech the internal feelings of the heart, is very rare; there is, however, a poetical spirit in all beings who are capable of strong and lively affections: expression is wanting to those who have not exerted themselves to find it. It may be said that the poet only disengages the sentiment that was imprisoned in his soul. Poetic genius is an internal disposition, of the same nature with that which renders us capable of a generous sacrifice. The composition of a fine ode, is a heroic trance. If genius were not versatile, it would as often inspire fine actions as affecting expressions; for they both equally spring from a consciousness of the beautiful that is felt within us.

TASTE.

Those who think themselves in possession of taste, are more proud of it than those who believe that they possess genius. Taste is, in literature, what the bon ton is in society. We consider it as a proof of fortune and of birth, or, at least, of the habits which are found in connection with them; while genius may spring from the head of an artisan who has never had any intercourse with good company. In every country where there is vanity, taste will be placed in the highest rank of qualifications, because it separates different classes, and serves as a rallying point to all the individuals of the first class. In every country where the power of ridicule is felt, taste will be reckoned as one of first advantages; for, above all things, it teaches us what we ought to avoid.

But taste, in its application to the fine arts, differs extremely from taste as applied to the relations of social life; when the object is to force men to grant us a reputation, ephemeral as our own lives, what we omit doing is at least as necessary as what we do; for the higher orders of society are naturally so hostile to all pretensions, that very extraordinary advantages are requisite to compensate that of not giving occasion to the world to speak about us. Taste in poetry depends on nature, and, like nature, should be creative; the principles of this taste are therefore quite different from those which depend on our social relations.

STANHOPE, LADY HESTER,

Was the oldest daughter of the earl of Stanhope, well known for his eccentricities and democratic sentiments. Her mother was sister of the celebrated William Pitt. Lady Hester early lost her mother, and, under the nominal guidance of a young and gay step-mother, she received an ill-directed and inappropriate education. She was very precocious—the genius of the family, and the favourite of her father, with whom she took great liberties. She relates, herself, that upon one occasion, when the earl, in a democratic fit, put down his carriage, she brought him round again by an amusing practical appeal. “I got myself a pair of stilts,” she said, “and out I stumped down a dirty lane, where my father, who was always spying about through a glass, could see me.” The experiment had the desired effect; her father questioned her good-humouredly upon her novel mode of locomotion, and the result was a new carriage. Unlike her father, Lady Hester was a violent aristocrat, boasting of her nobility, and priding herself upon those mental and physical peculiarities which she considered the marks of high birth. At an early age, she established herself in the family of her uncle, Mr. Pitt, for the purpose, she asserted, of guarding the interests of her family during a perilous political crisis. She resided with Mr. Pitt till his death, courted and flattered by the most distinguished people in England, and enjoying all the advantages which her position as mistress of his house afforded her. She represents herself as having possessed considerable influence with Mr. Pitt; sharing his confidence, and exercising a large amount of control over the patronage belonging to his post.

After the death of Mr. Pitt, she obtained from George III. a pension of £1500. On this she tried to maintain her former rank and style; but, finding it impossible, she removed to Wales, and finally, in 1810, to the East. In 1813, she settled near Sidon; and soon afterwards removed to Djoun, her celebrated Syrian residence. Here she erected extensive buildings for herself and suite, in the Oriental style, with several gardens laid out with good taste. Money goes very far in the East, and the munificence which she exhibited, added to her well-known rank, acquired for her an influence which her personal character soon established; and she exercised a degree of power and control over the neighbouring tribes and their chiefs, for which their ignorance and superstition can alone account. Lady Hester here promulgated those peculiar religious sentiments which she continued to hold to the last. The words of St. John, "But there is one who shall come after me, who is greater than I am," she with a most extraordinary carelessness attributes to Christ; and upon this promise she founded her belief in the coming of another Messiah, whose herald she professed to be. She kept in a luxurious stable, carefully attended to by slaves devoted solely to that purpose, two mares, one of which, possessing a natural defect in the back, she avowed was born ready saddled for the Messiah; the other, kept sacred for herself, she was to ride upon at his right hand, when the coming took place.

It is impossible to say what Lady Hester's faith really was. She professed to believe in astrology, magic, necromancy, demonology, and in various extravagances peculiarly her own. This mysticism was well adapted to the people among whom she dwelt, and may in a great measure have been assumed to impose upon and confirm her influence with them. Possessing in a high degree the spirit of intrigue, she exercised her powers in fomenting or allaying the disturbances among the neighbouring tribes. With the emir Beshyr, prince of the Druses, whom she braved, she kept up an unceasing hostility; her enmity was also violently displayed towards the whole consular body, who she said "were intended to regulate merchants, and not to interfere with or control nobility." On the other hand, she was profuse in her bounty, and charitable to the poor and afflicted of every faith. Her residence was a place of refuge to all the persecuted and distressed who sought her protection. When news arrived of the battle of Navarino, all the Franks in Sayda fled for refuge to her dwelling; and, after the siege of Acre, she relieved and sheltered several hundred persons. Nor was her generosity confined to acts like these; she loaned large sums to chiefs and individuals, who, in their extremity, applied to her; and, to save whole families from the miseries of the conscription, she furnished the requisite fines. This profuse expenditure, added to the charge of her household, which was seldom composed of less than forty persons, without counting the various hangers-on from without, soon crippled her means. She took up money at an enormous interest, and became involved in pecuniary difficulties. Upon application made by one of her creditors to the British government, in 1838, Lord Palmerston issued an order to the consuls, forbidding them to sign the necessary certificates of Lady Hester's still being alive; and this high-handed measure being carried out, she was henceforward deprived of all use of her pension.

Lady Hester's suite comprised only two Europeans: Miss Williams, an English lady, who was a sort of humble companion, and died some years before Lady Hester; and her physician who accompanied her abroad. Dr. M. remained with her till 1817; and at two different periods he again rejoined her for the space of a year or two at a time. It is to the Journal kept by the latter that we are chiefly indebted for the information we have obtained regarding her singular life in the East; the accounts given of her by the numerous travellers who visited her, affording but very partial insight into her character and pursuits. By many, Lady Hester Stanhope is looked upon as an insane person; that her mind was diseased there can be very little doubt. Even admitting that much which she professed to believe was assumed to mislead others, the very desire to give such impressions betrays an ill-balanced mind.

Lady Hester's ruling passion was an inordinate love of power. She exercised the most despotic dominion over all connected with her, which trait may account for her choice of residence; as no Christian followers would have submitted to her tyranny. Her will was the law; she allowed no one to make a suggestion or venture an opinion in her presence. Even her doctor's opinions she disputed on his own ground, quarrelling with him for not taking her prescriptions, though she refused to follow his! Her temper was violent in the extreme, and she did not confine herself to words when under its influence. One of the marked characteristics of her mind was the necessity she was under of incessantly talking. Her physician, who describes her eloquence at times as something wonderful, relates that he has sat thirteen hours at a time listening to her; that a gentleman once remained from three in the afternoon till break of day, tête-à-tête with her; and "Miss Williams," he also adds, "once assured me that Lady Hester kept Mr. N., an English gentleman, so long in discourse that he fainted away!

Her ladyship's readiness in exigencies may be exemplified by what occurred on that occasion. When she had rung the bell, and the servants had come to her assistance, she said very quietly to them, that in listening to the state of disgrace to which England was reduced by the conduct of the ministers, his feelings of shame and grief had so overwhelmed him that he had fainted. Mr. N., however, declared to Miss Williams, that it was no such thing, but that he absolutely swooned away from fatigue and constraint.

Tormented by her creditors, and enraged at the treatment she had received from her own government, Lady Hester renounced her allegiance, refusing ever again to receive her pension. She walled up her gate-way, determining to have no communication with any one without; and dismissed her physician, though she was in an advanced stage of pulmonary disease. Dr. M. left her in August, 1838. Her last letter to him is dated May, 1839; and, on the 23d of June, 1839, attended by a few slaves, and without a single European or Christian near her, she breathed her last, aged sixty-three years. Mr. Moore, the English consul at Beyrout, and Mr. Thompson, an American missionary, hearing of her death, proceeded to Djoun, and performed the last sad offices to her remains, burying her at midnight in her own garden.

STEELE, MRS. ANNE,

Was the daughter of the Rev. Mr. Steele, a dissenting minister at Broughton, in Hampshire, England. She is the authoress of many of the most popular hymns sung in churches. She also wrote a version of the Psalms, which showed great talent. She died in 1779.

STEPHENS, KATHARINE,

The daughter of a carver and gilder, was born in London, September 18th, 1794. She gave early proofs of her musical abilities, and on the 23d of September, 1813, made her début on the stage, at Covent Garden Theatre, as a vocalist, and was received with great applause. She continued for a long time the principal female singer on the English stage. Her character was always unimpeachable.

STEWART, HARRIET BRADFORD,

Was born near Stamford, in Connecticut, on the 24th of June, 1798. Her father, Colonel Tiffany, was an officer during the revolutionary war, but he died while his daughter was very young, and her youth was passed principally at Albany and Cooperstown, in New York. In 1822, Miss Tiffany married the Rev. C. S. Stewart, missionary to the Sandwich Islands, and accompanied him to those distant and uncultivated regions. She had previously, in 1819, passed through that mysterious change denominated regeneration. "Repeated afflictions," says her biographer, Rev. Mr. Eddy, "the death of friends, and her own sickness, led her to feel the need of a strong arm and a sure hope. She turned to Him who can give support to the soul in the hours of its dark night, and guide it amid the gloom."

The great subject of a missionary life was presented to her view, connected with a proposal to accompany Rev. C. S. Stewart to the Sandwich Islands, as his assistant and companion. With trembling anxiety she submitted the case to the wise discretion of her Father in heaven;—on earth she had none. As may be supposed, it was no easy thing for a young lady of high and honourable connexions, who had always been surrounded with friends, and educated in the circle of refinement and luxury, to leave all these. There were tender ties to be riven, fond associations to be broken up, dear friends to part with, and a loved home to leave behind; and when the momentous question was brought distinctly before her mind, it required a strong faith, a firm dependence on God, an entire submission to his will, to induce her to take the solemn and important step; but believing herself called upon by God, she decided in his favour, and lost sight of the sacrifice and self-denial of the undertaking.

She resolved to go;—to go, though home was to be abandoned, friends to be left, loved scenes deserted, and a life of toil to be endured. She resolved to go;—to go, though she might pass through a sea of tears, and at last leave her enfeebled body upon a couch that would have no kind friends to surround it when she died. She resolved to go, though she should find in savage lands a lowly grave.

She married Mr. Stewart, and they sailed in company with a large number of others who were destined for the same laborious but delightful service. The sun of the nineteenth of November, 1822, went down on many homes from which glad spirits had departed, on their errand of mercy to a dying world; and on that day the eye of many a parent gazed upon the form of the child for the last time. Nor could a vessel leave our shores having on her decks nearly thirty missionaries, without being followed by the prayers of more than the relatives of those who had departed. There was mingled joy and sorrow throughout the churches of New England, as the gales of winter wafted the gospel-freighted vessel to her distant destination.

They arrived, in April of the following year, at Honolulu; and after a residence of a few days, Mr. and Mrs. Stewart located themselves at Lahaiua, a town containing about twenty-five thousand inhabitants, who were mostly in a degraded condition. Here they found but few of the conveniences of life, and were obliged to live in little huts, which afforded but slight shelter from the scorching heat or the pelting rain. In these miserable tenements did the child of luxury and wealth reside, and in perfect contentment perform the duties of her station. She suffered, but did not complain; she laboured hard, but was not weary; and cheerful in her lot, smiled even at her privations and sorrows.

In 1825, her health began to fail. Unable longer to labour for her perishing heathen sisters, she sailed for England, in order to enjoy medical advice and care; but instead of improving by the voyage, she continued to decline, until the hopelessness of her case became apparent. She embarked for America in July, 1826, her residence of a few months in England having rendered her no permanent benefit. In her low state the voyage was anything but agreeable, and she arrived among her friends the mere shadow of what she was when, a few years before, she had gone forth in the flush of youth and the vigour of health.

For a time after her arrival, strong hopes were cherished that she might recover. The balmy breezes of her own native valley, the kind congratulations of friends, the interest and excitement of a return to the scenes of youth, gave colour to her cheek, and life to her step. But this expectation, or rather hope, proved delusive; she died January, 1830, aged thirty-eight.

STUART, ARABELLA,

WAS the daughter of Charles Stuart, earl of Lennox, brother of Darnley, the husband of Mary queen of Scots, and Elizabeth Cavendish, daughter of the countess of Shrewsbury, commonly called "Old Bess of Hardwick." She was born about the year 1577. Her affinity to the throne made her an object of jealousy, even in infancy, to queen Elizabeth, who took great offence at the marriage of her parents. She, however, permitted her to remain under the charge of the old countess of Shrewsbury, her grandmother, who brought her up, her parents having both died early. Arabella, when quite a child, was made the object of dark intrigues; the Catholic party plotting to carry her off, and educate her in that faith, for the purpose of placing her on the throne upon the death of Elizabeth. An active watch was in consequence constantly kept over her during that queen's reign, who nevertheless frequently threw out hints that she intended to declare the lady Arabella her successor. Upon the accession of James to the throne, the lady Arabella was received at the new court, and treated as one of the family. James, however, in the position in which she stood, could not fail to look upon her with eyes of suspicion, which must have been confirmed by the breaking out of that unfortunate conspiracy, into which Raleigh was accused of having entered, the main object of which was to place her on the throne. Her innocence was proved upon the trial, and it appears that the king was persuaded of her ignorance of the plot. James, after he ascended the throne, seems to have adopted the policy of queen Elizabeth, in desiring to prevent the marriage of the lady Arabella. Many offers of marriage were made to her, many alliances proposed, to none of which he gave heed. Surrounded by numerous difficulties, alone, with no one to enter into her interests—for her grandmother was now dead—Arabella accepted the hand of Sir William Seymour, second son of Lord Beauchamp, and grandson of the earl of Hertford, to whom she was warmly attached. Anticipating the king's denial, they took the rash step of marrying privately. It was not long before their secret was divulged: the bride was placed in safe keeping, and the bridegroom was hurried to the Tower. The unhappy pair were not kept so closely confined as to prevent their secretly corresponding; but when this was discovered by the king, he angrily ordered Arabella to be removed to a place of greater security. On her journey to Durham, Arabella was taken ill, and while resting on the road, she contrived to escape, to communicate with her lover, who also escaped, and get on board a vessel bound to France. Here, while waiting to be joined by her husband, she was taken prisoner by one of the king's ships in pursuit of her, and re-conducted to London, where she was placed under strict guard in the Tower; Seymour meanwhile escaping safely to Flanders, where he remained for many years a voluntary exile. The unhappy Arabella, unpitied by the king, languished in prison, the victim of deferred hope, till her reason sank under her accumulated sorrows. She died in the Tower, a maniac, after four years' confinement, on the 27th of September, 1615. Her unfortunate husband, Seymour, though he afterwards married again, preserved inviolably his tender affection for his first love, and gave her name to his daughter, who was called Arabella Stuart, in memory of his attachment and misfortunes.

STUART, FRANCES, DUCHESS OF RICHMOND,

COMMONLY called La Belle Stuart, was the daughter of Walter Stuart, son of lord Blantyre, who stood in a distant degree of relationship to the royal family. She was born about 1647, and was educated in France, from whence she accompanied her mother to England. Soon after her arrival she was appointed maid of honour to queen Catherine. Her remarkable beauty attracted the attention of Charles II., who is said to have been so much distracted at her rejection of his advances, that he contemplated divorcing his queen, that he might marry her. La Belle Stuart, though so highly favoured as regards personal charms, is described as a frivolous, vain beauty. She had many admirers; among them, Francis Digby, son of the earl of Bristol, who threw away his life in despair, in a naval engagement, for her sake

However "empty" may have been her head, she had principle and strength of mind sufficient to resist the overtures of the king, in a court where evil example surrounded her, and where infamy in high places was so gilded as to lose all its loathsomeness. Perceiving that scandal was already attacking her, in consequence of the king's open pursuit, she determined to marry, and accepted the offer of the duke of Richmond, who was one of her most devoted lovers; she eloped from Whitehall, and was privately married to the duke. The king, highly incensed, forbid them both the court. Charles, however, with his usual placability, soon forgave them, and in less than a year she was appointed lady of the bed-chamber to queen Catherine. The beauty which had turned so many heads was destined to suffer a speedy eclipse; the duchess caught the small-pox when she had only been a wife two years, and though she recovered her health, her beauty had disappeared forever. The king appears to have retained a regard and respect for the duchess ever after. She continued to remain at court, always in favour, and is mentioned as one of the witnesses present at the birth of the unfortunate prince of Wales, the son of James II. She died in 1702, a devout catholic, having survived her husband thirty years. She had no children, and bequeathed a considerable fortune to her nephew, lord Blantyre.

SUFFOLK, HENRIETTA, COUNTESS OF.

To the divinity that "hedges a king," there are few now in the world willing to pay blind admiration. Looking back only to the last century, it is wonderful to note what a faint shadow of personal merit was magnified into virtue and excellence, when it fell upon royalty! How the vilest faults were not only overlooked, but fostered by otherwise worthy persons. Unquestionably one of the most pernicious errors—vices it should be said—that royal privileges introduced into society, and varnished with the appearance of respectability, was conjugal infidelity. That two women, such as queen Caroline and lady Suffolk, should have been brought to stifle their natural virtues, abate their pride, and lower their intellects to minister to the evil propensities of so coarse, narrow-minded, and unfeeling an animal as George II., is an instance of the corrupting influence of ill-placed power scarcely to be comprehended by an American woman.

Henrietta Hobart was the eldest daughter of Sir Henry Hobart. She was born about 1688, and was left an orphan at quite an early age;—her eldest brother being but fifteen, she was in a very unprotected situation, and as a matter rather of expediency than of prudence or affection, married Charles Howard, who subsequently, by the deaths of his two elder brothers and their sons, became earl of Suffolk. Mr. Howard is spoken of, by Horace Walpole, as every thing that was worthless and contemptible: and he appears to have tormented his wife to the utmost of his ability, as long as he lived, although a formal separation between them took place long before that event occurred. At the accession of George I., Mr. Howard was appointed groom of the chamber to the king; and Mrs. Howard named one of the bed-chamber women to the princess of Wales, Caroline of Anspach. In this situation she obtained the highest favour with the princess, who appeared to value her society, and her many estimable qualities. Unfortunately she attracted the admiration of the prince, and has been "damned to everlasting fame," by the disgraceful ambition of possessing what was called the heart of a stupid and licentious monarch.

Here may be recalled an anecdote lord Hervey relates: that the daughters of George II., expressing their gratification, when lady Suffolk was dismissed from court, that their mother's rival was abandoned, qualified their triumph by lamenting that "Poor mamma would have to endure so many more hours of his majesty's tediousness." The decorum and propriety of lady Suffolk's conduct, in this unworthy situation, it must be allowed were great; since some memoir writers are yet found who would vindicate her from more than a Platonic attachment to the king. This all the best contemporary authorities disprove; and yet, as the shadow of virtue is better than the ostentation of vice, we must grant it as much favour as it deserves. That lady Suffolk formed friendships with all the most remarkable characters of her circle, is not to be wondered at, during the period that she possessed court favour; but that she retained these friends after her retirement, must be ascribed to her own merits. The happiest period of her life must have been after she left the slavery of the court and established herself at Marble Hill, an estate which she derived from the gift of the king. Lord Suffolk died in 1733; and in 1734 she resigned her office and formally retired from court, fully understanding that it was a measure desired by both the king and queen.

In 1735, the countess of Suffolk married the Hon. George Berkley, youngest son of the earl of Berkley; in which union, which was entirely one of inclination, she appears to have enjoyed the utmost domestic happiness. By her first husband, the earl of Suffolk, she had one son, who succeeded his father as tenth earl, and was the last of his branch. Lady Suffolk died in 1767, surviving both her son and Mr. Berkley. Her sweetness of disposition and equanimity of mind appear to have furnished her with a cheerful and pleasant existence, though she was afflicted with many constitutional infirmities. She had been troubled with deafness at the most brilliant period of her life. Living in the neighbourhood of Twickenham, she saw a great deal of Pope; and in her latter years maintained a close intimacy with Horace Walpole. Her correspondence, published in 1824, shows the very high estimation in which she was held by all the illustrious, the noble, and the literary characters of consequence, who lived at that time. Swift, Chesterfield, the great lord Chatham, Gay; in short, a list of her friends would be but a list of the great men of England, in the reign of George II.

Horace Walpole, in his reminiscences, speaks of her remarkable beauty, which never entirely deserted her, even in old age showing its traces; he commends her amiable disposition and prudence, in the same work. We will finish this sketch by quoting from a letter he wrote to lord Strafford, in which, after giving an account of her death, he proceeds to these encomiums:—"I can give your lordship strong instances of the sacrifices she tried to make to her principles. I own I cannot help wishing that those who had a regard for her, may now, at least, know how much more she deserved it than even they suspected. In truth, I never knew a woman more respectable for her honour and principles; and have lost few whom I shall miss so much."

SUZE, HENRIETTA COLIGNY DE LA,

Was the daughter of the marshal de Coligny. She was born in 1613, and was one of the most admired poetesses of her day. She was particularly praised for her elegies. Mademoiselle de Scuderi has given her the most high-flown eulogiums, in her romance of "Clelia;" and she received tributes from all the beaux esprits; some Latin poems among others. It is said that, being engaged in a lawsuit with Madame de Chatillon, Madame de la Suze met that lady in the vestibule of the court of parliament, escorted by M. de la Feuillade, while she herself was accompanied by the poet Benserade. "Madame," said her adversary, "you have rhyme on your side, and we have reason upon ours."

"It cannot be alleged," retorted Madame de la Suze, "that we go to law without rhyme or reason."

Nothing could exceed the want of order in which she lived, nor her apathetic negligence of her affairs. One morning, at eight o'clock, her household goods were seized for debt; she was not up, and she begged the officer on duty to allow her to sleep a couple of hours longer, as she had been up late the night before. He granted her request, and took his seat in the ante-room. She slept comfortably till ten, when she arose, dressed herself for a dinner-party to which she was engaged, walked in to the officer, thanked him, and made him a great many compliments on his politeness and good manners; and coolly adding, "I leave you master of everything," she went out. She and her husband lived very unhappily; they were Protestants. Madame de la Suze, having become a Roman Catholic, queen Christina of Sweden said she did so, that she might not meet her husband in the other world. She obtained a divorce from him at the sacrifice of a large sum of money. Madame de la Suze died in 1673.

T.

TAGGART, CYNTHIA,

HAS won herself a place among those who deserve to be remembered, by her serene patience under the severest bodily sufferings, and the moral energy whereby she made these sufferings serve as instructors to her own mind, and to the hearts of pious Christians who may read her sorrowful story. The father of Cynthia Taggart was a soldier in our war for independence. During this struggle his property was destroyed; and, dying in poverty, he had nothing to leave for the support of his daughters. They resided in Rhode Island, about six miles from Newport; and there, in a little cottage, this poor girl was born, about the year 1804. Her training was religious, though she had few opportunities of learning; and when, at the age of nineteen, her strength became utterly prostrated by severe sufferings from a chronic disease of the bones and nerves, or rather of her whole physical system, she began her intellectual life, self-educated by her own sensations and reflections; and her soul was sustained in this conflict of bodily pain with mental power, by her strong and ardent faith in her Saviour. She enumerates among her greatest sufferings, her inability to sleep. For many years she was unable to close her eyes in slumber, except when under the powerful effect of anodynes; and it was during these long, dark watches of the night, when every pulse was a throb of pain, and every breath an agony of suffering, that she composed her soul to contemplations of the goodness of God and the beauties of nature, and breathed out her strains of poetry.

Her poems were collected and published in 1834, with an autobiography sadly interesting, because it showed the hopelessness as well as helpless condition of Miss Taggart; enduring death in life. The work has passed through several editions. Miss Taggart has been released from her unparalleled sufferings. She died in 1849. Her poetry will have an interest for the afflicted; and few there are who pass through the scenes of life without feeling a chord of the heart respond to her sorrowful lyre.

THE HAPPINESS OF EARLY YEARS.

Dear days! in rapid pleasures past,
Whene'er I glance my longing eyes
Back o'er these joys too fair to last,
My aching heart within me dies.

The waves melodious flow the same,
The joyful birds still wake the song,
The morn and evening gales still breathe
Their balmy odours pure along.

The flow'ry landscape blooms as fair,
The foliage waves as graceful now,
As when each breezy breath of air
Fanned fragrance o'er this peaceful brow.—

Gone are the bright, the rosy smile,
The raptured bosom's thrilling glow,
The peace, the joy, that breathed the while,
Soft as the warbling music's flow.

Where calmly spreads the embowering shade,
That oft this gliding form hath traced,
When laughing joy and pleasure strayed,
And innocence and peace embraced,

Still nature wears her sweetest charms;
And wooingly each loved retreat
Seems opening an affection's arms,
The long-expected guest to meet.

Far from each bright, each flowery scene,
In solemn silence now reclined,
No hope, no joy, no smile serene,
Revives this blighted form and mind.

Though nature smile with aspect sweet,
And varying seasons circle round,
No more the struggling captive's feet
Can 'scape affliction's prison bound.

The reflux tide, the rolling wave
Alternate on the peaceful shore,
That oft to this glad spirit gave
A pensive rapture, now no more.

ODE TO THE POPPY.

Through varied wreaths of myriad hues,
As beams of mingling light,
Sparkle replete with pearly dews,
Waving their tinted leaves profuse,
To captivate the sight;
Though fragrance, sweet exhaling, blend
With the soft, balmy air,
And gentle zephyrs, wafting wide
Their spicy odours bear;
While to the eye,
Delightingly,
Each floweret laughing blooma
And o'er the fields
Prolific, yields
Its increase of perfumes;
Yet one alone o'er all the plain,
With lingering eye, I view;
Hasty I pass the brightest bower,
Heedless of each attractive flower,
Its brilliance to pursue.

No odours sweet proclaim the spot
Where its soft leaves unfold;
Nor mingled hues of beauty bright
Charm and allure the captive sight
With forms and tints untold.

One simple hue the plant portrays
Of glowing radiance rare,
Fresh as the roseate morn displays,
And seeming sweet and fair.

But closer pressed, an odorless breath
Repels the rover gay;
And from her hand with eager haste
'Tis careless thrown away;
And thoughtless that in evil hour
Disease may happiness devour,
And her fairy form, elastic now,
To Misery's wand may helpless bow.

Then Reason leads wan Sorrow forth
To seek the lonely flower;
And blest Experience kindly proves
Its mitigating power.

Then its bright hue the sight can trace,
The brilliance of its bloom;
Though misery veil the weeping eyes,
Though sorrow choke the breath with sighs,
And life deplore its doom.

This magic flower
In desperate hour
A balsam mild shall yield,
When the sad, sinking heart
Feels every aid depart,
And every gate of hope for ever sealed.

Then still its potent charm
Each agony disarm,
And its all-healing power shall respite give:
The frantic sufferer, then,
Convulsed and wild with pain,
Shall own the sovereign remedy, and live.

The dews of slumber now
Rest on her aching brow,
And o'er the languid lids balsamic fall;
While fainting Nature hears,
With dissipated fears,
The lowly accents of soft Somnus' call.

Then will Affection twine
Around this kindly flower;
And grateful Memory keep
How, in the arms of Sleep,
Affliction lost its power.

TALBOT, CATHARINE,

Was lineally descended from the noble family of Talbots, earls of Shrewsbury, and was niece to Lord Talbot, created earl of Chancellor in 1733. Her father, Mr. Edward Talbot, married the daughter of the Rev. George Martin, and died suddenly before the birth of Catharine. The fatherless daughter and her mother found a home, in every sense of the word, with Dr. Secker, archbishop of Canterbury, whose wife was the friend of Mrs. Talbot. This worthy prelate, having no children, bestowed much affection on Catharine, and took great pleasure in cultivating her mind and encouraging her literary tastes. By constantly associating with him, she reaped all the advantages of his extensive learning, accurate knowledge of the Scriptures, and his critical acquaintance with the sciences and languages connected with that important study.

But the circumstance which had the greatest influence in stimulating the talents of Miss Talbot, (for we do not think that she possessed what is termed genius,) was her early acquaintance and intimate friendship with Mrs. Elizabeth Carter. This acquaintance began when Elizabeth Carter was twenty-three and Catharine Talbot twenty years of age, and continued till the death of the latter, at the age of forty-eight. Miss Talbot and Mrs. Carter corresponded for many years; and these letters show that the former had an excellent understanding, and a heart warm with piety. After her death, her manuscripts were collected and published, under the supervision of Mrs. Carter. These works are, "Reflections on the Seven Days of the Week," "Essays and Miscellaneous Works," and "Correspondence between Mrs. Carter and Miss Talbot." In estimating the character of this excellent woman, we will abide by the opinion of her friend, Mrs. Carter, who says of Miss Talbot:—"Never, surely, was there a more perfect pattern of evangelical goodness, decorated by all the ornaments of a highly improved understanding; and recommended by a sweetness of temper, and an elegance and politeness of manners, of a peculiar and more engaging kind, than in any other character I ever knew."

TALLIEN, THÉRÉSA,

Was the daughter of Count Cabarrus, a French gentleman, established in Spain. His wife, the mother of Thérèse, was a native of that country. Thérèse was married, at an early age, to M. de Fontenay. During the reign of terror, while on their way to Spain, M. de Fontenay was arrested at Bordeaux, and thrown into prison. Madame de Fontenay remained at Bordeaux, in the hope of effecting his liberation, where she became acquainted with M. Tallien, who, under the direction of the Convention, was persecuting the Girondists. All unite in representing the beauty and grace of Madame de Fontenay as extraordinary; she added to these attractions, wit, great fascination, and a compassionate and tender heart. Tallien became passionately enamoured of her, and Madame de Fontenay was frail enough to accept his homage. Her husband was released, and favoured in his retreat to Spain. Thérésa remained behind, and procured a divorce, to enable her to marry Tallien. Meanwhile, she exerted her influence over her lover to stay the course of bloodshed. Tallien could not resist her tears and entreaties, and daily some family had to thank her for a member saved from the guillotine. In the town where her lover reigned, she received the name of "Our Lady of Mercy."

The leniency of Tallien was condemned in Paris. He was recalled, and Thérésa was thrown into prison, where she shared the room of Josephine, future empress of France. Tallien was unable to procure the release of the woman he adored. Expecting daily to be summoned to the fatal tribunal, she energetically urged him from her prison to save her — to overthrow Robespierre, and deliver France from the reign of terror. Love inspired Tallien. The ninth Thermidor delivered France from Robespierre; the prison doors were thrown open, and Thérésa was free. A few days after, Tallien and Thérésa confirmed their union at the altar.

Madame Tallien had the most beneficent influence over her husband's public life, and all her efforts were exerted to assist the unfortunate sufferers from the revolution. By her political influence and beauty, she attracted the attention of all Paris; Josephine de Beauharnais and herself being the principal ornaments of the splendid circle of Barras. Gratitude to her husband, did not prevent her from entering into other passing connexions. Tallien, who followed Napoleon to Egypt, was forgotten, and, on her application, she was formally divorced from him. Napoleon, who had been one of her intimates, after his marriage with Josephine, broke off all intercourse with her, and could never be persuaded to grant her admission to court. She was thus thrown into the opposition, which led to her connexion with Madame de Staël and her third husband, the prince of Chimay, whom she married in 1805. As she could not obtain admittance to the Tuilleries during Napoleon's administration, she was obliged to content herself with forming a little court of her own, at Chimay, where she died in 1835.

TAMBRONI, CLOTILDE,

Was born at Bologna, in 1758. Her childhood offered indications of superior intelligence, which were observed by every one who knew her; but disregarding these, her mother, far from attempting to cultivate her mind, required her to devote herself to household duties, and to useful needlework, and the various humble labours demanded of girls in their modest station in society. The distinguished Hellenist, Emanuele Aponte, lodged with the Tambroni family; and while Clotilde sat apparently busied with her work, she was attentively listening to the Greek lessons given by that professor to various classes. One day, as he was examining an ill-prepared scholar, to his great surprise, the little girl prompted the blunderer, giving him exactly the right sentence in excellent Greek. Delighted and astonished, Aponte persuaded the mother to allow him to cultivate this decided inclination for study. Her facility of acquirement was wonderful; to a general acquaintance with elegant literature, she added a knowledge of mathematics, and of the Latin tongue; but her most remarkable accomplishment was her very uncommon learning 'n Greek. At the recommendation of Aponte, she was, while yet a girl, appointed to the Greek chair in the junior department of the University of Bologna. Political circumstances caused her family to leave Italy at one time, and she remained for a short period in Spain; but subsequently returning home, she was received by her countrymen with the highest honours, and was appointed by the government of Milan, professor of Greek in the University of Bologna—a situation which she held with credit to herself, and advantage to the college. She lived in a lettered seclusion, dividing her leisure between study and the society of a few congenial and erudite persons. She died, at the age of fifty, in the year 1817. She has left several translations from the Greek, and some Greek poems; besides an oration, which she delivered in Latin, on the inauguration of the doctor Maria Dalle-Donne into the college honours.

TARABOTTI, CATERINA,

Was born at Venice, in 1582, and was taught the art of painting by Alessandro Varotari. She profited so well by his instructions, as to be distinguished in her native city above many of the most considerable artists in history. She died there in 1631.

TARRAKANOFF, N., PRINCESS OF,

DAUGHTER of Elizabeth, empress of Russia, by Alexis Rozoumoffski, whom she had secretly married, was carried away, in 1767, at the age of twelve, by prince Radzivil, and concealed in a convent at Rome. This singular step was taken by the dissatisfied noble to curb the ambition of Catharine; but it failed, and her favourite, Alexis Orloff, pretending great discontent against the government of Catharine, prevailed on the princess, in the absence of Radzivil, to marry him, and, by her presence, to excite a new insurrection in Russia. The young and unsuspecting princess no sooner placed herself in his power, than she was seized in the bay of Leghorn, where she had been conducted on pretence of paying her military honours, bound in chains, and carried to St. Petersburg. In December, 1777, a violent rising of the Neva suddenly forced the waters into her prison, and she was drowned before assistance could be obtained.

TAYLOR, JANE,

Was born in London, September 23d, 1783, where her father, a respectable engraver, then resided. Being also a dissenting minister, Mr. Taylor accepted, in 1792, an invitation from a congregation at Colchester, and carried his daughters there with him, superintending himself their education, and teaching them his own art. It was in the intervals of these pursuits that Jane Taylor found leisure to write; and on a visit to London, in 1802, she and her sister were induced to join several other young ladies in contributing to the "Minor's Pocket-Book," a small publication, in which her first work, "The Beggar Boy," appeared, in 1804. The success of this little poem encouraged her to proceed, and she continued to publish occasional miscellaneous pieces in prose and verse; the principal of which were, "Original Poems for Infant Minds," and "Rhymes for the Nursery." In 1815, she published a prose composition of higher pretensions, called "Display," which was very successful. Her last and principal work, published while she was living, consists of

"Essays in Rhymes, on Morals and Manners." The latter part of her life was passed principally at Ongar, where her family had resided since 1810. She died of an affection of the lungs, in April, 1823. After her decease, her prose writings, consisting of "Contributions of Q. Q. to a Periodical," and her "Correspondence," consisting chiefly of letters to her intimate friends, were collected and published. No one who reads her works, and those of Cowper, but must, we think, notice the likeness in the character of their minds. Miss Taylor possessed, like Cowper, a vein of playful humour, that often gave point and vividness to the most sombre sentiment, and usually animated the strains she sung for children; but still, there was often over her fancy, as over his, a deep shade of pensiveness,—"morbid humility," she sometimes calls it,—and no phrase could better express the state of feeling which frequently oppressed her heart. The kind and soothing domestic influences which were always around her path in life, prevented the sad and despairing tone of her mind from ever acquiring the predominance, so as to unfit her for her duties; in this respect she was much more favoured than the bard of Olney. But we are inclined to think that, had she met with severe trials and misfortunes, the character of her poetry would have been more elevated, and her language more glowing. The retiring sensitiveness of her disposition kept down, usually, that energy of thought and elevation of sentiment, which, from a few specimens of her later writings, she seemed gifted to sustain, could she only have been incited to the effort. Her piety was deep and most humble: diffidence was usually in all things the prevailing mood of her mind; and this often clouded her religious enjoyment. But she triumphed in the closing scene; those "unreal fears" were, in a great measure, removed, and she went down to the "cold dark grave" with that firm trust in her Redeemer which disarmed death of its terrors. The first specimen is in her devotional strain; the others are in the moral and playful mood.

"THE THINGS THAT ARE UNSEEN ARE ETERNAL."

There is a state unknown, unseen,
Where parted souls must be:
And but a step may be between
That world of souls and me.

The friend I loved has thither fled;
With whom I sojourned here:
I see no sight—I hear no tread,
But may she not be near?

I see no light—I hear no sound,
When midnight shades are spread:
Yet angels pitch their tents around,
And guard my quiet bed.

Jesus was wrapt from mortal gaze,
And clouds conveyed him hence;
Enthroned amid the sapphire blaze,
Beyond our feeble sense.

Yet say not—Who shall mount on high
To bring him from above?
For lo! the Lord is always nigh
The children of his love

The Saviour, whom I long have sought,
And would, but cannot see—
And is he here? O wondrous thought!
And will he dwell with me?

I ask not with my mortal eye
To view the vision bright;
I dare not see Thee, lest I die;
Yet, Lord, restore my sight!

Give me to see Thee, and to feel—
The mental vision clear;
The things unseen reveal! reveal!
And let me know them near.

I seek not fancy's glittering height,
That charmed my ardent youth;
But in thy light would see the light
And learn thy perfect truth.

The gathering clouds of sense dispel
That wrap my soul around;
In heavenly places make me dwell
While treading earthly ground.

Illume this shadowy soul of mine,
That still in darkness lies;
O let the light in darkness shine,
And bid the day-star rise!

Impart the faith that soars on high,
Beyond this earthly strife,
That holds sweet converse with the sky
And lives Eternal Life!

EXPERIENCE.

* * * * *

How false is found, as on in life we go,
Our early estimate of bliss and woe!
—Some sparkling joy attracts us, that we vain
Would sell a precious birth-right to obtain.
There all our hopes of happiness are placed;
Life looks without it like a joyless waste;
No good is prized, no comfort sought beside;
Prayers, tears implore, and will not be denied.
Heaven pitying hears the intemperate, rude appeal,
And suits its answer to our truest weal.
The self-sought idol, if at last bestowed,
Proves, what our wilfulness required—a goad;
Ne'er but as needful chastisement, is given
The wish thus forced, and torn, and stormed from heaven
But if withheld, in pity, from our prayer,
We rave, awhile, of torment and despair,
Refuse each proffered comfort with disdain,
And slight the thousand blessings that remain.
Meantime, Heaven bears the grievous wrong, and waits
In patient pity till the storm abates;
Applies with gentlest hand the healing balm,
Or speaks the ruffled mind into a calm;
Deigning, perhaps, to show the mourner soon,
'Twas special mercy that denied the boon.

Our blasted hopes, our aims and wishes crossed,
Are worth the tears and agonies they cost;
When the poor mind, by fruitless efforts spent
With food and raiment learns to be content.
Bounding with youthful hope, the restless mind
Leaves that divine monition far behind;
But tamed at length by suffering, comprehends
The tranquil happiness to which it tends,
Perceives the high-wrought bliss it aimed to share,
Demands a richer soil, a purer air;
'That 'tis not fitted, and would strangely grace
The mean condition of our mortal race.
And all we need, in this terrestrial spot,
Is calm contentment with "the common lot."

THE PHILOSOPHER'S SCALES.

In days of yore, as Gothic fable tells,
When learning dimly gleamed from grated cells,

When wild Astrology's distorted eye
Shunned the fair field of true philosophy,
And, wandering through the depths of mental night,
Sought dark predictions 'mid the worlds of light:—
When curious Alchymy, with puzzled brow,
Attempted things that Science laughs at now,
Losing the useful purpose she consults,
In vain chimeras and unknown results:—
In those gray times there lived a reverend sage,
Whose wisdom shed its lustre on the age.
A monk he was, immured in cloistered walls,
Where now the ivied ruin crumbling falls.
'Twas a profound seclusion that he chose;
The noisy world disturbed not that repose;
The flow of murmuring waters, day by day,
And whistling winds that forced their tardy way
Through reverend trees, of ages growth, that made
Around the holy pile a deep monastic shade;
The chanted psalm, or solitary prayer—
Such were the sounds that broke the silence there.

* * * * *

'T was here, when his rites sacerdotal were o'er,
In the depth of the cell with its stone-covered floor,
Resigning to thought his chimerical brain,
He formed the contrivance we now shall explain:
But whether by magic, or alchymy's powers,
We know not—indeed 'tis no business of ours:
Perhaps it was only by patience and care,
At last, that he brought his invention to bear.
In youth, 't was projected; but years stole away,
And ere 't was complete he was wrinkled and gray:
But success is secure unless energy fails;
And at length he produced The Philosopher's Scales.

What were they?—you ask: you shall presently see;
These scales were not made to weigh sugar and tea;
O no;—for such properties wondrous had they,
That qualities, feelings, and thoughts they could weigh Together with articles small or immense,
From mountains or planets, to atoms of sense:
Nought was there so bulky, but there it could lay;
And nought so ethereal, but there it would stay;
And nought so reluctant, but in it must go;
All which some examples more clearly will show.

The first thing he tried was the head of Voltaire,
Which retained all the wit that had ever been there;
As a weight, he threw in a torn scrap of a leaf,
Containing the prayer of the penitent thief;
When the skull rose aloft with so sudden a spell,
As to bound like a ball on the roof of the cell.

Next time he put in Alexander the Great,
With a garment that Dorcas had made—for a weight;
And though clad in armour from sandals to crown,
The hero rose up, and the garment went down.

A long row of alms-houses, amply endowed,
By a well-esteemed pharisee, busy and proud,
Now loaded one scale, while the other was prest
By those mites the poor widow dropped into the chest;—
Up flew the endowment, not weighing an ounce,
And down, down, the farthing's worth came with a bounce

Again, he performed an experiment rare;
A monk, with austerities bleeding and bare,
Climbed into his scale; in the other was laid
The heart of our Howard, now partly decayed;
When he found, with surprise, that the whole of his brother
Weighed less, by some pounds, than this bit of the other.

By further experiments (no matter how)
He found that ten chariots weighed less than one plough;
A sword, with gilt trappings, rose up in the scale,
Though balanced by only a ten-penny nail;
A shield and a helmet, a buckler and spear,
Weighed less than a widow's uncrystallized tear.
A lord and a lady went up at full sail,
When a bee chanced to light on the opposite scale
Ten doctors, ten lawyers, two courtiers, one earl,
Ten counsellors' wigs full of powder and curl,
All heaped in one balance, and swinging from thence,
Weighed less than some atoms of candour and sense.

A first water diamond, with brilliants begirt,
Than one good potato, just washed from the dirt;
Yet, not mountains of silver and gold would suffice
One pearl to outweigh—it was the “pearl of great price.”

At last the whole world was bowled in at the grate,
With the soul of a beggar to serve for a weight;
When the former sprang up with so strong a rebuff,
That it made a vast rent, and escaped at the roof;
Whence, balanced in air, it ascended on high,
And sailed up aloft a balloon in the sky;
While the scale with the soul in so mightily fell,
That it jerked the philosopher out of his cell.

Moral.

Dear reader, if e'er self-deception prevails,
We pray you to try The Philosopher's Scales.
But if they are lost in the ruins around,
Perhaps a good substitute thus may be found:—
Let judgment and conscience in circles be cut,
To which strings of thought may be carefully put:
Let these be made even with caution extreme,
And impartiality use for a beam:
Then bring those good actions which pride overrates,
And tear up your motives to serve for the weights.

TENCIN, MADAME DE,

WAS born at Grenoble, in 1681. She was compelled by her father to take the veil at an early age. The gay and worldly life led by the inmates of the convent where she was placed, called down great scandal; and it was in the large and brilliant circle which there surrounded her, that the attractions, both mental and personal, of Mademoiselle de Tencin first became known. She was fascinating rather than beautiful. Her manners were pliant and insinuating, and her tact was unerring. The fascination which she exercised over the abbess and her confessor, procured her unusual freedoms; and the more she saw of the world, the more she longed to enter it. She protested against her vows, and succeeded in gaining her liberty; the obligation of celibacy being the only one not dispensed with. Madame de Tencin, for she henceforth assumed that name, took up her residence with her brother, the abbe de Tencin, in Paris, where she soon became surrounded by a host of admirers. She had several intrigues, one of which ended in the birth of a son, who was exposed upon the steps of a church, on the 17th of November, 1717. The child, thus forsaken, was found and brought up by a poor glazier's wife, and proved to be the future great mathematician, D'Alembert. She never provided for it; the fear of future detection outweighing every other consideration.

Madame de Tencin soon began to take an active part in her brother's political intrigues. After a vain attempt to influence the regent, she formed a degrading connexion with cardinal Dubois. He admired her talents, and, at a time when Madame du Maine was enlisting society against the regent, he felt the value of Madame de Tencin's influence over the brilliant and select circle which assembled at her house. Madame de Tencin possessed a deep knowledge of human nature, especially of its evil side, and a keen perception of character. Few women understood so well as she did the art of drawing together men of the most varied tastes and opinions; or of influencing them without their even suspecting her power. Men of science and daring thought, gathered around her; and, after acting the part of a profligate intrigante under the regency, Madame de Tencin, under the ministry of Fleury, seemingly gave up her intrigues, and was satisfied with keeping one of the earliest and most celebrated “bureaux d'Esprits” of the eighteenth century. Fleury, though he feared and disliked her, did not venture to oppose this branch of her power. This society was at one period disturbed to its centre, by an unfortunate incident which involved Madame de Tencin. La Frenaye, councillor to the king, one of her lovers, shot himself at her house in a fit of jealousy or despair. In an incoherent document which he left, he declared her to be the cause of his death. This accusation was taken in a literal sense, and she was thrown into the Bastille, whence, however, she was soon released. It was in the brilliant society of Madame de Tencin, and under her superintendence, that the germ of the future encyclopædists was slowly developed. A mind so keen and clear sighted, so deeply versed in the details of political life as Madame de Tencin's, could not but be disgusted with the disorder of every thing in the state. Disappointed ambition converted this feeling into one of secret, but dangerous, opposition; and she became the recipient of the covert indignation which the condition of France was then beginning to inspire. The first attacks on absolute monarchy, in favour of constitutional liberty, which characterized the eighteenth century, originated in her drawing-room. It was an intellectual movement, and Madame de Tencin was one of the first women who laid the basis of this formidable power. “Unless,” she said, “God visibly interferes, it is physically impossible that the state should not fall to pieces;” a pithy prophecy, which may be quoted as a proof of her political sagacity and foresight. The nature of her influence over her contemporaries may be traced in two important works, which, if they do not owe their existence to her, were inspired by the tone of her society, viz.: Montesquieu's “Esprit des Lois,” and Helvetius's “De l'Esprit.”

As she advanced in age her conduct became more correct, and the attractions of her mind and conversation procured her more admirers than she had formerly obtained by the charms of her person. The immorality of Madame de Tencin was no disqualification for her becoming the advocate of enlightened freedom. It was a characteristic feature of the eighteenth century, that all those who prepared the great, but short-lived, triumph of liberty, with which it closed, participated, from Madame de Tencin down to Mirabeau, in the immorality of the age. Her intrigues procured her brother the highest dignities of the church; but she did not succeed in raising him to the rank of minister, her constant aim. The writings with which she amused her old age, are calculated to give a high idea of her intellect, as well as of a nobleness and delicacy contradicted by her life. She wrote, “Memoires de Comminges,” “The Siege of Calais,” “Anecdotes of Edward II.,” and a collection of letters.

TEODORO, DANTI,

Of Perugia, was born in 1498. She was a profound scholar in the exact sciences, and well acquainted with physics and painting. Never intending to marry, she employed herself in intellectual pursuits and was honoured with general esteem.

She has left an elaborate commentary on Euclid; also a treatise on painting, and several poems of an agreeable style. She died in 1573.

TERRACINA, LAURA,

Of Naples, was born in 1500. She was much praised by the contemporary literati. She met with a violent death,—being killed by her husband, Boccalini Mauro, in 1595. Four editions of her works were printed at Venice; these are principally poems.

THÉOT, CATHARINE,

Was born, in 1725, at Baranton, a village in the diocese of Avranches. She came, when young, to Paris, to obtain means of subsistence, and lived in a menial capacity in several places, the last of which was the convent of the Miramions, which she left in 1779, as she had discovered that she possessed the gift of seeing visions and of prophecy. From that time she published openly her reveries, calling herself, sometimes a second Eve, sometimes the mother of God, and at last, a messiah, who was to regenerate the human race. Her pretensions attracted the attention of the police, and she was confined in the Bastille, but at the end of five weeks was transferred to the hospital of Salpêtrière, where she remained till 1782.

In 1794, having made a convert of dom Gerle, a priest, and member of the constituent assembly, a man of learning and merit, but whose mind had been affected by his austerities and solitary life, she again openly proclaimed herself the mother of God, and promised eternal life to her adherents. Her followers became very numerous, and even extended into Germany. She received from them the homage due only to God, and her revelations were regarded as divine. She was soon, however, taken prisoner, together with dom Gerle and a number of her adherents, and tried before the convention; but being protected by Robespierre, she and all her friends were acquitted. She died in five weeks after her arrest.

THERESA, SAINT,

Was born at Avila, in Spain, in 1515. While reading the lives of the saints, when very young, she became possessed with a desire for martyrdom, and ran away from her parents, hoping to be taken by the Moors. But she was discovered, and was obliged to return, when she persuaded her father to build her a hermitage in his garden, where she might devote herself to her religious duties. In 1537, Theresa took the veil at the convent of the Carmelites at Avila, where her religious zeal led her to undertake the restoration of the original severity of the order. In pursuance of this object, in 1562, she founded a convent of reformed Carmelite nuns at Avila; and in 1568, a monastery of friars, or barefooted Carmelites, at Dorvello. She died at Alba, October 1582, but before her death there were thirty convents founded for her followers. She was canonized by pope Gregory XV. She left an autobiography, and several other works.

THÉROIGNE, ANNE JOSEPH,

SURNAMED La Liegoise, was born in 1759, at the village of Mericourt, near the city of Liege. Her parents were honest labourers; but her intellect, grace, and beauty rendering her their idol, she was brought up as delicately and carefully as most children in a much higher rank. When she was about seventeen, the son of a nobleman, whose estate was near the humble abode of the beautiful girl, saw her, fell violently in love with her, seduced her, and then coldly abandoned her. This cruel treatment, and her subsequent disgrace, created in her breast a resentment that was extinguished many years after only in the blood of her seducer.

Soon after the abandonment of Théroigne by her lover, she went to England, and we have no accurate account of her manner of life there, though it is said that she made a conquest of the prince of Wales, and she certainly lived in luxury. At the end of three months she went to Paris, bringing with her letters from the duke of Orleans; and for some time she was the reigning beauty in that city. Her tall, well-formed figure, brilliant eye, and expressive countenance, making her every where conspicuous. Upon the first breaking out of the revolution, she embraced the cause of the people, more to revenge herself on the class to which her seducer belonged than from any other motive, and, adopting the dress of a soldier, she led those savage hordes of men and women who sacked the Hotel des Invalides, burnt the Bastille, and murdered all, on whom the slightest suspicion of aristocracy rested, who crossed their paths. She gave orders to these ferocious crowds, and was obeyed without the slightest opposition. She spoke at the clubs and revolutionary festivals, and always with great effect. She was present at those dreadful scenes of blood at the Abbey, at La Force, at Bicêtre; and meeting, among the doomed prisoners at the Abbey, the young nobleman who had seduced her, she plunged her sword into his breast.

At the taking of the Bastille, she had formed a strong attachment to Brissot, which was the cause of her ruin; for he became very unpopular, and she attempted in vain to defend him, and at one time, when Brissot was assailed by a mob of furious women, in the garden of the Tuilleries, she, rushing forward to save him, was seized by them and publicly whipped.

This disgrace was so deeply felt by the proud amazon as to make her deranged; she was confined in the Salpêtrière, an asylum for the insane, and never afterwards appeared in public, though she lived till 1817. She was fifty-eight years of age, and preserved her great beauty, in a measure, to the last; although a greater part of the time a raving maniac. Her ferocity survived her intellect.

THICKNESSE, ANNE,

WAS born in the Temple, in London, in 1737. Her beauty and talents early introduced her into the world of fashion. She gave three concerts on her own account, having left her father's house to avoid being forced into a marriage. By her concerts she is said to have realized £1500; and acquiring the patronage of lady Betty Thicknesse, became domesticated in her family. On the death of this lady, she married governor Thicknesse, and accompanied her husband on various journeys. She was with him in France when he died, in 1792, and narrowly escaped execution; Robespierre having sent an order to that effect. On her liberation she returned to England, and died at her house, on the Edgeware Road, in 1824. Her principal works are, "Biographical Sketches of Literary Females of the French Nation," and "The School of Fashion," a novel.

THOMAS, ELIZABETH,

KNOWN under the name of Corinna, was born in 1675; and, after a life of ill health and misfortunes, died February 3d, 1730, and was buried in the church of St. Bride. She was only a second-rate writer; but her poetry is soft and delicate, and her letters sprightly and entertaining. She incurred, in some way, Pope's displeasure, and he placed her in his "Dunciad."

THYNNE, FRANCES, DUCHESS OF SOMERSET,

WAS born near the close of the eighteenth century. Walpole says of her, "she had as much taste for the writings of others as modesty about her own," and might have obtained fame for her talents, had not her retiring disposition and affectionate piety led her to prefer the society of well-chosen friends, to the applause of the world. Her attainments were considerable, which she employed in the careful education of her children, the charge of whom, and devoted attendance by the sick-bed of her husband, occupied the best part of her life. She was fond, however, of literary society, as is shown by her friendship for Mrs. Rowe, (she was the authoress of the letter signed Cleora, in Mrs. R.'s collection); Thomson, whom she kindly patronized, (who dedicated to her the first edition of his "Spring"); Dr. Watts, (who dedicated to her his "Miscellaneous Thoughts in Prose and Verse"); and Shenstone, (who addressed to her his ode on "Rural Elegance.") She died in 1754. No collection of her poems has been made, though a number are preserved in Bingley's "Correspondence of the Countess of Pomfret" with our authoress. The specimen given is found in Dr. Watt's Miscellanies, ascribed to Eusebia.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN'S HOPE.

When faint, and sinking to the shades of death,
I gasp with pain for ev'ry lab'ring breath,
O may my soul by some blest foretaste know
That she's deliver'd from eternal woe!

May hope in Christ dispel each gloomy fear
And thoughts like these my drooping spirits cheer.
What tho' my sins are of a crimson stain,
My Saviour's blood can wash me white again.
Tho' numerous as the twinkling stars they be.
Or sands along the margin of the sea;
Or as smooth pebbles on some beachy shore,
The mercies of th' Almighty still are more:
He looks upon my soul with pitying eyes,
Sees all my fears, and listens to my cries:
He knows the frailty of each human breast,
What passions our unguarded hearts molest
And for the sake of his dear dying Son,
Will pardon all the ills that I have done.
Arm'd with so bright a hope, I shall not fear
To see my death hourly approach more near;
But my faith strength'ning as my life decay,
My dying breath shall mount to heav'n in praise.

TIBERGEAU, MARCHIONESS DE,

WAS sister of the marquis de Phisieulx, and the beloved niece of Rochefoucauld, author of the celebrated "Maxims." Her maiden name was Sillery. She early showed a decided inclination for poetry. It was to Mademoiselle de Sillery that La Fontaine addressed several fables, and of her he spoke when he said,

"Qui dit Sillery, dit tout."

She married the marquis de Tibergeau, and continued till her death the constant friend and protector of literary men. She encouraged Destouches in writing for the theatre, and induced M. Phisieulx to take him for his secretary when he went as ambassador to Sweden. Destouches often consulted Madame de Tibergeau concerning the plans of his different plays. She preserved all her quickness and vivacity of mind to the last. When she was more than eighty, being at Sillery with her brother and her young nieces and their husband, one evening, after she had retired, there was a long dispute as to whether it showed greater tenderness of feeling to write to one's lover or mistress in prose or verse. It was agreed to refer the decision of this important point to Madame de Tibergeau; and they went to awaken her for that purpose. She sent for her writing-desk, and wrote immediately:

"Non, ce n'est point en vers qu'un tendre amour s'exprime:
Il ne doit point rêver pour trouver ce qu'il dit,
Et tout arrangement de mesure et de rime,
Ote toujours au cœur ce qu'il donne à l'esprit."

She died at the age of eighty. She lived in the seventeenth century.

TIGHE, MARY,

WAS the daughter of the Rev. William Blachford, county of Wicklow, Ireland. Mary Blachford was born in Dublin, in 1774; and in 1793, when but nineteen years old, she married her cousin, Henry Tighe, of Woodstock, M. P. for Kilkenny, in the Irish parliament, and author of a "County History of Kilkenny." The family of Mrs. Tighe were consumptive, and she inherited the delicacy of organization which betokens a predisposition to this fatal disease. From early womanhood she suffered from depression of mind and languor of frame, which probably gave that "tone of melancholy music" to her celebrated poem, "which seemed the regretful expression of the consciousness of a not far-off death." Well she might feel sad when this thought was pressing on her heart; for she was most happily married, beloved and cherished by her husband, and surrounded with all the luxuries of life; dwelling

"The glorious bowers of earth among."

Yet she felt that all these loved and lovely blessings of earth were passing swiftly away. She died in 1810, aged thirty-five, after six years of protracted suffering. Her husband, though he survived her some years, never married again. She left no children; but the scenes of her bridal happiness,* and of her lamented death,† will bear the memory of her beauty, genius, and virtues, while her "Psyche" is read, and the names of those who have celebrated her merits in their songs are remembered. And she has left an enduring monument of her goodness, which gives lustre to her genius. From the profits of her poem, "Psyche," which ran through four editions during her life-time, she built an addition to the orphan asylum in Wicklow, thence called the "Psyche Ward."

An English critic thus testifies to the merits of her great work:—"Her poem of 'Psyche,' founded on the classic fable related by Apuleius, of the loves of 'Cupid and Psyche,' or the allegory of 'Love and the Soul,' is characterised by a graceful voluptuousness and brilliancy of colouring rarely excelled. It is in six cantos, and wants only a little more concentration of style and description to be one of the best poems of the period."‡

"None but Spenser himself," says William Howitt, in his popular work, 'Homes and Haunts of the most Eminent British Poets,' "has excelled Mrs. Tighe in the field of allegory." But the most full and free acknowledgment of her merits has been given by an eminent American scholar and divine, Rev. Dr. Bethune, who has recorded his opinion in his "British Female Poets." He says, "Perhaps Mrs. Tighe has been too diffuse;

but, taking her altogether, she is not equalled in classical elegance by any English female, and not excelled (in that particular) by any male English poet. She has the rare quality for a poetess of not sparing the pumice-stone, her verses being sedulously polished to the highest degree. She shows also her great taste in omitting obsolete words, the affectation of which so frequently disfigures imitations of the great master of English allegory. Her minor pieces are far inferior to her main work, though graceful, but pervaded by a painful, often religionless, despondency. It is of Mrs. Tighe that Moore writes in his touching song:

"I saw thy form in youthful prime."

We give a few selections from "Psyche."

THE MARRIAGE OF CUPID AND PSYCHE IN THE PALACE OF LOVE.

The sun looks glorious 'mid a sky serene,
And bids bright lustre sparkle o'er the tide;
The clear blue ocean at a distance seen,
Bounds the gay landscape on the western side,
While closing round it with majestic pride,
The lofty rocks 'mid citron groves arise;
"Sure some divinity must here reside,"
As tranced in some bright vision, Psyche cries,
And scarce believes the bliss, or trusts her charmed eyes.

When lo! a voice divinely sweet she hears,
From unseen lips proceeds the heavenly sound;
"Psyche approach, dismiss thy timid fears,
At length his bride thy longing spouse has found.
And bids for thee immortal joys abound;
For thee the palace rose at his command,
For thee his love a bridal banquet crowned;
He bids attendant nymphs around thee stand,
Prompt every wish to serve—a fond obedient band."

Increasing wonder filled her ravished soul,
For now the pompous portals opened wide,
There, pausing oft, with timid foot she stole
Through halls high-domed, enriched with sculptured pride,
While gay saloons appeared on either side,
In splendid vista opening to her sight;
And all with precious gems so beautified,
And furnished with such exquisite delight,
That scarce the beams of heaven emit such lustre bright.

The amethyst was there of violet hue,
And there the topaz shed its golden ray,
The chrysoberyl, and the sapphire blue
As the clear azure of a sunny day,
Or the mild eyes where amorous glances play,
The snow-white jasper, and the opal's flame,
The blushing ruby, and the agate gray,
And there the gem which bears his luckless name
Whose death, by Phæbus mourned, insured him death's fame.

There the green emerald, there cornelians glow,
And rich carbuncles pour eternal light,
With all that India and Peru can show,
Or Labrador can give so flaming bright
To the charmed mariner's half-dazzled sight:
The coral-paved baths with diamonds blaze;
And all that can the female heart delight
Of fair attire, the last recess displays,
And all that luxury can ask, her eye surveys.

Now through the hall melodious music stole,
And self-prepared the splendid banquet stands,
Self-poured the nectar sparkles in the bowl,
The lute and viol, touched by unseen hands,
Aid the soft voices of the choral bands;
O'er the full board a brighter lustre beams
Than Persia's monarch at his feast commands
For sweet refreshment all inviting seems
To taste celestial food, and pure ambrosial streams

But when meek eye hung out her dewy star,
And gently veiled with gradual hand the sky,
Lo! the bright folding doors retiring far,
Display to Psyche's captivated eye
All that voluptuous ease could e'er supply
To soothe the spirits in serene repose:
Beneath the velvet's purple canopy,
Divinely formed, a downy couch arose,
While alabaster lamps a milky light disclose

Once more she hears the hymeneal strain;
Far other voices now attune the lay;
The swelling sounds approach, awhile remain,
And then retiring, faint dissolved away;
The expiring lamps emit a feebler ray,
And soon in fragrant death extinguished lie:
Then virgin terrors Psyche's soul dismay,
When through the obscuring gloom she nought can spy,
But softly rustling sounds declare some being nigh.

Oh, you for whom I write! whose hearts can melt
At the soft thrilling voice whose power you prove,
You know what charm, unutterably felt,
Attends the unexpected voice of love:
Above the lyre, the lute's soft notes above,
With sweet enchantment to the soul it steals,
And bears it to Elysium's happy grove;
You best can tell the rapture Psyche feels,
When Love's ambrosial lip the vows of Hymen seals.

"'Tis he, 'tis my deliverer! deep imprest
Upon my heart those sounds I well recall,"
The blushing maid exclaimed, and on his breast
A tear of trembling ecstasy let fall.
But, ere the breezes of the morning call
Aurora from her purple, humid bed,
Psyche in vain explores the vacant hall;
Her tender lover from her arms is fled,
While sleep his downy wings had o'er her eyelids spread.

PSYCHE GAZES ON LOVE WHILE ASLEEP, AND IS BANISHED.

And now with softest whispers of delight,
Love welcomes Psyche still more fondly dear;
Not unobserved, though hid in deepest night,
The silent anguish of her secret fear.
He thinks that tenderness excites the tear,
By the late image of her parent's grief,
And half offended seeks in vain to cheer;
Yet, while he speaks, her sorrows feel relief,
Too soon more keen to sting from this suspension brief!

Allowed to settle on celestial eyes,
Soft sleep, exulting, now exerts his sway,
From Psyche's anxious pillow gladly flies
To veil those orbs, whose pure and lambent ray
The powers of heaven submissively obey.
Trembling and breathless then she softly rose,
And seized the lamp, where it obscurely lay,
With hand too rashly daring to disclose
The sacred veil which hung mysterious o'er her woes.

'Twice, as with agitated step she went,
The lamp expiring shone with doubtful gleam,
As though it warned her from her rash intent:
And twice she paused, and on its trembling beam
Gazed with suspended breath, while voices seem
With murmuring sound along the roof to sigh;
As one just waking from a troublous dream,
With palpitating heart and straining eye,
Still fixed with fear remains, still thinks the danger nigh.

Oh, daring Muse! wilt thou indeed essay
To paint the wonders which that lamp could show?
And canst thou hope in living words to say
The dazzling glories of that heavenly view?
Ah! well I ween, that if with pencil true
That splendid vision could be well expressed,
The fearful awe imprudent Psyche knew
Would seize with rapture every wondering breast,
When Love's all-potent charms divinely stood confessed.

All imperceptible to human touch,
His wings display celestial essence light;
The clear effulgence of the blaze is such,
The brilliant plumage shines so heavenly bright,
That mortal eyes turn dazzled from the sight;
A youth he seems in manhood's freshest years:
Round his fair neck, as clinging with delight,
Each golden curl resplendently appears,
Or shades his darker brow, which grace majestic wears:

Or o'er his guileless front the ringlets bright
Their rays of sunny lustre seem to throw,
That front than polished ivory more white!
His blooming cheeks with deeper blushes glow
Than roses scattered o'er a bed of snow:
While on his lips, distilled in balmy dews,
(Those lips divine, that even in silence know
The heart to touch), persuasion to infuse,
Still hangs a rosy charm that never vainly sues.

The friendly curtain of indulgent sleep
Disclosed not yet his eyes' resistless sway,
But from their silky veil there seemed to peep
Some brilliant glances with a softened ray,
Which o'er his features exquisitely play,
And all his polished limbs suffuse with light.
Thus through some narrow space the azure day,
Sudden its cheerful rays diffusing bright,
Wide darts its lucid beams, to gild the brow of night

His fatal arrows and celestial bow
Beside the couch were negligently thrown,
Nor needs the god his dazzling arms to show
His glorious birth; such beauty round him shone
As sure could spring from Beauty's self alone;
The bloom which glowed o'er all of soft desire
Could well proclaim him Beauty's cherished son:
And Beauty's self will oft those charms admire,
And steal his witching smile, his glance's living fire.

Speechless with awe, in transport strangely lost,
Long Psyche stood with fixed adoring eye;
Her limbs immovable, her senses tossed
Between amazement, fear, and ecstasy,
She hangs enamoured o'er the deity.
Till from her trembling hand extinguished falls
The fatal lamp—he starts—and suddenly
Tremendous thunders echo through the halls,
While ruin's hideous crash bursts o'er the affrighted walls,

Dread horror seizes on her sinking heart,
A mortal chillness shudders at her breast,
Her soul shrinks fainting from death's icy dart,
The groan scarce uttered dies but half expressed,
And down she sinks in deadly swoon oppressed:
But when at length, awaking from her trance,
The terrors of her fate stand all confessed,
In vain she casts around her timid glance;
The rudely frowning scenes her former joys enhance.

No traces of those joys, alas, remain!
A desert solitude alone appears;
No verdant shade relieves the sandy plain,
The wide-spread waste no gentle fountain cheers;
One barren face the dreary prospect wears;
Nought through the vast horizon meets her eye
To calm the dismal tumult of her fears;
No trace of human habitation nigh;
A sandy wild beneath, above a threatening sky.

JEALOUSY.

Her spirits die, she breathes polluted air,
And vaporous visions swim before her sight!
His magic skill the sorcerer bids her share,
And lo! as in a glass, she sees her knight
In bower remembered well, the bower of loose delight.

But oh! what words her feelings can impart!
Feelings to hateful envy near allied!
While on her knight her anxious glances dart:
His plumed helmet, lo! he lays aside;
His face with torturing agony she spied,

Yet cannot from the sight her eyes remove;
 No mortal knight she sees had aid supplied,
 No mortal knight in her defence had strove;
 'T was Love! 't was Love himself, her own adored Love.

Poured in soft dalliance at a lady's feet,
 In fondest rapture he appeared to lie,
 While her fair neck with inclination sweet,
 Bent o'er his graceful form her melting eye,
 Which his looked up to meet in ecstasy.
 Their words she heard not; words had ne'er exprest,
 What well her sickening fancy could supply,
 All that their silent eloquence confest,
 As breathed the sigh of fire from each impassioned breast.

While thus she gazed, her quivering lips turn pale;
 Contending passions rage within her breast,
 Nor ever had she known such bitter bale,
 Or felt by such fierce agony oppress.
 Oft had her gentle heart been sore distressed,
 But meekness ever has a lenient power
 From anguish half his keenest darts to wrest;
 Meekness for her had softened sorrow's hour,
 Those furious fiends subdued which boisterous souls devour.

For there are hearts that, like some sheltered lake,
 Ne'er swell with rage, nor foam with violence;
 Though its sweet placid calm the tempests shake,
 Yet will it ne'er with furious impotence
 Dash its rude waves against the rocky fence,
 Which nature placed the limits of its reign:
 Thrice blest! who feel the peace which flows from hence,
 Whom meek-eyed gentleness can thus restrain;
 Whate'er the storms of fate, with her let none complain!

LOVERS' QUARRELS.

Oh! fondly cherish then the lovely plant
 Which lenient heaven hath given thy pains to ease
 Its lustre shall thy summer hours enchant,
 And load with fragrance every prosperous breeze,
 And when rude winter shall thy roses seize,
 When nought through all thy bowers but thorns remain,
 This still with undeciduous charms shall please,
 Screen from the blast and shelter from the rain,
 And still with verdure cheer the desolated plain.

Through the hard season Love with plaintive note
 Like the kind red-breast tenderly shall sing,
 Which swells 'mid dreary snows its tuneful throat,
 Brushing the cold dews from its shivering wing,
 With cheerful promise of returning spring
 To the mute tenants of the leafless grove.
 Guard thy best treasure from the venomous sting
 Of baneful peevishness: oh! never prove
 How soon ill-temper's power can banish gentle Love!

Repentance may the storms of passion chase,
 And Love, who shrunk affrighted from the blast
 May hush his just complaints in soft embrace,
 And smiling wipe his tearful eye at last:
 Yet when the wind's rude violence is past,
 Look what a wreck the scattered fields display!
 See on the ground the withering blossoms cast!
 And hear sad Philomel with piteous lay
 Deplore the tempest's rage that swept her young away.

The tears capricious beauty loves to shed,
 The pouting lip, the sullen silent tongue,
 May wake the impassioned lover's tender dread,
 And touch the spring that clasps his soul so strong;
 But ah, beware! the gentle power too long
 Will not endure the frown of angry strife;
 He shuns contention, and the gloomy throng
 Who blast the joys of calm domestic life,
 And flies when discord shakes her brand with quarrels rife.

Oh! he will tell you that these quarrels bring
 The ruin, not renewal of his flame:
 If oft repeated, lo! on rapid wing
 He flies to hide his fair but tender frame;
 From violence, reproach, or peevish blame
 Irrevocably flies. Lament in vain!

Indifference comes the abandoned heart to claim,
 Asserts for ever her repulsive reign,
 Close followed by disgust and all her chilling train.

Indifference, dreaded power! what art shall save
 The good so cherished from thy grasping hand?
 How shall young Love escape the untimely grave
 Thy treacherous arts prepare? or how withstand
 The insidious foe, who with her leaden band
 Enchains the thoughtless, slumbering deity?
 Ah, never more to wake! or e'er expand
 His golden pinions to the breezy sky,
 Or open to the sun his dim and languid eye.

Who can describe the hopeless, silent pang
 With which the gentle heart first marks her sway?
 Eyes the sure progress of her icy fang
 Resistless, slowly fastening on her prey;
 See rapture's brilliant colours fade away,
 And all the glow of beaming sympathy;
 Anxious to watch the cold averted ray
 That speaks no more to the fond meeting eye.
 Enchanting tales of love, and tenderness, and joy.

Too faithful heart! thou never canst retrieve
 Thy withered hopes: conceal the cruel pain!
 O'er thy lost treasure still in silence grieve;
 But never to the unfeeling ear complain:
 From fruitless struggles dearly bought refrain!
 Submit at once—the bitter task resign,
 Nor watch and fan the expiring flame in vain:
 Patience, consoling maid, may yet be thine,
 Go seek her quiet cell, and hear her voice divine!

DELAY OF LOVE COMPENSATED.

Two tapers thus, with pure converging rays,
 In momentary flash their beams unite,
 Shedding but one inseparable blaze
 Of blended radiance and effulgence bright,
 Self-lost in mutual intermingling light;
 Thus, in her lover's circling arms embraced,
 The fainting Psyche's soul, by sudden flight,
 With his its subtlest essence interlaced;
 Oh! bliss too vast for thought! by words how poorly traced

Fond youth! whom Fate hath summoned to depart,
 And quit the object of thy tenderest love,
 Flow oft in absence shall thy pensive heart
 Count the sad hours which must in exile move,
 And still their irksome weariness reprove;
 Distance with cruel weight but loads thy chains
 With every step which bids thee farther rove,
 While thy reverted eye, with fruitless pain,
 Shall seek the trodden path its treasure to regain.

For thee what rapturous moments are prepared!
 For thee shall dawn the long-expected day!
 And he who ne'er thy tender woes hath shared,
 Hath never known the transport they shall pay,
 To wash the memory of those woes away:
 The bitter tears of absence thou must shed,
 To know the bliss which tears of joy convey,
 When the long hours of sad regret are fled,
 And in one dear embrace thy pains compensated!

Even from afar beheld, how eagerly
 With rapture thou shalt hail the loved abode!
 Perhaps already, with impatient eye,
 From the dear casement she hath marked thy road,
 And many a sigh for thy return bestowed:
 Even there she meets thy fond enamoured glance;
 Thy soul with grateful tenderness o'erflowed,
 Which firmly bore the hand of hard mischance,
 Faints in the stronger power of joy's o'erwhelming trance.

TINTORETTO, MARIETTA,

Was born in Venice, in 1560, and was instructed in the art of painting by her father, Giacomo.
 She showed an early genius for music, as well as for painting, and performed remarkably well on several instruments; but her predominant inclination to the art in which her father was so eminent, determined her to quit all other studies, and apply herself entirely to it. By the direction of Giacomo, she studied design, composition, and colouring; and drew after the antique, and finest models, till she had obtained a good taste and great readiness of hand. But though she was well qualified to make a considerable appearance in historical, she devoted her talents wholly to portrait-painting. Her father, who was accounted little inferior to Titian, if not his equal in that line, took great pains to direct her judgment and skill in that branch of art, till she gained an easy elegance in her manner of design, and an admirable tint of colour. Her pencil was free, her touch light and full of spirit; and she received deserved applause, not only for the beauty of her work, but for the exactness of resemblance. Most of the nobility of Venice sat to her; and she was solicited by the emperor Maximilian, Philip II., king of Spain, and by the archduke Ferdinand, to visit their courts; but such was her affectionate attachment to her father, that she declined these honours, and continued at Venice, where she married; but died young, in 1590.

TISHEM, CATHARINE,

SAID to have been an Englishwoman, married Gualtherus Gruter, a burgomaster of Antwerp, to whom she bore a son, James Gruter, celebrated for his erudition. Being persecuted, on account of her religion, by Margaret, duchess of Parma, she took refuge with her son in England, in 1565. She was one of the most learned women of the age; was well acquainted with the ancient and modern languages, and read Galen in Greek; which few physicians were then able to do. She was her son's chief instructor, and continued to superintend his studies during his residence in Cambridge. She was living in 1579.

TOLLET, ELIZABETH,

AN English lady, eminent for her knowledge of mathematics, history, French, Latin, and Italian. She published among other poems, "Susannah, or Innocence Preserved." Her talents were carefully cultivated by her father, under whose superintendence she received every advantage of education. Sir Isaac Newton was an intimate friend of hers, and an admirer of her genius. Several of her poems display profound thought. She also had great taste and skill in music and drawing. She was never married. She died February 1st, 1754, at the age of sixty.

TOMLINS, ELIZABETH S.,

AN ingenious English poetess, novelist, and miscellaneous writer, was born in London, in 1768. Her father was Thomas Tomlins, Esq., an eminent solicitor. She showed an early talent for poetry; but afterwards turning her attention to the composition of tales and novels, she published successively several works, the most popular of which was, "The Victim of Fancy," and a ballad, entitled "Connell and Mary." Miss Tomlins also translated the first history of Napoleon Bonaparte. She died at her residence at Chalden, in Surrey, 1826.

TONNA, CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH,

BETTER known simply as Charlotte Elizabeth, was the only daughter of the Rev. Mr. Browne, an Episcopal clergyman at Norwich, England. She was born in the latter part of the eighteenth century; when about six years old, intense application to study brought on a total blindness, which lasted for several months. When about ten years old, she was afflicted with an illness, which, together with the severe remedy (calomel) used by the physicians, brought on the total loss of her hearing, which she never recovered, though she retained the faculty of speech all her life. Her enthusiastic nature was shown when she was very young, in her ardent pursuit of knowledge and her intense love of poetry. When she was about eighteen, her father died. She married Dr. Phelan, a surgeon in the British army, whom she followed to Halifax, Nova Scotia. This union proved an unhappy one, and, after nearly three years' absence, Charlotte Elizabeth returned to England. She soon after went to Ireland, where her husband was then engaged in a law-suit. While there, she became very much interested in the Irish people, and formed a strong attachment to them which lasted all her life; and what was of greater importance to herself and the world, she also became deeply and truly religious.

In 1821, she went to the county of Kilkenny, where she resided for three years. While here, she became deeply interested in a little ignorant dumb boy, whom she took and educated, so that he proved a useful and pious member of society till his early death. In 1824, she returned to England, taking her little mute with her, and for the next year she resided at Clifton, near Bristol, where she formed an acquaintance with Mrs. Hannah More. Her only and dearly beloved brother returning at that time from Portugal, where he had been for some time as an officer in the British army, she accompanied him and his family to Sandhurst. In the course of the little more than two years that she passed with her brother, Charlotte Elizabeth wrote "The Rockite," "The System," "Izram," "Consistency," "Perseverance," "Allen McLeod," and more than thirty other little books and tracts, besides contributions to various periodicals.

In 1828, her brother, captain Murray Browne, was ordered to Ireland, where he was drowned while fishing. After five years' residence at Sandhurst, where Charlotte Elizabeth had been zealous and untiring in every good and benevolent work, she removed to London, where she continued her career of active usefulness, both with her pen and by her personal exertions. She established schools for the poorest of the poor, in the wretched district of St. Giles, and taught in them herself a great part of the day. In 1836 she removed to Blackheath; and in 1837 she again visited Ireland. In the same year she heard of the death of captain Phelan, and in 1841 she married L. H. I. Tonna. In 1841 she also undertook the editorship of the "Protestant Magazine," which she continued till 1844. Her last work of fiction was entitled,

"Judah's Lion." In 1842 she wrote "Principalities and Powers in Heavenly Places." "Conformity," and "Dangers and Duties," also appeared during this year. In 1843 she wrote "The Wrongs of Women," "The Church Visible in all Ages," and "The Perils of the Nation." In 1845 she wrote "Judea Capta;" and in the same year removed to London. Soon after she went to Ramsgate, for the benefit of the sea-air, but returned in a short time to London. She afterwards returned to Ramsgate, where she died of a cancer, July 12th, 1846. She wrote several other works, which are not enumerated here.

The life and writings of Charlotte Elizabeth afford remarkable proofs of the advantages of female education, and the usefulness of female talents. No other English writer has, within the last fifty years, done so much to promote the cause of evangelical piety in the English Church as this deaf woman. And her pen, reaching across the Atlantic, has instructed thousands of Christians of America in the better understanding, or doing, of their work of love.

It is impossible to estimate the good which has been, and will be, effected by the earnest, active, instructed mind of this woman, devoting herself and her genius to God and his cause on earth. Though she is dead her works live, and their potent and persuasive manner of setting forth the truths of the Bible, will maintain their popularity with those who value the Word of God above the traditions of men. This adherence to the doctrines of the Bible, and constant reference to the sacred book, as the source of all true wisdom, we consider the most striking and beautiful characteristic of her works. As these are extensively known, we choose our selections from her "Autobiography," which, as unveiling the secret sources of her uncommon energies, and her wonderful power to move the hearts of her readers, should be studied by all who are interested by her writings.

THE ADVANTAGES OF ORDER.

How very much do they err who consider the absence of order and method as implying greater liberty or removing a sense of restraint! Such freedom is galling to me; and in my eyes the want of punctuality is a want of honest principle; for however people may think themselves authorised to rob God and themselves of their own time, they can plead no right to lay a violent hand on the time and duties of their neighbour. I say it deliberately, that I have been defrauded of hundreds of pounds, and cruelly deprived of my necessary refreshment in exercise, in sleep, and even in seasonable food, through this disgraceful want of punctuality in others, more than through any cause whatsoever besides. It is also very irritating; for a person who would cheerfully bestow a piece of gold, does not like to be swindled out of a piece of copper; and many an hour have I been ungenerously wronged of, to the excitement of feelings in themselves far from right, when I would gladly have so arranged my work as to bestow upon the robbers thrice the time they made me wantonly sacrifice. To say, "I will come to you on such a day," leaving the person to expect you early, and then, after wasting her day in that uncomfortable, unsettled state of looking out for a guest, which precludes all application to present duties, and to come late in the evening—or to accept an invitation to dinner, and either break the engagement or throw the household into confusion by making it wait—to appoint a meeting, and fail of keeping your time—all these, and many other effects of this vile habit are exceedingly disgraceful, and wholly opposed to the scriptural rules laid down for the governance of our conduct one to another. I say nothing of the insult put upon the Most High, the daring presumption of breaking in upon the devotions of his worshippers, and involving them in the sin of abstractedness from the solemn work before them, by entering late into the house of prayer. Such persons may one day find they have a more serious account to render on the score of their contempt of punctuality than they seem willing to believe.

BROTHERS AND SISTERS.

How strong, how sweet, how sacred is the tie that binds an only sister to an only brother, when they have been permitted to grow up together, untrammelled by the heartless forms of fashion; unrivalled by alien claimants in their confiding affection; undivided in study, in sport, and in interest. Some object, that such union renders the boy too effeminate and the girl too masculine. In our case it did neither. He was the manliest, the hardiest, most decided, most intrepid character imaginable; but in manners sweet, gentle, and courteous, as they will be who are accustomed to look with protecting tenderness on an associate weaker than themselves. And as for me, though I must plead guilty to the charge of being more healthy, more active, and perhaps more energetic than young ladies are usually expected to be, still I never was considered unfeminine; and the only peculiarity resulting from this constant companionship with one of the superior sex, was to give me a high sense of that superiority, with a habit of deference to man's judgment, and submission to man's authority, which I am quite sure God intended the woman to yield. Every way has this fraternal tie been a rich blessing to me. The love that grew with us from our cradles never knew diminution from time or distance. Other ties were formed, but they did not supersede or weaken this. Death tore away all that was mortal and perishable, but this tie he could not sunder. As I loved him while he was on earth, so do I love him now that he is in heaven; and while I cherish in his boys the living likeness of what he was, my heart ever more yearns towards him where he is, anticipating the day when the Lord shall come, and bring that beloved one with him.

Parents are wrong to check as they do the outgoings of fraternal affection, by separating those whom God has especially joined as the offspring of one father and one mother. God has beautifully mingled them, by sending now a babe of one sex, now of the other, and suiting, as any careful observer may discern, their various characters to form a domestic whole. The parents interpose, packing the boys to some school where no softer influence exists to round off, as it were, the rugged points of the masculine disposition, and where they soon lose all the delicacy of feeling peculiar to a brother's regard, and learn to look on the female character in a light wholly subversive of the frankness, the purity, the generous care for which earth can yield no substitute, and the loss of which only transforms him who ought to be the tender preserver of woman into her heartless destroyer. The girls are either grouped at home, with the blessed privilege of a father's eye upon them, or sent away in a different direction from their brothers, exposed, through unnatural and unpalatable restraints, to evils not perhaps so great, but every whit as wantonly incurred as the others.

THE EVILS OF TIGHT LACING.

One morning, when I was about eight years old, my father came in, and found sundry preparations going on, the chief materials for which were buckram, whalebone, and other stiff articles: while the young lady was under measurement by the hands of a female friend.

"Pray what are you going to do to the child?"

"Going to fit her with a pair of stays."

"For what purpose?"

"To improve her figure; no young lady can grow up properly without them."

"I beg your pardon; young gentlemen grow up very well without them, and so may young ladies."

"Oh, you are mistaken. See what a stoop she has already; depend on it this girl will be both a dwarf and a cripple if we don't put her into stays."

"My child may be a cripple, ma'am, if such is God's will; but she shall be one of his making, not our's."

All remonstrance was vain; stays and every species of tight dress was strictly prohibited by the authority of one whose will was, as every man's ought to be, absolute in his own household. He also carefully watched against any evasion of the rule; a riband drawn tightly round my waist would have been cut without hesitation, by his determined hand; while the little girl of the anxious friend, whose operations he had interrupted, enjoyed all the advantages of that system from which I was preserved. She grew up a wand-like figure, graceful and interesting, and died of decline at nineteen, while I, though not able to compare shapes with a wasp or an hour-glass, yet passed muster very fairly among mere human forms, of God's moulding; and I have enjoyed to this hour a rare exemption from headaches, and other lady-like maladies, that appear the almost exclusive privilege of women in the higher classes.

This is no trivial matter, believe me; it has frequently been the subject of conversation with professional men of high attainment, and I never met with one among them who did not, on hearing that I never but once, and then only for a few hours, submitted to the restraint of these unnatural machines, refer to that exemption, as a means, the free respiration, circulation, and powers both of exertion and endurance with which the Lord has most mercifully gifted me. There can be no doubt that the hand which first encloses the waist of a girl in these cruel contrivances, supplying her with a fictitious support, where the hand of God has placed bones and muscles that ought to be brought into vigorous action, that hand lays the foundation of bitter sufferings; at the price of which, and probably of a premature death, the advantage must be purchased of rendering her figure as unlike as possible to all the models of female beauty, universally admitted to be such, because they are chiselled after nature itself. I have seen pictures, and I have read harrowing descriptions, of the murderous consequences of thus flying in the face of the Creator's skill, and presuming to mend—to improve—his perfect work; but my own experience is worth a thousand treatises and ten thousand illustrations, in bringing conviction to my mind.

EMPLOYMENT.

How is it that Christians so often complain they can find nothing to do for their Master? To hear some of them bemoaning their unprofitableness, we might conclude that the harvest indeed is small, and the labourers many. So many servants out of employ, is a bad sign; and to obviate this difficulty complained of, I purpose showing you two or three ways in which those who are so inclined may bestir themselves for the good of others. What a blessing were a working church! and by a church, I mean "the company of all faithful people," whomsoever and wheresoever they be.

In the village where I lived, there was a very good national-school, well attended: also a Sunday-school; and the poorer inhabitants generally were of a respectable class, with many of a higher grade—such as small tradesmen, and the families of those in subordinate offices about the Military College. I always took a great interest in the young; and as love usually produces love, there was no lack of affectionate feeling on their part. It occurred to me, as the Sunday was much devoted by most of them to idling about, that assembling such of them as wished it at my cottage, would afford an opportunity for scriptural instruction; and without anything resembling a school, or any regular proposal, I found a little party of six or seven children assembled in the afternoon, to hear a chapter read, answer a few questions upon it, and join in a short prayer. Making it as cheerful and unrestrained as possible, I found my little guests greatly pleased; and on the next Sabbath my party was doubled, solely through the favourable report spread by them. One had asked me, "Please, ma'am, may I bring my little sister?" and on the reply being given, "You may bring anybody and everybody you like," a general beating up for recruits followed. In three or four weeks, my assemblage amounted to sixty, only one half of whom could be crowded into the parlour of my small cottage. What was to be done? The work was rather arduous; but as I too had been complaining not long before of having little to do for the Lord, except with the pen, I resolved to brave a little extra labour. I desired the girls to come at four, the boys at six; and allowing an interval of half an hour between, we got through it very well. A long table was set across the room, from corner to corner; round this they were seated, each with a Bible, I being at the head of the table. I found this easy and sociable way of proceeding highly gratified the children: they never called, never thought it a school—they came bustling in with looks of great glee, particularly the boys, and greeted me with the affectionate freedom of young friends. A few words of introductory prayer were followed by the reading of one or more chapters, so that each had a verse or two; and then we talked over the portion of Scripture very closely, mutually questioning each other. Many of the girls were as old as sixteen or seventeen, beautiful creatures, and very well dressed; and what a privilege it was so to gather and so to arm them, in a place where, alas! innumerable snares beset their path! We concluded with a hymn; and long before the half-hour had expired that preceded the boys' entrance, they were clustering like bees at the gate, impatient for the joyous rush; and to set themselves round their dear table, with all that free confidence, without which I never could succeed in really commanding the attention of boys.

Our choice of chapters was peculiar; I found they wanted stirring subjects, and I gave them Gideon, Samson, Jonathan, Nehemiah, Boaz, Mordecai, Daniel—all the most manly characters of Old Testament history, with the rich gospel that lies wrapped in every page of that precious volume. Even in the New Testament, I found that individualizing, as much as possible, the speaker or the narrative, produced great effects. Our blessed Lord himself, John the Baptist, Paul—all were brought before them as vividly as possible; and I can assure those who try to teach boys as they would teach girls, that they are pursuing a wrong method. Mine have often coaxed an extra hour from me; and I never once saw them willing to go, during the fifteen months of our happy meetings. If the least symptom of unruliness appeared, I had only to tell them they were my guests; and I appealed to their feelings of manliness, whether a lady had not some claim to forbearance and respect. Nothing rights a boy of ten or twelve years like putting him on his manhood; and, really, my little lads became gentlemen in mind and manners, while, blessed be God! not a few became, I trust, wise unto salvation.

THE BIBLE.

Those who received the gospel by man's preaching, may doubt and cavil: I took it simply from the Bible, in the words that God's wisdom teacheth, and I thus argued:—"Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners: I am a sinner: I want to be saved: he will save me." There is no presumption in taking God at his word: not to do so, is very impertinent: I did it, and I was happy.

I confess myself very little under the influence of human teachers; my being thrown exclusively on the Bible for a scheme of doctrine, not only furnished me with a satisfactory one, but showed me so much of the inexhaustible treasures of wisdom and knowledge hid in Christ, and of the Holy Spirit's all-sufficiency to take of those things, and show them unto the humble, diligent, prayerful enquirer, that, in most cases of difficulty, instead of asking, "What say the commentators?" or "What says Mr. so and so?" I put the question, "What says the Lord?" For an answer, I search his written word; and for a commentary upon it. I study his visible works.

TORRELLA, IPPOLITA,

Was the wife of the celebrated Baldassane Castigliona, and was born at Reggio. Little is known of her life, except that she was a friend of the learned and virtuous Olimpia Morati. She has left some excellent Latin poems—the following translation of one by Moore, may serve as a specimen. It is addressed to her husband, absent at the court of Leo X.

They tell me thou'rt the favour'd guest
Of every gay and brilliant throng;
No wit like thine to point the jest,
No voice like thine to breathe the song—
And none could tell, so gay thou art,
That thou and I are far apart.

Alas, alas! how different flows,
With thee and me, the time away!
Not that I wish thee sad, heaven knows;
Still, if thou canst be light and gay,
I only know that without thee,
The sun himself is dark to me.

Do I thus haste to hall and bower,
Among the gay and fair to shine?
Or deck my hair with gem and flower,
To flatter other eyes than thine?
Ah, no! with me, love's smiles are past—
Thou had'st the first, thou had'st the last.

TOSINI, EUTROPIA,

Was born in Ferrara. The works of this authoress have survived but in part, as they were suppressed by the censors of the press, the subjects being deemed detrimental to the existing church. She was a nun of the Augustine order. Those poems which have been preserved, are in the collection of Bergalli, and are very beautiful.

TRANHAM, BETSEY,

CELEBRATED for her longevity, was a German by birth, and emigrated to the British colonies of North America in 1710, and died in Maury county Tennessee, in 1834, at the great age of 154.

TRIMMER, SARAH,

THE daughter of Mr. Kirby, who wrote on Perspective, was born at Ipswich, in England, in 1741. She prepared several useful works to promote the diffusion of education, at a period when for a woman to devote herself to such a task was uncommon and unpopular. Mrs. Hannah More was, it is true, in the field of literature; but she had gained powerful friends and supporters; nor did she aim so much at opening and clearing the sources of education for the young and ignorant, as in interesting and improving those who were already educated, or giving a moral direction to minds which could not be kept quiet in their ignorance. But Hannah More could not do everything which was then needed in literature for her sex and for children; she, probably, effected more good than any other writer of her time; and among her kind feelings and noble acts, was the regard she manifested for Mrs. Trimmer, and the efforts she used to serve this more humble, but useful literary contemporary, as the following letter proves:—

FROM MRS. TRIMMER TO MISS H. MORE.

May 10, 1787.

DEAR MADAM:—I feel myself inexpressibly obliged by your kind attention. It would appear like flattery to say how much I value your good opinion, but indeed it has long been the secret wish of my heart to obtain it. Your kind mention of my works to the bishop of Salisbury, I esteem a high obligation. I cannot but be proud of his approbation, though I must consider it as a proof of his regard to religion, which induces him to countenance any attempt, however feeble, to promote its interests. I could wish you, dear madam, to assure his lordship that his kind notice gives fresh animation to my zeal, and that I shall be highly gratified if he does me the honour of calling on me.

I have been favoured with a most friendly letter from Dr. Stonehouse, and a present of all his Tracts, &c. My best thanks are due to you, madam, for the obliging representations which have procured me the notice of this venerable gentleman, who would otherwise have overlooked me and my humble performances. I need not say that it is a great satisfaction to me to be regarded in so favourable a light by the good and the wise; for you have had such full experience of this kind of pleasure, that you can easily conceive what I enjoy from this circumstance.

When I see new editions of your publications advertised, I sincerely rejoice that there is so much taste remaining in the world. I hope your useful pen does not lie idle. Surely, you mean to favour the public with something more, shortly. I have long been in hopes of seeing another volume of "Sacred Dramas." Indeed, my dear madam, you should go on with them; they are so extremely engaging to young minds, and the sentiments so agreeable to Scripture, that they cannot fail of producing the happiest effects. You know that I read the sacred volume frequently; I may truly say, it is my highest entertainment to do so, and I can assure you that your "Sacred Dramas" excite in my mind the same kind of devotional feeling as the Scriptures themselves.

I avail myself of your kind permission to submit the beginning of my new edition of "Sacred History" to your inspection, and should esteem myself greatly obliged if you would favour me with your sincere opinion whether I have improved upon the former one or not. I send with it a specimen of the Psalms, which I mentioned when I had the pleasure of seeing you. I believe I must endeavour to do them in a more concise way for Sunday-schools; but at present the revision of "Sacred History" employs all my time.

In conformity with your friendly counsel, I wrote to my publisher about three weeks ago, desiring that he would settle my account in the course of this month, which he has promised to do without fail. At present, I am a mere bookseller's fag, but hope to have resolution enough to disentangle myself.

When, my dear madam, may I hope for the favour of your company? I long to introduce my family to you; they are impatient to see a lady whose character and writings they so highly esteem. I wish to show you the spinning-wheel it is really a most interesting sight to see twelve little girls so usefully and so agreeably employed. I shall experience so great a disappointment if I should chance to be out when you come, that I hope you will be able to fix the time. I cannot be satisfied with a mere call—surely you can spare me a day. I have a bed at your service, if you can be prevailed on to accept it.

Mrs. Trimmer died in 1810, aged sixty-nine.

U.

ULRICA ELEONORA,

Second daughter of Charles XI. of Sweden, was born 1688, and governed the kingdom during the absence of her brother, Charles XII.; after his death, she was proclaimed queen, 1719. The following year she resigned the crown to her husband, Frederic of Hesse-Cassel, with whom she shared the honours of royalty; but such was the ascendancy of the nobles, that they obliged their sovereigns to acknowledge their right to the throne as the unbiassed election of the people. Ulrica, by a wise administration, contributed to restore peace and prosperity to the nation, and was greatly beloved and respected. She died in 1741. Her mother, the wife of Charles XI., also bore the name of Ulrica, and died in consequence of the chagrin which her husband's brutal treatment had occasioned.

URSINS, ANNE MARIA DE LA TRE-MOUILLE, PRINCESS DES

MARRIED, in youth, Tallegan, prince de Chalais; and afterwards, the duke de Bracciano, of the house of Orsino: but as this celebrated woman has always borne the name in the French style, des Ursins, it would only lead to uncertainty to adopt any other. She became a widow, for the second time, in 1698; and the dukedom of Bracciano being sold to pay the debts of the family, she took the name of princess des Ursins. At the marriage of Philip V. of Spain, grandson of the French king, Louis XII., with the daughter of Victor Amadeus, of Savoy, the princess of Ursins was placed in the household of the new queen, by the influence of Madame de Maintenon, who flattered herself she could direct the affairs of Spain through a correspondence with one whom she considered her creature, and whose domineering and intriguing spirit, she felt assured, would soon obtain unbounded influence over Philip and his young wife. In the latter particular she was not mistaken. Philip V. was not without natural understanding, but his education had been worse than neglected. He had, in common with all the junior members of the royal family of France, been taught to distrust his own judgment; to lean upon the opinions of others; and never to fancy himself capable of directing the most trivial matter, without advice: besides, all knowledge of business, or of anything practical, had been discouraged, as almost treasonable, and his attention had been entirely wasted on attainments the most futile. This was a bad preparation for the head of a great nation, and left the young sovereign at the mercy of any artful flatterer who might be near his person. Such a one was the princess des Ursins. Supple, insinuating, entertaining, resolute, she soon became the real governor of the kingdom; neither the king nor queen could live without her advice and companionship. Inflated by her new elevation, her insolence and enterprise became unbounded. Not even the despatches of the French ambassador were sacred; she searched them, and had the effrontery to add marginal comments, and send them on. The extreme boldness of this measure, in a Frenchwoman, can only be estimated, when we consider how Louis idolized his dignity, and how unsparing he was to the smallest breach of etiquette. On this occasion he was justly incensed, and exacted the banishment of Madame des Ursins from the Spanish court. After a time, however, Madame de Maintenon, who missed her Spanish correspondence, persuaded Louis to pardon the offender. The king and queen of Spain evidently longed for her return, and when it took place, she obtained higher authority than ever. When she made a journey, she was escorted by a body of royal guards. No affair of importance was undertaken without her suggestion, and nothing signed without her permission. She hindered the ratification of a treaty of peace, which was important to the most considerable powers of Europe, merely to favour an underhanded intrigue to obtain some personal advantages.

The queen of Spain died in 1714. Madame des Ursins immediately conceived the idea of stepping into her place; and such was her power over the feeble mind of Philip, that her bold expectations might have been answered, but for the intervention of the king's confessor. Madame des Ursins finding her views defeated of placing herself on the throne, determined, as the next best thing, to choose a wife for Philip who should be entirely in her dependence; for this purpose, she thought of Elizabeth Farnese, niece of the duke of Parma. She imagined a young princess brought up without education, in the little court of Parma, would be merely a tool in her hands. For this purpose, she engaged in the negotiation the abbé Julio Alberoni, agent of the duke of Parma at Madrid. This man, afterwards the well-known cardinal Alberoni, saw, at a glance, to what this marriage might lead him. He spoke of the princess of Parma as exactly the insignificant person demanded; determining, at the same time, his own plan of conduct. Madame des Ursins, sure of making the king accept whomsoever she wished, caused the proposal to be made in form. After it had gone, and matters were drawing to a conclusion, she was told that Elizabeth, though without education, had good natural abilities, and a decided character. This alarmed the princess: she immediately despatched a courier to suspend everything. He arrived the very day that the nuptials were to be celebrated by proxy. The uncle and niece determined at once what to do. The courier was arrested: he was offered the choice of instant death, or a considerable sum to remain hidden till the next day, and then to appear as just arrived. Of course the courier did not hesitate as to his choice. The marriage was celebrated, and the princess of Parma set out for Spain. On arriving at Pampeluna she met Alberoni, and told him she was resolved to get rid of Madame des Ursins the moment she saw her. Alberoni bade her be wary, and tried to dissuade her from this bold step; but she had made her determination, and abided in it. The king, who knew nothing of Madame des Ursin's courier—whose errand had so deeply incensed the queen—advanced to meet her at Guadalaxara, twelve miles from Madrid. It is impossible to know what apologies Madame des Ursins had framed to appease the royal bride; probably she had been so long used to absolute domination, and to have her reasonings accepted without demur, that she thought to carry everything off by high-handed insolence: she seemed to think herself as much above attack as if she had been born to the throne. Whatever were her views, she constituted herself camerera-mayor of the new queen, as she had been of the former, and went to pay her court, to meet her at Quadraca, seven miles farther onward than Guadalaxara. As soon as she presented herself, the attendants retired, to permit a free conversation. Very soon, loud words were heard; the queen called her officers to arrest this impertinient woman, who behaved to her with disrespect. Madame des Ursins, thunderstruck, asked in what she had been disrespectful—what was her crime? The queen, without answering her, ordered the commandant of her guards to put this woman in a carriage with two trusty officers, to "out immediately, and to convey her beyond the frontiers of Spain. The commandant, scarcely believing what he heard, timidly represented that such an order could only come from the king.

"And has he not given you one," said the queen, haughtily, "to obey me in everything, without reserve, or dispute?"

He had such an order, though nobody but the queen was acquainted with it. Madame des Ursins was accordingly placed in a carriage, with a chambermaid and two guards. It was a cold night in December; she was allowed no preparations, nor time even to change her attire; but in the unseasonable trappings of a court dress, no covering for her arms or head, travelled the whole night. Too proud to complain, not a sigh, not a word escaped her—the revolution was too sudden for belief—nor did she cease indulging in hopes that the king would send after her, till she arrived at Chalais, where she was joined by her nephew, bearing a letter from Philip, in which he said he was very sorry for her, but that he could not resist the queen.

Under this blow, Madame des Ursins at least maintained her dignity, for she preserved an unaltered mien, and said nothing. Her conductors, who were accustomed to view her with fear and respect, were, though with different emotions, as much confounded as herself: they set her free at St. Jean-de-Luz. Finding that all was over for her in Spain, she attempted to make her court in France. Louis, who was at the close of his career, consented to see her, at the request of Madame de Maintenon, but received her coldly; and the rising sun, the future regent, having received from Spain ample testimony of the calumnies with which the dethroned favourite had asspersed him, obtained from the king an order that she should never appear in his presence, or in that of any of his family. Those who have been long accustomed to the life of a court, can only live in its atmosphere, at whatever expense of dignity. Madame des Ursins, unable to obtain the reality, caught at its image. She attached herself to the household of the pretender James III., where she did the honours, and regulated the etiquette. She died in 1722, having lived more than eighty years.

UTTMAN, BARBARA,

A GERMAN, the inventor of the method of weaving lace, in 1561. Nothing of her private history is recorded.

V.

VALLIÈRE, LOUISE FRANÇOISE, DUCHESSE DE LA

A FRENCH lady of an ancient family, and maid of honour to Henrietta of England, wife of the duke of Orleans, became the mistress of Louis XIV. of France, by whom she had a son and a daughter. She is thus described by contemporary writers. "She was a most lovely woman; the lucid whiteness of her skin, the roses on her cheeks, her languishing blue eyes, and her fine silver-coloured hair were altogether captivating." To her Choisy applies the following line:

"And grace still more charming than beauty."

"That La Vallière," (says Anquetil, in his Mémoires), "who was so engaging, so winning, so tender, and so much ashamed of her tenderness; who would have loved Louis for his own sake had he been but a private man; and who sacrificed to her affection for him her honour and conscientious scruples, with bitter regret." In a fit of mingled repentance and jealousy, she one day left the court, and retired to a convent at St. Cloud. The king, when informed of this, seized the first horse that came to hand, and rode hastily after her. He at length prevailed over her pious resolutions, and carried her back in triumph. "Adieu, sister," said she to the nun who opened the gate for her; "you shall soon see me again." From that time La Vallière, shunning the public gaze, lived in retirement; and consequently the king mingled but little with the circles of the court. In 1666, however, in obedience to her lover, and from tenderness to her children, she ventured once more to appear in public, and accepted the title and honours of duchess.

Some time after, the beauty, wit, and vivacity of Madame de Montespan, acquired for her such an ascendancy over the fickle monarch, that La Vallière was again driven by her jealousy to the convent; and she was again induced, by the tears and entreaties of Louis, to return. But, being convinced that his affections were irretrievably lost, she resolved finally to carry out her purpose, and took the vows in the presence of the whole court, under the name of sister Louise, of the order of Mercy, June 4th, 1675. She survived this sacrifice for thirty-six years, devoted to the performance of the austerities of a conventual life. It was proposed to elevate her to those dignities consistent with her retirement, but she declined, saying, "Alas! after having shown myself incapable to regulate my own conduct, shall I presume to direct that of others?"

Madame de Montespan went sometimes to see her. "Are you really as happy," asked she, at one time, "as people say?"

"I am not happy," replied the gentle Carmelite, "but content."

Her daughter, Mademoiselle de Blois, was married to the prince of Conti; her son, Louis of Bourbon, count of Vermandois, died at the siege of Courtrai, in 1683. "Alas, my God!" said La Vallière, when informed of her misfortune, "must I weep for his death, before my tears have expiated his birth?" She died in 1710, at the age of sixty-six.

She was much beloved for her meekness, gentleness, and beneficence. She is considered the author of "Réflexions sur la Miséricorde de Dieu."

VANHOMRIGH, ESTHER, or VANESSA,

THE name given in playfulness to Miss Vanhomrigh, by Dean Swift, and by which, through her connexion with him, she will descend to future times. Esther Vanhomrigh was the daughter of a widow lady in affluent circumstances, in whose house Swift was domesticated when he was in London. Of her personal charms little has been said; Swift has left them unsung, and other authorities have rather depreciated them. When Swift became intimate in the family, she was not twenty years old; lively and graceful, yet with a greater inclination for reading and mental cultivation, than is usually combined with a gay temper. This last attribute had fatal attractions for Swift, who, in intercourse with his female friends, had a marked pleasure in directing their studies, and acting as their literary mentor; a dangerous character for him who assumes it, when genius, docility, and gratitude are combined in a young and interesting pupil. Miss Vanhomrigh, in the meanwhile, sensible of the pleasure which Swift received from her society, and of the advantages of youth and fortune which she possessed, and ignorant of the peculiar circumstances which bound him to another, yielded to the admiration with which he had inspired her, and naturally looked forward to becoming his wife. Swift, however, according to that singular and mysterious line of conduct which he had laid down for himself, had no such intention of rewarding her affection; he affected blindness to her passion, and persisted in placing their intercourse upon the footing of friendship—the regard of pupil and teacher.

The imprudence—to use no stronger term—of continuing such an intercourse behind the specious veil of friendship, was soon exhibited. Miss Vanhomrigh, a woman of strong and impetuous feelings, rent asunder the veil, by intimating to Swift the state of her affections. In his celebrated poem, in which he relates this fact, he has expressed the "shame, disappointment, guilt, surprise," which he experienced at this crisis; but, instead of answering it with a candid avowal of his engagements with Stella—or other impediments, which prevented his accepting her hand and fortune—he answered the confession, at first in raillery, and afterwards by an offer of devoted and everlasting friendship, founded on the basis of virtuous esteem. Vanessa was neither contented nor silenced by the result of her declaration; but, almost to the close of her life, persisted in endeavouring, by entreaties and arguments, to extort a more lively return to her passion. The letters of Vanessa to Swift, after his return to Ireland, are filled with reproaches for his coldness and indifference, combined with the most open and passionate expressions of attachment; whilst his replies betray evident annoyance, and a settled purpose to repress these unreserved proofs of devotion. It is impossible to read these letters without feeling the profoundest pity for the woman who could so far lose sight of all self-respect as to continue such professions of regard to a man whose conduct to her was marked by such cruel and heartless selfishness. Her passion appears to have been so resistless as to have borne before it all sense of humiliation—every feeling of womanly pride.

The circumstances of Vanessa, by a singular coincidence, were not dissimilar to those of Stella. Her parents died, and she became mistress of her own fortune. Some of her estates being in Ireland, it became necessary to look after them; and she, induced, no doubt, as much by a desire to be near Swift as by this object, repaired to Ireland. This step placed Swift in a very unpleasant position; he dreaded having the rivals on the same ground, and was terrified at the vehemence of Vanessa's passion, which she was at no pains to conceal. She took possession of her small property at Cellbridge, and her letters to Swift became more and more embarrassing to him. The jealousy of Stella was now awakened by rumours that had reached her, and her health and spirits rapidly declined. The marriage of Swift and Stella, is still a disputed question; but the most recent researches upon the subject, serve to confirm this belief. It is asserted, that alarmed at the state of Stella's health, Swift employed his friend, the bishop of Clogher, to ask, what he dared not question himself, the cause of her melancholy. The answer was such as his conscience must have anticipated. Swift, to appease her, consented to go through the form of marriage with her, provided it was kept a secret from the world, and that they should continue to live apart as before; and they were married at the deanery, by the bishop of Clogher.

Notwithstanding the new obligation which he had imposed upon himself, to act with uprightness to Vanessa, Swift still continued to visit her as before; he professed to discourage her attachment, and even advised her to marry one of her suitors: but, by his warm interest in her and her affairs, secretly confirmed her feelings. Vanessa had now become aware of Swift's connexion with Stella, whose declining health alone had prevented her asking an explanation of Swift, as to the real state of his position with her. Impatience at length prevailed; and, in an evil hour, she wrote to Stella, requesting to be informed of the true state of the case. Stella, without hesitation, informed her of her marriage with the dean, and enclosing to him Vanessa's letter, she left her own abode in indignation, and retired to the house of a friend. Infuriated against the woman whose rashness had betrayed his treachery, Swift proceeded to the dwelling of Vanessa; he entered her presence, and casting upon her a withering glance of scorn and rage, threw the letter which she had written to Stella upon the table, and, without a word, rushed from the house, mounted his horse, and returned to Dublin.

Vanessa, horror-stricken, saw that her fate was sealed, and she sank under the weight of her despair. This cruel act of her lover, however, at last restored her to reason; she revoked a will made in his favour, and left it in charge to her executors, to publish all the correspondence between her and Swift; which, however, never appeared. Vanessa survived this fatal blow only fourteen months; she died in 1723. On hearing of her death, Swift, it is said, seized with remorse, and overcome with shame and self-reproach, withdrew himself from society, and for two months the place of his retreat was unknown. Thus two noble-hearted women, true and disinterested in their affection for him, were sacrificed to his selfish vanity and worldly wisdom.

VAN NESS, MARCIA,

Was the only daughter and heiress of David Burns, Esq., of Maryland. She was carefully educated, and was distinguished for her loveliness of person and her benevolence of character. In 1802, at the age of twenty, she married the Hon. John P. Van Ness, by whom she had only one child, a daughter. The sudden death of this daughter, soon after her marriage to Arthur Middleton, of South Carolina, was a sad affliction; but she resigned herself to the will of God, and devoted her energies to the cause of charity. She was the leader in those plans of benevolence, in the city of Washington, managed by ladies. A society was incorporated for establishing a Female Orphan Asylum, and Mrs. Van Ness gave the grounds necessary for the erection of such an edifice; and she was one of the most efficient agents in promoting the success of this charitable institution. United with lady-like manners, she displayed sound sense and great decision of character, and was honoured and respected by all classes of people who knew her deeds, and were admitted to her society.

Mrs. Van Ness died on the ninth of September, 1832, and the announcement of her decease cast a gloom over the whole city. The citizens, without distinction of political party or religious creeds, had a meeting to express their grief at her departure from her labours of charity and piety, and to fix on some method of bearing testimony to her worth. The citizens voted to procure a plate to be put on her coffin, with an inscription, detailing her virtues and expressing their gratitude. This was done; and the whole city may be said to have attended her funeral. This is the first instance on record in the United States, in which the people of a city or a town were called together to devise funeral honours for a woman.

VAROTARI, CHIARA,

Was born at Verona, in 1582. She was the daughter of the celebrated artist, Drio Varotari, by whom she was instructed in the art of painting. Her portraits were considered very excellent. She died at Verona, in 1639.

VARNHAGEN, RACHEL LEVIN, or ROBERT,

Was born at Berlin, in 1771. She was a Jewess by birth; and with no outward advantages to compensate for this grand mischance, she nevertheless raised herself by degrees—and without seeking it, but by sheer instinctive elasticity—to be a queen of thought and taste in the most intellectual country of Europe. Her early education seems to have been much neglected; but, with the strength and compass of soul with which she was gifted, this absence of external influence only caused the internal might to develop itself with more freshness and originality.

In the year 1815, after a long-continued struggle with herself, she felt constrained to make an open profession of Christianity; in the same year, she married K. A. Varnhagen von Ense, and their union was a pre-eminently happy one, although she was several years older than her husband. Her husband published her letters and biography after her death. As an authoress, she is only known through her letters; every one of which breathes a spirit of purity, devotion, and Christian humility, that makes them worthy of a place in every Christian library. She was acquainted and corresponded with most of the distinguished persons in Germany. Schleienmacher, Frederick Shlegel, Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, and Gentz, the famous historian, all knew and acknowledged the Berlin Jewess, as Pope Paul V. did Cardinal Perron:—"May God inspire that man with good thoughts, for whatsoever he says, we must do it!" She was noted for her great strength, vigour, and activity of mind; for her ardent love of truth, and her strong, resolute, and vehement contempt for falsehood or shams of all kinds; and also for the truly womanly grace and kindness which marked all her actions. Amid the horrors of war in Berlin in 1813, and the greater horrors of pestilence in 1831, she moved about like a beneficent Valkyrie, and exclaimed triumphantly, "My whole day is a feast of doing good!" She died in 1833, at Berlin.

VERDIER, MADAME DE,

Was a French poetess from Uzès. Her poetical epistle entitled "The Bondage of Love," was crowned by the Academy at Toulouse, in 1769. She wrote several other poems which were highly praised.

VERELST, MADEMOISELLE,

A FLEMISH historical and portrait painter, was born in 1630. She was niece of Simon Verelst, and was taught painting by her father, Herman Verelst, but afterwards lived entirely with her uncle, who gave her the best instructions in his power. She was a fine performer on several musical instruments, and spoke and wrote the German, Italian, Latin, English, and French languages with fluency and elegance. She painted with genius and spirit, and was admired for the delicacy of her touch, and the neat manner of her finishing. The time of her decease is not recorded.

VERNEUIL, CATHARINE HENRIETTA DE
BALZAC, MARQUISE DE,

A FRENCH lady, who so captivated Henry IV. that he promised to marry her. His subsequent marriage with Maria de Medicis, so offended his haughty mistress, that she conspired with the Spanish court to dethrone him, and place the crown of France on the head of the son she had borne to Henry. Their intrigues were discovered, and her accomplices punished. She died in exile, 1633, aged fifty-four.

VERRUE, COUNTESS OF,

Was one of the most accomplished and beautiful women of Parisian society. She belonged to the proud and ancient family of Luynes, and was early married to the count de Verrue, who took her to Turin. Her great beauty attracted the attention of Amadée Victor, duke of Savoy and king of Sicily. She long resisted his addresses, with a constancy and virtue rare for the age in which she lived. The persecution of her husband's relatives, whose protection she implored in vain, and the temptation of ruling over a court where her virtue only excited ridicule, at length proved stronger than her scruples: she became the mistress of the prince. His love was very ardent and sincere; it only increased with years; and it ended by heartily wearying Madame de Verrue. Her children by her lover, the power she exercised at his court, the wealth she enjoyed, could not fix her affections. She eloped with her brother. A great quantity of valuable medals disappeared with her from the Duke's palace. She led an elegant and luxurious life in Paris. She was rich and prodigal, and spent upwards of a hundred thousand livres a year on curiosities and rare books. Her library was, in plays and novels, the most complete a private person had then possessed. She loved company; and Voltaire admired and flattered her. It is said that she never spoke of her former lover, or of her children, or expressed the least regret for the step she had taken. She was generally considered attractive and agreeable, and was, probably, as much so as a heartless woman without faith, love, or purity can ever be.

VIEN, MADAME,

WIFE and pupil of the celebrated French artist, Joseph Marie Vien, was a distinguished painter of objects of still-life. She depicted birds, shells, and flowers, with exquisite skill. Her domestic virtues equalled her talents. She died in 1805, at the age of seventy-seven.

VIGNE, ANNE DE LA,

Was born in 1634, at Vernon, in Normandy. She was the daughter of one of the king's physicians, and was one of the most beautiful and intellectual persons of her time. Her extreme devotion to study brought on a disease of which she died, at Paris, in 1684. She belonged to the academy of the Ricovrati at Padua; and was the intimate friend of Mademoiselle de Scuderi and Marie Dapré. She was distinguished for her poetical talents, and her scientific attainments. Her ode, entitled "Monseigneur le Dauphin au Roi," obtained great reputation.

VIGRI, CATERINA,

Was born at Bologna, in 1413, and was so highly esteemed for her piety, as well as her talents, that the name of Santa Caterina di Bologna was conferred upon her. She seldom painted in oil, but was principally employed in illuminating missals, and executing religious subjects in miniature. She died in 1463.

VILLEBRUNE, MARY DE,

Was a portrait-painter, of whom but little is known. She exhibited at the Royal Academy, in London, from 1770 to 1782. She is supposed to have married a man named De Noblet.

VILLEDIEU, MARIE CATHARINE
HORTENSE DE,

DAUGHTER of the provost of Alençon in France, was born there, in 1632. Her second husband was M. de Chatte, and her third, M. des Jardins. This lady wrote various works, both in prose and verse; her fugitive poems are most highly esteemed. She also wrote a number of romances. She died in 1683. The following is a specimen of her poetry:

MADRIGAL.

Quand on voit deux amants d'esprit assez vulgaire
Trouver dans leurs discours de quoi se satisfaire,
Et se parler incessamment,
Les beaux esprits, de langue bien disante,
Disent avec étonnement:
Que peut dire cette innocente?
Et que répond ce sot amant?
Taisez-vous, beaux esprits, votre erreur est extrême;
Ils se disent cent fois tour à tour: Je vous aime.
En amour, c'est parler assez élégamment.

VILLENEUVE, GABRIELLE SUSANNE
BARBUT DE,

A CELEBRATED novel-writer, was the widow of J. B. Gaalon de Villeneuve, lieutenant-colonel of infantry in the service of France. She began to write late in life, and produced about twelve volumes. She died at Paris, December 29th, 1755. None of her works are now read; the fashion of novels changes with each generation; and works of fiction which only illustrate the manners and sentiments of the writer's own times can hardly be expected to be read but by contemporaries.

VIOT, MARIE ANNE HENRIETTE,

A NATIVE of Dresden, Prussia, was distinguished for her wit, learning, and the versatility of her genius. Her father, M. de l'Estang, removed to France when she was a child. At the age of twelve she married d'Antremont, who left her a widow in four years. She then married de Bourdic, of Nismes. After his decease she again married; her third husband was M. Viot, commissary of the Intérieures at Barcelona. Madame Viot was honoured with a seat in the academy of Nismes, and read, on her admission, an eulogy on her favourite, Montaigne. She wrote an "Ode to Silence," "The Summer," "Fauvette," a romance, "La Foret de Brama," an opera, &c. This excellent and accomplished lady died near Bagnols, in 1802, aged fifty-six.

W.

WALTERS, HENRIETTA,

AN artist, was born at Amsterdam, in 1692. She was first instructed by her father, Theodore Van Pee, but afterwards by the best artists in the city. After copying some of the works of Christopher Le Blond, she became desirous of having him for an instructor, which favour, with great difficulty, she obtained; his compliance being almost entirely owing to the extraordinary talents he discovered in her. In the manner of Le Blond, she painted portraits in small; and copied a portrait and a St. Sebastian, after Vandyck, which exceedingly advanced her reputation, as her copies resembled the originals to an astonishing degree.

She gradually rose to such a reputation, that Peter the Great of Russia offered her a large pension, to engage her in his service at St. Petersburg; but no inducements were sufficient to make her leave her own country, where she was so highly esteemed. The czar sat to her for his picture, but he had not patience to have it finished, as she usually required twenty sittings, of two hours each, for every portrait. She was afterwards honoured with a visit from the king of Prussia, who solicited her to reside at his court; but his generous proposal was also rejected. She died at Amsterdam, in 1741, aged forty-nine years.

WAKEFIELD, PRISCILLA,

AN Englishwoman, well known for the useful and ingenious works she has written for the instruction of youth. She is said to be the original promoter of banks for the savings of the poor, which are now so general. Some of her works are, "Juvenile Improvement," "Leisure Hours," "An Introduction to Botany," "Mental Improvement," "Reflections on the Present Condition of the Female Sex, with Hints for its Improvement," "A Familiar Tour through the British Empire," "Excursions in North America," "Sketches of Human Manners," "Variety," "Perambulations in London," "Instinct Displayed," "The Traveller in Africa," "Introduction to the Knowledge of Insects," and "The Traveller in Asia." Mrs. Wakefield was one of those useful writers, whose talents, devoted to the cause of education, have been a moral blessing to the youth of England.

Her first work was published in 1795, her last in 1817; thus, for more than twenty years, she kept her post in the cause of improvement.

WARE, KATHARINE AUGUSTA,

DAUGHTER OF Dr. Rhodes, of Quincy, Massachusetts, was born in 1797. In 1819, she married Charles A. Ware, of the navy. She is principally known as a poetical contributor to periodicals. She also edited, for a year or two, a magazine called "The Bower of Taste," published at Boston. She went to Europe, in 1839, and died at Paris, in 1843. A collection of her poems was published in London, not long before her death. The two following, if not her most finished poems, are the most pleasing, from their tender and true womanly sentiment.

A NEW-YEAR WISH.

TO A CHILD AGED FIVE YEARS.

Dear one, while bending o'er thy couch of rest,
I've looked on thee as thou wert calmly sleeping.
And wished—Oh, couldst thou ever be as blest

As now, when haply all thy cause of weeping
Is for a truant bird, or faded rose!

Though these light griefs call forth the ready tear,
They cast no shadow o'er thy soft repose—
No trace of care or sorrow lingers here.

With rosy cheek upon the pillow prest,

To me thou seem'st a cherub pure and fair,
With thy sweet smile and gently heaving breast,
And the bright ringlets of thy clustering hair.
What shall I wish thee, little one? Smile on Through childhood's morn—through life's gay spring
For oh, too soon will those bright hours be gone!—
In youth time flies upon a silken wing.

May thy young mind, beneath the bland control

Of education, lasting worth acquire;
May Virtue stamp her signet on thy soul,
Direct thy steps, and every thought inspire!
Thy parents' earliest hope—be it their care
To guide thee through youth's path of shade and flowers,
And teach thee to avoid false pleasure's snare—
Be thine, to smile upon their evening hours.

LOSS OF THE FIRST-BORN.

I saw a pale young mother bending o'er
Her first-born hope. Its soft blue eyes were closed,
Not in the balmy dream of downy rest.
In Death's embrace the shrouded babe reposed;
It slept the dreamless sleep that wakes no more.
A low sigh struggled in her heaving breast,
But yet she wept not: hers was the deep grief
The heart, in its dark desolation, feels;
Which breathes not in impassioned accents wild,
But slowly the warm pulse of life congeals;
A grief which from the world seeks no relief—
A mother's sorrow o'er her first-born child.
She gazed upon it with a steadfast eye,
Which seemed to say, "Oh, would I were with thee!"
As if her every earthly hope were fled
With that departed cherub. Even he—
Her young heart's choice, who breathed a father's sigh
Of bitter anguish o'er the unconscious dead
Felt not, while weeping by its funeral bier,
One pang so deep as hers, who shed no tear.

WARNE, ELIZABETH,

ONE of the martyrs to religious opinions, during the reign of Mary of England, was burned at Stratford-le-Bow, August, 1555. Her husband had been executed before.

WARREN, MERCY,

ONE of the first American female poets, and a historian who still holds a high place among the American writers of her day, was born in Barnstable, in the old colony of Plymouth, in 1728. She was the daughter of Colonel James Otis, and received her instruction principally from the Rev.

Jonathan Russel, the clergyman of the village, as schools were then almost unknown. About 1754, Miss Otis married James Warren, a merchant of Plymouth, who encouraged her in literary pursuits. She was one of the first female poets of America, and many of her poems, especially her satires, received great applause, and were said to have had great influence. She entered warmly into the contest between England and America, and corresponded with Samuel and John Adams, Jefferson, Dickinson, Gerry, Knox, and many other leading men of the time; these often consulted her, and acknowledged the soundness of her judgment, on many of the important events before and after the war. Mrs. Warren often changed her residence during the war, but always retained her habits of hospitality. She wrote two tragedies, "The Sack of Rome," and "The Ladies of Castile," many of her other poems, and a satire called "The Group," to alleviate the pangs of suspense, while her friends were actively engaged, during the revolution. She was particularly celebrated for her knowledge of history; and Rochefoucauld, in his "Travels in the United States," speaks of her extensive reading. Mrs. Warren died October 19th, 1814, in the eighty-seventh year of her age. Her writings were published in 1805, under the title of "The History of the Rise, Progress, and Termination of the American Revolution, interspersed with Biographical, Political, and Moral Observations," in three volumes. This work she dedicated to Washington; and it is now considered valuable as a record of the events and feelings of those revolutionary times. Mr. Griswold, in his "Female Poets of America," makes these just remarks on his selections from her writings: "Her tragedies were written for amusement, in the solitary hours in which her friends were abroad, and they are as deeply imbued with the general spirit as if their characters were acting in the daily experience of the country. They have little dramatic or poetic merit, but many passages are smoothly, and some vigorously written—as the following, from 'the Sack of Rome.' "

SUSPICION.

I think some latent mischief lies concealed
Beneath the vizard of a fair pretence;
My heart ill brooked the errand of the day,
Yet I obeyed—though a strange horror seized
My gloomy mind, and shook my frame
As if the moment murdered all my joys

REMORSE.

The bird of death that nightly pecks the roof,
Or shrieks beside the caverns of the dead;
Or paler spectres that infest the tombs
Of guilt and darkness, horror or despair,
Are far more welcome to a wretch like me
Than yon bright rays that deck the opening morn.

FORTUNE.

The wheel of fortune, rapid in its flight,
Lags not for man, when on its swift routine;
Nor does the goddess ponder unresolved;
She wafts at once, and on her lofty car
Lifts up her puppet—mounts him to the skies,
Or from the pinnacle hurls headlong down
The steep abyss of disappointed hope.

ARDELIA.

She was, for innocence and truth,
For elegance, true dignity, and grace,
The fairest sample of that ancient worth
Th' illustrious matrons boasted to the world
When Rome was famed for every glorious deed.

DECLINE OF PUBLIC VIRTUE.

That dignity the gods themselves inspired,
When Rome, inflamed with patriotic zeal,
Long taught the world to tremble and admire,
Lies faint and languid in the wane of fame,
And must expire in Luxury's lewd lap
If not supported by some vigorous arm.

From "The Ladies of Castile."

CIVIL WAR.

'Mongst all the ills that hover o'er mankind,
Unfeigned, or fabled in the poet's page,
The blackest scrawl the sister furies hold,
For red-eyed Wrath or Malice to fill up,
Is incomplete to sum up human woe,
Till Civil Discord, still a darker fiend,
Stalks forth unmasked from his infernal den,
With mad Aleeto's torch in his right hand.

THE COURAGE OF VIRTUE.

A soul, inspired by freedom's genial warmth,
Expands, grows firm, and by resistance, strong:
The most successful prince that offers life,
And bids me live upon ignoble terms,
Shall learn from me that virtue seldom fears.
Death kindly opens a thousand friendly gates,
And Freedom waits to guard her votaries through.

WARWICK, MARY, COUNTESS OF,

Was the thirteenth of the fifteen children of the great earl of Cork, founder of the illustrious house of Boyle. Mary married Charles, earl of Warwick, whom she survived five years. From her liberality to the poor, her husband was said to have left his estate to charitable uses. The fame of her hospitality and benevolence, advanced the rent of the houses in her neighbourhood, where she was the common arbitress of all differences. Her awards, by the judgment and sagacity they displayed, prevented many law-suits. She died April, 1678.

WASHINGTON, MRS. MARY

MOTHER of George Washington, the hero of the American revolutionary war, and the first president of the United States, claims the noblest distinction a woman should covet or can gain, that of training her gifted son in the way he should go, and inspiring him by her example to make the way of goodness his path to glory.*

"Mrs. Washington was descended from the very respectable family of Ball, who settled as English colonists, on the banks of the Potomac. Bred in those domestic and independent habits, which graced the Virginia matrons in the old days of Virginia, this lady, by the death of her husband, became involved in the cares of a young family, at a period when those cares seem more especially to claim the aid and control of the stronger sex. It was left for this eminent woman, by a method the most rare, by an education and discipline the most peculiar and imposing, to form in the youth-time of her son those great and essential qualities which gave lustre to the glories of his after-life. If the school savoured the more of the Spartan than the Persian character, it was a fitter school to form a hero, destined to be the ornament of the age in which he flourished, and a standard of excellence for ages yet to come.

It was remarked by the ancients, that the mother always gave the tone to the character of the child; and we may be permitted to say, that since the days of old renown, a mother has not lived better fitted to give the tone and character of real greatness to her child, than she whose remarkable life and actions this reminiscence will endeavour to illustrate.

At the time of his father's death, George Washington was only ten years of age. He has been heard to say that he knew little of his father, except the remembrance of his person, and of his parental fondness. To his mother's forming care he himself ascribed the origin of his fortunes and his fame.

The home of Mrs. Washington, of which she was always mistress, was a pattern of order. There the levity and indulgence common to youth was tempered by a deference and well-regulated restraint, which, while it neither suppressed nor condemned any rational enjoyment usual in the spring-time of life, prescribed those enjoyments within the bounds of moderation and propriety. Thus the chief was taught the duty of obedience, which prepared him to command. Still the mother held in reserve an authority which never departed from her, even when her son had become the most illustrious of men. It seemed to say, "I am your mother, the being who gave you life, the guide who directed your steps when they needed a guardian; my maternal affection drew forth your love; my authority constrained your spirit; whatever may be your success or your renown, next to your God, your reverence is due to me." Nor did the chief dissent from these truths; but to the last moments of his venerable parent, yielded to her will the most dutiful and implicit obedience, and felt for her person and character the highest respect, and the most enthusiastic attachment.

Such were the domestic influences under which the mind of Washington was formed; and that he not only profited by, but fully appreciated their excellence and the character of his mother, his behaviour towards her at all times testified. Upon his appointment to the command-in-chief of the American armies, previously to his joining the forces at Cambridge, he removed his mother from her country residence to the village of Fredericksburg, a situation remote from danger, and contiguous to her friends and relatives.

It was there the matron remained during nearly the whole of the trying period of the revolution. Directly in the way of the news, as it passed from north to south, one courier would bring intelligence of success to our arms; another, "swiftly coursing at his heels," the saddening reverse of disaster and defeat. While thus ebb'd and flow'd the fortunes of our cause, the mother, trusting to the wisdom and protection of divine providence, preserved the even tenour of her life; affording an example to those matrons whose sons were alike engaged in the arduous contest; and showing that unavailing anxieties, however belonging to nature, were unworthy of mothers, whose sons were combating for the inestimable rights of man, and the freedom and happiness of the world.

When the comforting and glorious intelligence arrived of the passage of the Delaware, (December, '76,) an event which restored our hopes from the very brink of despair, a number of her friends waited upon the mother with congratulations. She received them with calmness, observed that it was most pleasurable news, and that George appeared to have deserved well of his country for such signal services; and continued, in reply to the gratulating patriots, (most of whom held letters in their hands, from which they read extracts,) "But, my good sirs, here is too much flattery—still George will not forget the lessons I early taught him—he will not forget himself, though he is the subject of so much praise."

During the war, and indeed during her useful life, up to the advanced age of eighty-two, until within three years of her death, (when an afflictive disease prevented exertion,) the mother set a most valuable example in the management of her domestic concerns, carrying her own keys, bustling in her household affairs, providing for her family, and living and moving in all the pride of independence. She was not actuated by that ambition for show which pervades lesser minds; and the peculiar plainness and dignity of her manners became in nowise altered, when the sun of glory arose upon her house. There are some of the aged inhabitants of Fredericksburg, who well remember the matron, as seated in an old-fashioned open chaise, she was in the habit of visiting, almost daily, her little farm in the vicinity of the town. When there, she would ride about her fields, giving her orders, and seeing that they were obeyed.

Her great industry, with the well-regulated economy of all her concerns, enabled the matron to dispense considerable charities to the poor, although her own circumstances were always far from rich. All manner of domestic economies, so useful in those times of privation and trouble, met her zealous attention; while everything about her household bore marks of her care and management, and very many things the impress of her own hands. In a very humble dwelling, and suffering under an excruciating disease, (cancer of the breast,) thus lived this mother of the first of men, preserving unchanged her peculiar nobleness and independence of character.

She was always pious, but in her latter days her devotions were performed in private. She was in the habit of repairing every day to a secluded spot, formed by rocks and trees, near her dwelling, where, abstracted from the world and worldly things, she communed with her Creator, in humiliation and prayer.

After an absence of nearly seven years, it was at length, on the return of the combined armies from Yorktown, permitted to the mother again to see and embrace her illustrious son. So soon as he had dismounted, in the midst of a numerous and brilliant suite, he sent to apprise her of his arrival, and to know when it would be her pleasure to receive him. And now mark the force of early education and habits, and the superiority of the Spartan over the Persian school, in this interview of the great Washington with his admirable parent and instructor. No pageantry of war proclaimed his coming, no trumpets sounded, no banners waved. Alone and on foot, the marshal of France, the general-in-chief of the combined armies of France and America, the deliverer of his country, the hero of the age, repaired to pay his humble duty to her whom he venerated as the author of his being, the founder of his fortune and his fame. For full well he knew that the matron would not be moved by all the pride that glory ever gave, nor by all the "pomp and circumstance" of power.

The lady was alone, her aged hands employed in the works of domestic industry, when the good news was announced; and it was further told that the victor chief was in waiting at the threshold. She welcomed him with a warm embrace, and by the well-remembered and endearing name of his childhood; enquiring as to his health, she remarked the lines which mighty cares and many trials had made on his manly countenance, spoke much of old times and old friends, but of his glory—not one word!

Meantime, in the village of Fredericksburg, all was joy and revelry; the town was crowded with the officers of the French and American armies, and with gentlemen from all the country around who hastened to welcome the conquerors of Cornwallis. The citizens made arrangements for a splendid ball, to which the mother of Washington was specially invited. She observed, that although her dancing days were pretty well over, she should feel happy in contributing to the general festivity, and consented to attend.

The foreign officers were anxious to see the mother of their chief. They had heard indistinct rumours respecting her remarkable life and character; but, forming their judgments from European examples, they were prepared to expect in the mother that glare and show which would have been attached to the parents of the great in the old world. How were they surprised, when the matron, leaning on the arm of her son, entered the room! She was arrayed in the very plain, yet becoming garb worn by the Virginia lady of the olden time. Her address, always dignified and imposing, was courteous, though reserved. She received the complimentary attentions, which were profusely paid her, without evincing the slightest elevation; and, at an early hour, wishing the company much enjoyment of their pleasures, observing that it was time for old people to be at home, retired.

The foreign officers were amazed to behold one whom so many causes contributed to elevate, preserving the even tenour of her life, while such a blaze of glory shone upon her name and offspring. The European world furnished no examples of such magnanimity. Names of ancient lore were heard to escape from their lips; and they observed, that, "if such were the matrons of America, it was not wonderful the sons were illustrious."

It was on this festive occasion that general Washington danced a minuet with Mrs. Willis. It closed his dancing days. The minuet was much in vogue at that period, and was peculiarly calculated for the display of the splendid figure of the chief, and his natural grace and elegance of air and manner. The gallant Frenchmen who were present, of which fine people it may be said that dancing forms one of the elements of their existence, so much admired the American performance, as to admit that a Parisian education could not have improved it. As the evening advanced, the commander-in-chief, yielding to the gaiety of the scene, went down some dozen couple in the contradance, with great spirit and satisfaction.

The marquis de Lafayette repaired to Fredericksburg, previous to his departure for Europe, in the fall of 1784, to pay his parting respects to the mother, and to ask her blessing.

Conducted by one of her grandsons, he approached the house, when the young gentleman observed, "There, sir, is my grandmother." Lafayette beheld, working in the garden, clad in domestic-made clothes, and her grey head covered in a plain straw hat, the mother of "his hero!" The lady saluted him kindly, observing—"Ah, marquis! you see an old woman—but come, I can make you welcome to my poor dwelling, without the parade of changing my dress."

The marquis spoke of the happy effects of the revolution, and the goodly prospect which opened upon independent America; stated his speedy departure for his native land; paid the tribute of his heart, his love and admiration of her illustrious son; and concluded by asking her blessing. She blessed him; and to the encomiums which he had lavished upon his hero and paternal chief, the matron replied in these words: "I am not surprised at what George has done, for he was always a very good boy."

In her person, Mrs. Washington was of the middle size, and finely formed; her features pleasing, yet strongly marked. It is not the happiness of the writer to remember her, having only seen her with infant eyes. The sister of the chief he perfectly well remembers. She was a most majestic woman, and so strikingly like the brother, that it was a matter of frolic to throw a cloak around her and place a military hat upon her head; and, such was the perfect resemblance, that, had she appeared on her brother's steed, battalions would have presented arms, and senates risen to do homage to the chief.

In her latter days, the mother often spoke of her own good boy; of the merits of his early life; of his love and dutifulness to herself; but of the deliverer of his country, the chief magistrate of the great republic, she never spoke. Call you this insensibility? or want of ambition? Oh, no! her ambition had been gratified to overflowing. She had taught him to be good; that he became great when the opportunity presented, was a consequence, not a cause.

Mrs. Washington died, at the age of eighty-seven, soon after the decease of her illustrious son. She was buried at Fredericksburg, and for many years her grave remained without a memorial-stone. But the heart of the nation acknowledged her worth, and the noble spirit of her native Virginia was at length aroused to the sacred duty of perpetuating its respect for the merits of its most worthy daughter. On the seventh of May, 1833, at Fredericksburg, the corner-stone of her monument was laid by Andrew Jackson, then the President of the United States. The public officers of the general government, and an immense concourse of people from every section of the country, crowded to witness the imposing ceremonies. Mr. Barrett, one of the Monument Committee of Virginia, delivered the eulogy on Mrs. Washington, and then addressed the President of the United States. In his reply, General Jackson paid a beautiful tribute to the memory of the deceased, which, for its masterly exposition of the effect of maternal example, and of the importance of female influence, deserves to be preserved in this "Record of Women." We give a few sentences:—

"In tracing the recollections which can be gathered of her principles and conduct, it is impossible to avoid the conviction, that these were closely interwoven with the destiny of her son. The great points of his character are before the world. He who runs may read them in his whole career, as a citizen, a soldier, a magistrate. He possessed an unerring judgment, if that term can be applied to human nature; great probity of purpose, high moral principles, perfect self-possession, untiring application, an enquiring mind, seeking information from every quarter, and arriving at its conclusions with a full knowledge of the subject; and he added to these an inflexibility of resolution, which nothing could change but a conviction of error. Look back at the life and conduct of his mother, and at her domestic government, and they will be found admirably adapted to form and develop the elements of such a character. The power of greatness was there; but had it not been guided and directed by maternal solicitude and judgment, its possessor, instead of presenting to the world examples of virtue, patriotism, and wisdom, which will be precious in all succeeding ages, might have added to the number of those master spirits, whose fame rests upon the faculties they have abused, and the injuries they have committed.

"How important to the females of our country, are these reminiscences of the early life of Washington, and of the maternal care of her upon whom its future course depended! Principles less firm and just, an affection less regulated by discretion, might have changed the character of the son, and with it the destinies of the nation. We have reason to be proud of the virtue and intelligence of our women. As mothers and sisters, as wives and daughters, their duties are performed with exemplary fidelity. They, no doubt, realize the great importance of the maternal character, and the powerful influence it must exert upon the American youth. Happy is it for them and our country, that they have before them this illustrious example of maternal devotion, and this bright reward of filial success! The mother of a family, who lives to witness the virtues of her children and their advancement in life, and who is known and honoured because they are known and honoured, should have no other wish, on this side the grave, to gratify. The seeds of virtue and vice are early sown, and we may often anticipate the harvest that will be gathered. Changes, no doubt, occur, but let no one place his hope upon these. Impressions made in infancy, if not indelible, are effaced with difficulty and renewed with facility; and upon the mother, therefore, must frequently, if not generally, depend the fate of the son.

"Fellow-citizens—At your request, and in your name, I now deposit this plate in the spot destined for it; and when the American pilgrim shall, in after ages, come up to this high and holy place, and lay his hand upon this sacred column, may he recall the virtues of her who sleeps beneath, and depart with his affections purified and his piety strengthened, while he invokes blessings upon the Mother of Washington."

This monument bears the simple but touching inscription, MARY, THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, MARTHA,

WIFE of General George Washington, was born in the county of New Kent, Virginia, in May, 1732. Her maiden name was Martha Dandridge; at the age of seventeen, she married Colonel Daniel Parke Custis, of the White House, county of New Kent, by whom she had four children: a girl, who died in infancy; a son named Daniel, whose early death is supposed to have hastened his father's; Martha, who arrived at womanhood, and died in 1770; and John, who perished in the service of his country, at the siege of Yorktown, aged twenty-seven.

Mrs. Custis was left a young and very wealthy widow, and managed the extensive landed and pecuniary concerns of the estates with surprising ability. In 1759, she was married to George Washington, then a colonel in the colonial service, and soon after, they removed permanently to Mount Vernon, on the Potomac. Upon the election of her husband to the command-in-chief of the armies of his country, Mrs. or Lady Washington, as she was generally called, accompanied the general to the lines before Boston, and witnessed its siege and evacuation; and was always constant in her attendance on her husband, when it was possible. After General Washington's election to the presidency of the United States, in 1787, Mrs. Washington performed the duties belonging to the wife of a man in that high station, with great dignity and ease; and on the retirement of Washington, she still continued her unbounded hospitality. The decease of her venerated husband, who died December 14th, 1799, was the shock from which she never recovered, though she bore the heavy sorrow with the most exemplary resignation. She was kneeling at the foot of his bed when he expired, and when she found he was gone, she said, in a calm voice, "'Tis well; all is now over; I shall soon follow him; I have no more trials to pass through." Her children were all deceased—her earthly treasures were withdrawn; but she held firm her trust in the Divine Mercy which had ordered her lot. For more than half a century, she had been accustomed to passing an hour every morning alone in her chamber, engaged in reading the Bible and in prayer. She survived her husband a little over two years, dying at Mount Vernon, aged seventy.

In person Mrs. Washington was well formed, though somewhat below the middle size. A portrait, taken previous to her marriage, shows that she must have been very handsome in her youth; and she retained a comeliness of countenance, as well as a dignified grace of manner, during life. In her home she was the presiding genius that kept action and order in perfect harmony; a wife in whom the heart of her husband could safely trust. The example of this illustrious couple ought to have a salutary influence on every American family; the marriage union, as it subsisted between George and Martha Washington, is shown to be the happiest, as well as holiest, relation in which human beings can be united to each other. The delicacy of Mrs. Washington's nature, which led her, just before her decease, to destroy the letters that had passed between her husband and herself, proves the depth and purity of her love and reverence for him. She could not permit that the confidences they had shared together should become public; it would be desecrating their chaste loves, and, perhaps, some word or expression might be misinterpreted to his disadvantage. One only letter from Washington to his wife was found among his papers;—the extracts we give from this letter indicate clearly the character of their correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, June 18th, 1775.

MY DEAREST,—I am now set down to write you on a subject which fills me with inexpressible concern; and this concern is greatly aggravated and increased, when I reflect upon the uneasiness I know it will give you. It has been determined in Congress, that the whole army raised for the defence of the American cause shall be put under my care, and that it is necessary for me to proceed immediately to Boston, and take upon me the command of it.

You may believe me, dear Patsy, when I assure you, in the most solemn manner, that, so far from seeking this appointment, I have used every endeavour in my power to avoid it, not only from my unwillingness to part with you and the family, but from a consciousness of its being a trust too great for my capacity, and that I should enjoy more real happiness in one month with you at home, than I have the most distant prospect of finding abroad, if my stay were to be seven times seven years. But as it has been a kind of destiny that has thrown me upon this service, I shall hope that my undertaking it is designed to answer some good purpose.

* * * * *

I shall rely, therefore, confidently on that Providence, which has heretofore preserved and been bountiful to me, not doubting but that I shall return safe to you in the fall. I shall feel no pain from the toil or the danger of the campaign; my unhappiness will flow from the uneasiness I know you will feel from being left alone. I therefore beg that you will summon your whole fortitude, and pass your time as agreeably as you can. Nothing will give me so much sincere satisfaction as to hear this, and to hear it from your own pen.

* * * * *

He then goes on to say that, as life was always uncertain, he had had his will drawn up, and enclosed the draft to her; by this will he gave her the use and control of all his estates and property during her life-time; which will was observed on his decease. Such was the love the greatest man the world ever saw, cherished towards his wife; and she was worthy of his love. What higher celebrity could a woman desire?

WASSER, ANNA,

WAS born at Zurich, in Switzerland, in 1679; being the daughter of Rodolph Wasser, a person of considerable note in his own country, and a member of the council of Zurich. Anna had the advantage of a polite education; and as she showed a lively genius, particularly in designing, she was placed under the direction of Joseph Werner, at Berne. He made her study after good models, and copy the best paintings he could procure. After having instructed her for some time, on seeing a copy which she had finished of a flora, it astonished him to find such correctness and colouring in so young an artist, she being then but thirteen years of age. She painted at first in oil, but afterwards applied herself entirely to miniature, for which, indeed, nature seemed to have furnished her with peculiar talents. Her works in that style procured her the favour of most of the princes of Germany; and the duke of Wirtemberg, in particular, sent his own portrait and that of his sister to be copied in miniature by her hand; in which performance she succeeded so admirably, that her reputation was effectually established through all Germany. The Margrave of Baden-Durlach was another of her early patrons; and she also received many commissions from the first personages in the Low Countries. Though, by the influence of her father, she was prevailed upon to devote most of her time to portrait painting, yet her favourite subjects were those of the pastoral kind, in which she displayed the delicacy of her taste in invention and composition, in the elegance of her manner of designing, and in giving so much harmony to the whole, as invariably to afford pleasure to the most judicious beholders. In all her subjects, indeed, she discovered a fine genius, an exceedingly good taste, and an agreeable colouring. She died, unmarried, in 1713.

WATTS, JANE,

WAS the daughter of George Waldie, Esq., of Hendersyde Park, Scotland. Before she was five years old she showed much fondness for drawing, and she very early painted landscapes in oil, which were greatly admired. She was almost wholly self-taught, yet her pictures, when exhibited at the Royal Academy and the British Institution, commanded universal applause. In literature she displayed equal talent. This accomplished woman died in 1826, at the age of thirty-seven.

WEISSERTHURN, JOHANNA F. V. VON,

BORN 1773, at Coblenz, was the daughter of the play-actor, Grünberg. Before she was twelve years old, she became, encouraged by her step-father, Teichman, the director of a little troupe, the members of which were her brothers and sisters and cousins, and with it she performed, at a private theatre, a number of pieces expressly written for children. In 1787, an engagement was offered to her at the Munich theatre; in 1789, she exchanged this for one that was offered to her by her step-brother, the director of the theatre at Baden; in 1790, she was called to the Imperial Court Theatre, at Vienna. Here she married, in 1791, Von Weissertthurn. Shortly after her marriage, she published a few plays, which were so well received, that, encouraged by it, she continued to write for the stage, and became quite a prolific author. In 1817, she lost her husband; and in 1841, she withdrew from the stage, and died in 1845.

Her dramatic writings have been published in three parts: the first, in Vienna, 1804, under the title of "Plays," six volumes; the second, 1817, under the title "New Plays," two volumes; the third, 1823-31, under the title "Latest Plays," five volumes. Her best pieces are, "The Forest near Hermanstown," "Which is the Bridegroom," "The Heirs," and "The Last Resort."

WELSER, PHILIPPINA,

DAUGHTER of Francis, and niece of Bartholomew Welser, the opulent privy-councillor of Charles V. of Germany, was a beautiful and accomplished woman. Ferdinand, son of the archduke (afterwards emperor) Ferdinand, and nephew of Charles V., fell violently in love with her, in 1547, at Augsburg. She refused all his offers, except on condition of marriage, and the ceremony was performed privately, in 1550. When the archduke heard of it, he was very much incensed, and for eight years he refused to see his son. Philippina died in 1580, at Innspruck. Her husband had a medal struck in her honour, with the inscription, Diva Philippina. She had two sons, who both died without children.

WEST, ELIZABETH,

WAS born at Edinburgh, 1672, of respectable parents, and was well educated. In youth, she imbibed notions somewhat similar to those of the mystics, and was frequently led into extravagancies. She was reputed the female saint of her day, and married Mr. Brie, minister of Saline, in Fifeshire; but she did not live happily with him. She wrote her own memoirs, and died in Saline, in 1735, aged sixty-three.

WEST, JANE,

WAS the wife of a farmer, in Northamptonshire, England. She received but a scanty education; still she applied herself very closely to study, and was known as an amusing and moral writer. She lived in the latter part of the eighteenth, and the early part of the present century. Her principal works are, "A Gossip Story," "a Novel," "A Tale of the Times," "Poems and Plays," "Letters to a Young Man," "Letters to a Young Lady," &c

WESTMORELAND, JANE, COUNTESS OF,

ELDEST daughter of Henry, earl of Surrey, who was beheaded in 1547, was the wife of Charles, earl of Westmoreland, by whom she had four daughters. This lady made such progress in Latin and Greek, under the instruction of Fox, the martyrologist, that she might compete with the most learned men of the age. The latter part of her life was rendered very unhappy by her husband's conduct; for he was engaged in an insurrection, in 1569, and, in consequence, his property was confiscated, and he himself sentenced to death, which he escaped by leaving the country, and remaining a long time in exile.

WESTON, ELIZABETH JANE,

Was born about 1558. She left England very young, and settled at Prague, in Bohemia, where she passed the rest of her life. She was a woman of fine talents, which were highly cultivated; she was skilled in various languages, especially Latin, in which she wrote several works, both in prose and verse, highly esteemed by some of the most learned men of her time. They were published in 1606. She was married to John Leon, a gentleman belonging to the emperor's court, and was living in 1605, as appears by a letter written by her in that year. She was commended by Scaliger, and complimented by Nicholas May in a Latin epigram. She is ranked with Sir Thomas Moore, and the best Latin poets of the sixteenth century.

WHARTON, ANNE, COUNTESS OF,

DAUGHTER of Sir Henry Lee, of Oxfordshire, England, married Thomas, earl of Wharton, and distinguished herself by her learning and poetical works. She died in 1685. One of her plays was entitled, "Love's Martyr, or Wit above Crowns." Many of her poems are printed in the collections of Dryden and Nichols. She had no children.

WHEATLEY, PHILLIS,

Was brought from Africa, to Boston, Massachusetts, in 1761, when she was six years old, and sold in the slave-market, to Mrs. John Wheatley, wife of a merchant of that city. This lady, perceiving her natural abilities, had her carefully educated, and she acquired a thorough knowledge of the English and Latin languages. She wrote verses with great ease and fluency, frequently rising in the night to put down any thought that had occurred to her. In 1772, she accompanied a son of Mr. Wheatley to England, for her health, where she received a great deal of attention from the people in the higher ranks of life. Her poems were published in London, 1773, while she was in that city. She was then nineteen years of age. The volume was dedicated to the countess of Huntingdon; and in the preface are the names of the governor of Massachusetts, and several other eminent gentlemen, bearing testimony to their belief of her having been the genuine writer. Mr. Sparks, who gives these particulars in his "Life and Writings of George Washington," from which the letter quoted below is taken, observes: "In whatever order of merit these poems may be ranked, it cannot be doubted that they exhibit the most favourable evidence on record, of the capacity of the African intellect for improvement. The classical allusions are numerous, and imply a wide compass of reading, a correct judgment, good taste, and a tenacious memory. Her deportment is represented to have been gentle and unpretending, her temper amiable, her feelings refined, and her religious impressions strong and constant."

After her return, Phillis married a coloured man, named Peters, who proved unworthy of her, and made the rest of her life very unhappy. She died at Boston, in great poverty, in 1784, leaving three children. She was but thirty-one years old at the time of her decease. An edition of her poems was published in 1773, and another, with a biography of her, in 1835. Besides these poems, she wrote many which were never published; and one of these, addressed and sent to General Washington, soon after he took command of the American army, gives her a more enduring fame than all her printed pieces. In the following letter from that great man, we see how kind was the soul whose energies were then carrying forward the destinies of the new world, and shaking the dynasties of the old.

CAMBRIDGE, February 28th, 1776.

MISS PHILLIS: Your favour of the 26th of October did not reach my hands till the middle of December. Time enough, you will say, to have given an answer ere this. Granted. But a variety of important occurrences, continually interposing to distract the mind and withdraw the attention, I hope will apologize for the delay, and plead my excuse for the seeming but not real neglect. I thank you most sincerely for your polite notice of me, in the elegant lines you enclosed; and however undeserving I may be of such encomium and panegyric, the style and manner exhibit a striking proof of your poetical talents; in honour of which, and as a tribute justly due to you, I would have published the poem, had I not been apprehensive that, while I only meant to give the world this new instance of your genius, I might have incurred the imputation of vanity. This, and nothing else, determined me not to give it place in the public prints. If you should ever come to Cambridge, or near head-quarters, I shall be happy to see a person so favoured by the muses, and to whom Nature has been so liberal and beneficent in her dispensations. I am, with great respect, your obedient, humble servant,

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Phillis Wheatley's poems have little literary merit; their worth arises from the extraordinary circumstance that they are the productions of an African woman; the sentiment is true always, but never new. The elegy and acrostic were her favourite modes of composition. The following is among her best pieces:

ON THE DEATH OF THE REV. GEORGE WHITFIELD.

* * * * *

Thou, moon, hast seen, and all the stars of light,
How he has wrestled with his God by night.
He prayed that grace in every heart might dwell;
He longed to see America excel;
He charged its youth that every grace divine
Should with full lustre in their conduct shine.
That Saviour, which his soul did first receive,
The greatest gift that even a God can give,
He freely offered to the numerous throng
That on his lips with list'ning pleasure hung.
"Take him, ye wretched, for your only good,
Take him, ye starving sinners, for your food;
Ye thirsty, come to this life-giving stream,
Ye preachers, take him for your joyful theme;
Take him, my dear Americans," he said,
"Be your complaints on his kind bosom laid:
Take him, ye Africans, he longs for you;
Impartial Saviour, is his title due:
Washed in the fountain of redeeming blood,
You shall be sons, and kings, and priests to God."

But though arrested by the hand of death,
Whitfield no more exerts his lab'ring breath,
Yet let us view him in the eternal skies,
Let every heart to this bright vision rise;
While the tomb safe retains its sacred trust,
Till life divine reanimates his dust.

WILKINSON, ELIZA,

WHOSE published letters give a lively and graphic account of the situation of the people, and the events that occurred during that part of the war of the revolution which was carried on in the section of the country in which she resided, was a daughter of Francis Yrage, a Welsh emigrant, who had settled on Yrage's Island, about thirty miles from Charleston, South Carolina. She married Mr. Wilkinson, who died six months after their union, leaving her a young and beautiful widow. She was noted for her wit, and her kindness to the American soldiers.

WILKINSON, JEMIMA,

A RELIGIOUS impostor, was born in Cumberland, Rhode Island, about 1753. Recovering suddenly from an apparent suspension of life, she announced that she had been raised from the dead, and claimed supernatural power. She made a few proselytes, and removed with them to the neighbourhood of Crooked Lake, in New York, where she died, in 1819.

WILLIAMS, ANNA,

WAS the daughter of a surgeon and physician, in South Wales, where she was born, in 1706. She went with her father to London, in 1730, when, from some failure in his undertakings, he was reduced to great poverty. In 1740, Miss Williams lost her sight by a cataract, which prevented her, in a great measure, from assisting her father; but she still retained her fondness for literature, and what is more extraordinary, her skill in the use of her needle. In 1746, she published the "Life of the Emperor Julian, with Notes, translated from the French." She was assisted by her friends, in this work, and it does not appear that she derived much pecuniary advantage from it. Soon after this, Dr. and Mrs. Johnson became interested in her, and at Dr. Johnson's request an operation was performed on her eyes, but without success; and from that time, even after his wife's death, she remained almost constantly an inmate of Johnson's house. Her circumstances were improved in the last years of her life, by the publication of a volume of prose and verse, and by some other means, and the friendship and kindness of Johnson continued unalterable. She died at his house in Bolt-Court, Fleet street, aged seventy-seven. The following is a good specimen of her poetry, which never rises above the sentimental:

ON A LADY SINGING.

When Delia strikes the trembling string,
She charms our list'ning ears;
But when she joins her voice to sing,
She emulates the spheres.

he feathered songsters round her throng,
And catch the soothing notes;
To imitate her matchless song,
They strain their little throats.

The constant mournful-cooing doves,
Attentive to her strain,
All mindful of their tender loves,
By list'ning soothe their pain.

Soft were the notes by Orpheus played,
Which once recalled his bride;
But had he sung like thee, fair maid,
The nymph had scarcely died.

WILLIAMS, HELEN MARIA,

WAS born, in 1762, in the north of England, and was ushered into public notice by Dr. Kippis, at the age of eighteen. Between 1782 and 1788, she published "Edwin and Eltrada," "An Ode to Peace," and other poems. In 1790 she settled in Paris, and became intimate with the most eminent of the Girondists, and, in 1794, was imprisoned, and nearly shared their fate. She escaped to Switzerland, but returned to Paris in 1796, and died there in 1827.

She wrote "Julia, a Novel," "Letters from France," "Travels in Switzerland," "A Narrative of Events in France," and "A Translation of Humboldt and Bonpland's Personal Narrative." Miss Williams possessed a strong mind, much historical acumen, and great industry, though her religious sentiments were not free from some errors of the period. As a poetess she had little more than some facility and the talent inseparable from a cultivated taste. One of her pieces has much favour as a devotional hymn :

TRUST IN PROVIDENCE.

Whilst thee I seek, protecting Power !
Be my vain wishes stilled :
And may this consecrated hour
With better hopes be filled.

Thy love the power of thought bestowed,
To thee my thoughts would soar :
Thy mercy o'er my life has flowed ;
That mercy I adore.

In each event of life, how clear
Thy ruling hand I see !
Each blessing to my soul most dear,
Because conferred by thee.

In ev'ry joy that crowns my days,
In ev'ry pain I bear,
My heart shall find delight in praise,
Or seek relief in prayer.

When gladness wings my favoured hour,
Thy love my thoughts shall fill :
Resigned, when storms of sorrow lower,
My soul shall meet thy will.

My lifted eye without a tear
The gath'ring storm shall see ;
My steadfast heart shall know no fear ;
That heart will rest on thee.

PART OF A PARAPHRASE.

In every note that swells the gale,
Or tuneful stream that cheers the vale,
The cavern's depth, or echoing grove,
A voice is heard of praise and love.

As o'er God's works the seasons roll,
And soothe with change of bliss the soul,
Oh, never may their smiling train
Pass o'er the human scene in vain.

But oft, as on the charm we gaze,
Attune the wondering soul to praise ;
And be the joys that most we prize
The joys that from His favor rise.

WINCHELSEA, ANNE, COUNTESS OF,

Was the daughter of Sir William Kingsmill, of Sidmonton, in the county of Southampton, England. She was maid of honour to the duchess of York, second wife of James II., and married Heneage, second son of Heneage, earl of Winchelsea, who afterwards succeeded to the title of earl of Winchelsea. She died August 5th, 1720, without leaving any children. Wordsworth speaks highly of her poem called "A Nocturnal Reverie." Another of her poems was addressed to "The Spleen." A collection of the countess's poems was printed in London, together with a tragedy, never acted, entitled "Aristomenes." Mr. Chambers remarks of her poetry, and it should not be forgotten that she was the first Englishwoman who attempted to ascend the Parnassian heights—"Her lines are smoothly versified, and possess a tone of calm and contemplative feeling."

A NOCTURNAL REVERIE.

In such a night, when every louder wind
Is to its distant cavern safe confined,
And only gentle zephyr fans his wings,
And lonely Philomel still waking sings ;
Or from some tree, famed for the owl's delight,
She, hollering clear, directs the wanderer right :
In such a night, when passing clouds give place,
Or thinly veil the heaven's mysterious face ;
When in some river overhung with green,
The waving moon and trembling leaves are seen ;
When freshened grass now bears itself upright,
And makes cool banks to pleasing rest invite,
Whence springs the woodbine, and the bramble rose
And where the sleepy cowslip sheltered grows ;
Whilst now a paler hue the foxglove takes,
Yet chequers still with red the dusky brakes ;
When scattered glow-worms, but in twilight fine,
Show trivial beauties watch their hour to shine ;
Whilst Salisbury stands the test of every light,
In perfect charms and perfect virtue bright :
When odours which declined repelling day,
Through temperate air uninterrupted stray ;
When darkened groves their softest shadows wear,
And falling waters we distinctly hear ;
When through the gloom more venerable shows
Some ancient fabric, awful in repose ;
While sunburnt hills their swarthy looks conceal,
And swelling haycocks thicken up the vale :
When the loosed horse now, as his pasture leads,
Comes slowly grazing through the adjoining meads,
Whose stealing pace and lengthened shade we fear
Till torn-up forage in his teeth we hear ;
When nibbling sheep at large pursue their food,
And unmolested kine re Chew the cud ;
When curlews cry beneath the village walls,
And to her straggling brood the partridge calls ;
Their short-lived jubilee the creatures keep,
Which but endures while tyrant man does sleep :
When a sedate content the spirit feels,
And no fierce light disturbs, whilst it reveals ;
But silent musings urge the mind to seek
Something too high for syllables to speak ;
Till the free soul to a composedness charmed,
Finding the elements of rage disarmed,
O'er all below a solemn quiet grown,
Joys in the inferior world, and thinks it like her own :
In such a night let me abroad remain,
Till morning breaks, and all's confused again ;
Our cares, our toils, our clamours are renewed,
Or pleasures seldom reached again pursued.

The following is another specimen of the correct and smooth versification of the countess, and seems to us superior to the "Nocturnal Reverie."

LIFE'S PROGRESS.

How gaily is at first begun
Our life's uncertain race ;
Whilst yet that sprightly morning sun,
With which we just set out to run,
Enlightens all the place.

How smiling the world's prospect lies,
How tempting to go through !
Not Canaan to the prophet's eyes,
From Pisgah, with a sweet surprise
Did more inviting show.

How soft the first ideas prove
Which wander through our minds !
How full the joys, how free the love,
Which does that early season move,
As flowers the western winds !

Our sighs are then but vernal air,
But April drops our tears,
Which swiftly passing, all grows fair,
Whilst beauty compensates our care
And youth each vapour clears.

But oh! too soon, alas! we climb,
Scarce feeling we ascend
The gently-rising hill of Time,
From whence with grief we see that prime,
And all its sweetness end.

The die now cast, our station known,
Fond expectation past:
The thorns which former days had sown,
To crops of late repentance grown,
Through which we toil at last.

Whilst every care's a driving harm,
That helps to bear us down;
Which faded smiles no more can charm,
But every tear's a winter storm,
And every look's a frown.

WINCKEL, THERESA EMILIA HENRIETTA,

WAS born at Dresden, in 1784, and was celebrated for her copies of the old masters. She is said to have been unequalled in the copies she made of Correggio's works. She went to Paris, with her mother, in 1808, and spent her time while in that city in studying the works of art with which it abounds. Her letters from Paris have been published, and she also wrote many articles for periodicals. She began the study of the art of painting, at first, for her own gratification; but her mother losing her fortune, Henrietta supported them both by her own exertions.

WILSON, MRS.,

AN Englishwoman, who deserves an honoured place among the distinguished of her sex, for her noble self-sacrifice in going out to India, to introduce the light of female education into that region of moral darkness. She also founded the first orphan refuge, or asylum, for native female children, established under the British sceptre in the East. This beginning of female instruction was introduced only twenty-nine years ago; the English East India Company had held rich possessions and controlling power in India for more than a century, yet no man had sought to remedy or remove the horrible degradation and ignorance of the female sex. The spirit of selfishness or sin reigned paramount in the hearts of men; and their "enmity" to the moral or intellectual influence of women was, and is still, there wrought out in the most awful oppressions, and brutal practices, the corrupt mind can devise. And never will the chains of sin be broken, or the Gospel make progress in that "clime of the sun," till the female sex are instructed, and raised from their social degradation. Mrs. Wilson has done much, for she made the beginning. We give the history as we find it in Chambers's Journal, written, evidently, by a lady. She tells us that Mrs. Wilson, then Miss Cook, went out to India in 1821.

"Up till this time, the education of natives had been confined to boys, for whom a number of schools had been opened; and as no attempt at conversion was allowed, there was no prejudice against them. One of the most benevolent founders of schools for boys in Calcutta was David Hare, a person who, having amassed a considerable fortune in that city, determined to spend it there instead of his native land; and not only did he spend his money, but his life, in benefitting the city where he had so long resided. These attempts, as we have said, met with no opposition on the part of the natives; on the contrary, they warmly seconded them, and the schools were crowded with boys willing to learn after the English fashion instead of their own; but the prejudices against educating females were not to be so easily overcome. For the woman, no education of any kind but such as related to making a curry or a pillau had ever been deemed necessary. As long as infancy and childhood lasted, she was the pet and plaything of the family; and when, with girlhood, came the domestic duties of the wife, she entered on them unprepared by any previous moral training. All intellectual acquirements were out of place for one who was not the companion, but the drudge and slave of her husband; and the more ignorant she was, the less intolerable would be the confinement and monotony of her life. In India, all females above the very lowest ranks, and of respectable character, are kept in seclusion after betrothment; and after marriage, none of any rank, except the very highest, are exempt from those duties which we should consider menial, though not really so when kept in due bounds. A wife can never be degraded by preparing her husband's repast; but it is humiliating to be considered unworthy to partake of it with him, and not even to be permitted to enliven it with her conversation. Those females, again, whose station is not high enough to warrant the privileges of seclusion, present a picture painful to contemplate; the blessing of liberty cannot make up for the incessant toil and drudgery to which they are invariably condemned; and the alternations of the climate, added to the exposure, render the woman in the prime of life a withered crone, either depressed into an idiot or irritated into a virago. Though in the present day something has been effected in the way of elevating the social position of the Hindoo female, thirty years ago even that little was considered unattainable. It was evident that while one entire sex remained so utterly uncared for, the instruction of the other would fail to produce the desired effects; and that if India was to be regenerated, her female as well as her male population must be instructed. The task was difficult; for whilst the government was indifferent, the natives of India were all strongly opposed to any measures for ameliorating the condition, social or intellectual, of their women. One zealous friend, however, devoted herself to the task. The work was to be done, and Mrs. Wilson did it.

Animated with a determination to spare no personal exertion, she had herself trained to the business of general instruction, and did not fear the effects of an Indian climate. Physically, morally, and intellectually, she was fitted for her task. Her health was excellent; her spirits elastic; her temper even; her mind clear, quick, and shrewd; her manners most engaging, though dignified; and her will indomitable. On arriving in India, her first efforts were devoted to acquiring a knowledge of Bengalee, the language of the native of Calcutta; and as soon as she could make herself understood by those around her, she took up her abode in the midst of the native population, and courted and encouraged pupils. Slowly and suspiciously they came in, attracted by a small gratuity each received as a reward for daily attendance. In time others followed their example; and a school which could scarcely be said to aspire to the dignity of ragged, being literally a naked one, was established. The premises occupied by Mrs. Wilson were so confined, that when the pice, not the learning, attracted more pupils, she was obliged to open classes in various parts of the bazaar, and go from one to the other. This occasioned much loss of time; and none but those of the very lowest rank could be enticed even by a fee to attend the school. Any one less earnest would have lost heart, and been disgusted to find that all her efforts were to be so confined. But Miss Cook hoped, and trusted, and determined to remedy what appeared remediable. She was convinced that a large house, in a more respectable part of the native town, would be one means of attracting pupils of rather a higher caste; and she determined to secure this. A rajah, who at that time was anxious to pay court to the government, presented the "Ladies' Society for Promoting Native Female Education" with a piece of ground in a very eligible situation; a European gentleman furnished the plan, and kindly superintended the erection of the buildings; and in about five years after her first arrival in Calcutta, Mrs. Wilson took possession of the Central School, a large, airy, and handsome abode. Five years had accustomed the natives to the anomaly of teaching girls, and a somewhat better class than had at first attended were now to be seen congregated round their energetic teacher, seated cross-legged on the floor, tracing their crabbed characters on a slate; reading in sonorous voices the translations of the parables and miracles; or even chanting hymns, also translated. Still none came, unless brought by the women who were employed to go the rounds of the bazaar in the morning, and who received so much for each child: bribery alone ensured attendance; and none of the pupils remained more than two or three years at the most. As for the natives of the upper class, all attempts to gain a footing amongst them proved total failures. The examinations of the school were attended by all the native gentlemen of rank who professed to take an interest in education; but none of them favoured it sufficiently to desire its benefits for his own daughters, though Mrs. Wilson offered to attend them privately, when not engaged in the duties of the school. At length the same rajah who had given the ground informed her that his young wife insisted on learning English. She had already learned to read and write Bengalee; but as this did not satisfy her, he requested Mrs. Wilson's services, which were immediately given; and she found her pupil a very apt scholar, eager for information of all kinds. In the course of a few weeks, the lady succeeded in obtaining her husband's permission to visit Mrs. Wilson at the Central School, and to be introduced to some more English ladies. It was not without much persuasion that this boon was granted; and even when we were all seated expecting her arrival, (for the writer of this was present,) we scarcely believed that anything so contrary to etiquette would be permitted. At length, however, the rapid tread of many feet was heard, a closed palanquin, surrounded by chacprasseys, entered the veranda, and panting after it were two old crones. The vehicle was set down in the inner veranda, or, as it would be called here, lobby, from which all the male servants were then excluded, and the doors closed; and then a figure enveloped in a large muslin sheet was taken out of the conveyance, and guided up stairs by the duennas. As soon as she was in the sitting-room, the envelope was removed, and disclosed a very pretty young creature, dressed in a pink muslin sorharee and white muslin jacket, both spotted with silver, slippers richly embroidered, and her thick plait of dark glossy hair fastened by a richly ornamented pin. She had gold bangles on her neck and arms; but no display of jewellery, though her husband was reputed very wealthy.

I may mention that the sorharee is all the clothing of the Hindoo female. It is about seven yards long and one wide, the width forming the length of the garment. It is wound round the figure as often as convenient, and the remainder brought over the head as a veil. The boddice is an occasional addition, never adopted by the lower classes, and their sorharees are scanty and coarse. It is but an ungraceful costume, as there are no folds. Our visitor's countenance was very animated, and her extreme youth—for she was not more than sixteen—gave a charm to features not distinguished for regularity. Secluded as her life had been, the young creature was far from being timid. She was quite at her ease, and ready to enter into conversation with any one who understood Bengalee. She could not converse in English; but was proud of displaying her acquirements in reading and spelling, and told us that she had prevailed on the rajah to hear her repeat her lessons every evening.

Of course our dresses excited her curiosity, for she had never seen any of European make, except Mrs. Wilson's widow's garb. She made many enquiries about our children, but would have considered it indelicate even to name our husbands. After replying to all our queries, she became so familiar that she offered to sing to us, regretting that she had not her instrument (a very simple sort of guitar) to accompany her voice. The melody was simple, and her voice very sweet. All this time the old women who had accompanied their lady were crouching down in one corner of the room, watching her intently; and at last, as if they thought her freedom had lasted long enough, they rose, and told her it was the maharajah's orders she should go. She unwillingly complied, and left us to our great regret; for there was a confiding naïveté about her which was very winning. In a few weeks the lessons were discontinued; her husband fell into well-merited disgrace; and this was the first and last pupil Mrs. Wilson had in the highest ranks. This disappointment, however, was more than compensated by the accomplishment of another scheme, perhaps more important, for the amelioration of the native female character.

I have said that the attendance of the day scholar seldom exceeded three years; and much as Mrs. Wilson desired to believe that the bread cast upon the waters would not be lost, no well-authenticated evidence ever reached her that the brief school-days produced any permanently beneficial effects, sufficient to counteract the superstition and ignorance with which her pupils were necessarily surrounded. Feeling the impossibility with day-schools of obviating infection from such sources, she had always cherished the idea of rearing some children from their very infancy, uncontaminated by the evil examples of a native home; but it was not till just before she moved into the Central School that she had an opportunity of carrying her plan into execution. Her durzie (tailor) feeling himself dying, sent for her, and implored her to take charge of his only child; he said he could not be a Christian himself, but he wished her to be one; and that if Mrs. Wilson would promise to keep her, he would, in the presence of his relatives, make over the little girl to that lady. The assurance was as readily given as her task was conscientiously fulfilled; and no first-fruits could have been more promising, or could have ripened more satisfactorily; no commencement could have been followed by more complete success. In a very few weeks another orphan, totally destitute, was thrown in Mrs. Wilson's way; and much about the same time she was requested to receive as a boarder a little slave girl, the charge of whom had, by very peculiar circumstances, devolved on a lady whose health and position prevented her training the poor castaway satisfactorily. "That there needs only a beginning," was never more fully verified than in the case of the Orphan Asylum. That which for several years had been the chief wish of Mrs. Wilson's heart was accomplished in a few months; and before she had a home to shelter them, she found herself surrounded by twenty-five dependent little creatures. The orphans were entirely and exclusively Mrs. Wilson's own charge; the ladies' committee had no control over them. From the first, the pupils were trained to contribute by their labour to their own support; and she was never without large orders for worsted work, which paid well. She was assisted in all her labours, but more particularly in this department, by a young lady who had joined her from England; and before this very interesting person fell a victim to the climate, some of the elder girls under her tuition had become so expert in the use of the needle, (another innovation on the privileges of the male sex,) that they were able to copy fancy-work of all kinds, from the sale of which a considerable sum was realized yearly. All the orphans, however, were not entirely dependent on

Mrs. Wilson; many of them were boarded with her by individuals who were only too thankful to find such a refuge for any poor stray sheep thrown upon their charity. Indeed, considering the frequency of such cases, it seems wonderful that so many years were required to carry out a plan so beneficial to so many. Thus one girl was the child of a wretched woman executed for a most inhuman murder; the benevolence of the judge's wife rescued the unfortunate child from starvation, and supported her in the Orphan Refuge: another boarder was a girl from the Goomsur country, whose limbs for months retained the marks of the ligatures with which she had been bound previous to sacrifice; another was a fine, handsome New Zealand girl, who was found in the streets of Calcutta, having been concealed on board the vessel that had brought her till its departure, and then left to live or die, as might happen. There was also one boarder of quite another class; she was the wife of a young Hindoo, who, whilst studying at Bishop's College after his conversion, was anxious to rescue his young wife from heathenism, and placed her with Mrs. Wilson, to be educated as a Christian. He died early, and I am not aware of the fate of his wife.

The building in which Mrs. Wilson resided was admirably calculated for day-schools, as it was in the centre of the native population. This proximity was essential to secure day-scholars, who might be seen, just returned from their bath in the not very distant Hoogly, as early as six in the morning beginning their studies, which continued till ten. The situation, however, that was the best for day-scholars, was the worst for those whom it was desirable to wean from their old paths—to obliterate all they knew already that was demoralizing—and, if possible, to present nothing but what was pure and lovely for their imitation. As long as the orphans were in daily contact with the out-pupils, these objects could not be obtained; and it became evident a separation must be made, or that the day-schools, as being of minor importance, should be sacrificed, and the Central School converted into an Orphan Refuge. It seemed hopeless to attempt carrying on both from funds collected on the spot. For all that had in the first instance been raised in Britain and India for the purposes of native female education, and placed at the disposal of the ladies' committee, had been swallowed up in the ruin of one of the large houses of agency in which they had been placed by the treasurer; and the expenses attendant on the day-schools had since been defrayed by subscriptions and donations from the benevolent in Calcutta; which, however liberal, sometimes left the secretary without a rupee in hand. Mrs. Wilson at once negated the plan of sacrificing the one scheme for the other; she said both should be accomplished; and what seemed impracticable to all consulted on the matter, was effected by the strong will and determined energy of one woman. She individually raised money to purchase ground at Agiparah, a retired spot on the banks of the Hoogly, about fourteen miles from Calcutta, which she obtained on very advantageous terms. She immediately commenced the erection of suitable, but simple buildings, within three walls so high as to exclude all the outer world, and with the river for the other boundary. Just at the time the ground was obtained, one of those dreadful inundations which sometimes depopulate Cuttack, occurred, and boat-loads of half-drowned women and children arrived off Calcutta. Mrs. Wilson gave a home to all who would take it; and although many came only to die, her number in a few weeks amounted to one hundred likely to live. Many of those past youth were unwilling to conform to the rules; those that remained were generally very young—some mere infants. When all this large accession of numbers was thus suddenly thrown upon her, Mrs. Wilson was still in Calcutta, and was obliged to erect temporary buildings for shelter, and to make a great effort to feed such a host of famishing creatures. Her energies were equal to the emergency, and funds were never wanting.

As soon as the buildings at Agiparah were completed, Mrs. Wilson removed thither with her large orphan family, and discontinued her attendance at the day-schools, and almost her connexion with the outer world. All within the precincts of the establishment professed Christianity; and no more enticing example to follow its precepts could have been afforded than Mrs. Wilson's conduct displayed. Her great aim and object in educating the native girl was to elevate the native woman; not merely to teach reading, writing, arithmetic, the use of the needle, &c., but to purify the mind, to subdue the temper, to raise her in the scale of being, to render her the companion and helpmate of her husband, instead of his slave and drudge. Many of the European patronesses of distinction, as soon as they heard of the plan of an Orphan Refuge, hailed it as a most admirable one for rearing a much better class of ladies'-maids or ayahs than was generally to be found in Calcutta, and who could speak English withal; but they little comprehended Mrs. Wilson's scheme. She did not educate for the benefit of the European, but of the native. A few of the most intelligent were taught to read and write English, but all knowledge was conveyed through the medium of their own language; and none were allowed to quit the Refuge until they were sought in marriage by suitable native Christians, or till their services were required to assist in forming other orphan retreats. As soon as the dwellings were finished, a place of worship was erected, and steps taken to induce a missionary and his wife to proceed to India to preside over this singular establishment. For all these undertakings funds were never wanting; and though their avowed purpose was to spread Christianity, many rich and influential natives contributed to them; and one Brahmin of high caste, when bequeathing a handsome sum, said he did so under the conviction that their originator was more than human. Before all Mrs. Wilson's plans were brought to maturity, many had gone and done likewise; and influential societies of various denominations were formed to promote female education in the East. There are now several Orphan Refuges in Calcutta, and one in almost every large station in India. It is not my purpose to speak of these: I wish only to record whence they all sprung, and who led the way in the good and great work. Mrs. Wilson is no longer with her lambs, but her deeds do follow her; and wherever the despised and outcast native female child may hereafter find a Christian home, and receive a Christian training, she should be taught to bless the name of Mrs. Wilson, as the first originator of the philanthropic scheme.

WINTER, LUCRETIA WILHELMINA,

(HER maiden name was Van Merken,) was born in 1745, in Amsterdam, Holland. She was married to the poet Nicolaus Simon Winter, with whose writings a great deal of her poetry was published. She was a poetess of the Dutch school; all her verses bear the impress of labour, and the marks of a great deal of polishing. She wrote the two epics, "David," and "Germanicus," and a number of miscellaneous poems, published in 1793. She died in 1795, at Leyden, Holland.

WOFFINGTON, MARGARET,

AN actress, celebrated for her beauty, elegance, and talent, was born at Dublin in 1718. She acted in the London and Dublin theatres, and was very much admired. She was sprightly, good-humoured, and charitable; and her society was sought by the gravest and most learned persons. She died in London, in 1760.

WOLF, ARNOLDINA,

A NATIVE of Cassel, in Germany, was born in 1769. Her father was an officer in the Hessian government; but he died while she was quite young. When she was about eighteen, she was attacked by a very painful disease, which prevented her from sleeping for nearly twenty-six weeks. She alleviated her sufferings by repeating and composing poetry. The poems she composed while in this state were published in 1788. At length she fell into an apparent state of insensibility, in which she hardly seemed to live; but she could hear, and was conscious of a great dread lest she should be buried alive. In four weeks she began to recover, and in time regained her health. She married, in 1791, Mr. Wolf, by whom she had nine children. She died, in 1820, at Smalcalden. Her poems, and an account of her illness, were published by Dr. Wiss.

WOLF, MRS.,

A GERMAN actress, who, like her husband, immortalized herself on the stage, and, like him, enjoyed, during her lifetime, the most glorious triumph. She united to a tall figure, an expressive physiognomy, and a noble, dignified carriage. Her pliant organs of speech rendered her utterance very easy, and she had cultivated highly this part of her art. Thus she was peculiarly adapted to tragedy, in which she represented with success the first heroines. Instances of her characters are: Iphigenia, Stella, Mary Stuart, Queen Elizabeth; the Princess, in Schiller's "Bride of Messina;" Clara, in Goëthe's "Egmont;" Adelheid, in Goëthe's "Goetz von Berlichingen;" Leonore, in Goëthe's "Tasso;" Eboli, in Schiller's "Don Carlos;" Sappho, in Grillparzer's drama of this name; and others. But she has also succeeded in cheerful and naïf parts. Everywhere, she betrayed a deep study of her part, a true conception of the whole, and a delicate taste for poetical beauties; moreover, her gestures were animated by charming grace, and she knew how to transport the spectator in those moments which the poet had chosen for his peculiar triumphs. Her declamation was not to be excelled, and still did not at all appear like art; she was also able, by her costume, to beautify and call into existence the artificial character which she represented. Mr. and Mrs. Wolf were engaged at the theatre at Berlin; and the public, though accustomed to Fleck and Zoffland, and Mrs. Bethmann, knew how to appreciate this rare couple, and rewarded them with those distinguished marks of approbation which they so richly deserved.

WOOD, JEAN,

Was the daughter of the Rev. John Moncure, a Scotch clergyman of the Episcopal church, who emigrated to America, and was the first progenitor of the numerous Virginia families bearing his name. He possessed considerable talents, which his third daughter, Jean, inherited. She was very intellectual, and highly gifted with poetical and musical genius. Of poetry, she has left some beautiful specimens, which it is in contemplation to publish, as they are sufficiently numerous to constitute a small volume, and well worth being put into such a form.

Though entirely self-taught, she played with taste and skill on the guitar, the piano, and the spinet, an instrument much in vogue in her day; indeed, so thoroughly did she make herself acquainted with it, that she has been known to employ her ingenuity very successfully in restoring an injured one to complete order and harmony; and such was her energy of character and perseverance in whatever she undertook, that when she had the misfortune to be overset in a carriage, and break her right wrist, she quickly learned to use her left hand in working, and even to write with it, not only legibly but neatly, and this when she was past sixty!

The early part of Mrs. Wood's life was tinged with romance. At seventeen, she reciprocated the ardent attachment of a young gentleman from Maryland, and they became engaged; but their union was prevented by her relations, because of his being a Roman Catholic. When they separated, they exchanged vows never to wed with others; so that years afterwards, when addressed by General James Wood (once Governor of Virginia), she declined his proposals, and bidding her, as he thought, "a long and last adieu," he proceeded to the west, intending to join in the war against the Indians. Before his departure, he made a will, bequeathing her, in case of his death, all his property. Fate, however, allotted him a brighter destiny; for Miss Moncure having been informed that her first lover had broken his pledge and wedded another, yielded to the advice of a cousin, with whom, since the death of her parents, she frequently resided, and consented to marry Mr. Wood; and not until after their union, did she discover that she had been deceived!

In the meanwhile, Mr. — hearing of her marriage, considered himself absolved from his promise, and also entered the bands of matrimony; and here it is worth while to mention a remarkable coincidence in their subsequent history,

Mrs. Wood had an only child—a daughter—who was extremely intelligent until four years old, but was then seized with convulsions, and, owing to their frequent occurrence, grew up an idiot; and Mrs. Wood's first lover, Mr. —, of Maryland, had a son in a similar state!

Mrs. Wood devoted herself to this ill-fated daughter with all of a mother's tenderness and zeal, and many of her poetical effusions allude most touchingly to the deep affection she bore her, and the anxiety she suffered on her account. She lost her at the age of eighteen, and bewailed her death as bitterly as if she had been of those whom God endows with the blessings of intellect and beauty. After this event, and the decease of General Wood, she removed from the pleasant shades of Chelsea to Richmond, and there spent the remainder of her days in works of usefulness and charity. There, aided by her friend, Mrs. Samuel Pleasants, and by Mrs. Chapman, the lady of a British officer, she founded a society for assisting indigent widows and children. It was termed, the "Female Humane Association of the City of Richmond," and under that title was incorporated by the Legislature of Virginia, in 1811. Some years afterwards it changed its purpose, and exclusively appropriated its efforts and finances to the care and maintenance of female orphan children. Mrs. Wood was elected president, and continued untiringly and faithfully to discharge the arduous duties of that station until her death, in the sixty-eighth year of her age.

After the decease of Mrs. Wood, her pastor and friend, the Rev. Dr. John H. Rice, formed a society of ladies to work for the benefit of poor students of divinity in Hampden-Sydney College, and gave it the appellation of the "Jean Wood Association."

WORONZOFF, ELIZABETH,

A LADY belonging to a distinguished Russian family, was the mistress of Peter III., emperor of Russia. She afterwards married the senator Polinski. The countess Butterlin and the princess Daschkoff both belonged to the same family.

Y.

YATES, MARY,

A CELEBRATED actress, whose maiden name was Graham, was born about 1737. She made her theatrical début at Dublin, in 1752; but succeeded so ill, that Mr. Sheridan, the manager, was glad to dissolve her engagement by a present. Necessity urged her to another attempt; and in 1754, she appeared at Drury Lane, London, but was not very successful. On her marriage with Mr. Yates, under whose instruction her talents first developed themselves, Mr. Garrick received her again at Drury-Lane, and she soon became the first tragic actress of the day. She also excelled in comedy. She was very attractive in her appearance. Mrs. Yates retired from the stage in 1785, and died in London in 1787.

YEARSLEY, ANNE,

A POETESS, novel-writer, and dramatist, born at Bristol about 1756. Her mother was a milkwoman in that city, and she for some time exercised the same occupation. She was taught by her mother and brother to read and write; and having had opportunities of perusing Young's Night Thoughts, and some of the works of Pope, Milton, Dryden, and Shakspeare, her talents were called forth, and she produced several pieces of poetry which excited the attention of Mrs. Hannah More. To the assistance and advice of that lady, she was much indebted for the improvement of her abilities; and under her patronage, she published by subscription a volume of poems in 1785. The profits of this work enabled her to relinquish her business, for the congenial employment of keeping a circulating library at Bristol Hot Wells. Her subsequent publications were, a second collection of "Poems on Various Subjects," 1787; a short poem "On the Inhumanity of the Slave Trade," 1788; "Stanzas of Woe," addressed to Levi Ames, Esq., mayor of Bristol, 1790; "Earl Godwin," an historical tragedy, which was performed at the Bristol and Bath theatres; and a novel, entitled "The Royal Captive," 1795, four volumes, 12mo., founded on the history of the man with the iron mask, imprisoned in the Bastille, whom she supposes to have been a twin-brother of Louis XIV. She experienced great encouragement from the public in the course of her literary career; but an unfortunate quarrel with her patroness, Mrs. More, which, like most affairs of the kind, was carried on in a manner by no means creditable to either party, tended somewhat to injure her popularity. Some years before her death, she retired from trade, and resided with her family at Melksham, in Wiltshire, in a state of almost absolute seclusion. She died May 8th, 1806, leaving a son and two daughters. Another son, who had studied painting as a profession, and who appeared to be a talented individual, was cut off by a pulmonary disease, two or three years previously to the death of his mother. As her name is connected with that of Hannah More, and our readers may, on that account, be curious to see some specimen of the Lactilla style of poetry, we insert one written to her patroness in the summer of their friendship, before the frosts of suspicion on one side, and self-conceit on the other, had blighted their trust and hope in each other. Mrs. More overrated her protégée at the beginning, but Mrs. Yearsley had talents of considerable power, as she proved, by continuing to write after her patroness had given her up.

TO STELLA

(ON HER ACCUSING THE AUTHOR OF FLATTERY.)

Excuse me, Stella, sunk in humble state,
With more than needful awe I view the great;
No glossy diction e'er can aid the thought
First stamped in ignorance with error fraught.
My friends I've praised—they stood in heavenly guise
When first I saw thee, and my mental eyes Shall in that heavenly rapture view thee still
For mine's a stubborn and a savage will;
No customs, manners, nor soft arts I boast,
On my rough soul your nicest rules are lost.
Yet shall unpurged gratitude be mine,
While Stella deigns to nurse the spark divine.
A savage pleads—let e'en her errors move,
And your forgiving spirit melt in love.
O cherish gentle Pity's lambent flame,
From Heaven's own bosom the soft pleader came.
Then deign to bless a soul, who'll ne'er degrade
Your gift, tho' sharpest miseries invade.
You I acknowledge next to bounteous heaven,
Like his, your influence cheers whene'er 'tis given:
Blest in dispensing, gentle Stella, hear
My only short, but pity-moving prayer.
That thy great soul may spare the rustic muse,
Whom science ever scorned, and errors still abuse.

Z.

ZANARDI, GENTILE,

WAS an artist, a native of Bologna, and flourished in the seventeenth century. She was instructed by Marc Antonio Franceschini, and had an extraordinary talent in copying the works of the great masters. She also painted historical subjects of her own design with equal taste and delicacy. The time of her death is not mentioned.

ZANWISKI, CONSTANTIA, PRINCESS CZARTONYSKA,

A NOBLE and accomplished woman, was the wife of Andrzej Zanwiski, a distinguished defender of the rights of Poland. She died in 1797.

ZAPPI, FAUSTINA,

WAS daughter of the painter Carlo Mazatti, and wife of Giambattista Zappi, who was born in 1668, and died in 1719. Faustina was beautiful, and a poetess. Some of her sonnets are very fine. She resided principally at Rome.

ZINGA, ANNA.

A MORE odious spirit, licentious, blood-thirsty, and cruel, never inhabited the form of woman! And yet she is deserving of a place in this Record; for she, in understanding and ability, stepped far beyond her countrymen, and the circumstances under which she lived. Zinga was born in Matamba, in Africa, in 1582. Her father was what the European travellers and writers chose to term a king. What state or elevation could be assumed by a chief of negroes and cannibals, it would be difficult to define; but, at all events, he was the principal personage of his tribe. Nothing can be said about a throne, where a bench or chair was a rare and inappreciable luxury. Zinga manifested a craft and management by which she soon got the better of her brothers; and, upon the death of her father, investing herself with the sacred character of priestess, became the leading spring of the people. At that time, the Dutch and Portuguese were attempting a rival influence on the coast of Africa for commercial purposes; religious difficulties became involved in this rivalry; there were no doubt many missionaries of high and pure motives; while others, forgetting their message of peace, served to exacerbate the opposition among Christians

Zinga had the good sense to appreciate the advantages she could derive from the Christians; she visited the Portuguese settlement, ingratiated herself with the governor, and was baptized. With their aid, she soon made herself predominant among all the tribes of the neighbourhood; and, as soon as she had destroyed all whom she might have feared, she abjured her new faith, and returned to her idols. For some time she lived feared and respected among her own people; but, perpetrating acts of despotic cruelty too terrible for detail, she soon became wearied of reigning over a race of trembling savages. Her intercourse with the Portuguese had taught her the advantages of civilization, and her own sagacity perceived that the introduction of Christianity could alone improve her nation. She sent for priests, and again became a nominal member of the Christian church. She was now sixty-five years old, and determined to remain faithful to the injunctions of the missionaries. Her example was followed by those who surrounded her; and, had she lived, the spirit of the Gospel might have tempered this savage race; but a sudden sickness put an end to her existence in 1663.

Her courage and vigour were remarkable; she was naturally formed for government; and her native capacity and energy would, in a different country and with suitable education, have made a great queen; while her extreme hardness of heart must have rendered her hateful and repulsive as a woman. Still, she exhibited better dispositions than any king of her race had ever done; and she was the first of her tribe who made any attempt to adopt Christianity. Had she been born and brought up under its blessed light, how different would have been her character and her destiny! When such instances of the capacity of the coloured race are brought before us, we should be awakened to the importance of sending the Gospel and the means of instruction to the wretched millions of women and children in Africa.

REMARKS ON THE FOURTH ERA.

THIS period is a record of the living—the time comprised being about half a century, or from 1800 to 1868.

Some readers may think I have given undue prominence to sketches and selections designating those still on the stage of humanity, moving and acting among us. It is my purpose to attract attention to these writers and doers in the present, who are now infusing vitality into the “soul of goodness,” thereby depriving evil of its power to deceive. The Past is dead; it may teach like a tomb-stone; it cannot persuade like the living voice.

Open before me an herbarium of choice specimens, gathered from fields of foreign fame, and places of old renown; I may admire the beauty of the flowers, and the skill that has preserved their forms and colours; but I never inquire how the plants were cultivated, nor do I try to train my own to become like them.

But show me a living, blossoming plant, that has healing leaves and odour-breathing flowers, blessing alike the sunshine and the shade, and I am in earnest to learn the manner of its growth, and the mode of its culture. Thus the Fourth Era of this record will be of more benefit, as affording examples for the young, and encouragement to those who are waiting some way to be opened to their endeavours, than all the histories in the preceding pages.

One of the most subtle devices of the powers of darkness to perpetuate sin, is to keep women in restraint and concealment—hidden, as it were, behind the shadow of the evil world. They may not even express openly their abhorrence of vice—it is unfeminine; and if they seek to promote good, it must be by stealth, as though it were wrong for them to be recognised doing anything which has a high aim.

The Saviour gave no precept, and left no example, thus restraining the sex. On the contrary, He was constantly bringing forward feminine examples of faith and love, encouraging the exertions and commending the piety of ministering women. Thus, when at Bethany Mary came to the feast made for Him, opened her box of “very precious ointment, and poured it on His head as He sat at meat,” and the disciples were angry at this public display of her zeal, then Jesus signally rebuked their selfishness, declaring, “She hath wrought a good work,” and emphatically announcing her undying fame—“Verily, I say unto you, Whosoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her.”

What signal honour was conferred openly on the sex, when a woman was thus praised by the Son of God! Let this console us when men undervalue the feminine mind, and strive to stifle the feminine soul. Let us do what we can; trust in God, and He will make our memorial sure. His Word will finally overcome the powers of darkness. Good men will yet follow the example of Christ, and accord, publicly, praise and honour to the work of woman.

This high standard of society is even now approximated by the Anglo-Saxon race, which will soon rule the world—the only people who have the true light. Every false religion may be known by this—it represents women as inferior to man; it sacrifices her honour, happiness, and glory, to his brute appetites, sensuous passions, and selfish pride. In such an atmosphere, the animal lives, the angel perishes, till humanity is morally dead. In this galaxy of living feminine genius, there is not a single ray from the wide horizon of heathendom. There, the mother mind is shrouded in the pall of ignorance, and therefore men are in the gross darkness of idolatry and sin.

The same low ideas concerning the office and destiny of woman govern, in a degree, all those nations where Christianity is a form of words and ceremonies, and not the quickening spirit of holiness in the soul—of purity in the life of the believer. Throughout the continent of Europe, the feminine mind is considered inferior to the masculine, and woman’s genius is only appreciated as it ministers to the sensuous gratification of man. Hence, the gifted daughters of those lands are romance-writers, public singers, dancers, artists; while every higher effort of their mental powers is, alike by potentates, priests, and philosophers, discouraged, disparaged, and nearly annihilated. There is not now an example among them of great feminine genius devoted to the noblest pursuits of the human mind—namely, seeking Truth and teaching Duty. Doubtless there are excellent women in those countries, and some of rare talents; but their souls have no expression, their virtues no voice. Military force extinguishes moral feeling. Where nearly two millions of men are soldiers, much of the out-door work they should do is devolved on the women; which circumstance alone deteriorates society. But the sins and sufferings caused by wars, where these are fought, add the deepest woe to the wrongs of women.

In truth, when we look over the world, with the exception of two nations, it still bears that shadow of gloom which fell when the ground first drank human blood; and Man the Murderer, Woman the Mourner, is still the great distinction between the sexes!

Thank God! there is hope. The Anglo-Saxon race in Europe numbers about thirty millions, living on a little island in the stormy Northern Ocean. But there, for over a hundred years, the sounds of battle have not been heard; the Salic Law never shamed the honour of their royal race; the Holy Bible has been for three centuries their household book, and a free press now disseminates truth among the people. Those thirty millions hold the mastery of mind over Europe and Asia; if we trace out the causes of this superiority, they would centre in that moral influence which true religion confers on the woman.

Therefore the Queen of Great Britain is the greatest and most honoured sovereign now enthroned; feminine genius is the grace and glory of British literature; feminine piety the purest light of the Anglican Church; and this Era is made brilliant by the distinguished women of the British Island.

There is still a more wonderful example of this uplifting power of the educated mind of woman. It is only ninety years since the Anglo-Saxons in the New World became a nation, then numbering about three millions of souls. Now, this people form the Great American Republic, with a population of thirty millions; and the destiny of the world will soon be in their keeping! The Bible has been their "Book of books" since the first Puritan exile set his foot on Plymouth Rock. Religion is free; and the soul, which woman always influences where God is worshipped in spirit and truth, is untrammelled by code, or creed, or caste. No blood has been shed on the soil of this nation, save in the sacred cause of freedom and self-defence; therefore, the blasting evils of war have seldom been felt; nor has the woman ever been subjected to the hard labour imposed by God upon the man—that of "subduing the earth." The advantages of primary education have been accorded to girls equally with boys, and, though the latter have, in their endowed colleges, enjoyed the special benefit of direct legislation, yet public sentiment has always been favourable to feminine education, and private liberality has supplied, in a good degree, the means of instruction to the daughters of the republic. The result is before the world,—a miracle of national advancement. American mothers train their sons to be Men!

The Old Saxon stock is yet superior to the New in that brilliancy of feminine genius, the artificial state of social life in England now fosters and elicits—surpassing every nation in its list of learned ladies; yet in all that contributes to popular education and pure religious sentiment among the masses, the women of America are in advance of all others on the globe. To prove this, we need only examine the list of American missionary women, the teachers and authoresses of works instructive and educational, contained in this "Record."

But, after all, it is not so much what women do for themselves, as what men do for them, which marks the real state of both. Now, the men of America uphold the honour of the gentle sex by the tenderest care and most respectful observance, acknowledging with warm praises the talents of their countrywomen. And, what is of higher significance, American men believe in the natural excellence of the feminine mind. Hence the most learned and noble in the land united in the experiment of developing the intellect of a poor little girl—deaf, dumb, blind! And these great men are proud to measure the powers of the human soul by its wonderful capacity as shown in this delicate feminine form.

The true progress of every race is marked in the condition of the women. The most distinguished exponent of the remarkable progress of the Anglo-Saxons—the governing race of the world—is Laura Bridgman.

FOURTH ERA.

OF LIVING FEMALE WRITERS.

AGNOULT, COUNTESS D',

Is only known as a writer by the name of Daniel Stern. Madame Dudevant, a woman of unquestionable, though very ill-directed, genius, among other eccentricities, adopted the undignified measure of renouncing her sex, as far as possible, by not only entering the lists of fame under a masculine name, but often assuming masculine apparel. False shows and seemings are always unworthy of a strong or healthy mind; unless there are extraordinary circumstances making concealment, for a time, justifiable; but for one who might be a champion, to desert his or her party, merely because it is physically the weakest, to appear in the uniform of the more powerful, shows certainly a want of "spirit, taste, and sense." To repeat this unwomanly and senseless proceeding was a fault in Madame d'Agnoult: it has lost even the grace of novelty, and the talent of the authoress—author, if she wish it,—causes a regret that she is not satisfied to be herself. This lady belongs to a family of rank, and is distinguished not only for literary abilities, but possesses a fine taste in the arts, which has been developed by her travels in Italy. Reversing the career of most imaginative writers, she began as a critic—having contributed, in "La Presse" of 1842 and '43, several articles that attracted much attention. The novel "Nélida," which appeared in 1846, has been received by the reading public with great favour—having been translated into German, English, and Spanish. She has also produced several political and critical essays, besides various romances.

ALBERETTI, VERDONI THERESE,

Of Verona, Italy. This lady, eminently distinguished for her graces and accomplishments, is the authoress of poems that are admired alike for a delicacy of thought and expression. The Abbé Giuseppe Barbresi, well known in Italy for his success in works of elegant literature, has inserted some of the poems of this admired authoress in the collection of his own works.

AMELIA MARIA FREDERICA AUGUSTA,

DUCHESS and princess of Saxony, was born in 1794. Her father, Prince Maximilian, was the youngest son of the Elector Frederic Christian. His eldest brother, Frederic Augustus, Elector, and afterwards king of Saxony, ruled this country sixty-four years, from 1763 to 1827. His reign was one of much vicissitude, as it embraced the period of Napoleon's career. An allusion to the political events of that day is not foreign to the present subject, as the literary abilities and consequent fame of the Princess Amelia could never have been developed under the old order of things in a contracted German court; neither could she have acquired that knowledge of life essential to the exercise of her dramatic talent: born fifty years sooner, she would have ranked merely among the serene highnesses of whom "to live and die" forms all the history. Fortunately for Amelia, the storms that were to clear the political atmosphere began before her birth: from the age of twelve till that of twenty-three she saw her family suffering exile; then enjoying return and sovereignty; her uncle prisoner—again triumphant. During this period her opportunities for observation, her suggestions for thought, her mental education, were most various and extensive. Scenes and characters were studied fresh from life—"not obtained through books." In 1827, her uncle, King Frederic Augustus, died, and was succeeded by his brother Anthony—a rather jolly old person, but exceedingly fond of his niece Amelia. She possessed much influence over him, and exercised it in a way that gained her great favour with high and low. In 1830, a revolution changed the government from a despotism to a limited monarchy. Anthony died in 1836, when the brother of Amelia became sovereign. Under her uncle's reign it would have scarcely been possible for her to appear as the authoress of acted dramas; but her brother had been brought up under a new order of things, and considered it no derogation for a scion of royalty to extend the influence of virtue and elevated morality by the aid of an art that makes its way to the general public with a peculiar force.

It is a curious circumstance that her first drama, which was offered under the name of Amelia Heiter, was refused by the managers of the court-theatre, and only appeared there after its confirmed success on the stage of Berlin. Mrs. Jamieson, from whom this sketch is principally derived, observes that the German drama was in an abyss of stupidity at the most flourishing epoch of the French and English stage. It was in the zenith of Garrick's reputation at London that the first efforts were made to give something like sense and taste to the representations of Germany, and these efforts were made by a woman, Johanna Neuber, a manager and director of the best company in Germany; she it was who enabled Lessing to produce his great works, and thus to awaken his countrymen to a sense of beauty and utility in dramatic poetry. Two or three women had manifested some ability in this branch of art before the Princess Amelia began her career. Johanna Von Weissertburn of Vienna, an actress, has left twelve or fourteen volumes of plays; some of which are still performed, and retain public favour. Another once popular writer was Charlotte Birch-Pfeiffer, who produced dramas depicting the life of the burghers and artisans: one of her pieces, called "Güttenberg," is a series of tableaux of the most extraordinary nature, illustrating the fortunes of the inventor of printing—a subject that would scarcely strike a modern dramatist in a poetical point of view. The Princess Amelia has gained by her plays a popularity deservedly exceeding any of her predecessors or contemporaries in the kind she has undertaken; for it must be remembered she is, though a woman of genius, no poet; her mind is elevated, truth-loving, and eager to convey useful lessons; she possesses a delicate discrimination of character, and infinity of gentle humours; her style is refined, and, at all times, as elegant as the attention to proprieties of the dramatis personæ will permit. She attacks selfishness and deception with an unflinching hostility, and her instructions are conveyed by such amusing and natural delineations that they cannot fail to excite a detestation of these vices; and even when such emotions are transient, they are a refreshing dew to the hard soil they cannot penetrate.

Before leaving the account of this illustrious lady, it may be remarked that her family are distinguished by something more than "leather and prunella" from the merely "monarch crowned." The present king, Amelia's brother, has published a work on botany and mineralogy, and Prince John the Younger has translated Dante into German poetry. She had a grandmother too, another Princess Amelia, whose biography is to be found in a preceding part of this work, who composed operas.

Mrs. Jamieson, in adverting to the possibility of this princess swaying the "reins of empire" in default of a male heir, speaks of the infinitely wider sway she now exercises by her individual goodness and talent. Some of these observations may be quoted, so perfectly do they agree with every idea our own efforts would inculcate.

"I respect her for the good she has done, and I think it honour to be the means of making her farther known. In this kind of spiritual influence, however and wherever exercised, be it in a larger or smaller circle, lies the true vocation, the undisputed empire of the intellectual woman—not in any of those political powers and privileges which have been demanded for us by eloquent pens, and "most sweet voices," but which every woman who has looked long upon life, and well considered her own nature, and the purposes for which she came into the world, would at once abjure if offered."

AMELIE MARIE, EX-QUEEN OF THE FRENCH,

DAUGHTER of Ferdinand I., king of the Two Sicilies, was married to Louis Philippe, then the exiled duke d'Orleans, November, 1809. It was, apparently, a marriage of affection with the duke, but on her side of that absorbing love which seemed to seek nothing beyond the content of her husband—except his salvation—to complete her felicity. In all the changes of his life, she was with him as his wife; sensible to the smiles or frowns of fortune only as these affected her husband.

In 1814, after the fall of Napoleon, the duke of Orleans with his family removed to Paris; and the immense estates of his father were restored to him. At Neuilly he resided in a superb palace, surrounded with every luxury; yet amid all this magnificence the simple tastes, order, and economy which distinguish the presence of a good wife, were predominant. They had nine children born to them; the training of these while young was their mother's care, and her example of obedience and reverence towards her husband, deepened and decided his influence over his family, which was a model of union, good morals, and domestic virtues.

By the events of July, 1830, Louis Philippe became King of the French; but this honour seems only to have increased the cares of his wife by her fears on his account; she never appears to have valued the station for any accession of dignity and importance it gave to her. Indeed, it is asserted that she was very adverse to his assuming the sceptre; with the instinct of a true woman's love, she probably felt that his happiness, if not his good name and his life, might be perilled; but he decided to be king, and she meekly took her place by his side, sharing his troubles, but not seeking to share his power. The French nation respected her character, and never imputed any of the king's folly, treachery, and meanness, to her; still the fervid truth of her soul was never surmised till she descended from the throne. Then she displayed what is far nobler than royalty of birth or station, the innate moral strength of woman's nature, when, forgetting self and sustaining every trial with a calm courage, she devotes her energies for the salvation of others. It has been said, that the queen endeavoured to prevent the abdication of Louis Philippe, that kneeling before him she exclaimed — "C'est le devoir d'un roi de mourir parmi son peuple!" But when he resolved on flight, it is known that her presence of mind sustained and guided him as though he had been a child. The sequel is familiar to all the world. They fled to England; Louis Philippe left Paris for the last time and for ever, on the 26th of February, 1848. Supported on the arm of his noble wife, he reached the carriage that bore them from their kingdom, and on the 26th of August, 1850, he passed from this world—forgiven of his sins, let us hope. He had been all his life a philosopher, that is to say, an infidel; but at the closing scene the piety and prayers of his wife seem to have been heard; the old king became a young penitent, performing with earnestness those holy rites his wife believes necessary to salvation. And she, who could never be happy if parted from him even for a day, resigned him to God without a murmur;—and now devotes herself to the interests her deceased husband considered important, calmly and cheerfully as though he was still by her side. Well might that husband feel what one of his biographers observes he manifested so strongly, that "It was impossible to be in the company of Louis Philippe for half an hour, without some indication of his remarkable respect for his wife." And it should always be remembered to his honour, that in his domestic life, as husband and father, he deserves the highest regard. This purity of private morals, so rare in the stations he occupied, was undoubtedly owing to the excellence of his early education, almost entirely conducted by a woman—hence his respect for the sex.

We place the name of Amelie, ex-Queen of the French, in our record, not because she has worn a crown, or displayed great talents, or performed any distinguished deed; but because she has been the perfect example of a good wife.

ANCELOT, VIRGINIE,

WIFE of the celebrated M. Ancelot, author of "Marie Padilla," and many other tragedies and dramas of great popularity, has a literary reputation little inferior to that of her husband. As an author of vaudevilles—that species of writing in which the French excel, she is regarded as having surpassed her husband; while her novels have displayed no small degree of talent. She resides in Paris, where her works are highly prized by that increasing class of novel-readers, who are willing to be amused and interested with portraits of the bright side of nature, the good which may be found in humanity, and hoped for in the future of our race.

Madame Ancelot exhibits artistic skill in the plot of her stories; her style is unexceptionable, and above all she has the merit of purity of thought, and soundness of moral principle. The most noted of her novels are "Gabrielle;" "Emerance;" and "Médérine." The first named has been included in the "Bibliothèque de l'Élite," and passed through several editions. The spirit and style of this work are in accordance with the sentiment of the popular English novels; those who admire Mrs. Gore's writings will find as much to amuse and interest them in "Gabrielle," with a more elevated tone of moral feeling. We will select our specimen of this authoress from the opening chapter of "Gabrielle."

AN OLD PEERESS.

— "There are no longer any women! no, my dear Count, there are no longer any women," mournfully exclaimed the Marchioness de Fontenay-Mareuil, turning towards the Count de Rhinville, seated by her side in the carriage. The count sighed, but did not appear at all disposed to question or oppose a proposition which might, at first, seem singular and rash.

The marchioness, not meeting any contradiction, was forced to renounce the pleasure of an argument. Was M. de Rhinville, who had been so long familiar with her ideas, convinced, or did he fear lest she should try to convince him? He did not answer, nor even show any surprise, when the marchioness uttered this phrase, which occurred, it is true, often enough in her conversation, for him to be accustomed to it.

They both then remained silent, whilst the carriage continued to proceed with rapidity—they had but little to say, for both had reached an advanced age—then words are slow, sad, and unfrequent. The ardent expressions of youth always unfold wholly or in part their ideas, plans, hopes, sorrows, and pleasures. They have so much to say that they speak often without knowing it, and all together; but two old people, on the contrary, would naturally be silent if they had not resolved to converse; and even then, in spite of their determination, their sentences are often unfinished. Sometimes, even when on the point of speaking, if they look at each other, they are silent; for they see those whitened locks, those furrowed brows, those traces of time and grief imprinted upon their countenances. They read there the sorrows and regrets of the past; the sadness of the present; and the few hopes which the future can offer, at least for this life.

The Marchioness de Fontenay-Mareuil, notwithstanding her seventy years, seemed now agitated by some great project, for she resumed the conversation with vivacity: "And it is because there are no longer any women, Count de Rhinville, that France is ruined—that the young men are ruined, and that my grandson——"

Here she stopped, fearing to utter a precise complaint against the object of her pride and tenderness.

M. de Rhinville could not repress a smile while saying:

"I should have thought just the contrary."

She, the marchioness, was not, at this time, inclined to jest, so she remained grave and sad while adding: "Undoubtedly, there are still young girls, married women and mothers. Men still marry women who are rich, and love those who are pretty; but their power is limited exclusively to these rights! Saloons exist no longer; conversation has ceased; good taste has disappeared with it, and mind has lost all its influence. You have a king who appoints and dismisses ministers; a house of deputies which makes and abolishes laws; a house of peers which neither makes nor abolishes anything; but is there any power to create agreeable men? to accustom young men to refined habits? to teach them that good taste is the proof of a good understanding, and noble manners the consequence of noble feelings? to impose upon them, by public opinion, those laws of politeness and good sense which are not found in the civic code? What power will induce them to doubt their own perfections sufficiently to endeavour to become men of merit without ceasing to be agreeable men? Still, my friend, this power, now, with so many others, extinct, formerly existed!—it was the power of women. Then, fear of the opinion of the saloons in which the Duke Yves de Mauléon would live, would have prevented him from separating so entirely from his family; that he, the last scion of two noble houses, the heir of so great a name, should live in the midst of a society which is not ours, and there act——" She stopped again; she seemed unable to utter the words which were on her lips.

"The rumour is true then," enquired the count, "which I have heard?——"

"What have you heard? Who has told you?"

Speak! Tell me! I wish to know all!" asked the marchioness apprehensively.

"Nothing very serious; nothing which could compromise the honour of a family," replied M. de Rhinville.

"I wish to know every thing," repeated she impatiently. Notwithstanding the anxiety and trouble depicted on the countenance of the marchioness, the count could not repress a slight smile in saying:

"Merely some youthful follies which are laughingly related, with which the world is amused, and which it very soon forgets. They say, that having attained his majority, and being put in possession of an income of fifteen or twenty thousand livres, all that remained of the immense wealth of his ancestors, M. de Mauléon, finding this moderate fortune too small to suit his rank and wishes, and, as he said, not willing to live, at twenty and a duke, like an old grocer retired from business, sold his property, and dividing into four parts the four hundred thousand francs which he had received, determined, four years ago, to live as if he had an income of a hundred thousand livres. They add that your son was so faithful to his word, that yesterday saw, at the same time, the end of the four years and of the four hundred thousand livres."

ANGOULÊME, MARIE THERÉSA CHARLOTTE,

DUCHESS d', dauphiness, daughter of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, born December 19th, 1778, at Versailles, displayed in early youth a penetrating understanding, an energetic will, and the tenderest feelings of compassion. She was about eleven years old when the revolution commenced; its horrors, and the sufferings her royal parents underwent, stamped their impress upon her soul, and tinged her character with a melancholy never to be effaced in this life. The indignities to which her mother was subjected never could be forgotten by the daughter. The whole family were imprisoned, August 10th, 1792, in the Temple. In December, 1795, the princess was exchanged for the deputies whom Dumourier had surrendered to the Austrians. Her income at this time was the interest of 400,000 francs, bequeathed to her by the archduchess Christina of Austria. During her residence at Vienna, she was married by Louis XVIII., to her cousin, the duke of Angoulême, June 10, 1799, at Mittau. The emperor of Russia signed the contract. In 1801, the political situation of Russia obliged all the Bourbons to escape to Warsaw. In 1805, they returned, by permission of the emperor Alexander, to Mittau. Towards the end of 1816, the successes of Napoleon obliged them to flee to England. Here the princess lived a very retired life at Hartwell, till 1814, when on the restoration of the Bourbons, she made her entrance May 4th, into Paris with the king. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, she was at Bordeaux with her husband. Her endeavours to preserve this city for the king being ineffectual, she embarked for England, went to Ghent, and on Napoleon's final expulsion, returned again to Paris. From this city she was driven by the revolution of 1830, which placed Louis Philippe on the throne of the French. She fled with her husband, the unfortunate Charles X., first to England; from thence the royal fugitives went to Germany, where she now resides. She had realized almost every turn of fortune's wheel, and endured sorrows and agonies such as very seldom are the lot of humanity. In every situation she has exhibited courage and composure, the indubitable evidence of a strong mind. And she also displayed the true nobility of soul which forgives injuries and does good whenever an opportunity presents. Napoleon once remarked that the "Duchess d'Angoulême was the only man of her family," and certainly she was in every respect superior to her husband, whose qualities were rather sound than brilliant; he had good sense, was of a generous disposition, had studied the spirit of the age, and understood the concessions which were due; but he cherished the doctrine that the heir of the throne should be the first to evince the most implicit obedience to the king; and thus sanctioned the adoption of measures he wanted the courage to oppose. "The duchess was of a character more firm," says a writer, describing the causes which led to the revolution of 1830. "She evinced no longer, or but feebly, that haughty expression of feeling with which she had been reproached at the first restoration. The necessity of concession had already wrought many changes in her mind. Without any liberal tendencies, she saw that when once a revolution has pervaded a nation it has scattered the seeds of both good and evil; and that to rule, we must learn how to respect not only commonly-acquired rights, but conquests the most opposed to our own convictions, even as Henry IV. had done. All opinions, then so prevalent upon her character, were erroneous. It was said that she was excessively religious; true; but her piety was real and enlightened, and sought not to be distinguished by a courtly train of bishops and of priests. As her misfortunes had been infinite, so had they left their impression; she could not abandon herself to a careless gaiety of life, and for this she was reproached; but yet there was still mingled with this an asperity both of manner and of speech, and when excited, and reassuming then all the ancient pride of her house, her opinions were imperatively expressed. Nevertheless, her firm and correct understanding, and the recollections of her misfortunes ever exercised a great influence over the king."

ARNIM, BETTINA VON,

BEST known to us by her letters, published as the "Correspondence of Goethe with a Child," is considered by the Germans one of their most gifted female writers. The very remarkable intercourse between the great "poetical Artist" and the "Child," is of a character which could never have happened but in Germany, where Philosophy is half-sister to Romance, and Romance appears half the time in the garb of Philosophy.

Bettina Brentano, grand-daughter of Sophia de la Roche, (see page 489,) was born at Frankfort on the Maine, about the year 1791. Her father, General Brentano, died of wounds received in the Prussian service; his wife did not long survive him, and their children, of whom Bettina was the youngest, were left orphans at an early age. There were two sons: Clement Brentano became celebrated in Germany for his work, "Des Knaben Wunderhorn," (The Boy's Wondrous Horn,) a collection of German popular songs; and Christian is mentioned in Bettina's letters; she had also a sister Sophia. Little Bettina, soon after the decease of her parents, became the favourite of Goethe's mother, who resided at Frankfort. It was his birth-place—Bettina's mother had been one of his devoted friends; so that from her earliest remembrance, the "Child" had heard the praises of the "Poet;"—and now his mother, whose love for him was little short of idolatry, completed the infatuation of Bettina. She had an ardent temperament; the name of Wolfgang Goethe acted as the spell of power to awaken her genius, and what was more remarkable, to develop the sentiment of love in a manner which seems so nearly allied to passion, that we cannot read her burning expressions without sadness, when reflecting that she, a maiden of sixteen summers, thus lavished the rich treasures of her virgin affections on a man sixty years old, whose heart had been indurated by such a long course of gross sensuality, as must have made him impenetrable in his selfish egotism to any real sympathy with her enthusiasm. And, moreover, he was a married man, if the ceremony which gave his house-keeper a legal right to call herself his wife, after living for sixteen years as his mistress, deserves the holy name of marriage. Goethe did not love Bettina; but her admiration flattered his vanity,—and he drew her on to make those passionate confessions which seem more like the ravings of an opium-eater, than the acknowledged feelings of a female soul.

The correspondence with Goethe commenced in 1807, when Bettina was, as we have stated, about sixteen, and continued till 1824. Soon after that period she was married to Ludwig Achim von Arnim, who is celebrated in Germany as a poet and novelist. He was born and resided at Berlin; thither he removed his lovely but very romantic wife; and Bettina became the star of fashion, as well as a literary star, in the brilliant circles of that metropolitan city. The sudden death of her husband, which occurred in 1831, left Bettina again to her own guidance; but she had learned wisdom from suffering, and did not give up her soul, as formerly, to the worship of genius. Since her widowhood she has continued to reside in Berlin, dividing her time between literature and charities. The warm enthusiasm of her nature displays itself in her writings, as well as in her deeds of benevolence. One of her works, "Dieu Buch gehoert dem Könige," (The King's Book,) was so bold in its tone, and so urgent on behalf of the "poor oppressed," that many of her aristocratic friends took alarm, and avoided the author, expecting she would be frowned upon by the king; but Frederick William is too politic to persecute a woman who only pleads that he will do good, and Madame von Arnim retains his favour, apparently, though his flatterers look coldly on her. The work has gained her great popularity with the people. Another work of hers, "Die Gûnderode," a romance in letters, is also very much admired, especially by young ladies; it is wild and extravagant, as are all her writings, but, at the same time, full of fine thoughts and beautiful feelings. All the natural impulses of the mind and heart of Bettina are good and pure; what she needed was and is a higher standard of morality, a holier object of adoration. The Æsthetic philosophy, referring the soul to the Beautiful as the perfection of art or human attainments, this, and not the Divine philosophy of the Bible, was the subject of her early study: the first bowed down her nature to worship Goethe—the last would have exalted her spirit to worship God! How the sweet fountain of her affections was darkened by the shadow of Goethe, and how this consciousness of his presence, as it were, constantly incited her to thoughts and expressions foreign to her natural character, must be evident to all who read the "Correspondence with a Child." We shall make our extracts from this work, and wish our limits permitted us to give more of Goethe's letters; these are short, and seem to have been written merely for the purpose of drawing out her replies, that he might study her young fresh heart as an entomologist would the colours of a butterfly he had fastened with his pin, and gain the rejuvenescence of his blasé nature from the full life of hers. That he intended to use her thoughts in his own writings he acknowledged to her; and his later works show that he did thus use them. Our first extract is a letter to Goethe's mother.

BETTINA TO FRAU RATH.*

MARCH 15th, 1807.

It is true I have received a letter from Wolfgang here in Rheingau; he writes, 'Keep my mother warm, and hold me dear.' These sweet lines have sunk into me like the first Spring rain; I am very happy that he desires me to love him; I know well that he embraces the whole world; I know that all men wish to see and speak with him, that all Germany says 'Our Goethe.' But I can tell you that, up to this day, the general inspiration of his greatness and his name has not yet arisen within me. My love to him is confined to that little white-walled room, where I first saw him; where the vine, trained by his own hand, creeps up the window; where he sits on the straw hassock, and holds me in his arms—there he lets in no stranger, and knows of nothing but me alone. Frau Rath, you are his mother, and to you I will tell it. When I saw him for the first time, and returned home, I found that a hair from his head had fallen upon my shoulder; I burnt it at the candle, and my heart was so touched that it also flamed, but merrily and joyfully, as flames in the blue sun-lit air, of which one is scarcely aware, and which consume their sacrifice without smoke: so will it be with me; I shall flutter joyfully my life long in the air, and no one will know whence the joy comes; it is only because I know that, when I come to him, he will be alone with me, and forget his laurels.

Farewell, and write to him of me.

BETTINA TO GOETEE.

When the sun shines hottest, the blue sky is often clouded; we fear the storm and tempest; a sultry air oppresses the breast, but at last the sun conquers, and sinks tranquil and burnished in the lap of evening.

Thus was it with me after writing to you; I was oppressed, as when a tempest gives warning of its approach, and I often blushed at the thought that you would find it wrong; at last my mistrust was dispelled by words which were few, but how dear! If you only knew what quick progress my confidence made in the same moment that I knew you were pleased with it! Kind, friendly man! I am so unskilled in interpreting such delicious words that I doubted their meaning, but your mother said, 'Don't be stupid, let him have written what he will, the meaning is, you shall write to him as often as you can, and what you like.' Oh, I can impart nothing to you but that, alone, which takes place in my heart. Oh, methought, could I now be with him, my sun of joy should illumine him with as bright a glow as the friendly look with which his eye met mine! Yes, splendid indeed! A purple sky my mind, a warm love-dew my words, the soul must come forth like a bride from her chamber, without evil, and avow herself. O, Master! in future I will see thee long and often by day, and often shall it be closed by such an evening.

I promise that that which passes within me, untouched by the outward world, shall be secretly and religiously offered to him who so willingly takes interest in me, and whose all-embracing power promises the fulness of fruitful nourishment to the young germs of my breast.

Without trust, the mind's lot is a hard one; it grows slowly and needily, like a hot plant betwixt rocks: thus am I—thus was I till to-day; and the fountain of the heart which could stream nowhere forth, finds suddenly a passage into light, and banks of balsam-breathing fields, blooming like paradise, accompany its course.

Oh, Goethe! my longings, my feelings, are melodies which seek a song to which they may adapt themselves. Dare I do so? then shall these melodies ascend high enough to accompany your songs.

Your mother wrote, as from me, that I laid no claim to an answer to my letters, and that I would not rob that time which would produce for eternity: but so it is not; my soul cries like a thirsty babe; all this time, past and future, I would drink into myself, and my conscience would make me but small reproach, if the world, from this time forth, should learn but little from you, and I more. Remember, in the mean time, that only a few words from you fill up a greater measure of joy than I expect from all futurity.

* Goethe's mother was always known by this title.

From Several Letters.

GOETHE TO BETTINA.

Thou art a sweet-minded child; I read thy dear letters with inward pleasure, and shall surely a'ways read them again with the same enjoyment. Thy pictures of what has happened to thee, with all inward feelings of tenderness, and what thy witty demon inspires thee with, are real original sketches, which, in the midst of more serious occupations, cannot be denied their high interest; take it, therefore, as a hearty truth, when I thank thee for them. Preserve thy confidence in me, and let it, if possible, increase. Thou wilt always be and remain to me what thou now art. How can one requite thee, except by being willing to be enriched with all thy good gifts. Thou, thyself, knowest how much thou art to my mother; her letters overflow with praise and love. Continue to dedicate lovely monuments of remembrance to the fleeting moments of thy good fortune. I cannot promise thee that I will not presume to work out themes so high-gifted and full of life, if they still speak as truly and warmly to the heart.

You are an unparalleled child, whom I joyfully thank for every enjoyment, for every bright glance into a spiritual life, which, without you, I should, perhaps, never have experienced.

All that you write is a spring of health to me, whose crystal drops impart to me a well-being. Continue to me this refreshment, upon which I place my dependence.

Your clear views upon men and things, upon past and future, are useful to me, and I deserve, too, that you grant me the best. [Such was the egotism of Goethe, who had given Bettina nothing, while he was using her very heart-strings to make him music!]

I wish to have your thoughts on art in general, and particularly on music, transmitted to me. Your solitary hours you can spend in no better way than in meditating on your dear caprice, and to entrust me with it.

By no means let slip the theme upon music, but on the contrary, continue to vary it in every possible manner. Continue to love me till happy stars bring us once more together.

From a Number of Letters.

BETTINA TO GOETHE.

Talent strikes conviction, but genius does not convince; to whom it is imparted, it gives forebodings of the immeasurable and infinite, while talent sets certain limits, and so because it is understood, is also maintained.

The infinite in the finite—genius in every art is music. In itself it is the soul, when it touches tenderly, but when it masters this affection, then it is spirit which warms, nourishes, bears and reproduces the own soul—and, therefore, we perceive music: otherwise the sensual ear would not hear it, but only the spiritual; and thus every art is the body of music, which is the soul of every art: and so is music, too, the soul of love, which also answers not for its working; for it is the contact of divine with human. Love expresses nothing through itself, but that it is sunk in harmony. Love is fluid; it flows in its own element, and that element is harmony.

I wish for you, Goethe, and believe it firmly, too, that all your enquiry, your knowledge, and that which the muse teaches you, and lastly also thy love, may, united, form a glorified body for thy spirit, that it may no longer be subject to the earthly body, when it puts it off, but may already have passed over into the spiritual body. Die you must not, he only must die whose spirit does not find the outlet. Thought wings the spirit, the winged spirit does not die, it finds not back the way to death.—

In love you are with the heroine of your new novel, and this makes you so retiring and cold to me.—God knows what model has served you here for an ideal; ah! you have a unique taste in women; Werther's Charlotte never edified me; had I then been at hand, Werther would never have shot himself, and Charlotte should have been piqued that I could console him so well.

I feel the same in William Meister; there, all the women are disgusting to me, I could "drive them all out of the temple," and I had built, too, upon it, that you have loved me as soon as you knew me, because I am better and more amiable than the whole female assemblage in your novels—yes, (and, really, this is not saying much) for you I am more amiable, if you the Poet will not find it out, for no other am I born; am I not the bee which flies forth, bringing home to you the nectar of each flower?

The moon is shining high above the hills, the clouds drive over like herds. I have already stood awhile at the windows, and looked at the chasing and driving above. Dear Goethe, good Goethe, I am alone, it has raised me out of myself, up to thee! Like a new-born babe, must I nurse this love between us; beautiful butterflies balance themselves upon the flowers which I have planted about its cradle, golden fables adorn its dreams, I joke and play with it, I try every stratagem in its favour. But you rule it without trouble, by the noble harmony of your mind—with you there is no need of tender expressions or protestations. While I take care of each moment of the present, a power of blessing goes forth from you, which reaches beyond all sense and above all the world.

ON MUSIC.

Yes! Christian Schlosser said, that you understood nothing of music, that you fear death, and have no religion; what shall I say to this? I am as stupid as I am mute, when I am so sensibly hurt. Ah! Goethe, if one had no shelter, which could protect in bad weather, the cold loveless wind might harm one, but I know you to be sheltered within yourself; but these three riddles are a problem to me. I would fain explain to you music in all its bearings, and yet I myself feel, that it is beyond sense and not understood by me; nevertheless I cannot retire from this Indissoluble, and I pray to it; no, the Inconceivable is ever—God; and there is no medium world, in which other secrets can be hidden. Since music is inconceivable, so is it like God; this I must say, and you will, with your notion of the “terz” and the “quint,” laugh at me! No! you are too good, you will not laugh; and then you are also too wise; you will surely willingly give up your studies and your conquered ideas, for such an all-hallowing mystery of the Divine Spirit in music. What could repay the pains of enquiry, if it were not this? after what could we enquire, which moves us, except the Divine only? And what can others, the well-studied, say better or higher upon it;—and if one of them should bring something forward against it, must he not be ashamed? If one should say, “Music is there, only that the human spirit may perfect itself therein.” Well, yes! we should perfect ourselves in God! If one say, it is only the connecting link with the Divine, but not God himself! No, ye false voices, your vain song is not divinely imbued! Ah! Divinity itself teaches us to understand the signs, that like it by our own powers, we may learn to govern in the realm of Divinity. All learning in art is only, that we may lay the foundation of self-dependence within us, and that it may remain our conquest. Some one has said of Christ, that he knew nothing of music: to this I could answer nothing; in the first place I am not nearly enough acquainted with his course of life, and then what struck me at the time, I can say only to you, although I do not know what you may answer to it. Christ says: “Your body also shall be glorified.” Is not music now the glorifying of sensual nature? Does not music so touch our senses, that we feel them melted into the harmony of the tones which you choose to reckon by terz and quint? Only learn to understand! You will wonder so much the more at the Inconceivable. The senses flow on the stream of inspiration, and that exalts them. All which spiritually lays claim on man, here goes over to the senses; therefore is it that through them he feels himself moved to all things. Love and friendship, and warlike courage, and longing after the Divinity, all boil in the blood; the blood is hallowed; it inflames the body, that it becomes of one instinct with the spirit. This is the effect of music on the senses, this is the glorifying of the body; the senses of Christ were dissolved in the Divine Spirit; they were of one instinct with him; he said: “What ye touch with the spirit as with the senses must be divine, for then your body becomes also spirit.” Look! this I myself almost felt and thought, when it was said, that Christ knew nothing about music.

Pardon me, that I thus speak with you, nearly without substantial ground, for I am giddy, and I scarcely perceive that which I would say, and forget all so easily again; but if I could not have confidence in you, to confess that which occurs to me, to whom else should I impart it?

This winter I had a spider in my room; when I played upon the guitar it descended hastily into a web which it had spun lower down. I placed myself before it, and drew my fingers across the strings; it was clearly seen how it vibrated through its little limbs; when I changed the chord, it changed its movements,—they were involuntary; by each different Arpeggio, the rhythm in its motions was also changed; it cannot be otherwise,—this little being was joy-penetrated, or spirit-imbued, as long as my music lasted; when that stopped it retired. Another little playfellow was a mouse, but he was more taken by vocal music: he chiefly made his appearance when I have sung the gamut; the fuller I swelled the tones, the nearer it came; in the middle of the room it remained sitting; my mother was much delighted by the little animal; we took great care not to disturb him. When I sung songs and varying melodies he seemed to be afraid; he could not endure it, and ran hastily away. Thus, then, the gamut seemed fitted for this little creature; prevailed over it, and (who can doubt?) prepared the way for something loftier within it; these tones, given with the utmost purity,—beautiful in themselves, touched these organs; this swelling and sinking to silence raised the little creature into another element. Ah, Goethe! what shall I say? everything touches me so nearly—I am so sensitive to-day I could weep: who can dwell in the Temple upon pure and serene heights, ought he to wish to go forth into a den of thieves? These two little animals resigned themselves up to music; it was their Temple, in which they felt their existence elevated by the touch of the Divine, and thou who feelest thyself touched by the eternal pulsation of the Divine within thee, thou hast no religion? Thou, whose words, whose thoughts are ever directed to the muse, thou not to live in the element of exaltation, in connection with God? O yes! the ascending from out unconscious life into revelation,—that is music!

ON ART.

I have spent a cold night, Goethe, listening to my thoughts; because you, in such a friendly manner, wish to know all; yet I could not write all, these thoughts are too volatile. Ay, Goethe! should I write down all, how odd would that be! Be contented with these; supply them in my mind, in which thou hast a home. You—no other—have ever reminded me to impart my soul to you, and I would withhold you nothing, therefore I would come forth to light out of myself, because you alone enlighten me.

Ah! I have not studied it; I know nothing of its origin, of its history, its condition; how is its influence, how men understand it,—that seems unreal to me.

Art is the hallowing sensual nature, and that is all I know about it. What is beloved shall serve to love: spirit is the beloved child of God,—chosen by God for the service of sensual nature this is art; intuition of the spirit into the senses is art. What you feel becomes thought, and what you think, what you strive to invent, that becomes sensual feeling. What men compile in arts; what they produce in it; how they force their way through it; what they do more or less, that would be submitted to many contradictions, but yet is it ever a spelling of the Divine. Let it be.

Ah! what do you ask about art? I can say nothing that shall satisfy you. Ask about love, this is my art; in it I am to perform; in it I shall recollect myself and rejoice.

I am afraid of you; I am afraid of the spirit which you bid to arise within me, because I am not able to express it. In your letter you say: 'the whole internal spirit shall come forth to light out of itself;' never before has this simple infallible command been obvious to me, and now, when your wisdom calls me forth to light, what have I to display as only faults against the internal genius; look there! misused and oppressed it was. But this breaking forth of the mind to light, is it not art? This inner man asking for light, to have by the finger of God loosened his tongue; untied his hearing; awakened all senses to receive and to spend; and is love here not the only master, and we its disciples in every work which we form by its inspiration?

Works of art, however, are those which alone are called art, through which we think to perceive and enjoy art; but as far as the producing of God in heart and mind overpowers the idea we make to ourselves of him and his laws, which, in temporal life, are of value, even so does art overpower men's valuing of it. They who fancy to understand it will perform no more than what is ruled by understanding; but when senses are submitted to its spirit, he has revelation.

To improve the advantages of experiences as they ought to be, is mastership; to transfer them on the scholar is teaching; has the scholar comprehended all, and understands how to employ it, then he becomes absolved; this is the school by which art will be transplanted. To one in such a manner absolved all ways of error are open, but never the right one. Once released from the long frequented school in which system and experience had enclosed him, the labyrinth of errors becomes his world, from which he may never escape. Every way he will choose is a misguided path of error; void of divine spirit, misled by prejudices, he tries to employ all his artificial craft to bring the object of his labour to a good issue. More will never be attained by the endeavours of an artist educated in the school of art. Whoever is come to something in art, did forget his craftiness, his load of experience, became shipwreck, and despair led him to land on the right shore. What from such a violent epoch will proceed is, indeed, often captivating, but not convincing, because the scale of judgment and of perception is no other than those experiences and artifices, which never suit where production will not be made up by means of them; then, also, because the prejudice of an obtained mastership will not allow anything to be that depends on its authority; and because the presentiment of a higher world will thus remain closed to it. The invention of the mastership is justified by the principle, that there is nothing new; that all is invented before imagination; such productions are partly in abuse of that which is invented to new inventions, partly, apparent inventions, where the work of art has not the thought within itself, but must make up for its want by the devices and experience of the school of art, and, finally, productions which go just as far as thought, by improvement, is allowed to comprehend; the more prudent balancing the more faultless and secure; the more comprehensible, too, they are for the multitude; these we call works of art.

In music, producing is, itself, a wandering of the divine idea, which enlightens the mind without object, and man, himself, is conception. In all is union of love; a joining of mental forces one in another.

Excitement becomes language, a summons to the spirit; it answers, and this is invention: the faculty of mind to answer a demand which has no fixed object as problem, but is the, perhaps, unconscious tendency of production.

All motions of mental events in life have such a deep, hidden basis; thus, as the breath of life sinks into the breast, to draw breath anew, so the procreating spirit sinks into the soul, again to ascend to the higher regions of eternal creative power.

The soul breathes by spirit; spirit breathes by inspiration; and this is the breathing of the divinity.

To inhale the divine spirit is to engenerate, to produce; to exhale the divine breath is to breed and nourish the mind:—thus the divine engenerates, breeds, and nourishes itself in the spirit,—thus through the spirit in the soul—thus through the soul in the body. Body is art, art is the sensual nature engenerated into the life of the spirit.

In the style of art they say: nothing that is new is to be invented, all has existed before:—yes! we can but invent in mankind, nothing is without them, for spirit is not without man, for God himself has no other harbour but the spirit of man; the inventor is love; and because embracing love alone is the foundation of existence, therefore beyond this embraced one, there is no being, no invention. Invention is only perceiving how the genius of love rules in the being founded by love.

Man cannot invent, only feel himself, only conceive, learn what the genius of love speaks to him, how it nourishes itself in him, and how it teaches him by itself. Without transforming its perceptions of divine love into the language of knowledge, there is no invention.

Late yesterday evening, I walked by moonlight in the beautiful, blooming Linden-walk, on the banks of the Rhine; there I heard a clapping and soft singing. Before her cottage beneath the blooming linden-tree, sat the mother of twins: one she had upon her breast, and the other she rocked with her foot, in measure to the song.

B.

BAILLIE, JOANNA,

SISTER of the celebrated Dr. Baillie, was born in Bothwell, Scotland, of an honourable family, about 1765. She has spent the greater part of her life at Hampstead, near London, where she now resides. Her "Plays of the Passions," a series of dramas, have made her famous. Scott compares her to Shakspeare; while eminent critics place her name at the head of the living dramatic writers of England.

The social sphere in which this favoured daughter of the muse has ever moved, was peculiarly suited to her character and genius; it was one in which taste, and literature, and the highest moral endowments were understood and appreciated. She had no need to resort to her pen from pecuniary motives, and her standing in society made fame of little moment to her. But the spirit prompted, and she obeyed its voice—always, we think, with that loftiest motive of human action or purpose, the desire of doing good.

To accomplish those reforms which she felt society needed, she determined to attempt the reform of that mimic world, the stage, by furnishing dramas whose representation should have a salutary effect on morals. In pursuance of this idea, she planned her celebrated "Plays on the Passions"—love, hatred, fear, religion, jealousy, revenge and remorse, she has portrayed with the truth, power, and feeling which richly entitle her to the honour of having her fame as a dramatic writer associated with that of Shakspeare. The parallel which was drawn by Scott is true, so far as placing the name of Joanna Baillie in the same relation to the dramatic poets of her own sex, which the name of Shakspeare bears to that of men. In such compositions she is unrivalled by any female writer, and she is the only woman whose genius, as displayed in her works, appears competent to the production of an Epic poem. Would that she had attempted this!

In the portraiture of female characters, and the exhibition of feminine virtues, she has been very successful. Jane de Montfort is one of the most sublime, yet womanly, creations of poetic art.

The power of Miss Baillie's genius seems concentrated in one burning ray—the knowledge of the human heart. She has illustrated this knowledge with the cool judgment of the philosopher, and the pure warm feelings of the Christian. And she has won fame, the highest which the critic has awarded to woman's lyre. Yet we have often doubted whether, in selecting the drama as her path of literature, she judged wisely. We have thought that, as an essayist, or a novelist, she might have made her great talents more effective in that improvement of society, which she evidently has so deeply at heart, and have won for herself, if not so bright a wreath of fame, a more extensive and more popular influence. And even had she chosen poetry as the vehicle of instruction, we still think that she would better and more generally have accomplished her aim, by shorter effusions, and more simple plans.

The remark of Goethe on the danger of a poet's "devoting himself to some great work," and neglecting present thoughts and feelings, and all the touching incidents of the actual world passing before him, is strikingly true of female writers. It seems the very soul of woman's genius to seize on the passing moment, and give to the common and the actual that beauty and interest which their finer imagination and more delicate taste can discover or invent. In this way, too, their moral power is brought to bear on the popular mind at once. The sweet lyrics of Mrs. Hemans have moved the hearts of millions of the unlearned, and moulded their affections to love the beautiful and the good; while the sublime and searching truths taught in the "Plays on the Passions," have been a sealed book to all but the learned and critical. True, many of the greatest poets who have written since these "Plays" appeared, have drawn from this mine of genius much to enrich their own stores. Even Byron had not read Miss Baillie without advantage, as a comparison between the "Ethwald" of the latter, and "Manfred," will clearly show.

But, although it is a proud station which this gifted sister of the lyre has won, thus to become, as it were, a teacher of genius, a beacon in the path of intellectual glory, yet we would prefer that our own sex should rather be admirers of the fame of Joanna Baillie than followers in her own peculiar and chosen sphere. At least since she, with her splendid talents, bold and vigorous fancy, and that calm, persevering energy of purpose, which none but minds of the highest order display, has failed to reform the stage, let no other woman flatter herself with a hope of succeeding. It may be within the scope of female powers to purify and exalt dramatic literature; but then these pattern plays will not be popular on the stage, and meretricious dances or spectacles of some kind will be substituted to draw the multitude. Thus the moral effect of a good play will be destroyed. It will be found more effectual for the gentle purpose of winning hearts to follow virtue and piety, which should be the aim of female literature, to address the mind through the moral and domestic feelings, rather than through the stern, dark, and wild workings of passion, in its conflicts with the world. One sweet song of home will be more effectual in securing the return of the prodigal, than all the pathetic scenes in Rayner and the penitence of Count Zaterloo.

There is in the "Cyclopædia of English Literature," a very clever and candid criticism on Miss Baillie's peculiar style of constructing her dramas; it is appropriate to our plan of showing, whenever possible, the opinions of literary men concerning the genius, and productions of women. After stating that the first volume of Joanna Baillie's "Plays on the Passions" was published in 1798; that she had, in her theory, "anticipated the dissertations and most of the poetry of Wordsworth," and that her volume passed through two editions in a few months, he goes on:—"Miss Baillie was then in the thirty-fourth year of her age. In 1802 she published a second volume, and in 1812 a third. In the interval she had produced a volume of miscellaneous dramas (1804), and "The Family Legend" (1810), a tragedy founded on a Highland tradition, and brought out with success at the Edinburgh theatre. In 1836, this authoress published three more volumes of plays, her career as a dramatic writer thus extending over the long period of thirty-eight years. Only one of her dramas has ever been performed on the stage: De Montfort was brought out by Kemble shortly after its appearance, and was acted eleven nights. It was again introduced in 1821, to exhibit the talents of Kean in the character of De Montfort; but this actor remarked that, though a fine poem, it would never be an acting play. The design of Miss Baillie in restricting her dramas each to the elucidation of one passion, appears certainly to have been an unnecessary and unwise restraint, as tending to circumscribe the business of the piece, and exclude the interest arising from varied emotions and conflicting passions. It cannot be said to have been successful in her own case, and it has never been copied by any other author. Sir Walter Scott has eulogized 'Basil's love and Montfort's hate,' as something like a revival of the inspired strain of Shakspeare. The tragedies of Count Basil and De Montfort are among the best of Miss Baillie's plays; but they are more like the works of Shirley, or the serious parts of Massinger, than the glorious dramas of Shakspeare, so full of life, of incident, and imagery. Miss Baillie's style is smooth and regular, and her plots are both original and carefully constructed; but she has no poetical luxuriance, and few commanding situations. Her tragic scenes are too much connected with the crime of murder, one of the easiest resources of a tragedian; and partly from the delicacy of her sex, as well as from the restrictions imposed by her theory of composition, she is deficient in that variety and fulness of passion, the 'form and pressure' of real life, which are so essential on the stage. The design and plot of her dramas are obvious almost from the first act—a circumstance that would be fatal to their success in representation. The unity and intellectual completeness of Miss Baillie's plays are their most striking characteristics. Her simple masculine style, so unlike the florid or insipid sentimentalism then prevalent, was a bold innovation at the time of her two first volumes; but the public had fortunately taste enough to appreciate its excellence. Miss Baillie was undoubtedly a great improver of our poetical diction."

Besides these many volumes of Plays, Miss Baillie has written miscellaneous poetry and songs sufficient to fill a volume, which was published in 1841. Her songs are distinguished for "a peculiar softness of diction, yet few have become favourites in the drawing-room." In truth, it is when alone, in the quiet sanctuary of one's own apartment, that the works of Miss Baillie should be studied. She addresses the heart through the understanding, not by moving the fancy or even the passions in any strong degree; she writes to mind, not to feeling; and the mind of the reader must become concentrated on the drama at first, by an effort of the will, before its singular merit will be fully apparent; even the best of all, "De Montfort," requires this close attention. We shall make our selections chiefly from the tragedies.

FROM DE MONTFORT.

[Jane, in disguise, meets her brother.]

De Montfort. Yes, it is ever thus. Undo that veil,
And give thy countenance to the cheerful light.
Men now all soft and female beauty scorn,
And mock the gentle cares which aim to please.
It is most terrible! undo thy veil,
And think of him no more.

Jane. I know it well, even to a proverb grown,
Is lovers' faith, and I had borne such slight;
But he, who has, alas! forsaken me,
Was the companion of my early days,
My cradle's mate, mine infant play-fellow.
Within our opening minds, with ripper years,
The love of praise and generous virtues sprung:
Through varied life our pride, our joys were one;
At the same tale we wept: he is my brother.

De Mon. And he forsook thee?—No, I dare not curse him:

My heart upbraids me with a crime like his.

Jane. Ah! do not thus distress a feeling heart.
All sisters are not to the soul entwined
With equal bands; thine has not watched for thee,
Wept for thee, cheered thee, shared thy weal and wo,
As I have done for him.

De Mon. (eagerly.) Ah! has she not?
By heaven! the sum of all thy kindly deeds
Were but as chaff poised against massy gold,
Compared to that which I do owe her love.
Oh pardon me! I mean not to offend—
I am too warm—but she of whom I speak
Is the dear sister of my earliest love;
In noble, virtuous worth to none a second;
And though behind those sable folds were hid
As fair a face as ever woman owned,
Still would I say she is as fair as thou.
How oft amidst the beauty-blazing throng,
I've proudly to th' enquiring stranger told
Her name and lineage! yet within her house,
The virgin mother of an orphan race
Her dying parents left, this noble woman
Did like a Roman matron, proudly sit,
Despising all the blandishments of love;
Whilst many a youth his hopeless love concealed,
Or humbly distant wooed her like a queen.
Forgive, I pray you! O forgive this boasting;
In faith, I mean you no discourtesy.

DESCRIPTION OF JANE DE MONTFORT.

'The following has been pronounced to be a perfect picture of Mrs. Siddons, the tragic actress.'

Page. Madam, there is a lady in your hall Who begs to be admitted to your presence.

Lady. Is it not one of our invited friends?

Page. No; far unlike to them. It is a stranger.

Lady. How looks her countenance?

Page. So queenly, so commanding, and so noble, I shrunk at first in awe; but when she smiled, Methought I could have compassed sea and land To do her bidding.

Lady. Is she young or old?

Page. Neither, if right I guess; but she is fair, For Time hath laid his hand so gently on her, As he, too, had been awed.

Lady. The foolish stripling!

She has bewitched thee. Is she large in stature?

Page. So stately and so graceful is her form, I thought at first her stature was gigantic; But on a near approach, I found in truth, She scarcely does surpass the middle size.

Lady. What is her garb?

Page. I cannot well describe the fashion of it: She is not decked in any gallant trim, But seems to me clad in her usual weeds Of high habitual state; for as she moves, Wide flows her robe in many a waving fold, As I have seen unfurled banners play With the soft breeze.

Lady. Thine eyes deceive thee, boy; It is an apparition thou hast seen.

Freberg. [Starting from his seat, where he has been sitting during the conversation between the Lady and the Page.]

It is an apparition he has seen, Or it is Jane de Monfort.

From Henriquez: A Tragedy.

TRUE LOVE.

Antonio. O blessed words! my dear, my generous love! My heart throbs at the thought, but cannot thank thee. And thou wilt follow me and share my fortune, Or good or ill!

Ah! what of good can with a skulking outlaw in his far wanderings, or his secret haunts, E'er be? O no! thou shalt not follow me.

Mencia. Good may be found for faithful, virtuous love, In every spot; and for the wandering outlaw The very sweetest nooks o' the earth are his. And be his passing home the goatherd's shed, The woodman's branchy hut, or fishers' cove, Whose pebbly threshold by the rippling tide Is softly washed, he may contented live, Ay, thankfully: fed like the fowls of heaven With daily food sent by a Father's hand.

Ant. Thou shalt not follow me, nor will I fly. Severed from thee I will not live, sweet love; Nor shalt thou be the mate of one disgraced, And by the good disowned. Here I'll remain, And Heaven will work for me a fair deliverance.

From Orra.

A WOMAN'S PICTURE OF A COUNTRY LIFE.

Even now methinks Each little cottage of my native vale Swells out its earthen sides, upheaves its roof, Like to a hillock moved by lab'ring mole, And with green trail-weeds clamb'ring up its walls, Roses and every gay and fragrant plant, Before my fancy stands, a fairy bower. Ay, and within it, too, do fairies dwell. Peep thro' its wreathed window, if indeed The flowers grow not too close; and there within Thou'lt see some half a dozen rosy brats, Eating from wooden bowls their dainty milk:— Those are my mountain elves. See'st thou not Their very forms distinctly?

I'll gather round my board All that heav'n sends to me of way-worn folks, And noble travellers, and neighb'ring friends,

Both young and old. Within my ample hall, The worn-out man of arms shall o' tiptoe tread, Tossing his grey locks from his wrinkled brow With cheerful freedom, as he boasts his feats Of days gone by.—Music we'll have; and oft The bick'ring dance upon our oaken floors Shall thund'ring loud strike on the distant ear Of 'nighted travellers, who shall gladly bend Their doubtful footsteps towards the cheering din. Solemn, and grave, and cloistered, and demure We shall not be. Will this content ye, damsels?

Ev'ry season

Shall have its suited pastime: even winter In its deep noon, when mountains piled with snow, And choaked valleys from our mansion bar All entrance, and nor guest nor traveller Sounds at our gate; the empty hall forsaking, In some warm chamber, by the crackling fire, We'll hold our little, snug, domestic court, Plying our work with song and tale between.

From the Legend of Lady Griseld Baillie.

THE WIFE.

THEIR long-tryed faith in honour plighted, They were a pair by Heaven united, Whose wedded love, through lengthened years, The trace of early fondness wears. Her heart first guessed his doubtful choice, Her ear first caught his distant voice, And from afar her wistful eye Would first his graceful form descry. Even when he hid him forth to meet The open air in lawn or street,

She to her casement went, And after him, with smile so sweet, Her look of blessing sent.

The heart's affection—secret thing! Is like the cleft rock's ceaseless spring, Which free and independent flows Of summer rains or winter snows. The fox-glove from its side may fall, The heath-bloom fade, or moss flower white, But still its runlet, bright though small, Will issue sweetly to the light.

THE WIDOW AND HER CHILDREN.

WITH her and her good lord, who still Sweet union held of mated will, Years passed away with lightsome speed; But oh! their bands of bliss at length were riven, And she was clothed in widow's sable weed, — Submitting to the will of Heaven. And then a prosperous race of children good And tender, round their noble mother stood, And she the while, cheered with their pious love, Waited her welcome summons from above. But whatsoe'er the weal or wo That Heaven across her lot might throw Full well her Christian spirit knew Its path of virtue straight and rue. Good, tender, generous, firm, and sage, Through grief and gladness, shade and sheen, As fortune changed life's motley scene, Thus passed she on to reverend age, And when the heavenly summons came, Her spirit from its mortal frame, And weight of mortal cares to free, It was a blessed sight to see, The parting saint her state of honour keeping, In gifted, dauntless faith, whilst round her, weeping Her children's children mourned on bended knee.

From Poems

THE TOMB OF COLUMBUS.

Ou! who shall lightly say that fame Is nothing but an empty name! Whilst in that sound there is a charm The nerve to brace, the heart to warm,

As, thinking of the mighty dead,
The young from slothful couch will start,
And vow, with lifted hands outspread,
Like them to act a noble part?

Oh! who shall lightly say that fame
Is nothing but an empty name!
When, but for those, our mighty dead,
All ages past a blank would be,
Sunk in oblivion's murky bed,—
A desert bare, a shipless sea;
They are the distant objects seen,—
The lofty marks of what hath been.

O! who shall lightly say that fame
Is nothing but an empty name!
When memory of the mighty dead
To earth-worn pilgrim's wistful eye
The brightest rays of cheering shed,
That point to immortality?

A twinkling speck, but fixed and bright,
To guide us through the dreary night,
Each hero shines, and lures the soul
To gain the distant happy goal.
For is there one who, musing o'er the grave
Where lies interred the good, the wise, the brave,
Can poorly think, beneath the mouldering heap,
That noble being shall for ever sleep?
No; saith the generous heart, and proudly swells,—
"Though his cored corpse lies here, with God his spirit dwells."

ADDRESS TO MISS AGNES BAILLIE ON HER BIRTHDAY.

[In order thoroughly to understand and appreciate the following verses, the reader must be aware that the author and her sister have lived to an advanced age constantly in each other's society.]

Dear Agnes, gleamed with joy and dashed with tears
O'er us have glided almost sixty years
Since we on Bothwell's bonny braes were seen,
By those whose eyes long closed in death have been—
Two tiny imps, who scarcely stooped to gather
The slender harebell on the purple heather;
No taller than the fox-glove's spiky stem,
That dew of morning studs with silvery gem
Then every butterfly that crossed our view
With joyful shout was greeted as it flew;
And moth, and lady-bird, and beetle bright,
In sheeny gold, were each a wondrous sight.
Then as we paddled barefoot, side by side,
Among the sunny shallows of the Clyde,*
Minnows or spotted parr with twinkling fin,
Swimming in mazy rings the pool within.
A thrill of gladness through our bosoms sent,
Seen in the power of early wonderment.

A long perspective to my mind appears,
Looking behind me to that line of years;
And yet through every stage I still can trace
Thy visioned form, from childhood's morning grace
To woman's early bloom—changing, how soon!
To the expressive glow of woman's noon;
And now to what thou art, in comely age,
Active and ardent. Let what will engage
Thy present moment—whether hopeful seeds
In garden-plat thou sow, or noxious weeds
From the fair flower remove, or ancient lore
In chronicle or legend rare explore,
Or on the parlour hearth with kitten play,
Stroking its tabby sides, or take thy way
To gain with hasty steps some cottage door,
On helpful errand to the neighbouring poor—
Active and ardent, to my fancy's eye
Thou still art young, in spite of time gone by.
Though oft of patience brief and temper keen,
Well may it please me, in life's latter scene,
To think what now thou art and long to me hast been.

* The Manse of Bothwell was at some considerable distance from the Clyde, but the two little girls were sometimes sent there in summer to bathe and wade about.

From Romiero: A Tragedy

JEALOUSY.

Romiero. So late! the first night too of my return!
Is it the tardiness of cold aversion?
'Tis more than that—some damned conference
Elsewhere detains her. Ay, that airy fool
Wore at the supper board a conscious look,
Glancing in concert with the half-checked smile
That moved his quivering cheek, too well betraying
His inward triumph; 'twas a cursed smile;
I would have cast my javelin at his throat,
But shame withheld me.

[Zorada enters, and stops short to wipe the tears from her eyes, as if preparing to appear composed, while Romiero, in the shade, after eyeing her suspiciously, bursts suddenly upon her, and, with great violence, upbraids her for want of conjugal affection. The conversation that ensues is very affecting, Zorada showing that she is conscious of what must have seemed unkindness, yet never for a moment thinking that her fidelity is suspected, and thus, in her innocence, alternately soothing and exasperating the passion of her moody lord.]

Rom. Where hast thou been so long?
Wilt thou not answer me?

Zor. You frighten me, Romiero, as I reckon
'Tis little past our usual hour of rest.

Rom. Thou dost evade the question. Not the time;
Where hast thou been?

Zor. Have patience! oh! have patience;
Where I have been I have done thee no wrong;
Let that suffice thee.

Rom. Ha! thou'rt quick, methinks,
To apprehend suspicion. Done no wrong!
What call'st thou wrong? Yea, by that sacred band,
Which linketh soul to soul in wedded love,
Pure, fervent, and confiding—every thought,
Fancy, and consciousness, that from thy husband,
Unfitting for his ear, must be withheld,
Is wrong to him, and is disgrace to thee.

Zor. Then woe is me! Since wives must be so perfect,
Why didst thou wed Zorada de Modinez?

Rom. Dost thou upbraid me for it? Then too well
I see the change. Yes. I will call it change,
For I must still believe thou loved'st me once.

Zor. Yes, yes, I loved thee once, I love thee now,
And will for ever love thee, dear Romiero,
If thou wilt suffer me.

Rom. Suffer thee, dear Zorada! It is paradise
To think thou lovest me, hell to doubt of it.

Zor. Then doubt it not. If I am cold and sad,
I have a cause—I must repeat my words—
Which does to thee no wrong. Some few days hence
Thou shalt know all, and thou wilt pity me.
Did I e'er tell thee that which afterwards
Thou foundest to be untrue?

Rom. Thou never didst.

Zor. Then why suspect me now?

Rom. Give me thy dear, dear hand, my own sweet wife,
Yes, I will trust thee, and do thou the while
Think charitably of my stern rebuke.
Love can be stern as well as tender, yet
Be all the while most true and fervent love.
But go to rest, dear child! and I will follow thee,
For it indeed is late.

A half-corrupted woman!
If it be come to this, who shall restrain
The hateful progress, which is rapidly—
Restrain it. No! to hell's profoundest pit
Let it conduct her, if she hath so far
Debased her once pure mind, and injured me.
I dare not think on't, yet I am compell'd;
And at the very thought a raging fire
Burns in my head, my heart, through every vein
Of this distracted frame. I'll to the ramparts,
And meet the chilliness of the midnight wind;
I cannot rest beneath this hateful roof.

BATTISTATI, LOUISA,

A NATIVE of Stradella, Sardinia, and a mantua-maker at Milan, displayed remarkable courage during the five days of the Revolution at Milan, in 1848. On Sunday, March 10th, she disarmed a cavalry soldier, though he carried a carbine. She placed herself at the head of the Poppietti bridge, and steadily continued there, fighting against the enemy during the 20th, 21st, and 22d days, heading a valiant band of young men, and killing a Croate at every shot. She defended the large establishment at Vettabia, which contained 580 persons, being the edifice in which the widows and their children, and other females took refuge when Barbaressa stormed Milan. This young woman was, in 1850, married, and doing duty in the civic guard.

BEECHER, ESTHER CATHERINE,

DAUGHTER of the Rev. Lyman Beecher, D. D., was born September 6th, 1800, at East Hampton, Long Island, where she resided till she was about ten years of age. Being the eldest of thirteen children, (ten are now living, all of whom have displayed good talents and some marked genius,) her education was, by her wise parents, considered of essential importance. They knew, that if the eldest child was trained to go in the right way, the others would be almost sure to follow. On the removal of the family to Litchfield, Connecticut, in 1810, the little Catherine was placed at the best school for young ladies there to be found — that of Miss Sally Pierce; and the pupil was soon to excel the teacher.

In a letter to a friend, Miss Beecher thus sketches herself at the age when, her education "finished," as the term is, she was preparing to take her part in the usual routine of woman's life; she says:

"The prominent traits of my natural character, as developed in childhood and youth, were great activity of body and mind, great cheerfulness of spirits, a strong love of the ludicrous, and my imagination teeming with poetry and romance. I had no taste for study or anything that demanded close attention. All my acquisitions were in the line of my tastes, so that at twenty, no habits of mental discipline had been formed."

It was about this time an event occurred that for ever ended all Miss Beecher's youthful dreams of poetry and romance, and changed the whole course of thought and feeling as regarded her destiny in this life. But the Providence that withdrew her heart from the world of woman's hopes, has proved a great blessing to her sex and her country. In 1822, she opened a Female Seminary at Hartford, Connecticut, which received pupils from every State in the Union, and soon numbered from 100 to 160 of these treasures of home, committed to her care and guidance. In discharging the important duties thus devolved on her, she not only learned to understand her own deficiencies of education, but also those of all the systems hitherto adopted for female pupils; and a wish to remedy the want of suitable text-books for her school, called forth her first printed work, an "Arithmetic;" her second work was on the more difficult points of Theology; and her third, an octavo, on "Mental and Moral Philosophy." This, like the others, was prepared for her own pupils, and though it has been printed and introduced into one of our Colleges for young men as a text-book, has never yet been published. These works are important as showing the energy of mind, and entire devotion to the duties she undertakes, which characterize Miss Beecher. In truth her school duties were then so arduous that her health gave way, and for a season, she was compelled to retire from the work.

In 1832, her father, with his family, removed to Cincinnati, Ohio. She accompanied them, and there for two years superintended an Institution for Female Education, opened in that city. Since then Miss Beecher has been engaged in maturing and carrying into effect a great plan for the education of all the children in our country. For this end she has written and journeyed, pleaded and laboured, and for the last ten years made it the chief object of her thoughts and efforts. We will quote her own interesting description, given in a letter to a friend, as this best elucidates her views, and shows the feasibility of a plan which, in its results, promises such benefits to humanity.

"The grand aim of this plan has been to unite American women in an effort to provide a Christian education for two million children in our country who were destitute of schools.

This plan embraced three departments. The first was designed to secure the immediate services of a great body of educated women, already qualified as it respects their own education for the duties of a teacher, but having no opportunity to enter the profession. For this department I succeeded in obtaining the aid and co-operation of the "Board of National Popular Education," with Governor Slade as its general agent, and during the first three years of the operation more than two hundred teachers have, by this agency, been placed in this field of usefulness.

But the second department has been regarded as still more important, and that is the effort to raise up prominent institutions for the education of female teachers. Resigning all direct connection with the Board of National Popular Education, I first received the funds needed, secured an Association of gentlemen in Jacksonville, to aid me by managing the financial matters, and then went forward to do myself what I had hoped would have been done by Governor Slade. It is my expectation that the two operations ere long will be merged in one, and then I shall hope to retire from any direct agency in the work, and devote myself to the preparation of school books. In this last, I believe, is my most appropriate field of labour.

The method of establishing these prominent institutions is this. First an offer is made to some town or city, that is lacking in good schools, of a Library and Apparatus and four superior teachers, on condition that the citizens give a reliable pledge that there shall be pupils enough to support the teachers, and the current expenses of the school. This pledge is made by an association of the citizens, who subscribe a certain amount to be used by Trustees of their own appointment in case the income of the school fails to support it.

Next, the institution thus established is organized on the college plan instead of the plan usually adopted for high schools—that is, instead of one Principal to sustain the whole responsibility and to employ subordinate teachers entirely subject to the control of this principal, the responsibilities of instruction and government are divided among at least four teachers, each of whom is the head of a given department, while the vote of a majority instead of the will of an individual decides every question. At the same time a regular plan of study is instituted as is done in colleges. Thus the removal of any one teacher never interrupts the prosperity of the institution, as is always the case when a High School changes from the control of one principal to that of another.

It has been my part to find the proper teachers and to organize the two first institutions on this plan—one in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and the other at Quincy, Illinois. In both these places the citizens have met the proposal very cordially, and more than 100 pupils in each place are engaged or already entered on their course of study.

After these High Schools have progressed one year successfully, it is designed to add a Normal Department expressly for the education of teachers. A fifth teacher will then be added to superintend this department. The class of Normal pupils will consist chiefly of the daughters of home missionaries and poor ministers. Other young females of promising abilities will also be received, especially orphans. The salary of the teachers of the Normal Department and most of the expenses of the pupils of that department will be defrayed by funds collected for the purpose. This department will be under the control of the association at Jacksonville, Illinois, who also will hold in trust all the Libraries and Apparatus employed.

In case any institution fails from the neglect of the citizens to furnish the requisite support from pupils and the fund, the Library and Apparatus and Teachers will be removed to another place which will give the requisite pledge.

Thus there are two parties to co-operate in the effort, viz: the Educational Association at Jacksonville that furnishes the instruments of education—that is, apparatus, library and good teachers, and the citizens who give a reliable pledge securing the requisite number of pupils.

Those who are the best friends of education and the best judges of the West, say this plan will work wonders. Each of these High and Normal Schools will be a centre for sending out the best class of teachers to all the vicinity. And there are twenty large towns or cities which would readily welcome such an opportunity within my own sphere of observation. I expect that the services of a gentleman of high character and abilities will soon be secured, and then I shall resign, and the plan will go forward on a great scale."

Such are the noble views of this patriotic, Christian woman; surely, her own sex—the whole nation will respond to her great idea, and assist in its development, till the work is perfect, the female mind prepared for its office of Christian educator, and every child in our wide land, brought under this enlightened and enlightening influence.

The example of Miss Beecher is of singular interest in manifesting the power of female talent directed, as hers has ever been, to objects clearly within the allowed orbit of woman's mission. She has never overstepped nature; she gives authority and reverence to the station of men; she hastens to place in their hands the public and governing offices of this mighty undertaking, which is destined to become of more importance to our country's interests than any projected since America became a nation. Next to having free institutions, stands Christian education, which makes the whole people capable of sustaining and enjoying them. It is only by preparing woman as the educator, and giving her the office, that this end can be attained.

The printed writings of Miss Beecher have been connected with her governing idea of promoting the best interests of her own sex, and can scarcely be considered as the true index of what her genius, if devoted to literary pursuits, might have produced. Her chief intellectual efforts seem to have been in a direction exactly contrary to her natural tastes; hence the romantic girl, who, till the age of twenty, was a poet only, has since aimed at writing whatever she felt was most required for her object, and, of course, has chosen that style of plain prose which would be best understood by the greatest number of readers. Besides the three works named, Miss Beecher has prepared an excellent book on "Domestic Economy, for the use of Young Ladies at Home and at School," which has a wide popularity. Many of those who have studied this work will probably be surprised to learn that the author has ever worshipped the muse, and so we will here insert two poems of Miss Beecher's, and then an extract from her "Mental and Moral Philosophy." Her greatest work has yet to be written.

THE EVENING CLOUD.

See yonder cloud along the west
 In gay fantastic splendour dressed;
 Fancy's bright visions charm the eye,
 Sweet fairy bowers in prospect lie,
 And blooming fields smile from the sky
 Decked in the hues of even;
 But short its evanescent stay,
 Its brilliant masses fade away,
 The breeze floats off its visions gay,
 And clears the face of heaven.

Thus to fond man does Life's fair scene
 Delusive spread its cheerful green;
 Before his path shine pleasure's bowers,
 Each smiling field seems drest in flowers,
 Hope leads him on, and shows his hours
 For peace and pleasure given.
 But one by one his hopes decay,
 Each flattering vision fades away,
 Each cheering scene charms to betray,
 And naught remains but heaven.

TO THE MONOTROPA, OR GHOST FLOWER.

This flower grows in shaded places, and has a singular appearance, with its white stem clasped with pale and livid leaves, and its single drooping white petal. A lovely young friend, who, after mourning the loss of parents, sisters, friend and lover, was herself fast passing away, one day espied this flower in a shaded nook: "Poor thing!" she exclaimed, "it has lost all its friends!" Write some poetry for it and for me!" The following was in obedience to this request.

Pale, mournful flower, that hidest in shade
 Mid dewy damps and murky glade,
 With moss and mould,
 Why dost thou hang thy ghastly head,
 So sad and cold?

No freshness on thy petal gleams,
 Gone the bright hues like sunny dreams,
 Thy balmy breath,
 Lost! and thy livid covering seems
 The garb of Death.

Do ills that wring the human breast,
 The blooming buds of spring infest
 And fade their bloom?
 And bend they too, with griefs oppressed,
 To the cold tomb?

Is thy pale bosom chilled with woe?
 Has treachery hushed the genial flow
 Of life's young morn?
 Have all who woke thy bosom's glow
 Left thee forlorn?

Perchance the wailing night-bird's song
 That mortal cares and griefs prolong
 At midnight hour,
 Wakes thy full tide of feeling strong
 With thrilling power.

Perchance thy paly earth-bowed head
 Is bending now above the dead
 With dewy eye,
 Soft moaning o'er thy treasure fled
 In evening's sigh.

And this thy plaint to reason's ear;
 In every scene grief will appear
 And Death's cold hour,
 As springs mid beauties of the year,
 One pale, cold flower.

OBEDIENCE TO THE DIVINE LAW.

Thus reason would sustain the belief, that obedience to the divine law is the surest mode for securing every species of happiness, attainable in this state of existence.

To this may be added the evidence of the recorded experience of mankind. To exhibit this, some specific cases will be selected, and perhaps a fairer illustration cannot be presented than the contrasted records of two youthful personages who have made the most distinguished figure in the Christian, and in the literary world; Henry Martyn, the Missionary, and Lord Byron, the Poet.

The first was richly endowed with ardent feelings, keen susceptibilities, and superior intellect. He was the object of many affections, and in the principal university of Great Britain, won the highest honours, both in classic literature and mathematical science. He was flattered, caressed, and admired; the road of fame and honour lay open before him; and the brightest hopes of youth seemed ready to be realized. But the hour came when he looked upon a lost and guilty world in the light of eternity; when he realized the full meaning of the sacrifice of our Incarnate God; when he assumed his obligations to become a fellow-worker in redeeming a guilty world from the dominion of selfishness, and all its future woes. "The love of God constrained him;" and without a murmur, for wretched beings, on a distant shore, whom he never saw, of whom he knew nothing but that they were miserable and guilty, he gave up the wreath of fame; forsook the path of worldly honour; severed the ties of kindred and still dearer ties that bound him to a heart worthy of his own; he gave up friends, and country, and home, and with every nerve throbbing in anguish at the sacrifice, went forth alone, to degraded heathen society, to sorrow and privation, to weariness and painfulness, and to all the trials of missionary life.

He spent his days in teaching the guilty and degraded, the way of pardon and peace. He lived to write the law of his God in the wide spread character of the Persian nation, and to place a copy in the hands of its king. He lived to contend with the chief Moullahs of Mahomet in the mosques of Shiraz, and to kindle a flame in Persia, more undying than its fabled fires. He lived to suffer rebuke and scorn, to toil and suffer in a fervid clime, to drag his weary steps over burning sands, with the every day dying hope, that at last he might be laid to rest among his kindred, and on his native shore. Yet even this was not attained, but after spending all his youth in ceaseless labours for the good of others, at the early age of thirty-two, he was laid in an unknown and foreign grave.

He died alone—a stranger in a strange land—with no friendly form around to sympathize and soothe. "Compositus est paucioribus lachrymis." Yet this was the last record of his dying hand: "I sat in the orchard and thought with sweet comfort and peace of my God! in solitude, my company! my friend! my comforter!"

And in reviewing the record of his short yet blessed life, even if we forget the exulting joy with which such a benevolent spirit must welcome to heaven the thousands he toiled to redeem; if we look only at his years of self-denying trial, we can find more evidence of true happiness, than is to be found in the records of the youthful Poet, who was gifted with every susceptibility of happiness, who spent his days in search of selfish enjoyment, who had every source of earthly bliss laid open, and drank to the very dregs.

His works present one of the most mournful exhibitions of a noble mind in all the wild chaos of ruin and disorder. He also was naturally endowed with overflowing affections, keen sensibilities, quick conceptions, and a sense of moral rectitude. He had all the constituents of a master mind. But he passed through existence amid the wildest disorder of a ruined spirit. His mind seemed utterly unbalanced, teeming with rich thoughts and overbearing impulses, the sport of the strangest fancies, and the strongest passions; bound down by no habit, restrained by no principle; a singular combination of noble conceptions and fantastic caprices, of manly dignity and childish folly, of noble feeling and babyish weakness.

The lord of Newstead Abbey—the heir of a boasted line of ancestry—a peer of the realm—the pride of the social circle—the leading star of poesy—the hero of Greece—the wonder of the gaping world, can now be followed to his secret haunts. And there the veriest child of the nursery might be amused at his silly weakness and ridiculous conceits. Distressed about the make of a collar, fuming at the colour of his dress, intensely anxious about the whiteness of his hands, deeply engrossed with monkeys and dogs, and flying about from one whim to another with a reckless earnestness as ludicrous as it is disgusting.

At times this boasted hero and genius seemed nought but an overgrown child, that had broken its leading strings and overmastered its nurses. At other times he is beheld in all the rounds of dissipation and the haunts of vice, occasionally filling up his leisure in recording and disseminating the disgusting minutiae of his weakness and shame, and with an effrontery and stupidity equalled only by that of the friend who retails them to the insulted world. Again we behold him philosophizing like a sage, and moralizing like a Christian; while often from his bosom bursts forth the repinings of a wounded spirit. He sometimes seemed to gaze upon his own mind with wonder, to watch its disordered powers with curious enquiry, to touch its complaining strings, and start at the response; while often with maddening sweep he shook every chord, and sent forth its deep wailings to entrance a wondering world.

Both Henry Martyn and Lord Byron shared the sorrows of life, and their records teach the different workings of the benevolent and the selfish mind. Byron lost his mother, and when urged not to give way to sorrow, he burst into an agony of grief, saying, “I had but one friend in the world, and now she is gone!” On the death of some of his early friends, he thus writes: “My friends fall around me, and I shall be left a lonely tree before I am withered. I have no resource but my own reflections, and they present no prospect here or hereafter, except the selfish satisfaction of surviving my betters. I am indeed most wretched!”

And thus Henry Martyn mourns the loss of one most dear. “Can it be that she has been lying so many months in the cold grave! Would that I could always remember it, or always forget it; but to think a moment on other things, and then feel the remembrance of it come, as if for the first time, rends my heart asunder. O my gracious God, what should I do without Thee! But now thou art manifesting thyself as ‘the God of all consolation.’ Never was I so near thee. There is nothing in the world for which I could wish to live, except because it may please God to appoint me some work. O thou incomprehensibly glorious Saviour, what hast thou done to alleviate the sorrows of life!”

It is recorded of Byron, that in society he generally appeared humorous and prankish; yet, when rallied on his melancholy turn of writing, his constant answer was, that though thus merry and full of laughter, he was at heart one of the most miserable wretches in existence. And thus he writes: “Why, at the very height of desire and human pleasure, worldly, amorous, ambitious, or even avaricious, does there mingle a certain sense of doubt and sorrow—a fear of what is to come—a doubt of what is. If it were not for Hope, what would the future be—a hell! as for the past, what predominates in memory—hopes baffled! From whatever place we commence, we know where it must all end. And yet what good is there in knowing it? It does not make men wiser or better. If I were to live over again, I do not know what I would change in my life, unless it were for—not to have lived at all. All history, and experience, and the rest teach us, that good and evil are pretty equally balanced in this existence, and that what is most to be desired is an easy passage out of it. What can it give us but years? and these have little of good but their ending.”

And thus Martyn writes: “I am happier here in this remote land, where I seldom hear what happens in the world, than I was in England, where there are so many calls to look at things that are seen. The precious Word is now my only study, by means of translations. Time flows on with great rapidity. It seems as if life would all be gone before anything is done. I sometimes rejoice that I am but twenty-seven, and that unless God should ordain it otherwise, I may double this number in constant and successful labour. But I shall not cease from my happiness and scarcely from my labour, by passing into the other world.”

And thus they make their records at anniversaries, when the mind is called to review life and its labours. Byron writes: “At 12 o’clock I shall have completed thirty-three years! I go to my bed with a heaviness of heart at having lived so long and to so little purpose. It is now 3 minutes past 12, and I am 33!”

Eheu fugaces, Posthume, Posthume,
Labuntur anni;

But I do not regret them so much for what I have done, as for what I might have done.”

And thus Martyn: "I like to find myself employed usefully, in a way I did not expect or foresee. The coming year is to be a perilous one, but my life is of little consequence, whether I finish the Persian New Testament or not. I look back with pity on myself, when I attached so much importance to my life and labours. The more I see of my own works, the more I am ashamed of them, for coarseness and clumsiness mar all the works of man. I am sick when I look at the wisdom of man, but am relieved by reflecting, that we have a city whose builder and maker is God. The least of his works is refreshing. A dried leaf, or a straw, make me feel in good company, and complacency and admiration take the place of disgust. What a momentary duration is the life of man! 'Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum,' may be affirmed of the river; but men pass away as soon as they begin to exist. Well, let the moments pass!

'They waft us sooner o'er this life's tempestuous sea,
Soon we shall reach the peaceful shore
Of blest eternity!'

Such was the experience of those who in youth completed their course. The Poet has well described his own career:

"A wandering mass of shapeless flame,
A pathless comet and a curse,
The menace of the universe;
Still rolling on with innate force,
Without a sphere, without a course,
A bright deformity on high,
The monster of the upper sky!"

In Holy Writ we read of those who are "raging waves of the sea foaming out their own shame; wandering stars to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." The lips of man may not apply these terrific words to any whose doom is yet to be disclosed; but there is a passage which none can fear to apply. "Those that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as stars forever and ever!"

To these youthful witnesses may be added the testimony of two who had fulfilled their years. The first was the polished, the witty, the elegant and admired Earl of Chesterfield, who tried every source of earthly enjoyment, and at the end makes this acknowledgment:—"I have seen," says he, "the silly rounds of business and of pleasure, and have done with them all. I have enjoyed all the pleasures of the world, and consequently know their futility, and do not regret their loss. I appraise them at their real value, which is, in truth, very low. Whereas those that have not experienced, always over-rate them. They only see their gay outside, and are dazzled at the glare. But I have been behind the scenes. I have seen all the coarse pulleys and dirty ropes which exhibit and move the gaudy machines; and I have seen and smelt the tallow candles which illuminated the whole decoration, to the astonishment and admiration of the ignorant audience. When I reflect on what I have seen, what I have heard, and what I have done, I can hardly persuade myself that all that frivolous hurry of bustle and pleasure of the world, had any reality; but I look upon all that is passed as one of those romantic dreams, which opium commonly occasions; and I do by no means desire to repeat the nauseous dose, for the sake of the fugitive dream. Shall I tell you that I bear this melancholy situation with that meritorious constancy and resignation, which most people boast of? No, for I really cannot help it. I bear it, because I must bear it, whether I will or no! I think of nothing but of killing time the best way I can, now that he is become my enemy. It is my resolution to sleep in the carriage during the remainder of the journey of life."

The other personage was Paul, the Aged. For Christ and the redemption of those for whom He died, he "suffered the loss of all things;" and this is the record of his course: "In labours abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths, oft; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils among false brethren. In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness,—and that which cometh daily upon me, the care of all the churches. We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, yet not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed. For though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen; for the things which are seen, are temporal, but the things which are not seen, are eternal." And when the time drew near that he was to be "offered up," and he looked back on the past course of his life, these are his words of triumphant exultation: "I have fought a good fight! I have finished my course! I have kept the faith! from henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which Christ, the righteous judge shall give!"

To this testimony of experience, may be added that of Scripture. "Whoso trusteth in the Lord, happy is he! The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding. Wisdom is better than rubies, and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to it. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. Keep sound wisdom, so shall it be life to thy soul. Then shalt thou walk in thy way safely, and when thou liest down thou shalt not be afraid, yea, thou shalt lie down and thy sleep shall be sweet." And thus the Redeemer invites to his service: "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls!"

BELLOC, LOUISE SWANTON,

RESIDES in Paris, where she is favourably known for her zeal in promoting female education. She is one of that class of literary women, now, as we trust, fast increasing in France, who believing in God and his revealed Word, are devoting their time and talents to the great work of popular instruction. As the basis of this, female education is indispensable, and those who, with pious hearts and delicate hands, toil in this portion of the vineyard of truth, deserve a high place among the philanthropists of our era.

Madame Belloc is happy in having an ally—Adelaide Montgolfier, daughter of the celebrated aeronaut; their good works are so interwoven that we cannot well separate their names in this sketch. One of their plans for the moral benefit of society is thus described by Mademoiselle Montgolfier, in a letter to an American friend.

"We have established a choice circulating library, designed to counterbalance, as much as possible, the bad effects produced by the numerous reading rooms, which place in all hands, and spread every where, the most dangerous works, and the sad consequences of bad reading. Especially women who have not the active life of men, and cannot therefore correct the visions of imagination as easily, are becoming more and more sensible of this fact in our country. We wish therefore to succour these children, young persons, young women, and parents, and form a choice library of sound and healthy reading, which will develop and enkindle the soul, enlighten the mind, and vivify and direct the imagination. We do not allow any book to enter this library whose tendency is dangerous. We issue to subscribers a leaf of the catalogue every month, giving the title of the works and a short account of their moral and literary character, as well as the effect they will probably produce on the intelligence, character, and taste of the people. As may be practicable, we submit these opinions to the consideration of those who are generally known as good judges."

But previous to the formation of this plan, and soon after the Revolution of Les trois Jours, Madame Belloc was appointed by the Government of France to assist General Lafayette in establishing public libraries; but owing to various obstacles the design was never encouraged, and finally was abandoned. Then the select circulating library was planned,—we do not know what its success has been; but the idea illustrates the noble character of these women. Another work of their united care was very successful. They edited and published a monthly Magazine—"La Ruche, Journal d'études Familiale,"—devoted to the education of girls.

The principal works of both have been prepared for the young. "Pierre et Pierrette," by Madame Belloc, was crowned (or obtained the prize) by the French Academy; and "Corbeille de l'Année, or Mélodies de Printemps," by Mademoiselle Montgolfier, was adopted, by the University, in the primary and high schools for girls. She has written many other works for the young, among which are "Piccolissima," and "Contes devenus Histoires."

Madame Belloc has translated many useful works for the youth of her own fair land, from the English language, and from American authors. Miss Sedgwick's writings are among her favourites. She also translated Dr. Channing's "Essay upon the actual State of Literature in the United States, and the importance of a National Literature," to which Madame Belloc prefixed an "Essai sur la vie publique et privée de l'Auteur," written with much discrimination and good sense.

But the lofty patriotism and noble sentiments of Madame Belloc are strikingly expressed in a work published in 1826, at Paris, entitled "Bonaparte and the Greeks:"—those who would become acquainted with the mind of a gifted and true woman should read this work. It breathes the assurance of moral renovation in France,—a nation must struggle upward if the souls of its women hold the truth steadfast; and France has daughters worthy of this encomium.

M. Jullien, the distinguished editor of the Revue Encyclopédique, in speaking of Madame Belloc to an American lady* who visited France in 1830, said she—Madame Belloc—was introduced to him by the Marquise de Villette, as a young person of brilliant talents. She first wrote for the Revue, from the mere impulse of an active and benevolent mind, and her writings had been much admired and spoken of, before she would allow her name to be made public. He told her this was a course unworthy of her. She was responsible for the talent God had given her, and why shrink from that responsibility? Fame would increase her power for doing good to the unfortunate, and of being useful to the world—and for these reasons, she should encounter its inconveniences, and overcome her own delicate though mistaken feelings.

He spoke of her piety, her filial tenderness and sacrifices, the constancy of her attachments, and gave instances to illustrate her compassionate zeal for the unfortunate.

* See Journal of Travels in France and Great Britain, by Mrs. Emma Willard.

She is described as "majestic in figure, with a countenance expressive of benevolence and intelligence;" a Minerva in form, as well as in wisdom and goodness.

The likeness we give of Madame Belloc, is from an engraving taken from a picture painted by her husband.

BLACKWELL, ELIZABETH,

DESERVES to have her name recorded for the earnest efforts she is making to prepare herself to be a physician for her own sex. The reform of the practice which has confined all medical and even physiological science to men is, we trust, approaching. The example of this young heroic woman has already had a salutary effect. We give her history, as written by one well qualified to judge of her character, and the fitness of the pursuit she has chosen. Having been a physician, he knows and feels that some branches of medical practice ought to be exclusively in the hands of women.

"The public, through the newspapers, has been pretty generally informed that Elizabeth Blackwell was a regular student of Geneva Medical College, and received the diploma of that institution at its commencement in 1849. As she is the first Medical Doctor of her sex in the United States, the case is, naturally enough, one of those questionable matters upon which there must be a great variety of opinions; and the public sentiment is, besides, influenced by the partial and inaccurate statements of facts and conjectures which usually supply the place of correct information.

Elizabeth Blackwell was born about 1820, in the city of Bristol, England. Her father settled with his family in New York when she was about eleven years old. After a residence there of five or six years, he failed in business, and removed to Cincinnati. A few weeks after his arrival there, he died, leaving his widow and nine children in very embarrassed circumstances. Elizabeth, the third daughter, was then seventeen years of age. During the ensuing seven years, she engaged with two of her sisters in teaching a young lady's seminary. By the joint efforts of the elder children, the younger members of the family were supported and educated, and a comfortable homestead on Walnut Hill was secured for the family. The property which, in the midst of their first difficulties, they had the forecast to purchase, has already quadrupled the price which it cost them. I give this fact for the illustration of character which it affords.

It was in 1843 that Miss Blackwell first entertained the idea of devoting herself to the study of medicine. Having taken the resolution, she went vigorously to work to effect it. She commenced the study of Greek, and persevered until she could read it satisfactorily, and revived her Latin by devoting three or four hours a day to it, until she had both sufficiently for all ordinary and professional purposes. French she had taught, and studied German to gratify her fondness for its modern literature. The former she speaks with fluency, and translates the latter elegantly, and can manage to read Italian prose pretty well.

Early in the spring of 1845, for the purpose of making the most money in the shortest time, she set out for North Carolina, and, after some months teaching French and music, and reading medicine with Dr. John Dickson, at Asheville, she removed to Charleston. Here she taught music alone, and read industriously under the direction of Dr. Samuel H. Dickson, then a resident of Charleston, and now Professor of Practice in the University of New York. In 1847, she came to Philadelphia, for the purpose of pursuing the study. That summer, Dr. J. M. Allen, Professor of Anatomy, afforded her excellent opportunities for dissection in his private anatomical rooms. The winter following, she attended her first full course of lectures at Geneva, N. Y. The next summer, she resided at the Blockley Hospital, Philadelphia, where she had the kindest attentions from Dr. Benedict, the Principal Physician, and the very large range for observation which its great variety and number of cases afford. The succeeding winter, she attended her second course at Geneva, and graduated regularly at the close of the session. Her thesis was upon Ship Fever, which she had ample opportunities for observing at Blockley. It was so ably written, that the Faculty of Geneva determined to give it publication.

It is in keeping with my idea of this story to add, that the proceeds of her own industry have been adequate to the entire expense of her medical education—about eight hundred dollars.

My purpose in detailing these particulars is, to give the fullest notion of her enterprise and object. She gave the best summary of it that can be put into words in her reply to the President of the Geneva College, when he presented her diploma. Departing from the usual form, he rose and addressed her in a manner so emphatic and unusual, that she was surprised into a response. "I thank you, sir," said she. "With the help of the Most High, it shall be the study of my life to shed honour on this diploma."

Her settled sentiment was perhaps unconsciously disclosed in this brief speech. She had fought her way into the profession, openly, without disguise, evasion, or any indirection, steadily refusing all compromises and expediences, and under better impulses and with higher aims than personal ambition or the distinction of singularity. Her object was not the honour that a medical degree could confer upon her, but the honour that she resolved to bestow upon it; and that she will nobly redeem this pledge is, to all who know her, rather more certain than almost any other unarrived event.

Those who will form opinions about Miss Blackwell herself, from their own views of her enterprise, run a very great risk of making mistakes. It is natural enough for them to ask, 'What sort of a woman is she?' and it is likely that each will answer it for himself, but it is not likely that one in a dozen will hit the truth. Manifest considerations of propriety forbid such a description in this "Record," and especially due respect for her own feelings checks the inclination which I feel to draw her personal character. She seeks no notoriety that can be avoided, though she shrinks from no necessary exposure. She has not given her name to any of the publications by which she has been earning money for the achievement of her great undertaking, and her avoidance of the occasions of notoriety which court her at every turn amounts almost to a fault. In manner and spirit she is as quiet and retiring as she is inflexible in purpose and determined in action. The spirit of adventure never had a more gentle and tranquil lodgment in woman's nature.

In two or three years, she has solicited perhaps fifty medical men, and at least a dozen medical schools, for the privilege of studying the profession, and was refused by all except those which I have mentioned. I heard her say that she had found in the Union four medical schools willing to admit black men, and only two that would extend the same courtesy to white women. I have seen her often after her successive repulses, but in no instance heard a word of complaint or reproach, or observed the slightest indication of dejection. Her conclusion always was, "There is some place in the world for me, and I'll find it." There are doubtless other physicians, and perhaps other schools, that would have received her, but she always took the first acceptable grant, and instantly availed herself of it, with an industry and promptitude that I never saw equalled. The fact is, that the faith in which she lives and works has the tone and all the force of religious confidence. The secret of her efficiency and her success is in that patience which rests upon the Divine Providence. Her construction of the resistance which she was constantly encountering was always kinder and perhaps truer than any friend would allow or any opponent could fairly ask.

She entertains no particular respect for the science of medicine, and disavows any natural taste for its pursuit; and the incidents of the study I believe are as repugnant to her as to any sensitive woman who would shudder at the thought of them. But she differs in the matter of nerves from those who shudder at anything which comes in the shape of duty and noble enterprise. She devoted herself to her novel undertaking at twenty-three years of age, because she had then worked herself into the spirit of victory, and the tone of an earnest life that could not be smothered in her merely personal interests. Heroes are not made of the metal that is liable to rust.

Will she succeed? Those who, knowing her, do not know that now, are just the kind of geniuses who will not know the fact when it is fulfilled before their eyes.

Women will decide whether they must forever remain only sufferers and subjects of medical indelicacy, if they are once wakened up to the discussion."

Miss Blackwell sailed for Europe on the 18th April, 1849. She spent a couple of weeks in London, Dudley and Birmingham. In Birmingham, (near which her uncle and cousins, large iron manufacturers, reside, one of her cousins now being Government Geologist for Wales,) she was freely admitted to all the hospitals and other privileges of medical visitors. They called her in England, "The Lady Surgeon." Provided with letters to London, she made the acquaintance of the best known medical men there; among others, Dr. Carpenter, author of a standard work on Physiology, much in use in the United States, gave her a soirée, where she met the faculty of the highest rank generally. When she visited St. Bartholomew's hospital (it is the largest in England, and its annual income is £30,000,) the Senior Surgeon met her, and said that, hearing she would visit the hospital that day, though it was not his day for attending, he thought it due to her that he should do the honours of the establishment, and accordingly he lectured to the classes (clinical lectures, in her presence.

Moreover, early in the spring of 1850, the dean of the Faculty of St. Bartholomew's hospital, London, tendered to Miss Dr. Blackwell the privilege of their institution, on the ground that it was due to her, and added that he doubted not all the other schools of the city would do the same.

In Paris, she resided as an élève at the Hospital Maternité, in the Rue du Port Royal. It is, as its name indicates, a maternity hospital, and offers great opportunities in that department, as well as in the diseases of women and children.

None of the French physicians seem to have extended any particular courtesy towards Miss Blackwell, except M. Blot, of the Maternité—and his was characteristic of French delicacy, where they hide every thing which ought to be thrown open, and display just what they should conceal.

In England no difficulty was made or felt about Miss Blackwell's presence at the hospitals and before the classes. In Paris, M. Blot proposed to her to assume male attire,—then she might visit these places! Her indignant reply was, that she would not thus dishonour her womanhood, nor seek her object by any indirection, for all they could offer her.

In personal appearance Miss Blackwell is rather below the middle size, lady-like in manners, and very quiet, almost reserved, in company. That her example is destined to work out a great and beneficial change in the medical practice of America, we confidently hope; and that England will soon follow this change, we will not doubt. Is it not repugnant to reason, as well as shocking to delicacy, that men should act the part of midwives? Who believes this is necessary? that woman could not acquire all the requisite physiological and medical knowledge, and by her sympathy for the sufferer, which men cannot feel, become a far more congenial helper?

God has sanctioned this profession of Female Physicians; He "built houses" for the Hebrew midwives, and he will bless those who go forward to rescue their sex from subjection to this unnatural and shocking custom of employing men in their hour of sorrow. We trust the time is not far distant when the women of the Anglo-Saxon race will be freed from such a sad servitude to the scientific knowledge of man, which neither God nor nature sanctions.

BREMER, FREDERIKA,

A NAME that has a true feminine celebrity, because it awakens pleasant thoughts and bright hopes in the hearts of all who have read her heart, as it gushes forth from her pen, like a clear, sweet fountain in the sunshine of a summer day. We Americans love her name, as we do those who have contributed to our happiness; and she has done this by opening new sources of innocent enjoyment, and a wider field of benevolent feeling. She has brought the dim, old, Scandinavian world, that seemed completely hidden by the cloud of fable and curtain of time from the Western hemisphere, before us as with an enchanter's wand. Her little white hand has gently led us up among primeval mountains covered with eternal forests of pine, and along the banks of deep lakes, where the blue waters have slept since the creation; guiding us now to bowers of summer loveliness, where morning folds evening to her bosom with a kiss that leaves her own blushing lustre on the brow of her dusky sister; then we are set down among the snow-hills and ice-plains of the Norland winter, where the "dark night entombs the day." She has done more: she has led us "over the threshold of the Swede," introduced us into the sanctuary of their cheerful homes, made us friends with her friends; and awakened in our people an interest for the people of Sweden, which we have never felt for any other nation on the continent of Europe. She has thus prepared the way for the success of another gifted daughter of Sweden, who comes like a new St. Cecilia, to make manifest the heavenly influence of song when breathed from a pure and loving heart.

Frederika Bremer was born in Finland while it formed a portion of the Swedish kingdom; and about the time of its cession to Russia, in 1808, she was taken by her parents to Stockholm. Of these events, which were of much influence in giving her mind its peculiar tone, we will quote her own beautiful description, as communicated to us by her friend and sister spirit, Mary Howitt of London.

"If it should so happen that, as regards me, any one should wish to cast a kind glance behind the curtain which conceals a somewhat eventful life, he may discover that I was born on the banks of the Aura, a river which flows through Abo, and that several of the venerable and learned men of the university were even my godfathers. At the age of three, I was removed, with my family, from my native country of Finland. Of this part of my life, I have only retained one single memory. This memory is a word, a mighty name, which, in the depths of Paganism, was pronounced by the Finnish people with fear and love; and is still so pronounced in these days, although perfected by Christianity. I still fancy that I often hear this word spoken aloud over the trembling earth by the thunder of Thor, or by the gentle winds which bring to it refreshment and consolation. That word is—Jumala: the Finnish name for God, both in Pagan and Christian times.

If any one kindly follows me from Finland into Sweden, where my father purchased an estate after he had sold his property in Finland, I would not trouble him to accompany me from childhood to youth, with the inward elementary chaos, and the outward, uninteresting, and common-place picture of a family, which every autumn removed, in their covered carriage, from their estate in the country to their house in the capital; and every spring trundled back again from their house in the capital to their country-seat; nor how there were young daughters in the family who played on the piano, sang ballads, read novels, drew in black chalk, and looked forward, with longing glances, to the future, when they hoped to see and do wonderful things. With humility, I must confess, I always regarded myself as a heroine.

Casting a glance into the family circle, it would be seen that they collected, in the evening, in the great drawing-room of their country house, and read aloud; that the works of the German poets were read, especially Schiller, whose Don Carlos made a profound impression upon the youthful mind of one of the daughters in particular.

A deeper glance into her soul will show that a heavy reality of sorrow was spreading, by degrees, a dark cloud over the splendour of her youthful dreams. Like early evening, it came over the path of the young pilgrim of life; and earnestly, but in vain, she endeavoured to escape it. The air was dimmed as by a heavy fall of snow, darkness increased, and it became night. And in the depth of that endless winter night, she heard lamenting voices from the east, and from the west; from plant and animal; from dying nature and despairing humanity; and she saw life, with all its beauty, its love, its throbbing heart, buried alive beneath a chill covering of ice. Heaven seemed dark and void;—there seemed to her no eyes, even as there was no heart. All was dead, or, rather, all was dying—excepting pain.

There is a significant picture, at the commencement, in every mythology. In the beginning, there is a bright, and warm, and divine principle, which allies itself to darkness; and from this union of light and darkness—of fire and tears—proceeds a God. I believe that something similar to this takes place in every human being who is born to a deeper life; and something similar took place in her who writes these lines.

Looking at her a few years later, it will be seen that a great change has taken place in her. Her eyes have long been filled with tears of unspeakable joy; she is like one who has arisen from the grave to a new life. What has caused this change? Have her splendid youthful dreams been accomplished? Is she a heroine? Has she become victorious in beauty, or in renown? No; nothing of this kind. The illusions of youth are past—the season of youth is over. And yet she is again young; for there is freedom in the depth of her soul, and “let there be light” has been spoken above its dark chaos; and the light has penetrated the darkness, and illumined the night, whilst, with her eye fixed upon that light, she has exclaimed, with tears of joy, “Death, where is thy sting? Grave, where is thy victory?”

Many a grave since then has been opened to receive those whom she tenderly loved; many a pang has been felt since then; but the heart throbs joyfully, and the dark night is over. Yes, it is over; but not the fruit which it has borne; for there are certain flowers which first unfold in the darkness; so is it also in the midnight hours of great suffering; the human soul opens itself to the light of the eternal stars.

If it be desired to hear anything of my writings, it may be said that they began in the eighth year of my age, when I apostrophized the moon in French verses, and that during the greater part of my youth I continued to write in the same sublime strain. I wrote under the impulse of restless youthful feelings—I wrote in order to write. Afterwards, I seized the pen under the influence of another motive, and wrote—that which I had read.

At the present time, when I stand on the verge of the autumn of my life, I still see the same objects which surrounded me in the early days of my spring, and I am so happy as still to possess, out of many dear ones, a beloved mother and sister. The mountains which surround our dwelling, and upon which Gustavus Adolphus assembled his troops before he went as a deliverer to Germany, appear to me not less beautiful than they were in the days of my childhood; they have increased in interest, for I am now better acquainted with their grass and their flowers.”

An American friend of Miss Bremer thus concludes her sketch.

“The Countess Hahn-Hahn, who visited Miss Bremer at her country residence of Arsta a few years since, speaks of it as being remarkable in an historical point of view. The house is of stone, built during the Thirty Years’ War, with large and lofty apartments, overlooking the meadow where Gustavus Adolphus reviewed the army with which he marched into Livonia. It is surrounded with magnificent trees, the dark waters of the Baltic lying in the distance. Here Miss Bremer, with a beloved mother and sister, resides for a part of the year, and here many of our countrymen have had the pleasure of visiting her, and enjoying her hospitality. One of these remarks of her, that in every thought and act, she seems to have but one object—that of making her fellow-beings contented and happy. She is possessed of an ample fortune, and devotes her income mostly to charitable objects. In a recent severe winter, when the poor were dying with hunger and cold, hundreds through her means were warmed and fed, who would otherwise have perished.”

The writings of Miss Bremer were first made known to the British and American public by the Howitts, — William and Mary, — who translated “The Neighbours,” her first, and in many respects her most remarkable work. This was published in 1842, at New York, and soon made its way, as on the wings of the wind, through the length and breadth of our land. Every where it was welcomed as a messenger bird, that brought good tidings from a far country.

While the soul of the Christian yearns over the heathen, the heart will revolt from their unspeakable pollutions;—we cannot love their homes. But nations who have the Bible are naturally brought together, the moment the barrier of language is removed. “The Neighbours” were “Our Neighbours” as soon as dear Mary Howitt had presented them in English. The warm welcome the work received induced the translator to bring out the other works of Miss Bremer, and in quick succession, we read “Home;” “The H. Family;” “The President’s Daughters;” “Nina;” “The Strife and Peace;” “The Diary;” “Life in Delcarlia;” “The Midnight Sun;” and other shorter sketches from periodicals.

In the autumn of 1849, Miss Bremer, whose intention of visiting America had been previously announced, arrived in New York: she was welcomed to the hearts and homes of the American people with a warmth of affection her genius could never have inspired, had she not devoted her talents to the cause of humanity. Americans felt that she would understand the moral power, which in its development here, enables the people to govern themselves without “Cæsar, or his sword.” The following remarks which she made to an American, show that she does comprehend it; she said:—

“I have more than once heard you esteem yourself fortunate in being born a citizen of the North American republic. I have listened to your enthusiastic words respecting that empire, founded—so unlike all others,—not by the powers of war, but by those of peace; its wealth and greatness, acquired by bloodless victories; its efforts to become a great and powerful community in a Christian meaning, by raising every one to an equal degree of enlightenment and equal rights, efforts which now so powerfully attract the eyes of Europe and America: and I have understood your love. Will you also be able to understand mine? It belongs exclusively to a poor country, an inconsiderable people, nurtured in necessity and warlike deeds, but under whose blood-stained laurels there dwells a spirit, powerful and profound as their ancient mythology. This is now no more, or lives but as a remembrance in the breasts of our people, or as an echo in our valleys; corn grows in our fields, and the Linnaea blooms in our woods, protected by many years of peace. Travellers who come to Sweden from more populous countries exclaim, 'How still; how silent and lifeless!' Has that life, then, formerly so powerful, become extinct? No; but it has retired into silence. And in the silence of nature, in Sweden, where primeval mountains, covered with pine forests, surround deep, tranquil lakes, the contemplative spirit lives more profoundly than elsewhere; the listening ear can, better than amid the tumults of the world, become acquainted with the secrets of nature and the human heart, and comprehend the revelations of a life peculiar to that people, beside whose cradle the prophetess Vala sang her wonderful song of the origin, destruction, and regeneration of all things."

In this reference to Sweden, Miss Bremer, unconsciously to herself, accounts for all those blemishes in her works, which English Reviewers have so severely condemned; and which the moral and religious public in America have lamented. We see by her own admission, that what Mr. Laing stated in his "Observations on Sweden," is true—"that Christianity there is a matter of form;" that, "the old gods of the land have still a half-unconscious worship;" and that, "in no Christian community has religion less influence on the state of public morals."* And now bearing in mind these things, should we wonder that Miss Bremer describes dancing and merry making on Sundays; and love-scenes with married women as a matter of course; and even that shocking, incestuous passion between the niece and uncle which made "The H—— Family" a proscribed book? An uncle can intermarry with his niece in Sweden; the church permits festivities on Sundays; and Mr. Laing shows from authentic records the deplorable state of the people.†

But it is remarkable, and in the highest degree honourable to the delicacy of Miss Bremer's moral nature, that when she writes from her heart, everything with which she deals becomes pure and instructive. When drawing characters she must show them in the light by which to her human nature has been developed in Sweden; the evils apparent are in the system of government, both of church and state, not in the mind that paints their results.

In order to do justice to Miss Bremer, we shall select, chiefly, from such passages as display her good heart, rather than the more striking passages where her genius in the descriptive appears, or where her peculiar talent of giving to the conversations of her ideal characters a fresh racy and original flow is so graceful and charming. From the selections we make, the holy aspirings of her soul are apparent, and though she has already done so much for literature, her country, and her sex, yet we hope a wider vista is opening before her, and we believe she has power to reach even a higher and a holier fame. With the Bible as her rule of faith and morality, she would be more and more able to answer that prayer of the British friend of Sweden.

"Many of her best writers (says he) are more and more devoting themselves to domestic subjects. All who know the bold and honest and ingenuous Swedish yeomanry, must love and esteem them. As yet, in spite of the floods of demoralization flowing from the towns, they are sound at the core. May God raise up at least one spirit with courage great enough, and views extensive enough, and a life and heart pure enough, to urge him on to a public avowal and defence of those great, simple, solid, everlasting principles of private and national morals, of truth and justice and mercy, of law and of liberty, which shall turn the stream of public opinion in that country, into a more healthy channel, and restore to this ancient and brave and distinguished people that home right, and those home manners, that sound hearty northern gladness, and that unaffected purity which foreign corruptions and unfortunate government politics have shaken, till the very foundations thereof do tremble."

The hope of Sweden seems now to rest on her women; let the sweet singer be able to realize her plan of founding the common school system for the children; and let Miss Bremer awaken in the hearts of her readers the enthusiastic love of virtue, truth, and justice, which from her heart flows through her works—and with the blessing of God, the victory of Good over Evil will be won.

Selections from "The Neighbours."

ADVICE OF MA CHÈRE MÈRE TO A YOUNG WIFE.

A young woman—lay my words to heart—cannot be too circumspect in her conduct. She must take heed of herself, my dear Franziska, take heed of herself. I grant you that this our age is more moral than that of my youth, when King Gustave III., of blessed memory, introduced French manners and French fashions into our country; and I believe now, that there are much fewer Atheists and Asmodeuses in the world. But as I said before, you must take heed of yourself, Franziska, for the tempter may come to you, just as well as to many another one; not because you are handsome—for you are not handsome, and you are very short—but your April countenance has its own little charm, and then you sing very pret-

* "It is a singular and embarrassing fact, that the Swedish nation, isolated from the mass of the European people, and almost entirely agricultural or pastoral; having in about 3,000,000 of individuals only 14,925 employed in manufactories, and these not congregated in one or two places, but scattered among 2037 factories; having no great standing army or navy; no extended commerce; no afflux of strangers; no considerable city but one; and having schools and universities in a fair proportion, and a powerful and complete church establishment undisturbed in its labours by sect or schism; is notwithstanding in a more demoralized state than any nation in Europe—more demoralized even than any equal portion of the dense manufacturing population of Great Britain."—Laing's Observations on Sweden.

† "Figures do not bring home to our imagination the moral condition of a population so depraved as that of Stockholm. * * * Suppose a traveller standing in the streets of Edinburgh (as he might in Stockholm) and able to say from undeniable public returns, "One out of every three persons passing me is, on an average, the offspring of illicit intercourse; and one out of every forty-nine has been convicted within these twelve months of some criminal offence."—Laing's Observations on Sweden.

tily; as one may say, you have your own little attractions. And some day or other a young coxcomb will come and figure away before you; now mind my advice, keep him at a distance, keep him at a distance by your own proper behaviour. But if this should not suffice for him—should he still make advances, and speak fulsome seductive words, then you must look at him with a countenance of the highest possible astonishment, and say: ‘Sir, you are under a great mistake, I am not such a one as you suppose!’ Should this not answer the purpose, but he still continue to make advances, then go you directly to your husband, and say: ‘My friend, so and so has occurred, and so and so have I acted; now you must just act as you think proper!’ Then, my dear Franziska, depend upon it, the Corydon will soon discover that the clock has struck, and, no little ashamed, he will go about his own business; while you will have no shame, but on the contrary, honour from the affair, and beyond this, will find that a good conscience makes a happy conscience, and that ‘a conscience light gives rest by night.’

* * * * *

I will tell you how you must conduct yourself to your husband. You will always find him an honourable man, therefore I give you this one especial piece of advice—never have recourse to untruths with him, be it ever so small, or to help yourself out of ever so great a difficulty; for untruth leads ever into greater difficulty, and besides this it drives confidence out of the house.

* * * * *

When all this rummaging about and this thorough house inspection was brought to an end, we sat down on the sofa to rest, and Ma chère mère addressed me in the following manner: ‘It is only now and then, my dear Franziska, that I make such a house review, but it keeps every thing in order, and fills the domestics with respect. Set the clock only to the right time, and it will go right of itself, and thus one need not go about tick-tacking like a pendulum. Keep this in mind, my Franziska. Many ladies affect a great deal, and make themselves very important with their bunch of keys, running for ever into the kitchen and store-room; all unnecessary labour, Franziska; much better is it for a lady to govern her house with her head than with her heels; the husband likes that best, or if he do not he is a stupid fellow, and the wife ought then in heaven’s name to box him on the ears with her bunch of keys! Many ladies will have their servants for ever on their feet: that does no good; servants must have their liberty and rest sometimes; one must not muzzle the ox that treads out the corn. Let your people be answerable for all they do; it is good for them as well as the mistress. Have a hold upon them either by the heart or by honour, and give them ungrudgingly whatever by right is theirs, for the labourer is worthy of his hire. But then, three or four times a year, but not at any regular time, come down upon them like the day of judgment; turn every stone and see into every corner, storm like a thunder tempest, and strike down here and there at the right time; it will purify the house for many weeks.

RESOLUTIONS OF A YOUNG WIFE.

How is it that the flame is so soon extinguished on the altar of love? Because the married pair forget to supply materials for the fire. One must unfold, and cultivate, and perfect oneself in one’s progress through life, and then life will become an unfolding of love and happiness.

My first employment will be to arrange my house, so that contentment and peace may dwell in it. I will endeavour to be a wise lawgiver in my small, but not mean world; and do you know what law I mean first of all to promulgate and enforce with the most rigorous exactness? A law for the treatment of animals, thus:

All domestic animals shall be kept with the utmost care, and treated in a friendly and kind manner. They shall live happily, and shall be killed in that mode which will make death least painful to them.

No animal shall be tortured in the kitchen; no fish shall be cleaned while alive, or be put alive into the kettle; no bird shall, while half dead, be hung up on a nail: a stroke with a knife shall, as soon as possible, give them death, and free them from their torture.

These, and several other commands shall be contained in my laws. How much unnecessary cruelty is perpetrated every day, because people never think of what they do; and how uncalled for, how unworthy is cruelty toward animals! Is it not enough, that in the present arrangement of things they are sentenced during their lives to be subject to us, and after their deaths to serve us for food, without our embittering yet more this heavy lot? We are compelled in many cases to act hostilely toward them, but there is no reason why we need become cruel enemies. How unspeakably less would they not suffer, if in all these circumstances in which they resemble mankind, in the weakness of their age, in the suffering of their sickness, and in death, we acted humanely toward them!

There were laws in the old world which made mildness towards animals the holiest duty of man, while the violation of such laws was severely punished; and we, Maria, who acknowledge a religion of love, shall we act worse toward the animal creation than the heathen did? Did not He who established the kingdom of love on the earth, say that not a sparrow fell to the ground without the knowledge of our Father which is in heaven? Observe, Maria, he said not that the sparrow should not fall, but that it should not fall without being seen by the Universal Father. Yes, all the unnecessary suffering which the intemperance, the folly, the cruelty of man occasion to animals is also seen; and heard, too, is the lamentable cry and the complaint which the same causes; and on the other side the grave, may not its annoyance add yet one more pang to hell, and trouble even the peace of the spirits in heaven?

Oh, Maria! let not us women and housewives be deserving of this punishment; let us, when we come before the judgment-seat of the Universal

Father, be pure from all unthankfulness, and abuse of any creature which he has made; and let us deserve in that better world to see around us an ennobled race of animals, to live with them in a loving relationship, even as we had already begun to do on earth!

OF CHILDREN.

We will love our children, Fanny! We will bring them up in a clear and steady fear of God. We will teach them order and diligence. What relates to talent and a finer accomplishment, they shall receive that too if we have the means; if we have them not, then do not let us trouble ourselves about them. The chief thing is, that they become good and useful men; they will then find their way both here and hereafter. Thou, my Fanny, wilt early teach them what is in the hymn which thou art so fond of singing—

He who can read his paternoster right,
Fears neither witch nor devil.

* * * * *

Above all things, my dear daughters, bear in mind that you are human beings. Be good, be true; the rest will follow. As much as possible, be kind to every one; tender to every animal. Be without sentimentality and affectation. Affectation is a miserable art, my daughters—despise it as truly as you would acquire moral worth. Do not regard yourselves as very important, let you have as many talents and endowments as you may; consider nature and life, and be humble. Should you be treated by nature like a hard stepmother, and be infirm, ordinary, or the like, do not be discouraged; you may draw near to the Most High. Require not much from other people, especially from one another. The art to sink in the esteem of yourselves and others, is to make great demands, and give little.

From the other Novels of Miss Bremer.

A CHRISTIAN.

When a heart breaks under the burden of its sorrows—when sickness strikes its root in wounds opened by pain, and life consumes away slowly to death, then none of us should say that that heavily-laden heart should not have broken; that it might have exerted its strength to bear its suffering. No; we would express no word of censure on that prostrated spirit because it could not raise itself—before its resurrection from the grave.

But beautiful, strengthening, and glorious is the view of a man who presents a courageous and patient breast to the poisoned arrows of life; who without defiance and without weakness, goes upon his way untroubled; who suffers without complaint; whose fairest hopes have been borne down to the grave by fate, and who yet diffuses joy around him, and labours for the happiness of others. Ah, how beautiful is the view of such a one, to whom the crown of thorns becomes the glory of a saint!

I have seen more than one such royal sufferer, and have always felt at the sight, "Oh, could I be like this one—it is better than to be worldly fortunate!"

BETROTHMENT.

When Moses struck the rock and the water gushed forth; when Aaron's staff budded at once into green leaf and flower—it certainly was miraculous. But almost as miraculous is the change which takes place in two persons who love each other, and who, from mere acquaintance, become—betrothed. A partition wall has been removed from between them. They might love; they might show their love to each other; they might show it before the whole world and stand before each other as suns, and bloom forth in beauty before each other. But who can describe how the mystical depths disclose themselves in the deep, inward soul? It must be experienced. The change is the greatest in the woman; because habit and custom and that bashfulness which nature has given to the young girl before him whom she secretly loves, all fetter her behaviour, and put, as it were, body and soul in armour. But—hast thou read the beautiful old song about the Valkyria which lay bound in a deep sleep in her armour, under the strong power of witchcraft? The knight comes who unlooses her coat of mail, and then she is released. She wakes; salutes the day, salutes the night, heaven and earth, gods and goddesses, and looks joyfully on all the world, and she is now, the newly awakened, who gives to her deliverer, to her beloved, the drink (the mead) which makes him clear-sighted—

Human strength blended
With might of the gods:
Full of sweet singing
And power of healing,
Of beautiful poems
And runes of rejoicing.

It is she who interprets to him the mysterious runes of life; he who, enchanted, listens to her and learns.

MARRIAGE.

We array ourselves for marriages in flowers, and wear dark mourning-dresses for the last sorrowful festivity which attends a fellow-being to his repose. And this often might be exactly reversed. But the custom is beautiful—for the sight of a young bride invites the heart involuntarily to joy. The festal attire, the myrtle wreath upon the virgin brows; all the affectionate looks, and the anticipations of the future, which beautifully accompany her—all enrapture us. One sees in them a new home of love raised on earth; a peaceful Noah's Ark on the wild flood of life, in which the white dove of peace will dwell and build her nest; loving children, affectionate words, looks, and love-warm hearts, will dwell in the new home; friends will enjoy themselves under its hospitable roof; and much beautiful activity, and many a beautiful gift, will thence go forth, and full of blessing diffuse itself over life. There stands the young bride, creator of all this—hopes and joys go forth from her. No one thinks of sufferings at a marriage festival.

And if the eyes of the bride stand full of tears; if her cheeks are pale, and her whole being—when the bridegroom approaches her, fearful and ill at ease—even then people will not think of misfortune. Cousins and aunts wink at one another and whisper, "I was just so on my wedding-day; but that passes over with time!" Does a more deeply and more heavily tried heart feel perhaps a sigh rise within, when it contemplates the pale, troubled bride, it comforts itself, in order not to disturb the marriage joy, with, "O that is the way of the world!"

A HAPPY FAMILY.

I have now the greatest desire, dear reader, after the lapse of fourteen years, to cast a glance at Adelaide. Before all things must I mention their eight children; all extraordinarily pretty, good, and joyous, as the mother. She had nursed them all herself, attended on them, and played with them; from her they learned to love the sun, gladness, and God, and to reckon on papa Alarik as on a gospel. Count Alarik lived only for his wife, whom he adored—for his children, whom he assisted to educate—for his people, whom he made happy. The mother gave them gentleness and gladness of heart, from the father they learned history, and many other good things. Mamselle Rönquist instructed the three daughters in French and English. None could compare with Nina; but they promised to be good and merry, and to pass happily through the world. Adelaide devoted very much time to her children; yet she continued for many others "a song of joy," indispensable at all festivities; and wherever her kind, fair countenance showed itself, under lowly roof or in lofty castle, by the song of mourning or the marriage hymn, there was she greeted as a messenger of heaven sent forth with consolation and joy. She was still the swan of whiteness, freshness, slenderness, and grace, and the happiness of her home was the living well in which she bathed her wings.

Of Alarik and Adelaide it might be said with Job: "They increase in goods. Their seed is established in their sight with them, and their offspring before their eyes. Their house is safe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them. They send forth their little ones like a flock, and their children dance. They take the timbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ. They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave."

In a word, they belonged to the fortunate of this earth. I have seen many such; but have also beheld with wonder the dispensations of this world. "For another dies in the bitterness of his soul, and hath never eaten with pleasure."

But—"Who shall teach God?"

WISDOM.

I have already said that we do not become wise through books alone. No! not through books, not through travel, not through clever people, not through the whole world, if we do not carry in ourselves the slumbering power which calls forth out of all the individual parts the harmonious shape; or, to speak more simply, when we do not understand how to unite the end with the sensible deed.

PRAYER.

Prayer is the key of the gate of heaven. It does not open it easily. It requires strength, indefatigable knocking, a firm, determined will; but is the door but once open—behold! then there is no further separation between thee and the Almighty; and the angels of the Lord ascend and descend to bring thee consolation and help. Thou who sufferest perhaps like Clara, yearnest for repose like her, O listen! Sip not lightly at the cup of salvation! Drink deep draughts from the well of redemption! Fill thyself with prayer, with faith and humility, and thou wilt have peace!

PHILANTHROPY.

There is a time in our life when we are almost exclusively occupied by individual endeavours and suffering; when we merely labour for ourselves and those who are nearest to us. Another time also comes when we have in some measure accomplished this, and are in a state of peace, or at least of quietness. It is then the time when the thinking and the good man looks observantly around him into social life, and sees how he can labour in the best way for the great, neglected family-circle there, and make it a participator in the good things which he has obtained.

RENOVATION.

Calm and strong soul! much may be done by a human being with a pure will and amid a quiet life. But with certain deeper changes in that inner life, and for many a stormy soul, an outward change is almost a necessary means of an inward renovation. There is a power in old places, habits, impressions, connections—as dangerously fascinating as intoxicating liquors; as crippling as heavy fetters, from which no one can free himself—but by flight. But, far removed from them, with a new earth beneath our feet, with new stars above our head, new objects around us, new impressions, new thoughts have birth, and it is much easier for the soul to exert and raise itself. These outward removals are remedies in the hand of Providence for men. They do not supply the good desire, but they support it.

PATRIOTISM.

Happy are they who have a noble fatherland, to whose life and history they can look up with admiration and joy. They do not live insulated upon the earth. A mighty genius leads and animates them. Their little life has a greater one with which to unite itself, and for which to live.

VIRTUE.

She bowed herself while she kissed the mercifully severe hand which, amid wild tempests, calls forth the imperishable flower of virtue. This became to her the loveliest blossom of humanity and of the whole universe. It wound itself with beautifying effect around every creature; the storms of fate tossed rudely its chalice, but served only to promote its fullest expansion; it turned itself, as the sunflower toward the sun, above to

God. Strength, capacity of self-denial, equanimity and repose amid the occurrences of life, purity of heart and of the thoughts which arose to God—these Edla sought after, and found. Of the sacred doctrines of the Gospel, those chiefly acquired a living power in her heart which more especially favoured this bias: and her view of the world led her to regard man as ordained, before all things, to contest and self-denial. But this view of the world was clear and cheerful; the laurel of victory succeeded the trial, and the crown of thorns became the crown of glory.

TWIN-SISTERS.

I cannot conceive a more beautiful existence than that of twin sisters who go hand in hand through life; whose enjoyments are mutual—who participate in each other's feelings and thoughts—who weep over the same sorrow—who rejoice over the same festivity, whether it be only a mid-summer merriment or the Holy Supper. They stand in life like two young trees beside each other, and each new spring twines the twigs of their crown closer together. The happy ones! How intimately known is each to the other! How well must they understand each other, and be mutually able to read in each other's eyes as in a clear mirror. Can life ever become to either of them empty and dark? And if the one suffer, then has the other indeed the key to her heart; she knows every fold therein, and can open the locked-up chamber to the beams of daylight.

BRIDGMAN, LAURA,

A PUPIL in the Boston Institution for the Blind, has attained a wide-spread celebrity through her misfortunes, and through the efforts made by her benevolent instructor, Principal of that Institution, to redeem her from the appalling mental darkness, which the loss in early childhood of the faculties of sight, speech and hearing, had involved her. As yet, her history is only known through the "reports" made from time to time, to the Trustees of that Institution, by Dr. Howe. From these we derive the following information, though not without some regret, that in the modesty which always accompanies exalted worth he has said so little of his own noble exertions in throwing light upon that darkened spirit.

Laura Bridgman was born in Hanover, New Hampshire, on the twenty-first of December, 1829. She is described as having been a very sprightly and pretty infant, with bright blue eyes. She was, however, so puny and feeble, until she was a year and a half old, that her parents hardly hoped to rear her. She was subject to severe fits, which seemed to rack her frame almost beyond its power of endurance, and life was held by the feeblest tenure; but when a year and a half old, she seemed to rally; the dangerous symptoms subsided; and at twenty months old, she was perfectly well.

Then her mental powers, hitherto stinted in their growth, rapidly developed themselves; and during the four months of health which she enjoyed, she appears (making due allowance for a fond mother's account) to have displayed a considerable degree of intelligence.

But suddenly she sickened again; her disease raged with great violence during five weeks, when her eyes and ears were inflamed, suppurated, and their contents were discharged. But though sight and hearing were gone forever, the poor child's sufferings were not ended. The fever raged during seven weeks; "for five months she was kept in bed in a darkened room; it was a year before she could walk unsupported, and two years before she could sit up all day." It was now observed that her sense of smell was almost entirely destroyed; and consequently, that her taste was much blunted.

It was not until four years of age, that the poor child's bodily health seemed restored, and she was able to enter upon her apprenticeship of life and the world.

But what a situation was hers! The darkness and the silence of the tomb were around her; no mother's smile called forth her answering smile,—no father's voice taught her to imitate his sounds: to her, brothers and sisters were but forms of matter which resisted her touch, but which differed not from the furniture of the house, save in warmth and in the power of locomotion; and not even in these respects from the dog and the cat.

But the immortal spirit which had been implanted within her could not die, nor be maimed nor mutilated; and though most of its avenues of communication with the world were cut off, it began to manifest itself through the others. As soon as she could walk, she began to explore the room, and then the house. She became familiar with the form, density, weight, and heat, of every article she could lay her hands upon. She followed her mother, and felt of her hands and arms, as she was occupied about the house; and her disposition to imitate led her to repeat every thing herself. She even learned to sew a little, and to knit.

Her affections, too, began to expand, and seemed to be lavished upon the members of her family with peculiar force.

But the means of communication with her were very limited; she could only be told to go to a place by being pushed; or to come to one by a sign of drawing her. Patting her gently on the head signified approbation; on the back, disapprobation.

She showed every disposition to learn, and manifestly began to use a natural language of her own. She had a sign to express her knowledge of each member of the family; as drawing her fingers down each side of her face, to allude to the whiskers of one; twirling her hand around, in imitation of the motion of a spinning-wheel, for another; and so on. But although she received all the aid that a kind mother could bestow, she soon began to give proof of the importance of language to the development of human character. Caressing and chiding will do for infants and dogs, but not for children; and by the time Laura was seven years old, the moral effects of her privation began to appear. There was nothing to control her will but the absolute power of another, and humanity revolts at this: she had already begun to disregard all but the sterner nature of her father; and it was evident, that as the propensities should increase with her physical growth, so would the difficulty of restraining them increase.

At this time, Dr. Howe fortunately heard of the child, and immediately hastened to Hanover, to see her. He found her with a well-formed figure; a strongly-marked, nervous-sanguine temperament; a large and beautifully shaped head, and the whole system in healthy action.

Here seemed a rare opportunity of benefiting an individual, and of trying a plan for the education of a deaf and blind person, which he had formed on seeing Julia Brace, at Hartford.

The parents were easily induced to consent to her coming to Boston; and on the fourth of October, 1837, they brought her to the Institution.

For a while, she was much bewildered. After waiting about two weeks, until she became acquainted with her new locality, and somewhat familiar with the inmates, the attempt was made to give her a knowledge of arbitrary signs, by which she could interchange thoughts with others.

There was one of two ways to be adopted: either to go on and build up a language of signs on the basis of the natural language which she had already herself commenced; or to teach her the purely arbitrary language in common use: that is, to give her a sign for every individual thing, or to give her a knowledge of letters, by the combination of which she might express her idea of the existence, and the mode and condition of existence, of any thing. The former would have been easy, but very ineffectual; the latter seemed very difficult, but, if accomplished, very effectual: Dr. Howe determined, therefore, to try the latter.

The first experiments were made by taking articles in common use, such as knives, forks, spoons, keys, &c., and pasting upon them labels with their names printed in raised letters. These she felt of very carefully, and soon, of course, distinguished that the crooked lines spoon, differed as much from the crooked lines key, as the spoon differed from the key in form.

Then small detached labels, with the same words printed upon them, were put into her hands; and she soon observed that they were similar to the ones pasted on the articles. She showed her preception of this similarity by laying the label key upon the key, and the label spoon upon the spoon. She was here encouraged by the natural sign of approbation, patting on the head.

The same process was then repeated with all the articles which she could handle; and she very easily learned to place the proper labels upon them. It was evident, however, that the only intellectual exercise was that of imitation and memory. She recollected that the label book was placed upon a book, and she repeated the process, first from imitation, next from memory, with no other motive than the love of approbation, and apparently without the intellectual perception of any relation between the things.

After a while, instead of labels, the individual letters were given to her on detached pieces of paper: they were arranged side by side, so as to spell book, key, &c.; then they were mixed up in a heap, and a sign was made for her to arrange them so as to express the words book, key, &c., and she did so.

Hitherto, the process had been mechanical, and the success about as great as teaching a very knowing dog, a variety of tricks. The poor child had sat in mute amazement, and patiently imitated every thing her teacher did; but now the truth began to flash upon her—her intellect began to work—she perceived that here was a way by which she could herself make up a sign of any thing that was in her own mind, and show it to another mind, and at once her countenance lighted up with a human expression: it was no longer a dog, or parrot,—it was an immortal spirit, eagerly seizing upon a new link of union with other spirits! Dr. Howe could almost fix upon the moment when this truth dawned upon her mind, and spread its light to her countenance. He saw that the great obstacle was overcome, and that henceforward nothing but patient and persevering, though plain and straightforward efforts were to be used.

The result, thus far, is quickly related, and easily conceived; but not so was the process: for many weeks of apparently unprofitable labour were passed, before it was effected.

When it was said above, that a sign was made, it was intended to say, that the action was performed by her teacher, she feeling his hands, and then imitating the motion.

The next step was to procure a set of metal types, with the different letters of the alphabet cast upon their ends; also a board, in which were square holes, into which she could set the types, so that only the letters on their ends could be felt above the surface.

Then, on any article being handed to her, for instance, a pencil, or a watch, she would select the component letters, and arrange them on her board, and read them with apparent pleasure.

She was exercised for several weeks in this way, until her vocabulary became extensive; and then the important step was taken of teaching her how to represent the different letters by the position of her fingers, instead of the cumbrous apparatus of the board and types. She accomplished this speedily and easily, for her intellect had begun to work in aid of her teacher, and her progress was rapid.

This was the period, about three months after she had commenced, that the first report of her case was made, in which it is stated that "she has just learned the manual alphabet, as used by the deaf mutes, and it is a subject of delight and wonder to see how rapidly, correctly, and eagerly, she goes on with her labours. Her teacher gives her a new object, — for instance a pencil, first lets her examine it, and get an idea of its use, then teaches her how to spell it by making the signs for the letters with her own fingers: the child grasps his hand, and feels of his fingers, as the different letters are formed; she turns her head a little on one side, like a person listening closely; her lips are apart; she seems scarcely to breathe; and her countenance, at first anxious, gradually changes to a smile, as she comprehends the lesson. She then holds up her tiny fingers, and spells the word in the manual alphabet; next, she takes her types and arranges her letters; and at last, to make sure that she is right, she takes the whole of the types composing the word, and places them upon or in contact with the pencil, or whatever the object may be."

The whole of the succeeding year was passed in gratifying her eager enquiries for the names of every object which she could possibly handle; in exercising her in the use of the manual alphabet; in extending by every possible way her knowledge of the physical relations of things; and in taking proper care of her health.

At the end of the year a report of her case was made, from which the following is an extract:

"It has been ascertained, beyond the possibility of doubt, that she cannot see a ray of light, cannot hear the least sound, and never exercises her sense of smell, if she has any. Thus her mind dwells in darkness and stillness, as profound as that of a closed tomb at midnight. Of beautiful sights, and sweet sounds, and pleasant odours, she has no conception; nevertheless, she seems as happy and playful as a bird or a lamb; and the employment of her intellectual faculties, or acquirement of a new idea, gives her a vivid pleasure, which is plainly marked in her expressive features. She never seems to repine, but has all the buoyancy and gayety of childhood. She is fond of fun and frolic, and when playing with the rest of the children, her shrill laugh sounds loudest of the group.

When left alone, she seems very happy if she has her knitting or sewing, and will busy herself for hours: if she has no occupation, she evidently amuses herself by imaginary dialogues, or by recalling past impressions: she counts with her fingers, or spells out names of things which she has recently learned in the manual alphabet of the deaf mutes. In this lonely self-communion she seems to reason, reflect, and argue; if she spells a word wrong with the fingers of her right hand, she instantly strikes it with her left, as her teacher does, in sign of disapprobation: if right, then she pats herself upon the head, and looks pleased. She sometimes purposely spells a word wrong with the left hand, looks roguish for a moment and laughs, and then with the right hand strikes the left, as if to correct it.

During the year, she has attained great dexterity in the use of the manual alphabet of the deaf mutes; and she spells out the words and sentences which she knows, so fast and so deftly, that only those accustomed to this language can follow with the eye the rapid motion of her fingers.

But wonderful as is the rapidity with which she writes her thoughts upon the air, still more so is the ease and accuracy with which she reads the words thus written by another, grasping their hands in hers, and following every movement of their fingers, as letter after letter conveys their meaning to her mind. It is in this way that she converses with her blind playmates; and nothing can more forcibly show the power of mind in forcing matter to its purpose, than a meeting between them. For, if great talent and skill are necessary for two pantomimes to paint their thoughts and feelings by the movements of the body and the expression of the countenance, how much greater the difficulty when darkness shrouds them both, and the one can hear no sound!

When Laura is walking through a passage-way, with her hands spread before her, she knows instantly those whom she meets, and passes them with a sign of recognition; but if it be a girl of her own age, and especially if one of her favourites, there is instantly a bright smile of recognition — a twining of arms — a grasping of hands — and a swift telegraphing upon the tiny fingers, whose rapid evolutions convey the thoughts and feelings from the outposts of one mind to those of the other. There are questions and answers — exchanges of joy or sorrow — there are kisses and caresses — just as between little children with all their senses."

During this year, and six months after she had left home, her mother came to visit her; and the scene of their meeting was an interesting one.

The mother stood some time, gazing with overflowing eyes upon her unfortunate child, who, all unconscious of her presence, was playing about the room. Presently Laura ran against her, and at once began feeling her hands, examining her dress, and trying to find out if she knew her; but not succeeding in this, she turned away as from a stranger, and the poor woman could not conceal the pang she felt, at finding that her beloved child did not know her.

She then gave Laura a string of beads which she used to wear at home, which were recognised by the child at once, who, with much joy, put them around her neck, and sought Dr. Howe eagerly, to say she understood the string was from her home.

The mother now tried to caress her child, but poor Laura repelled her, preferring to be with her acquaintances.

Another article from home was now given her, and she began to look much interested; she examined the stranger more closely, and gave Dr. Howe to understand that she knew she came from Hanover; she even endured her caresses, but would leave her with indifference at the slightest signal. The distress of the mother was now painful to behold; for, although she had feared that she should not be recognised, the painful reality of being treated with cold indifference by a darling child, was too much for woman's nature to bear.

After a while, on the mother taking hold of her again, a vague idea seemed to flit across Laura's mind, that this could not be a stranger: she therefore very eagerly felt her hands, while her countenance assumed an expression of intense interest; she became very pale, and then suddenly red; hope seemed struggling with doubt and anxiety, and never were contending emotions more strongly depicted upon the human face. At this moment of painful uncertainty, the mother drew her close to her side, and kissed her fondly, when at once the truth flashed upon the child, and all mistrust and anxiety disappeared from her face, as with an expression of exceeding joy she eagerly nestled to the bosom of her parent, and yielded herself to her fond embraces.

After this, the beads were all unheeded; the playthings which were offered to her were utterly disregarded; her playmates, for whom but a moment before she gladly left the stranger, now vainly strove to pull her from her mother; and though she yielded her usual instantaneous obedience to Dr. Howe's signal to follow him, it was evidently with painful reluctance. She clung close to him, as if bewildered and fearful; and when, after a moment, he took her to her mother, she sprang to her arms, and clung to her with eager joy.

Dr. Howe had watched the whole scene with intense interest, being desirous of learning from it all he could of the workings of her mind; but he now left them to indulge, unobserved, those delicious feelings, which those who have known a mother's love, may conceive, but which cannot be expressed.

The subsequent parting between Laura and her mother, showed alike the affection, the intelligence and the resolution of the child; and was thus noticed at the time:

"Laura accompanied her mother to the door, clinging close to her all the way, untill they arrived at the threshold, where she paused and felt around, to ascertain who was near her. Perceiving the matron, of whom she is very fond, she grasped her with one hand, holding on convulsively to her mother with the other, and thus she stood for a moment; then she dropped her mother's hand—put her handkerchief to her eyes, and turning round, clung sobbing to the matron, while her mother departed, with emotions as deep as those of her child."

(1841.) It was remarkable that she could distinguish different degrees of intellect in others, and that she soon regarded almost with contempt, a new comer, when, after a few days, she discovered her weakness of mind. This unamiable part of her character has been more strongly developed during the past year

She chooses for her friends and companions, those children who are intelligent, and can talk best with her; and she evidently dislikes to be with those who are deficient in intellect, unless, indeed, she can make them serve her purposes, which she is evidently inclined to do. She takes advantage of them, and makes them wait upon her, in a manner that she knows she could not exact of others; and in various ways she shows her Anglo-Saxon blood.

She is fond of having other children noticed and caressed by the teachers, and those whom she respects; but this must not be carried too far, or she becomes jealous. She wants to have her share, which, if not the lion's, is the greater part; and if she does not get it, she says, "My mother will love me."

Her tendency to imitation is so strong, that it leads her to actions which must be entirely incomprehensible to her, and which can give her no other pleasure than the gratification of an internal faculty. She has been known to sit for half an hour, holding a book before her sightless eyes, and moving her lips, as she has observed seeing people do when reading.

She one day pretended that her doll was sick; and went through all the motions of tending it, and giving it medicine; she then put it carefully to bed, and placed a bottle of hot water to its feet, laughing all the time most heartily. When Dr. Howe came home, she insisted upon his going to see it, and feel its pulse; and when he told her to put a blister to its back, she seemed to enjoy it amazingly, and almost screamed with delight.

Her social feelings, and her affections, are very strong; and when she is sitting at work, or at her studies, by the side of one of her little friends, she will break off from her task every few moments, to hug and kiss her with an earnestness and warmth, which is touching to behold.

When left alone, she occupies and apparently amuses herself, and seems quite contented; and so strong seems to be the natural tendency of thought to put on the garb of language, that she often soliloquizes in the finger language, slow and tedious as it is. But it is only when alone, that she is quiet; for if she becomes sensible of the presence of any persons near her, she is restless until she can sit close beside them, hold their hand, and converse with them by signs.

She does not cry from vexation and disappointment, like other children, but only from grief. If she receives a blow by accident, or hurts herself, she laughs and jumps about, as if trying to drown the pain by muscular action. If the pain is severe, she does not go to her teachers or companions for sympathy, but on the contrary tries to get away by herself, and then seems to give vent to a feeling of spite, by throwing herself about violently, and roughly handling whatever she gets hold of.

Twice, only, have tears been drawn from her by the severity of pain, and then she ran away from the room, as if ashamed of crying for an accidental injury. But the fountain of her tears is by no means dried up, as is seen when her companions are in pain, or her teacher is grieved.

in her intellectual character, it is pleasing to observe an insatiable thirst for knowledge, and a quick perception of the relations of things. In her moral character, it is beautiful to behold her continual gladness—her keen enjoyment of existence—her expansive love—her unhesitating confidence—her sympathy with suffering—her conscientiousness, truthfulness, and hopefulness.

She is remarkably correct in her deportment; and few children of her age evince so much sense of propriety in regard to appearance. Never, by any possibility, is she seen out of her room with her dress disordered; and if by chance any spot of dirt is pointed out to her on her person, or any little rent in her dress, she discovers a sense of shame, and hastens to remove, or repair it.

She is never discovered in an attitude or an action at which the most fastidious would revolt; but is remarkable for neatness, order, and propriety.

There is one fact which is hard to explain in any way: viz., the difference of her deportment to persons of different sex. This was observable when she was only seven years old. She is very affectionate; and when with her friends of her own sex, she is constantly clinging to them, and often kissing and caressing them; and when she meets with strange ladies, she very soon becomes familiar, examines very freely their dress, and readily allows them to caress her. But with those of the other sex it is entirely different, and she repels every approach to familiarity.

Laura has often amused herself during the past year, (1846,) by little exercises in composition. The following story, written during the absence of her teacher, will serve as a specimen of her use of language. The last sentence, though not grammatical, may be considered as the moral, and a very good moral of the whole.

“THE GOOD-NATURED GIRL—

“Lucy was nearly nine years old. She had excellent parents. She always did with alacrity what her mother requested her to do. She told Lucy when it was time for her to go to school; so Lucy ran and put on her bonnet and shawl and then went back to her mama. She offered Lucy a basket containing some pie and cake for luncheon. And Lucy went precisely at schooltime and when she got to the house she took her own seat and began to study diligently with all the children. And she always conformed to her teachers wishes—In recess she took luncheon out of her basket but she gave some of it to her mates—Lucy had some books with pictures and slate in her desk—

“When she went home she found that dinner was all ready—Afterwards her mother took her to take tea with her friends. Lucy was much delighted to play with her little cousin Lucy and Helen; and they let her see their play things. After tea Lucy was sorry to depart; and when she went to bed she thought that she had made it pleasantly to all her friends with little joyful heart.”

Laura keeps a sort of diary, in which she writes with her own hand an account of what passes every day. It is generally a bald narration of the facts; but an extract will give an idea of her daily routine of study. The diary is generally very legibly written. We will transcribe a day's record, exactly as she wrote it, with her spelling and punctuation, putting any explanations that may be necessary in brackets. The only alteration is in the use of capitals, which she has never been taught to make.

“SIXTH OF JAN TUESDAY.

“I studied arithmetic before my breakfast. Afterwards Miss Wight was occupied for Dr. till quarter to ten. Then she read to me about Bible. Abraham went to live in the city Gerar. He and his wife lived in the western corner of Palestine place [country]. But his son Isaac was very kind to comfort his parents when they grew old [.] Isaac was always good to take care of them and made them feel very happy. Abraham thanked God for his kindness exceedingly.

“Wight taught me two more lessons geography and history. Putnam was a farmer who was ploughing his land with the cattle in a field. When tidings were brought to him of a battle at Lexington he did not stop to unharness the cattle but ran very rapidly to his home and went to live in Boston. In a few weeks thirty thousand of soldiers arrived to Boston. Most of them had no cannons nor leads nor guns. And the British went to Bunker Hill from Boston to attack the Americans and expel them away when they were going to fire upon them. And when the British saw them ready they were surprised.”

Her store of knowledge has been very much increased during the last year. It will be seen, too, that she has improved in the use of language; and when it is considered that other deaf mutes have as great advantage over her as we have over them, if not greater, her style will bear comparison with theirs.

She has become somewhat more thoughtful and sedate than formerly, though she is generally very cheerful, and sometimes displays a childish humour that shows her age is to be measured by the degrees of her mental development, rather than by the number of years that she has lived.

She has extended the circle of her acquaintance, and has endeared herself to many persons who have learned to converse with her. It is the earnest hope of all that her life may be prolonged, and that we may be enabled to do our duty to her and to ourselves by making it as happy and useful as possible.

(1850.) Her progress has been a curious and an interesting spectacle. She has come into human society with a sort of triumphal march; her course has been a perpetual ovation. Thousands have been watching her with eager eyes, and applauding each successful step, while she, all unconscious of their gaze, holding on to the slender thread, and feeling her way along, has advanced with faith and courage towards those who awaited her with trembling hope. Nothing shows more than her case the importance which, despite their useless waste of human life and human capacity, men really attach to a human soul. They owe to her something for furnishing an opportunity of showing how much goodness there is in them; for surely the way in which she has been regarded is creditable to humanity.

BRONTË, CHARLOTTE,

KNOWN to the literary world as CURRER BELL, author of "Jane Eyre," and "Shirley," has won a wide celebrity, and deserves, for her original genius, a high place among living female writers. She is daughter of a clergyman, the Rev. Patrick Brontë, who holds the livings of Haworth and Bradford, in Yorkshire. Miss Brontë has been engaged in what we consider the noblest pursuit of woman—she has been an instructress. To judge from the hints scattered through her works, she is an excellent teacher, or rather was, for her days of governing are now over. Residing with her father, she devotes herself to literary pursuits. Like Minerva of old, Miss Brontë burst forth on the world complete for her part; her first work placed her among celebrated novel writers. Yet we hope she has better and holier treasures of wisdom yet in store for those who will eagerly read whatever falls from her pen. To make our meaning clear, we will briefly but candidly express our opinion of her novels.

Perhaps no work of fiction has, for the last twenty years, so fastened on its readers, or taken so large a place in public estimation, as "Jane Eyre." Vigour, animation, originality, an interest that never flags, must be conceded to it; the style is far from being invulnerable to criticism,—yet it has its own charm: its faults are often such as "true critics would not mend," imparting a piquancy and individuality to the narrative. We do not reckon among these "failings that lean to virtue's side," certain Gallicisms that occasionally appear, being decidedly opposed to all "confusion of tongues." But the hero of this book, Mr. Rochester, is a personage utterly distasteful and disagreeable. We are told of his fine eyes, and good understanding—the last is, however, never exhibited in action; and except these, no beauty, moral or physical, is anywhere attributed to him. We are not so "superfluous" as to require a reason for Jane's falling in love with him—we will grant the power of the blind god to inspire an ingenuous girl of eighteen with a passion for a coarse, rude, unamiable, ill-looking, blasé roué of forty; but the sort of feeling she is described as entertaining for Mr. Rochester is altogether unnatural, impossible,—and if it were possible, would be revolting. Any true sentiment of love must naturally be confiding, more especially in the breast of an unsophisticated young woman; here we have a girl singularly ignorant of life, whose knowledge of her own sex has been limited to the uniformly moulded habits of inexperienced school-girls, whose knowledge of man has been entirely derived from books, whose knowledge of books has been taken chiefly from those of a didactic nature;—we see this damsel, at the very moment of receiving her lover's vows in all their freshness,—very coolly reducing them to the most frigid standard of reasoning, and seriously predicting to him how all this romance will gradually abate, and how marriage will prove a sedative to his fervent affection. Just as a grandmother might have wished to moderate the too great enthusiasm of youthful expectation, by taking the pencil of sage experience to sketch the brevity of human passion.

As to the chapters which immediately follow Mr. Rochester's most singularly managed declaration of love, they have the air of being a contribution from some male friend—and one, we must add, who has been not much accustomed to the society, and habits of thought, of refined women. Unprincipled men have been known to attempt a seduction, or failing in this, to propose marriage to their intended victims; the author of this book has devised a scheme of entire originality; Mr. Rochester offers marriage, and when that cannot be accomplished, deliberately tries to undermine the principles, and sacrifice the reputation of the woman he professes to love. Jane Eyre is a book which has fascinated so many young readers, and is written with such power, that we deem it right to censure most unsparingly the perverse sophistications it contains. Mr. Rochester's infamous designs, instead of inspiring Jane with resentment, are looked upon as excusable, and as resulting from unfortunate circumstances. Is virtue then to lose her essence, under any circumstances? Is it not the very condition of her nature to support extraordinary trials—and be virtue still!

Mr. Rochester had in youth made a sordid marriage of convenience, in which his heart was not at all engaged. Such marriages usually turn out ill; Mr. Rochester's proved of the very worst sort; his wife became a maniac, and he was obliged to seclude her for life. This state of things, he conceived, justified him in spending his early manhood in a course of avowed immorality and continual dissipation. The gratifications of vice are palling; tired of opera-dancers, he felt himself permitted to try a new crime,—to ruin the character and principles of an innocent young girl, placed under the protection of his roof by circumstances. All this he explains in a way, that appears to convince Jane that he is rather more to be pitied than condemned. And yet she did not fall: the author has here shown wonderful power in depicting the struggle of Jane, not only with the ungovernable passions of Mr. Rochester, but also with her own deep, heart-enthalling love for him. The pure instinct of virtue did not fail her; and as a discriminating critic of her own country has remarked:—She was, in that trial, "a noble, high-souled woman, bound to us by the reality of her sorrow, and yet raised above us by the strength of her will, she stands in actual life before us. If this be Jane Eyre, the author has done her injustice hitherto, not we. Look at her in the first recognition of her sorrow after the discomfiture of the marriage. True, it is not the attitude of a Christian, who knows that all things work together for good to those who love God, but it is a splendidly drawn picture of a natural heart, of high power, intense feeling, and fine religious instinct, falling prostrate, but not grovelling before the tremendous blast of sudden affliction."

Among the other characters of this work are some very excellent and well sketched,—that of Miss Temple is perfectly charming,—and many touches in Helen Burns are exquisite.—As to the "fine people" assembled at Thornfield, they may be accurate delineations of British gentry; very certainly they do in no respect accord with our cis-Atlantic ideas of high-bred men and women. In these conversational matters, however, every age and every nation has its own laws:—"What can we reason but from what we know?" An author can merely describe as to manners and customs what is proper to his own country. An American writer would be very ridiculous were she to describe a young lady of fashion, or of no fashion in a "morning-robe of sky-blue crape, and a gauzy scarf twisted in her hair," hectoring her mother, and assuming the rude school-boy style of conversation, in which Miss Ingram indulges; but it may be that "they do these things differently in England."

After passing censure which seemed due, upon what is unsound in Jane Eyre, we are happy to notice a very commendable portion of the book, a digression certainly from the story, but in itself tending to utility, admirably conceived and perfectly well executed: this is the episode of her school in the parish of St. John Rivers. Works enough we have, and to spare, upon education, the education of ladies and gentlemen, the polishing and strengthening "the Corinthian columns."—Miss Brontë gives us a homely sketch of what may be effected by an intelligent woman, in awakening the torpidity of those classes of her sex to whom knowledge has but few opportunities of "unrolling her ample page." She shows, that there are things besides a little learning, the germs of which lie in every female bosom, as well in that of the rural milkmaid, as in hers who is the cynosure of the opera-box—things which by a little timely culture, will embellish the cottage as well as the castle,—“make the rough paths of peevish nature even, and open in each breast a little heaven.” Order, industry, neatness, courtesy, and kindness of spirit, are suitable to all conditions of life, and may be inculcated with, or without “the useful and ornamental branches of an English education.” This moral of Jane Eyre has already produced good results; we find subsequent thinkers are turning their attention to this very point, and the next step, we hope, will be for the doers to act upon it. The female sex must be educated, and become fit for educators, before the world will make much progress in moral wisdom.

"Shirley" is quite exempt from the serious faults of "Jane Eyre." We consider it a more valuable work. It has not the like intense interest which makes it difficult to lay it aside till it is finished; it has some superfluous personages whose portraits are but incumbrances; yet it is replete with wit, has much original and striking thought, and is written with a free, bold spirit, that charms by its spontaneous vigour. The three curates are capitally described. Shirley herself, though a fine, spirited, sensible woman, is rather too "mannish;" but Caroline is charming, and has only that fault which is common to all Miss Brontë's heroines, submitting to too much indignity from her lover. Is this a Yorkshire or an English characteristic of young women?

Miss Brontë cannot be too highly praised for her power of describing natural aspects of the country. It is what many aim at, and what hardly any one succeeds in accomplishing. In general, such pictures are vague and unreadable; but her landscapes and atmospheres are with you; you see them, feel them, and are also affected by them.

From "Jane Eyre."

LOWOOD SCENERY.

But the privations, or rather the hardships, of Lowood lessened. Spring drew on; she was, indeed, already come; the frosts of winter had ceased; its snows were melted; its cutting winds ameliorated. My wretched feet, flayed and swelled to lameness by the sharp air of January, began to heal and subside under the gentler breathings of April. The nights and mornings no longer, by their Canadian temperature, froze the very blood in our veins; we could now endure the play-hour passed in the garden. Sometimes, on a sunny day, it began even to be pleasant and genial; and a greenness grew over those brown beds which, freshening daily, suggested the thought that Hope traversed them at night, and left each morning brighter traces of her steps. Flowers peeped out among the leaves—snowdrops, crocuses, purple auriculas, and golden-eyed pansies. On Thursday afternoons (half holydays) we now took walks, and found still sweeter flowers opening by the wayside, under the hedges.

I discovered, too, that a great pleasure—an enjoyment which the horizon only bounded—lay all outside the high and spike-guarded walls of our garden. This pleasure consisted in a prospect of noble summits girding a great hill-hollow, rich in verdure and shadow; in a bright beck, full of dark stones and sparkling eddies. How different had this scene looked when I viewed it laid out beneath the iron sky of winter, stiffened in frost, shrouded with snow—when mists as still as death wandered to the impulse of east winds along those purple peaks, and rolled down "ing" and holm till they blended with the frozen fog of the beck! That beck itself was then a torrent, turbid and curbless; it tore asunder the wood, and sent a raving sound through the air, often thickened with wild rain or whirling sleet; and for the forest on its banks, that showed only ranks of skeletons.

April advanced to May. A bright, serene May it was; days of blue sky, placid sunshine, and soft western or southern gales filled up its duration. And now vegetation matured with vigour: Lowood shook loose its tresses; it became all green, all flowery; its great elm, ash, and oak skeletons were restored to majestic life; woodland plants sprung up profusely in its recesses; unnumbered varieties of moss filled its hollows; and it made a strange ground-sunshine out of the wealth of its wild primrose plants; I have seen their pale gold gleam, in overshadowed spots, like scatterings of the sweetest lustre. All this I enjoyed often and fully, free, unwatched, and almost alone; for this unwonted liberty and pleasure there was a cause, to which it now becomes my task to advert.

THE MEETING.

The ground was hard, the air was still, my road was lonely; I walked fast till I got warm, and then I walked slowly to enjoy and analyze the species of pleasure brooding for me in the hour and situation. It was three o'clock; the church-bell tolled as I passed under the belfry: the charm of the hour lay in its approaching dimness, in the low-gliding and pale-beaming sun. I was a mile from Thornfield, in a lane noted for wild roses in summer, for nuts and blackberries in autumn, and even now possessing a few coral treasures in hips and haws; but whose best winter delight lay in its utter solitude and leafless repose. If a breath of air stirred, it made no sound here; for there was not a holly, not an evergreen to rustle, and the stripped hawthorn and hazel bushes were as still as the white, worn stones which causewayed the middle of the path. Far and wide, on each side, there were only fields, where no cattle now browsed; and the little brown birds which stirred occasionally in the hedge looked like single russet leaves that had forgotten to drop.

This lane inclined up-hill all the way to Hay: having reached the middle, I sat down on a stile which led thence into a field. Gathering my mantle about me and sheltering my hands in my muff, I did not feel the cold, though it froze keenly—as was attested by a sheet of ice covering the causeway, where a little brooklet, now congealed, had overflowed after a rapid thaw some days since. From my seat I could look down on Thornfield: the grey and battlemented hall was the principal object in the vale below me; its woods and dark rookery rose against the west. I lingered till the sun went down among the trees, and sunk crimson and clear behind them. I turned eastward.

On the hill-top above me sat the rising moon; pale yet as a cloud, but brightening momentarily; she looked over Hay, which, half lost in trees, sent up a blue smoke from its few chimneys; it was yet a mile distant, but in the absolute hush I could hear plainly its thin murmurs of life. My ear, too, felt the flow of currents; in what dales and depths I could not tell: but there were many hills beyond Hay, and doubtless many becks threading their passes. That evening-calm betrayed alike the tinkle of the nearest streams, the sigh of the most remote.

A rude noise broke on these fine ripples and whisperings, at once so far away and so clear: a positive tramp, tramp; a metallic clatter, which effaced the soft wave-wanderings; as, in a picture, the solid mass of a crag, or the rough boles of a great oak, drawn in dark and strong on the foreground, efface the aerial distance of azure hill, sunny horizon and blended clouds, where tint melts into tint.

The din was on the causeway: a horse was coming; the windings of the lane yet hid it, but it approached. I was just leaving the stile; yet as the path was narrow, I sat still to let it go by. In those days I was young, and all sorts of fancies, bright and dark, tenanted my mind: the memories of nursery stories were there among other rubbish; and when they recurred, maturing youth added to them a vigour and vividness beyond what childhood could give. As this horse approached, and as I watched for it to appear through the dusk, I remembered certain of Bessie's tales wherein figured a North of England spirit, called a "Gytrash;" which, in the form of horse, mule, or large dog, haunted solitary ways, and sometimes came upon belated travellers, as this horse was now coming upon me.

It was very near, but not yet in sight, when, in addition to the tramp, tramp, I heard a rush under the hedge, and close down by the hazel stems glided a great dog, whose black and white colour made him a distinct object against the trees. It was exactly one mask of Bessie's "Gytrash"—a lion-like creature with long hair and a huge head: it passed me, however, quietly enough; not staying to look up, with strange pretercanine eyes, in my face, as I half expected it would. The horse followed—a tall steed, and on its back a rider. The man, the human being, broke the spell at once. Nothing ever rode the "Gytrash:" it was always alone; and goblins, to my notions, though they might tenant the dumb carcasses of beasts, could scarce covet shelter in the common-place human form. No "Gytrash" was this—only a traveller taking the short cut to Millcote. He passed, and I went on; a few steps, and I turned: a sliding sound and an exclamation of "What the deuce is to do now?" and a clattering tumble arrested my attention. Man and horse were down; they had slipped on the sheet of ice which glazed the causeway. The dog came bounding back, and seeing his master in a predicament, and hearing the horse groan, barked till the evening hills echoed the sound; which was deep in proportion to his magnitude. He snuffed round the prostrate group, and then he ran up to me; it was all he could do—there was no other help at hand to summon. I obeyed him, and walked down to the traveller, by this time struggling himself free of his steed. His efforts were so vigorous, I thought he could not be much hurt; but I asked him the question—

"Are you injured, sir?"

I think he was swearing, but am not certain, however, he was pronouncing some formula which prevented him from replying to me directly

"Can I do anything?" I asked again.

"You must just stand on one side," he answered, as he rose first to his knees, and then to his feet. I did; whereupon began a heaving, stamping, clattering process, accompanied by a barking and baying, which removed me effectually some yards distance: but I would not be driven quite away till I saw the event. This was finally fortunate; the horse was re-established, and the dog was silenced with a "Down, Pilot!" The traveller now stooping, felt his foot and leg, as if trying whether they were sound; apparently something ailed them, for he halted to the stile whence I had just risen, and sat down.

I was in the mood for being useful, or at least officious, I think, for I now drew near him again.

"If you are hurt, and want help, sir, I can fetch some one, either from Thornfield Hall or from Hay."

"Thank you; I shall do: I have no broken bones—only a sprain;" and again he stood up and tried his foot, but the result extorted an involuntary "Ugh!"

Something of daylight still lingered, and the moon was waxing bright; I could see him plainly. His figure was enveloped in a riding-cloak, fur-collared, and steel-clasped; its details were not apparent, but I traced the general points of middle height, and considerable breadth of chest. He had a dark face, with stern features and a heavy brow; his eyes and gathered eyebrows looked ireful and thwarted just now; he was past youth, but had not reached middle age: perhaps he might be thirty-five. I felt no fear of him, and but little shyness. Had he been a handsome, heroic-looking young gentleman, I should not have dared to stand thus questioning him against his will, and offering my services unasked. I had hardly ever seen a handsome youth; never in my life spoken to one. I had a theoretical reverence and homage for beauty, elegance, gallantry, fascination; but had I met those qualities incarnate in masculine shape, I should have known instinctively that they neither had nor could have sympathy with anything in me, and should have shunned them as one would fire, lightning, or any thing else that is bright but antipathetic.

If even this stranger had smiled and been good-humoured to me when I addressed him; if he had put off my offer of assistance gayly and with thanks, I should have gone on my way and not felt any vocation to renew enquiries; but the frown, the roughness of the traveller set me at my ease; I retained my station when he waved me to go, and announced—

"I can not think of leaving you, sir, at so late an hour, in this solitary lane, till I see you are fit to mount your horse."

He looked at me when I said this: he had hardly turned his eyes in my direction before.

"I should think you ought to be at home yourself," said he, "if you have a home in this neighbourhood; where do you come from?"

"From just below; and I am not at all afraid of being out late when it is moonlight: I will run over to Hay for you with pleasure, if you wish it—indeed, I am going there to post a letter."

"You live just below—do you mean at that house with the battlements?" pointing to Thornfield Hall, on which the moon cast a hoary gleam, bringing it out distinct and pale from the woods, that, by contrast with the western sky, now seemed one mass of shadow.

"Yes, sir."

"Whose house is it?"

"Mr. Rochester's."

"Do you know Mr. Rochester?"

"No, I have never seen him."

"He is not resident then?"

"No."

"Can you tell me where he is?"

"I can not."

"You are not a servant at the Hall, of course. You are—" He stopped, ran his eye over my dress, which as usual, was quite simple: a black merino cloak, a black beaver bonnet; neither of them half fine enough for a lady's maid. He seemed puzzled to decide what I was: I helped him

"I am the governess!"

"Ah, the governess!" he repeated; "deuce take me if I had not forgotten! The governess!" and again my raiment underwent scrutiny.

THE PARTING.

"I used to enjoy a chance meeting with you, Jane," said Mr. Rochester, "at this time; there was a curious hesitation in your manner; you glanced at me with a slight trouble—a hovering doubt; you did not know what my caprice might be—whether I was going to play the master, and be stern—or the friend, and be benignant. I was now too fond of you often to stimulate the first whim; and, when I stretched my hand out cordially, such bloom, and light, and bliss rose to your young, wistful features, I had much ado often to avoid straining you then and there to my heart."

"Don't talk any more of those days, sir," I interrupted, furtively dashing away some tears from my eyes: his language was torture to me; for I knew what I must do—and do soon—and all these reminiscences, and these revelations of his feelings, only made my work more difficult.

"No, Jane," he returned; "what necessity is there to dwell on the Past, when the Present is so much surer—the Future so much brighter?"

I shuddered to hear the infatuated assertion.

"You see now how the case stands—do you not?" he continued. "After a youth and manhood, passed half in unutterable misery and half in dreary solitude, I have for the first time found what I can truly love—I have found you. You are my sympathy—my better self—my good angel—I am bound to you with a strong attachment. I think you good, gifted, lovely; a fervent, a solemn passion is conceived in my heart; it leans to you, draws you to my centre and spring of life, wraps my existence about you—and kindling in pure and powerful flame, fuses you and me in one."

"It was because I felt and knew this, that I resolved to marry you. To tell me that I had already a wife is empty mockery; you know now that I had but a hideous demon. I was wrong to attempt to deceive you; but I feared a stubbornness that exists in your character. I feared early instilled prejudice; I wanted to have you safe before hazarding confidences. This was cowardly; I should have appealed to your nobleness and magnanimity at first, as I do now—opened to you plainly my life of agony—described to you my hunger and thirst after a higher and worthier existence—shown to you not my resolution (that word is weak) but my resistless bent to love faithfully and well, where I am faithfully and well loved in return. Then I should have asked you to accept my pledge of fidelity, and to give me yours: Jane—give it me now.”

A pause.

“Why are you silent, Jane?”

I was experiencing an ordeal; a hand of fiery iron grasped my vitals. Terrible moment; full of struggle, blackness, burning! Not a human being that ever lived could wish to be loved better than I was loved; and him who thus loved me I absolutely worshipped: and I must renounce love and idol. One drear word comprised my intolerable duty—“Depart!”

“Jane, you understand what I want of you? Just this promise—‘I will be yours, Mr. Rochester.’”

“Mr. Rochester, I will not be yours.”

Another long silence.

“Jane!” recommenced he, with a gentleness that broke me down with grief, and turned me stone-cold with ominous terror—for this still voice was the pant of a lion rising—“Jane, do you mean to go one way in the world, and to let me go another!”

“I do.”

“Jane (bending toward and embracing me), do you mean it now?”

“I do.”

“And now!” softly kissing my forehead and cheek.

“I do—” extricating myself from restraint rapidly and completely.

“Oh, Jane, this is bitter! This—this is wicked. It would not be wicked to love me.”

“It would to obey you.”

A wild look raised his brows—crossed his features: he rose, but he forbore yet. I laid my hand on the back of a chair for support; I shook, I feared—but I resolved.

“One instant, Jane. Give one glance to my horrible life when you are gone. All happiness will be torn away with you. What then is left? For a wife I have but the maniac up stairs; as well might you refer me to some corpse in yonder church-yard. What shall I do, Jane? Where turn for a companion, and for hope?”

“Do as I do; trust in God and yourself. Believe in Heaven. Hope to meet again there.”

“Then you will not yield?”

“No.”

“Then you condemn me to live wretched, and to die accursed?” His voice rose.

“I advise you to live sinless; and I wish you to die tranquil.”

“Then you snatch love and innocence from me? You fling me back on lust for a passion—vice for an occupation?”

“Mr. Rochester, I no more assign this fate to you than I grasp at it for myself. We were born to strive and endure—you as well as I; do so. You will forget me before I forget you.”

“You make me a liar by such language; you sully my honour. I declared I could not change; you tell me to my face I shall change soon. And what a distortion in your judgment, what a perversity in your ideas, is proved by your conduct? Is it better to drive a fellow-creature to despair than to transgress a mere human law—no man being injured by the breach? for you have neither relatives nor acquaintances whom you need fear to offend by living with me.”

This was true; and while he spoke my very conscience and reason turned traitors against me, and charged me with crime in resisting him. They spoke almost as loud as feeling, and that clamoured wildly. “Oh, comply!” it said. “Think of his misery, think of his danger, look at his state when left alone; remember his headlong nature, consider the recklessness following on despair; soothe him, save him, love him: tell him you love him and will be his. Who in the world cares for you? or who will be injured by what you do?”

Still indomitable was the reply, “I care for myself. The more solitary, the more friendless, the more unsustained I am, the more I will respect myself. I will keep the law given by God, sanctioned by man. I will hold to the principles received by me when I was sane, and not mad—as I am now. Laws and principles are not for the times when there is no temptation; they are for such moments as this, when body and soul rise in mutiny against their rigour: stringent are they; inviolate they shall be. If at my individual convenience I might break them, what would be their worth? They have a worth, so I have always believed; and if I cannot believe it now, it is because I am insane, quite insane, with my veins running fire, and my heart beating faster than I can count its throbs. Preconceived opinions, foregone determinations, are all I have at this hour to stand by; there I plant my foot.”

I did. Mr. Rochester, reading my countenance, saw I had done so. His fury was wrought to the highest; he must yield to it for a moment, whatever followed; he crossed the floor and seized my arm, and grasped my waist. He seemed to devour me with his flaming glance; physically, I felt, at the moment, powerless as stubble exposed to the draught and glow of a furnace; mentally I still possessed my soul, and with it the certainty of ultimate safety. The soul, fortunately, has an interpreter—often an unconscious, but still a truthful, interpreter—in the eye. My eye rose to his, and while I looked in his fierce face, I gave an involuntary sigh; his gripe was painful, and my overtaken strength almost exhausted.

“Never,” said he, as he ground his teeth, “never was any thing at once so frail and so indomitable. A mere reed she feels in my hand! (and he shook me with the force of his hold.) I could bend her with my finger and thumb, and what good would it do if I bent, if I up tore, if I crushed her? Consider that eye; consider the resolute, wild, free thing looking out of it, defying me, with more than courage, with a stern triumph. Whatever I do with its cage, I cannot get at it, the savage, beautiful creature! If I tear, if I rend the slight prison, my outrage will only let the captive loose. Conqueror I might be of the house, but the inmate would escape to heaven before I could call myself possessor of its clay dwelling-place. And it is you, spirit, with will and energy, and virtue and purity, that I want; not alone your brittle frame. Of yourself, you could come, with soft flight, and nestle against my heart, if you would; seized against your will, you will elude the grasp like an essence; you will vanish ere I inhale your fragrance. Oh! come, Jane, come!"

As he said this, he released me from his clutch, and only looked at me. The look was far worse to resist than the frantic strain; only an idiot, however, would have succumbed now. I had dared and baffled his fury, I must elude his sorrow; I retired to the door.

"You are going, Jane?"

"I am going, sir."

"You are leaving me?"

"Yes."

"You will not come? You will not be my comforter, my rescuer? My deep love, my wild woe, my frantic prayer, are all nothing to you?"

What unutterable pathos was in his voice! How hard it was to reiterate firmly, "I am going."

"Jane!"

"Mr. Rochester."

"Withdraw, then, I consent; but remember, you leave me here in anguish. Go up to your own room; think over all I have said, and, Jane, cast a glance on my sufferings; think of me."

He turned away, he threw himself on his face on the sofa. "Oh, Jane! my hope, my love, my life!" broke in anguish from his lips. Then came a deep, strong sob.

I had already gained the door, but, reader, I walked back—walked back as determinedly as I had retreated. I knelt down by him, I turned his face from the cushion to me; I kissed his cheek, I smoothed his hair with my hand.

"God bless you, my dear master," I said. "God keep you from harm and wrong, direct you, solace you, reward you well for your past kindness to me."

"Little Jane's love would have been my best reward," he answered; "without it, my heart is broken. But Jane will give me her love; yes, nobly, generously."

Up the blood rushed to his face; forth flashed the fire from his eyes, erect he sprang, he held his arms out, but I evaded the embrace, and at once quitted the room.

"Farewell!" was the cry of my heart, as I left him. Despair added, "Farewell, forever!"

MARRIED LIFE.

I have now been married ten years. I know what it is to live entirely for and with what I love best on earth. I hold myself supremely blessed—blessed beyond what language can express; because I am my husband's life as fully as he is mine. No woman was ever nearer to her mate than I am; ever more absolute bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh. I know of no weariness of my Edward's society; he knows none of mine, any more than we each do of the pulsation of the heart that beats in our separate bosoms; consequently, we are ever together. To be together is for us to be at once as free as in solitude, as gay as in company. We talk, I believe, all day long; to talk to each other is but a more animated and an audible thinking. All my confidence is bestowed on him; all his confidence is devoted to me; we are precisely suited in character; perfect concord is the result.

From "Shirley."

SHIRLEY AND CAROLINE.

Shirley easily persuaded Caroline to go with her; and when they were fairly out on the quiet road, traversing the extensive and solitary sweep of Nunnely Common, she as easily drew her into conversation. The first feelings of diffidence overcome, Caroline soon felt glad to talk with Miss Keeldar. The very first interchange of slight observations sufficed to give each an idea of what the other was. Shirley said she liked the green sweep of the Common turf, and, better still, the heath on its ridges, for the heath reminded her of moors: she had seen moors when she was travelling on the borders of Scotland. She remembered particularly a district traversed one long afternoon, on a sultry but sunless day in summer: they journeyed from noon till sunset, over what seemed a boundless waste of deep heath, and nothing had they seen but wild sheep; nothing heard but cries of the wild birds.

"I know how the heath would look on such a day," said Caroline; "purple-black: a deeper shade of the sky-tint, and that would be livid."

"Yes—quite livid, with brassy edges to the clouds, and here and there a white gleam, more ghastly than the lurid tinge, which, as you looked at it, you momentarily expected would kindle into blinding lightning."

"Did it thunder?"

"It muttered distant peals, but the storm did not break till evening, after we had reached our inn: that inn being an isolated house at the foot of a range of mountains."

"Did you watch the clouds come down over the mountains?"

"I did: I stood at the window an hour watching them. The hills seemed rolled in a sullen mist, and when the rain fell in whitening sheets, suddenly were blotted from the prospect: they were washed from the world."

"I have seen such storms in hilly districts in Yorkshire; and at their riotous climax, while the sky was all cataract, the earth all flood, I have remembered the Deluge."

"It is singularly reviving after such hurricanes to feel calm return, and from the opening clouds to receive a consolatory gleam, softly testifying that the sun is not quenched."

"Miss Keeldar, just stand still now, and look down at Nunnely dale and wood."

They both halted on the green brow of the Common: they looked down on the deep valley robed in May raiment; on varied meads, some pearly with daisies, and some golden with king-cups: to-day all this young verdure smiled clear in sunlight; transparent emerald and amber gleams played over it. On Nunwood—the sole remnant of antique British forest in a region whose lowlands were once all sylvan chase, as its highlands were breast-deep heather—slept the shadow of a cloud; the distant hills were dappled, the horizon was shaded and tinted like mother-of-pearl; silvery blues, soft purples, evanescent greens and rose-shades, all melting into fleeces of white cloud, pure as azury snow, allured the eye as with a remote glimpse of heaven's foundations. The air blowing on the brow was fresh, and sweet, and bracing.

"Our England is a bonnie island," said Shirley, "and Yorkshire is one of her bonniest nooks."

"You are a Yorkshire girl, too?"

"I am—Yorkshire in blood and birth. Five generations of my race sleep under the aisles of Briarfield Church: I drew my first breath in the old black hall behind us."

Hereupon Caroline presented her hand, which was accordingly taken and shaken. "We are compatriots," said she.

* * * * *

"Our power of being happy lies a good deal in ourselves, I believe," remarked Caroline, sagely. "I have gone to Nunwood with a large party, all the curates and some other gentry of these parts, together with sundry ladies; and I found the affair insufferably tedious and absurd: and I have gone quite alone, or accompanied but by Fanny, who sat in the woodman's hut and sewed, or talked to the good wife, while I roamed about and made sketches, or read; and I have enjoyed much happiness, of a quiet kind, all day long. But that was when I was young—two years ago."

"Did you ever go with your cousin Robert Moore?"

"Yes, once."

"What sort of a companion is he on these occasions?"

"A cousin, you know, is different to a stranger."

"I am aware of that; but cousins, if they are stupid, are still more insupportable than strangers, because you can not so easily keep them at a distance. But your cousin is not stupid?"

"No; but—"

"Well?"

"If the company of fools irritates, as you say, the society of clever men leaves its own peculiar pain also. Where the goodness or talent of your friend is beyond and above all doubt, your own worthiness to be his associate often becomes a matter of question."

"Oh! there I can not follow you: that crotchet is not one I should choose to entertain for an instant. I consider myself not unworthy to be the associate of the best of them—of gentlemen, I mean; though that is saying a great deal. Where they are good, they are very good, I believe. Your uncle, by-the-by, is not a bad specimen of the elderly gentleman; I am always glad to see his brown, keen, sensible old face, either in my own house, or any other. Are you fond of him? Is he kind to you? Now, speak the truth."

"He has brought me up from childhood, I doubt not, precisely as he would have brought up his own daughter, if he had had one; and that is kindness; but I am not fond of him: I would rather be out of his presence than in it."

"Strange! when he has the art of making himself so agreeable."

"Yes, in company; but he is stern and silent at home. As he puts away his cane and shovel-hat in the rectory-hall, so he locks his liveliness in his bookcase and study-desk; the knitted brow and brief word for the fireside, the smile, the jest, the witty sally, for society."

"Is he tyrannical?"

"Not in the least: he is neither tyrannical or hypocritical: he is simply a man who is rather liberal than good-natured, rather brilliant than genial, rather scrupulously equitable than truly just; if you can understand such superfine distinctions?"

"Oh! yes; good-nature implies indulgence, which he has not; geniality, warmth of heart, which he does not own; and genuine justice is the offspring of sympathy and considerateness, of which, I can well conceive, my bronzed old friend is quite innocent."

"I often wonder, Shirley, whether most men resemble my uncle in their domestic relations; whether it is necessary to be new and unfamiliar to them, in order to seem agreeable or estimable in their eyes; and whether it is impossible to their natures to retain a constant interest and affection for those they see every day."

"I don't know; I can't clear up your doubts. I ponder over similar ones myself sometimes. But, to tell you a secret, if I were convinced that they are necessarily and universally different from us—fickle, soon petrifying, unsympathizing, I would never marry. I should not like to find out that what I loved did not love me, that it was weary of me, and that whatever effort I might make to please would hereafter be worse than useless, since it was inevitably in its nature to change and become indifferent. That discovery once made, what should I long for? To go away—to remove from a presence where my society gave no pleasure."

"But you could not, if you were married."

"No, I could not—there it is. I could never be my own mistress more. A terrible thought!—it suffocates me! Nothing irks me like the idea of being a burden and a bore—an inevitable burden, a ceaseless bore! Now, when I feel my company superfluous, I can comfortably fold my independence round me like a mantle, and drop my pride like a veil, and withdraw to solitude: if married, that could not be."

"I wonder we don't all make up our minds to remain single," said Caroline: "we should, if we listened to the wisdom of experience. My uncle always speaks of marriage as a burden; and I believe whenever he hears of a man being married, he invariably regards him as a fool, or, at any rate, as doing a foolish thing."

"But, Caroline, men are not all like your uncle; surely not—I hope not."

She paused and mused.

"I suppose we each find an exception in the one we love, till we are married," suggested Caroline.

"I suppose so; and this exception we believe to be of sterling materials; we fancy it like ourselves; we imagine a sense of harmony. We think his voice gives the softest, truest promise of a heart that will never harden against us: we read in his eyes that faithful feeling—affection. I don't think we should trust to what they call passion, at all, Caroline. I believe it is a mere fire of dry sticks, blazing up and vanishing: but we watch him, and see him kind to animals, to little children, to poor people. He is kind to us, likewise—good, considerate: he does not flatter women, but he is patient with them, and he seems to be easy in their presence, and to find their company genial. He likes them not only for vain and selfish reasons, but as we like him—because we like him. Then we observe that he is just—that he always speaks the truth—that he is conscientious. We feel joy and peace when he comes into a room: we feel sadness and trouble when he leaves it. We know that this man has been a kind son, that he is a kind brother; will any one dare to tell me that he will not be a kind husband?"

"My uncle would affirm it unhesitatingly. 'He will be sick of you in a month,' he would say."

"Mrs. Pryor would seriously intimate the same."

"Mrs. Yorke and Miss Mann would darkly suggest ditto."

"If they are true oracles, it is good never to fall in love."

"Very good, if you can avoid it."

"I choose to doubt their truth."

"I am afraid that proves you are already caught."

"Not I: but if I were, do you know what sooth-sayers I would consult?"

"Let me hear."

"Neither man nor woman, elderly nor young;—the little Irish beggar that comes barefoot to my door; the mouse that steals out of the cranny in the wainscot; the bird that in frost and snow pecks at my window for a crumb; the dog that licks my hand and sits beside my knee."

"Did you ever see any one who was kind to such things?"

"Did you ever see any one whom such things seemed instinctively to follow, like, rely on?"

"We have a black cat and an old dog at the rectory. I know somebody to whose knee that black cat loves to climb; against whose shoulder and cheek it likes to purr. The old dog always comes out of his kennel and wags his tail, and whines affectionately when somebody passes."

"And what does that somebody do?"

"He quietly strokes the cat, and lets her sit while he conveniently can, and when he must disturb her by rising, he puts her softly down, and never flings her from him roughly; he always whistles to the dog, and gives him a caress."

"Does he? It is not Robert?"

"But it is Robert."

"Handsome fellow!" said Shirley, with enthusiasm: her eyes sparkled.

"Is he not handsome? Has he not fine eyes and well-cut features, and a clear, princely forehead?"

"He has all that, Caroline. Bless him! he is both graceful and good."

"I was sure you would see that he was: when I first looked at your face, I knew you would."

"I was well inclined to him before I saw him. I liked him when I did see him: I admire him now. There is a charm in beauty for itself, Caroline; when it is blent with goodness, there is a powerful charm."

"When mind is added, Shirley."

"Who can resist it?"

"Remember my uncle, Mesdames Pryor, Yorke, and Mann."

"Remember the croaking of the frogs of Egypt! He is a noble being. I tell you when they are good, they are the lords of the creation—they are the sons of God. Moulded in their Maker's image, the minutest spark of His spirit lifts them almost above mortality. Indisputably, a great, good, handsome man is the first of created things."

"Above us?"

"I would scorn to contend for empire with him—I would scorn it. Shall my left hand dispute for precedence with my right?—shall my heart quarrel with my pulse?—shall my veins be jealous of the blood which fills them?"

"Men and women, husbands and wives, quarrel horribly, Shirley."

"Poor things! poor, fallen, degenerate things! God made them for another lot—for other feelings."

"But are we men's equals, or are we not?"

"Nothing ever charms me more than when I meet my superior—one who makes me sincerely feel that he is my superior."

"Did you ever meet him?"

"I should be glad to see him any day: the higher above me, so much the better: it degrades to stoop—it is glorious to look up. What frets me is, that when I try to esteem, I am baffled: when religiously inclined, there are but false gods to adore. I disdain to be a Pagan."

"Miss Keeldar, will you come in? We are here at the rectory gates."

"Not to-day; but to-morrow I shall fetch you to spend the evening with me. Caroline Helstone—if you really are what at present to me you seem—you and I will suit. I have never in my whole life been able to talk to a young lady as I have talked to you this morning. Kiss me—and good-bye."

BROWN, FRANCES,

Was born in 1816, at Stranerlar, in the county of Donegal, Ireland, where her father was postmaster. She lost her eyesight when she was eighteen months old, yet, from her assiduity in acquiring knowledge, she can compete with many educated women in attainments. Her poems are considered very good; and she has received the title of "The Blind Poetess of Ulster," which awakens in the popular mind of her own country-people pity for her misfortune, and pride in her fame. She has herself given a touching account of the manner in which she acquired her learning: her intellectual taste was first awakened by the preaching of the village pastor; then she heard the books of children read; and, as her mind gained power, the works of Walter Scott, ancient histories, Burns, Pope's Iliad, Milton, Byron, all were read to her, and furnished her eager spirit with food for thought. She was about twenty, when she gathered courage to write to the editor of the London Athenæum, enclosing a few of her poems; these were favourably received, and she became a poet. She has contributed to several periodicals and annuals. In 1844, a volume of hers, "The Star of Attégchéi, and other Poems," was published in London, with a preface, (probably by her gifted publisher, Edward Moxon,) which truly says:—"The bard gathers dignity from the darkness amid which she sings, as the darkness itself is lightened by the song."

From the Vision of Schwartz.

THE SPANISH CONQUESTS IN AMERICA.

Whence came those glorious shadows? — Say,
Ye far and nameless tombs!
Ye silent cities, lost to-day
Amid the forest glooms!
Is there no echo in the glades,
Whose massive foliage never fades,—
No voice among the pathless shades,
To tell of glory gone?
Gone from faint memory's fading dreams,
From shepherd's tales and poet's themes;
And yet the bright, eternal streams
Unwasted still roll on,— Majestic as they rolled, before
A sail had sought, or found, the shore.

But by those mighty rivers, then,
What peaceful nations met,
Among the race of mortal men
Unnamed, unnumbered yet!
And cities rose and temples shone,
And power and splendour graced the throne,
And autumn's riches, freely strown,
Repaid the peasant's pains;
For homes of love and shrines of prayer
And fields of storied fame were there,
And smiling landscapes freshly fair —
The haunts of happy swains,—
And many a wide and trackless wild,
Where roved the farmer's tameless child.

* * * * *

Shades of Columbia's perished host!
How shall a stranger tell
The deeds that glorified your coast,
Before its warriors fell?
Where sleeps thy mountain muse, Peru?
And Chili's matchless hills of dew,
Had they no harp, to freedom true,
No bard of native fire,
To sing his country's ancient fame,
And keep the brightness of her name
Unfading as the worshipped flame? —
The wealth of such a lyre
Outvalues all the blood-bought ore
That e'er Iberia's galleons bore.

Iberia! on thine ancient crown
The blood of nations lies,
With power to weigh thy glory down,—
With voice to pierce the skies!
For written with an iron pen,
Upon the memories of men,
The deeds that marked thy conquest, then,
For evermore remain: —
And still the saddest of the tale
Is Afric's wild and weary wail,—

Though prelates spread the slaver's sail,*
And forged the Negro's chain:
The curse of trampled liberty
For ever clings to thine and thee!

DREAMS OF THE DEAD.

The peasant dreams of lowly love,—
The prince of courtly bowers,—
And exiles, through the midnight, rove
Among their native flowers: —
But flowers depart, and, sere and chill,
The autumn leaves are shed,
And roses come again — yet still,
My dreams are of the dead!

The voices in my slumbering ear
Have woke the world, of old,—
The forms that in my dreams appear
Have mingled with the mould;
Yet still they rise around my rest,
In all their peerless prime,—
The names by new-born nations blest —
The stars of elder time!

They come from old and sacred piles,
Where glory's ashes sleep,—
From far and long-deserted aisles,—
From desert or from deep,—
From lands of ever-verdant bowers,
Unstained by mortal tread; —
Why haunt ye thus my midnight hours,
Ye far and famous dead?

I have not walked with you, on earth,—
My path is lone and low,—
A vale where laurels have not birth,
Nor classic waters flow:
But on the sunrise of my soul
Your mighty shades were cast,
As cloud-waves o'er the morning roll,—
Bright children of the past!

And oft, with midnight, I have met
The early wise and brave,—
Oh, ever great and glorious, yet,
As if there were no grave!
As if, upon their path of dust,
Had been no trace of tears,
No blighted faith, no broken trust,
Nor waste of weary years!

But ah! my loved of early days,—
How brightly still they bring
Upon my spirit's backward gaze
The glory of its spring!
The hopes that shared their timeless doom
Return, as freshly green
As though the portals of the tomb
Had never closed between!

Oh! man may climb the mountain snows,
Or search the ocean wave,—
But who will choose to walk with those Whose dwelling is the grave? —
Yet when upon that tideless shore
His sweetest flowers are shed,
The lonely dreamer shrinks no more
From visions of the dead.

BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT,

OF ENGLAND, one of the most distinguished female poets of the age, is still young, and with her habits of study, will probably enrich the world with many precious gems of thought, in addition to her works already produced. Her maiden name was Barrett, under which she achieved her poetical reputation. In 1846, she was married to Robert Browning, a poet and dramatic writer of much celebrity, author of "Paracelsus" and several tragedies. This gifted couple, whose tastes as well as talents are congenial, seem destined to ascend together the hill of Fame. Mrs. Browning is probably more versed in classical learning, and a more complete scholar, than any of her sex now living. Her mind is also well stored with general literature: with an energy and force of character truly rare, she brought out the powers of her mind, and cultivated its faculties, during a wearying illness, which confined her for many years to her apartment. Shut out from the influences of external nature, she surrounded herself with the flowers of poetry, and created tints of the imagination to give unfading radiance to a room the sun's rays never entered. Mrs. Browning enjoys the friendship and correspondence of many of the most eminent men and women of the day, by whom she is justly valued for her abilities and excellence.

She has written in prose some treatises on "The Greek Christian Poets," which are said to be admirable, and among her friends her talents as a letter-writer are quite celebrated. Whether she is destined to go down to posterity as a great poet, is a point that will bear discussion; energy, learning, a romantic melancholy chastened by faith, and sincere piety, are found everywhere through her works; she also possesses an exuberance of fancy, and her memory is stored with expressions of the poets of the highest stamp. Do these gifts constitute poetry?

"Mrs. Browning," says a distinguished scholar, (Rev. George W. Bethune,) when commenting on her poems, "is singularly bold and adventurous. Her wing carries her, without faltering at their obscurity, into the cloud and the mist, where not seldom we fail to follow her, but are tempted, while we admire the honesty of her enthusiasm, to believe that she utters what she herself has but dimly perceived. Much of this, however, arises from her disdain of carefulness. Her lines are often rude, her rhymes forced, from impatience rather than affectation; and for the same reason, she falls into the kindred fault of verboseness, which is always obscure. She forgets the advice which Aspasia gave a young poet, 'to sow with the hand, and not with the bag.' Her Greek studies should have taught her more sculptor-like finish and dignity; but the glowing, generous impulses of her woman's heart are too much for the discipline of the classics. Hence it is that we like her less as a scholar than as a woman; for then she compels our sympathy with her high religious faith, her love of children, her delight in the graceful and beautiful, her revelations of feminine feeling, her sorrow over the suffering, and her indignation against the oppressor. It is easy to see, from the melody of rhythm in 'Cowper's Grave,' and a few shorter pieces, that her faults spring not from inability to avoid them, if she would. Her ear, like that of Tennyson (whom she resembles more than any other poet), thirsts for a refrain; and like him, she indulges it to the weariness of her reader. Her sonnets, though complete in measure, are more like fragments, or unfinished outlines; but not a few of them are full of vigour.

Her verses must be recited; none of them could be sung."

But if the melody of rhythm is sometimes wanting in her lines, the sweet grace of patience, the divine harmony of faith and love, seem ever abiding in her soul. She is among those women who do honour to their sex, and uplift the heart of humanity. Many of her shorter poems are exquisite in their touches of tenderness and devotional pathos. The power of passion is rarely exhibited, in its lava-like flood, on her pure pages; but deep affection and true piety of feeling meet us everywhere, and the sweet, holy emotions of woman's love are truthfully depicted; and thus her great abilities, guided by purity of thought, and hallowed by religious faith, are made blessings to the world.

The published works of Mrs. Browning are: "The Seraphim," "Prometheus Bound," "A Drama of Exile," "The Romaunt of Margaret," "Isobel's Child," "Sonnets," and "Miscellaneous Poems."

Her own appreciation of the holy office of the true poet, is thus glowingly expressed in the Preface to her poems. "'An irreligious poet,' said Burns, meaning an undevotional one, 'is a monster.' An irreligious poet, he might have said, is no poet at all. The gravitation of poetry is upwards. The poetic wing, if it move, ascends. What did even the heathen Greeks—Homer, Æschylus, Sophocles, Pindar? Sublimely, because born poets; darkly, because born of Adam and unrenewed in Christ, their spirits wandered like the rushing chariots and winged horses, black and white, of their brother-poet, Plato, through the universe of Deity, seeking if haply they might find HIM: and as that universe closed around the seekers, not with the transparency in which it flowed first from His hand, but opaquely, as double-dyed with the transgression of its sons,—they felt though they could not discern the God beyond, and used the gesture though ignorant of the language of worshipping. The blind eagle missed the sun, but soared towards its sphere. Shall the blind eagle soar—and the seeing eagle peck chaff? Surely it should be the gladness and the gratitude of such as are poets among us, that in turning towards the beautiful, they may behold the true face of God."

From the Drama of Exile.

ADAM'S PROPHECY OF WOMAN.

Henceforward, woman, rise

To thy peculiar and best altitudes
Of doing good and of enduring ill,—
Of comforting for ill, and teaching good.
And reconciling all that ill and good
Unto the patience of a constant hope,—
Rise with thy daughters! If sin came by thee,
And by sin, death,—the ransom-righteousness,
The heavenly life and compensative rest
Shall come by means of thee. If woe by thee
Had issue to the world, thou shalt go forth
An angel of the woe thou didst achieve;
Found acceptable to the world instead
Of others of that name, of whose bright steps
Thy deed stripped bare the hills. Be satisfied;
Something thou hast to bear through womanhood—
Peculiar suffering answering to the sin:
Some pang paid down for some new human life:

Some weariness in guarding such a life—
 Some coldness from the guarded; some mistrust
 From those thou hast too well served; from those beloved
 Too loyally, some treason; feebleness
 Within thy heart, and cruelty without;
 And pressures of an alien tyranny,
 With its dynastic reasons of larger bones
 And stronger sinews. But, go to! thy love
 Shall chant itself its own beatitudes,
 After its own life-working.—A child's kiss
 Set on thy sighing lips, shall make thee glad:
 A poor man, served by thee, shall make thee rich;
 An old man, helped by thee, shall make thee strong;
 Thou shalt be served thyself by every sense
 Of service which thou renderest. Such a crown
 I set upon thy head,—Christ witnessing
 With looks of prompting love—to keep thee clear
 Of all reproach against the sin foregone,
 From all the generations which succeed.

THE SLEEP.

"He giveth His beloved sleep."—Psalm cxxvii. 2.

Of all the thoughts of God that are Borne inward unto souls afar,
 Along the Psalmist's music deep—
 Now tell me if that any is,
 For gift or grace surpassing this—
 "He giveth His beloved sleep?"

What would we give to our beloved?
 The hero's heart, to be unmoved—
 The poet's star-tuned harp, to sweep—
 The senate's shout to patriot vows—
 The monarch's crown, to light the brows?—
 "He giveth His beloved sleep."

What do we give to our beloved?
 A little faith, all undisproved—
 A little dust, to overweep—
 And bitter memories, to make
 The whole earth blasted for our sake!
 "He giveth His beloved sleep."

"Sleep soft, beloved!" we sometimes say,
 But have no tune to charm away
 Sad dreams that through the eyelids creep
 But never doleful dream again
 Shall break the happy slumber, when
 "He giveth His beloved sleep."

O earth, so full of dreary noises!
 O men, with wailing in your voices;
 O delved gold, the wailers heap!
 O strife, O curse, that o'er it fall!
 God makes a silence through you all,
 And "giveth His beloved sleep."

His dew drops mutely on the hill;
 His cloud above it saileth still,
 Though on its slope men toil and reap!
 More softly than the dew is shed,
 Or cloud is floated overhead,
 "He giveth His beloved sleep."

Ha! men may wonder while they scan
 A living, thinking, feeling man,
 In such a rest his heart to keep;
 But angels say—and through the word
 I ween their blessed smile is heard—
 "He giveth His beloved sleep!"

For me, my heart, that erst did go,
 Most like a tired child at a show,
 That sees through tears the juggler's leap,—
 Would now its wearied vision close,
 Would child-like on His love repose,
 Who "giveth His beloved sleep!"

And friends!—dear friends!—when it shall be
 That this low breath has gone from me,
 And round my bier ye come to weep—
 Let me, most loving of you all,
 Say, not a tear must o'er her fall—
 "He giveth His beloved sleep!"

ROMANCE OF THE SWAN'S-NEST.

Little Ellie sits alone
 'Mid the beeches of a meadow,
 By a stream-side on the grass;
 And the trees are showering down
 Doubles of their leaves in shadow,
 On her shining hair and face.

She has thrown her bonnet by;
 And her feet she has been dipping
 In the shallow water's flow:
 Now she holds them nakedly
 In her hands all sleek and dripping
 While she rocketh to and fro.

Little Ellie sits alone,—
 And the smile she softly useth
 Fills the silence like a speech;
 While she thinks what shall be done
 And the sweetest pleasure chooseth
 For her future, within reach!

Little Ellie, in her smile
 Choseth . . . "I will have a lover,
 Riding on a steed of steeds!
 He shall love me without guile;
 And to him I will discover
 That swan's-nest among the reeds.

Then, ay then, he shall kneel low,
 With the red-roan steed anear him
 Which shall seem to understand—
 Till I answer—'Rise and go!
 For the world must love and fear him
 Whom I gift with heart and hand.'

Then he will arise so pale,
 I shall feel my own lips tremble
 With a yes—I must not say—
 Nathless, maiden brave, 'Farewell'—
 I will trifle and dissemble,
 'Light to-morrow with to-day.'

Then he will ride through the hills,
 To the wide world, past the river
 There to put away all wrong!
 To make straight distorted wills,
 And to empty the broad quiver
 Which the wicked bear along.

Three times shall a young foot-page
 Swim the stream and climb the mountain
 And kneel down beside my feet—
 'Lo! my master sends this gage,
 Lady, for thy pity counting!
 What wilt thou exchange for it?'

And the first time I will send
 A white rosebud for a guerdon,
 And the second time a glove!
 But the third time I may bend
 From my pride, and answer—'Pardon—
 If he comes to take my love.'

Then the young foot-page will run—
 Then my lover will ride faster,
 Till he kneeleth at my knee!
 'I am a duke's eldest son!
 Thousand serfs do call me master,
 But O Love, I love but thee!'

He will kiss me on the mouth
 Then, and lead me as a lover
 Through the crowds that praise his deeds,
 And when soul-tied by one troth,
 Unto him I will discover,
 That swan's-nest among the reeds."

Little Ellie with her smile
 Not yet ended, rose up gayly—
 Tied her bonnet, donned the shoe—
 And went homeward round a mile,
 Just to see, as she did daily,
 What more eggs were with the two,

Pushing through the elm-tree copse,
Winding by the stream light-hearted,
Where the osier pathway leads —
Past the boughs she stoops, and stops!
Lo! the wild swan had deserted —
And a rat had gnawed the reeds.

Ellie went home sad and slow!
If she found the lover ever,
With his red-roan steed of steeds,
Sooth I know not! But I know
She could show him never, never,
That swan's nest among the reeds!

THE MOTHER'S PRAYER.

"Dear Lord, dear Lord!"
She aye had prayed — (the heavenly word, Broken by an earthly sigh!)
"Thou, who didst not erst deny
The mother-joy to Mary mild
Blessed in the blessed child —
Hearkening in meek babyhood
Her cradle-hymn, albeit used
To all that music interused
In breasts of angels high and good!
Oh, take not, Lord, my babe away —
Oh, take not to thy songful heaven,
The pretty baby thou hast given;
Or ere that I have seen him play
Around his father's knees, and known
That he knew how my love hath gone
From all the world to him!
And how that I shall shiver, dim
In the sunshine, thinking e'er
The grave-grass keeps it from his fair
Still cheeks! and feel at every tread
His little body which is dead
And hidden in the turfy fold,
Doth make the whole warm earth a'cold!
O God! I am so young, so young —
I am not used to tears at nights
Instead of slumber — nor to prayer
With shaken lips and hands out-wrung!
Thou knowest all my prayings were
I bless thee, God, for past delights —
Thank God! I am not used to bear
Hard thoughts of death! The earth doth cover
No face from me of friend or lover!
And must the first who teacheth me
The form of shrouds and funerals, be Mine own first-born-beloved? he
Who taught me first this mother-love?
Dear Lord, who spreadest out above
Thy loving pierced hands to meet
All lifted hearts with blessing sweet, —
Pierce not my heart, my tender heart,
Thou madest tender! Thou who art
So happy in thy heaven away,
Take not mine only bliss away!"

THE CHILD AND THE WATCHER.

Sleep on, baby on the floor,
Tired of all the playing —
Sleep with smile the sweeter for
That you dropp'd away in;
On your curls' fair roundness stand
Golden lights serenely —
One cheek, push'd out by the hand,
Folds the dimple inly.
Little head and little foot
Heavy laid for pleasure,
Underneath the lids half-shut
Slants the shining azure —
Open-soul'd in noonday sun,
So, you lie and slumber;
Nothing evil having done,
Nothing can encumber.

I, who cannot sleep as well,
Shall I sigh to view you?
Or sigh further to foretell
All that may undo you?

Nay, keep smiling, little child,
Ere the fate appeareth!
I smile, too! for patience mild
Pleasure's token weareth.
Nay, keep sleeping before loss!
I shall sleep, though losing!
As by cradle, so by cross,
Sweet is the reposing.

And God knows, who sees us twain
Child at childish leisure,
I am all as tired of pain
As you are of pleasure.
Very soon, too, by His grace
Gently wrapt around me,
I shall show as calm a face,
I shall sleep as soundly!
Differing in this, that you
Clasp your playthings sleeping,
While my hand must drop the few
Given to my keeping —
Differing in this, that I
Sleeping, must be colder,
And in waking presently,
Brighter to beholder —
Differing in this beside — (Sleeper, have you heard me?
Do you move, and open wide
Your great eyes toward me?)
That while I you draw withal
From this slumber solely,
Me, from mine, an angel shall,
Trumpet-tongued and holy!

WORK AND CONTEMPLATION.

The woman singeth at her spinning-wheel
A pleasant song, ballad or barcarolle,
She thinketh of her song, upon the whole,
Far more than of her flax; and yet the reel
Is full, and artfully her fingers feel,
With quick adjustment, provident control,
The lines, too subtly twisted to unroll,
Out to the perfect thread. I hence appeal
To the dear Christian church — that we may do
Our Father's business in these temples mirk,
So swift and steadfast, so intent and strong —
While so, apart from toil, our souls pursue
Some high, calm, spheric tune — proving our work
The better for the sweetness of our song.

THE LADY'S YES.

"Yes!" I answered you last night;
"No!" this morning, Sir, I say!
Colours, seen by candle-light,
Will not look the same by day.

When the tabors played their best,
Lamps above, and laughs below —
Love me sounded like a jest,
Fit for Yes or fit for No!

Call me false, or call me free —
Vow, whatever light may shine,
No man on thy face shall see
Any grief for change on mine.

Yet the sin is on us both —
Time to dance is not to woo —
Woeful light makes fickle troth —
Scorn of me recoils on you!

Learn to win a lady's faith
Nobly, as the thing is high!
Bravely, as for life and death
With a loyal gravity.

Lead her from the festive boards,
Point her to the starry skies,
Guard her, by your truthful words,
Pure from courtship's flatteries.

By your truth she shall be true —
Ever true as wives of yore —
And her Yes, once said to you,
SHALL be Yes for evermore.

DISCONTENT.

Light human nature is too lightly tost
 And ruffled without cause; complaining on —
 Restless with rest — until, being overthrown,
 It learneth to lie quiet. Let a frost
 Or a small wasp have crept to the innermost
 Of our ripe peach; or let the wilful sun
 Shine westward of our window — straight we run
 A furlong's sigh, as if the world were lost.
 But what time through the heart and through the brain
 God hath transfixed us, — we, so moved before,
 Attain to a calm! Ay, shouldering weights of pain,
 We anchor in deep waters, safe from shore;
 And hear, submissive, o'er the stormy main,
 God's chartered judgments walk for evermore.

PATIENCE TAUGHT BY NATURE.

"O dreary life!" we cry, "O dreary life!"
 And still the generations of the birds
 Sing through our sighing, and the flocks and herds
 Serenely live while we are keeping strife
 With Heaven's true purpose in us, as a knife
 Against which we may struggle. Ocean girds
 Unslackened the dry land: savannah-swards
 Unweary sweep: hills watch, unworn; and rife
 Meek leaves drop yearly from the forest-trees,
 To show, above, the unwasted stars that pass
 In their old glory. O thou God of old!
 Grant me some smaller grace than comes to these; —
 But so much patience, as a blade of grass
 Grows by contented through the heat and cold.

CHEERFULNESS TAUGHT BY REASON.

I think we are too ready with complaint
 In this fair world of God's. Had we no hope
 Indeed beyond the zenith and the slope
 Of yon grey blank of sky, we might be faint
 To muse upon eternity's constraint
 Round our aspirant souls. But since the scope
 Must widen early, is it well to droop
 For a few days consumed in loss and taint?
 O pusillanimous Heart, be comforted, —
 And, like a cheerful traveller, take the road —
 Singing beside the hedge. What if the bread
 Be bitter in thine inn, and thou unshod
 To meet the flints? — At least it may be said,
 "Because the way is short, I thank thee, God!"

COWPER'S GRAVE.

I will invite thee, from thy envious herse
 To rise, and 'bout the world thy beams to spread,
 That we may see there's brightness in the dead.

HABINGTON.

It is a place where poets crown'd
 May feel the heart's decaying —
 It is a place where happy saints
 May weep amid their praying —
 Yet let the grief and humbleness
 As low as silence languish;
 Earth surely now may give her calm
 To whom she gave her anguish.

O poets! from a maniac's tongue
 Was pour'd the deathless singing!
 O Christians! at your cross of hope
 A hopeless hand was clinging!
 O men, this man in brotherhood,
 Your weary paths beguiling,
 Groan'd inly while he taught you peace,
 And died while ye were smiling!

And now, what time ye all may read
 Through dimming tears his story
 How discord on the music fell,
 And darkness on the glory —
 And how, when, one by one, sweet sounds
 And wandering lights departed,
 He wore no less a loving face,
 Because so broken-hearted.

He shall be strong to sanctify
 The poet's high vocation,
 And bow the meekest Christian down
 In meeker adoration:
 Nor ever shall he be in praise
 By wise or good forsaken;
 Named softly, as the household name
 Of one whom God hath taken!

With sadness that is calm, not gloom,
 I learn to think upon him;
 With meekness that is gratefulness,
 On God, whose heaven hath won him —
 Who suffer'd once the madness-cloud
 Towards His love to blind him;
 But gently led the blind along,
 Where breath and bird could find him;

And wrought within his shatter'd brain
 Such quick poetic senses,
 As hills have language for, and stars
 Harmonious influences!
 The pulse of dew upon the grass
 His own did calmly number;
 And silent shadow from the trees
 Fell o'er him like a slumber.

The very world, by God's constraint,
 From falsehood's chill removing,
 Its women and its men became Beside him true and loving! —
 And timid hares were drawn from woods
 To share his home-caresses,
 Uplooking to his human eyes,
 With sylvan tendernesses.

But while in blindness he remain'd,
 Unconscious of the guiding,
 And things provided came without
 The sweet sense of providing,
 He testified this solemn truth,
 Though frenzy desolated, —
Nor man nor nature satisfy Whom only God created!

Like a sick child, that knoweth not
 His mother while she blesses,
 And droppeth on his burning brow
 The coolness of her kisses;
 That turns his fever'd eyes around —
 "My mother! where's my mother?" —
 As if such tender words and looks
 Could come from any other! —

The fever gone, with leaps of heart
 He sees her bending o'er him;
 Her face all pale from watchful love,
 Th' unwearied love she bore him —
 Thus, woke the poet from the dream
 His life's long fever gave him.
 Beneath those deep pathetic eyes
 Which closed in death to save him!

Thus! oh, not thus! no type of earth
 Could image that awaking,
 Wherein he scarcely heard the chant
 Of seraphs round him breaking —
 Or felt the new immortal throb
 Of soul from body parted;
 But felt those eyes alone, and knew
 "My Saviour! not deserted!"

Deserted! who hath dreamt that when
 The cross in darkness rested,
 Upon the Victim's hidden face
 No love was manifested?
 What frantic hands outstretched have e'er
 Th' atoning drops averted —
 What tears have washed them from the soul —
 That one should be deserted?

Deserted! God could separate
 From His own essence rather:
 And Adam's sins have swept between
 The righteous Son and Father —

Yea! once, Immanuel's orphan'd cry
 His universe hath shaken —
 Went up single, echoless,
 "My God, I am forsaken!"

It went up from the Holy lips
 Amid his lost creation,
 That of the lost, no son should use
 Those words of desolation;
 That earth's worst Frenzies, marring hope,
 Should mar not hope's fruition:
 And I, on Cowper's grave, should see
 His rapture, in a vision!

C.

CAMPBELL, DOROTHEA PRIMROSE,

Is a native of the Zetland or Shetland Islands, a group situated in the Atlantic Ocean, to the north of Scotland. She was born and resides at Lerwick, the capital of Shetland, which is the only island of much account in the group. Here Miss Campbell made the acquaintance of Walter Scott, when he visited the Northern Isles in 1814. She was then very young, and probably, but for the advent of the great magician into this "Ultima Thule" of the olden times, Miss Campbell's name would never have been heard beyond the boundary of her own island home. But his encouragement inspired her with hope. In 1816, she dedicated to him, with his permission, a volume of "Poems," which made her highly celebrated among her own people; and therefore we give her a place among our distingues, considering, as we do, such home-fame the most difficult, usually, to win, and the best, when won, for a woman. The character of her poetry, chiefly suggested by the wild, rough scenery with which she lives surrounded, is healthy in its tone, and breathes of home and heaven. We subjoin a specimen:—

MOONLIGHT.

The winds of heaven are hushed and mild
 As the breath of slumbering child;
 The western bugle's balmy sigh
 Breaks not the mist-wreaths, as they lie
 Veiling the tall cliff's rugged brow,
 Nor dimple the green waves below.
 Such stillness round,—such silence deep—
 That nature seems herself to sleep.
 The full moon, mounted in the sky,
 Looks from her cloudless place on high.
 And trembling stars, like fairy gleams,
 Twinkle their many-coloured beams,
 Spangling the world of waters o'er
 With mimic gems from shore to shore;
 Till ocean, burning on the view,
 Glows like another heav'n of blue,
 And its broad bosom, as a mirror bright,
 Reflects their lucid path and all the fields of light.

CARLEN, EMILY,

Is a native of Sweden; her maiden name was Smith. She began her career as an authoress very early in life, for the purpose of adding to the means of her parents, who were in narrow circumstances. Her inspiration was thus of the noblest kind, and more poetical than the abstract love of fame. Her works were highly successful, soon brought her into notice, and obtained her the acquaintance of many distinguished personages. Her amiable character and exemplary life have secured her consideration in all the circles of Stockholm.

Four of her works have been presented, by translation, to the Anglo-Saxon reading public. They all display originality and inventive genius, together with a poetic and impassioned spirit; they have all the fault which proceeds from a rich and exuberant imagination—too many characters and too many incidents; this always weakens the interest, flattens the pathos of a story, and abates the attention of the reader. To "discreetly blot," is one of the nicest and most delicate parts of an author's craft; it requires judgment, experience and taste, and is unattainable by many; but the abilities of Mrs. Carlen appear such as to assure her of success, if she would do what the French wit complained he had no leisure for—"take time to make her works shorter."

It is not often that a book is complained of for containing too much matter; but out of the novel of "The Magic Goblet," several separate stories and dramas might be made. The number of well-imagined personages in this book is extraordinary. The Count, Uncle Sebastian, the Major, even the old steward Bergstad, are all elderly men; but so perfectly individualized, so strikingly delineated, that each is capital, natural, and quite as unlike as such could be found in real life. The countess and the baroness, though slightly touched, are distinct and living. The three young ladies, also, have no resemblance to each other. Thelma is too much, both in her adventures and her character, removed from reality to awaken strong interest; but Alfild and Maria are charmingly portrayed. Erika, in the "Rose of Thistle Island," is a woman of the same order of mind with Maria, yet it would be absurd to call one a repetition of the other; their traits of character are as different as the circumstances surrounding them—just as we find it in actual life. The charming Gabriella is perfectly distinct from Alfild, though both are young, innocent, simple, unlearned country-maidens, and the petted darlings of their fathers. It required no common genius to imagine and describe the young heroes of these works—Arve and Seiler; both are endowed with bravery and remarkable beauty, with courage and qualities to carry on the battle of life; but here all resemblance ends, so strong is the moral difference shown in every resolution and action. "The Magic Goblet" is spoiled by a narrative of crime and misery, introduced towards the end; it may be remarked that, as the story hinges on this, it could not be omitted; but Mrs. Carlen shows plainly that, with her fertility of invention, she might have constructed a different plot. "The Rose of Thistle Island" is too replete with horrors—the curtain falls on too many of the dead and dying. The marriage of Arman, which is vaguely spoken of, is no consolation—it is evidently none to him—and inspires the reader with no pleasure. But these dark pictures belong to Swedish life; the people of that country have a hard lot; ignorance, oppression and want, never soften human nature.

The "Brothers" and the "Temptations of Wealth," are not equal to the first two productions. Their beauties and defects are, however, of the same character. Upon the whole, Mrs. Carlen appears to yield to few women of our day in original genius. Some of the passages have an approach to sublimity in the descriptions of nature, and of moral suffering; many of the most forcible touches cannot be comprehended or appreciated, but in connection with the entire works. We shall, therefore, limit ourselves in extracting what can best be taken from its niche.

It must not be forgotten that our medium of judging this authoress, has been through particularly bad translations; this prevents any remark on the various poems which are interspersed.

From "The Rose of Thistle Island."

ERIKA.

In the new house on Thistle Island, was a small corner room, the windows of which were scarcely three feet from the rock behind them. This room was Erika's favourite resort: there she sat many hours alone, looking at the rock, which seemed to her a wall of separation between her and the rest of the world. She did not like the sea view—it recalled dark memories; but the rocks were her confidants, and to them she had often whispered the suffering she could not overcome.

Erika's gloomy apartment had but one ornament, a picture of uncommon beauty, representing the Crucifixion, which made the little room more resemble an oratory than a sitting-room. It was, in fact, the place to which Erika retired when she felt the necessity of pouring out her heart in prayer, or to refresh her spirit by salutary tears, and thus give it new energy. But the dark little room had another attraction. Birger had, at the time he brought her the picture after his first voyage, also given her a small writing-desk; and in this she kept the scraps of paper, on which, year after year, she learned better to express her thoughts and feelings. Those pages were as parts of her own mind; it was by them she thought to compensate herself for the singular and painful consciousness of being entirely alone.

It may, perhaps, be worth while to cast an eye on the simple reflections of a woman who, in the whole wide world, possessed no one to whom she could impart that which lived and dwelled within her. The early education she had received, had ripened by the exertion of her own excellent understanding: but Erika had not only understanding, she had also feeling; she had the consciousness of her cast-out situation: and it was those feelings, and that consciousness, that must have vent.

On one page, Erika had written, in large characters, the word, "Longing;" and under it she wrote, "As far back as I can remember, there has been a great void in my soul. I have longed, I still long, and shall ever long, for that which I can never attain—a mother's bosom. Why was I driven out into the world to struggle there, without hope of ever returning to a home? I have never known a home. No mother has ever lulled me on her knee; no father ever blessed me! Alone have I passed through life; alone have I sought the way of light; and alone I shall go hence. No one feels, no one cares, what the motherless one, rejected by the whole world, may suffer. Her longings are but her's alone. Often, I seem to myself like a person deaf and dumb, in whose heart dwell feelings rich and deep, but which she wants ability to communicate to others. Thus, I have at times the most delicious sensations—so sweet, that tears often start to my eyes; but I cannot connect my feelings. They are like a bell that one hears at a distance ringing a soft and solemn sound. It is longing—longing for home, which I shall never know here below—but which I shall find on high." On another page she had inscribed the words, "Family ties," and written underneath her reflections; "Very singular is that chain which binds the human race together, and forms connexions between them, which it afterwards becomes a duty to respect. I, the wife of a . . . , pray daily to God for him, whom every one would . . . if they knew . . . : but I am his; my life is a long sigh of prayer that the penitent may be brought back to the Father's throne: and if I gain that great object, (comforting angels often whisper to my oppressed heart that it is already attained!) then shall I not complain, or grieve that I thus live alone in the world; assuredly under other circumstances, I neither would, nor could have sacrificed myself. It strikes me, sometimes, as if my calling on earth were a high one; and a deep feeling thrills through my heart when I think of the responsibility I have taken on myself—to live among these people, to train, lead, and form for good, the motherless being I have adopted. Truly, He only who is mighty in the weak, can give me strength firmly to pursue my path, and to do some good among those with whom He has placed me.

"When life feels dark and heavy, I have comfort in the certainty that the trial is needful; I feel that it would make me happy if God were to give me one who would call me by that sweet name of mother, for which I have longed in vain: then I should be no longer alone; the strongest and holiest bond would then unite me to another being; but ought I to desire it? I ask myself whether I could procure for my child the happiness I would wish him to enjoy. Would he not, one day, when time and intelligence had removed the happy unconsciousness of childhood, blush and mourn for him who, according to Nature's laws, he ought to honour? And could there be any suffering comparable to that of hearing the son excrete the father—perhaps reproach his parent for having given him the bitter gift of life? No; rather than that, would I be evermore alone! For a few hours, months, or, at most, years of happiness, would I risk receiving in exchange the deepest and most real of sorrows? God is just. Punishment may not be withheld! I dare not even pray for the blessing which is woman's greatest comfort, the highest object of her existence. Around Gabriella will I enfold all the love that I could have lavished on a child of my own. Gabriella also is motherless; not in vain has she placed her under my care."

GABRIELLA.

As soon as Gabriella was alone, she went to the looking-glass, and was startled to find how the vexation of a few hours had changed her looks. "No, he shall not perceive this!" said she, in a tone of mortification—Erika is right; she has seen the world, and knows how it is proper to behave. No one sees her weep, and yet I am sure she does sometimes, when alone in the corner room. But what have I to cry for? if he will go away, who can help it?" And poor Gabriella, who did not rightly comprehend in what Erika's self-command consisted, began to defy her own agitated heart, and so to silence it.

Then followed in due order, the old art of bathing the eyes with cold water, and endeavouring, before the mirror, to assume a smiling and indifferent appearance. It is astonishing how far even a little simple Skårgord girl, acquainted only with the rocks on her island, and the few strangers who occasionally visited it, can be instructed when love begins to give lessons. A hundred things of which she has never dreamt, present themselves of their own accord; she learns easily to understand those small, and in reality innocent devices, which only become coquetry when the young mind is either naturally tainted by vanity, or has imbibed it through flattery. That neither of these was the case with Gabriella, she had to thank the education she had received from Erika, in which there was nothing to lead her to prize the accidental gift of beauty. The pretty appellation of the "Rose of Thistle Island" she had never reflected: she looked upon it as retained by custom since her childhood; and in that there was nothing flattering.

Another circumstance also preserved Gabriella from vanity, namely, that she had little opportunity of comparing herself with others. She had, indeed, of late years, made a trip every summer with Erika to Gothenburg; but she was so fully occupied while there, surveying all the remarkable things in the town, the richness of the shops, and the bustling crowds of people, that she did not at all attend to the appearance of the young women. If, therefore, there had been a tendency to this fault, it had never taken root, nor injured the moral beauty of her young mind. But the time for the heart's first awakening had come, and with it the accompaniments of new feelings, new thoughts, and new conceptions.

"I cannot wear this ugly handkerchief," said our young heroine to herself, and remarked for the first time, that the red-and-yellow cotton handkerchief was excessively unbecoming. "Birger really did not show much taste when he bought that; but if I put on the little pink silk scarf to-day, Erika will be sure to ask why I have done it." And Gabriella blushed before the mirror at the answer she would have to give, provided she spoke the truth; and she had not yet learned to tell the reverse.

In the mean time, the pink silk scarf was taken out and tried, merely for amusement; but the temptation was too strong; for, evidently the cheeks assumed another tinge; and besides, the yellow handkerchief cast a yellow shade over her face—it was too large, it was quite bunchy when it was tied round her neck. After a few minutes' longer consideration in the looking-glass, it became impossible to part with the pink; and when the resolution was once taken to brave the worst—an inquiring look, or even an interrogation from Erika—the hair was nicely smoothed, the work-basket hung on her arm, and with a mien which tolerably well represented the indifference aimed at, Gabriella went down stairs.

From The Magic Goblet.

[We must remark here, that the same laxity of moral sentiment in Sweden respecting marriage is indicated in the writings of Mrs. Carlen, which we noticed in our Sketch of Miss Bremer and her works. In the "Magic Goblet," the whole interest of the story is involved in the struggles of Rudolph Seiler to obtain a divorce from his wife, Maria, because he had fallen passionately in love with a young girl—Alfhild.]

LETTER OF THE WIFE TO HER HUSBAND.

"RUDOLPH!—In my half-broken heart tremble yet some notes that never found a response, but still could never die away, for they were the gift of the great composer who bestows on us the feelings of life—notes from those wonderful strings that vibrate only in eternal love. But, Rudolph, though these notes sound yet softly, they form no longer an harmonious whole. The strings have slowly rusted—one after the other is loosened, and there is but yet an echo, which now must also die away.

"Perhaps you do not understand me; it may be that you will not understand me. This I almost fear, for you have always maintained that there is no love in our marriage. But it is you, Rudolph, you alone, who determined that there should be none. And when I saw the earnest with which you indulged in this once conceived idea, I had not the courage, the strength, to throw myself upon your heart, to clear at least myself from this harsh opinion. Perhaps you grow displeased, if you see that in a moment when I should show most pride, I give signs of a weakness which I heretofore strove to conquer. But, Rudolph, in this weakness there lies perhaps my greatest strength. For you may believe it is, for the pride of a woman who knows herself to be rejected, no trifle to open her heart to that man who never wished to read it. I am, however, convinced that my duty as wife and mother, commands me to suppress every feeling of pride. I will show myself as I am, that you may not misjudge me in future. And if you should despise me on that account, then—it would be but one pang more, surely one more bitter, perhaps more painful than all the rest, yet rather this than not to have been candid at this fearful crisis.

"Yes, Rudolph, so it is. In my heart there has burned a feeling as deep and true as can glow in the breast of woman, and it burned alone. The sparks of this flame have often hovered around you, but they were quenched by the icy breath which you breathed upon them, and the heart, the poor heart trembled with coldness at the same time that it was consumed by its glow. But you know that I have suffered, and been silent. Even now I should have spared you the pain which my confession may cause you, had not your proposition of a divorce caused an uproar and storm in my soul, which I must try, at every hazard, to still; and it has seemed to me that I should grow more calm, if I have no longer a secret from you that dimmed the sun-rays of our domestic relation. I am not so infatuated as to hope that feelings which you never cherished should rise in your soul just now, while you are throwing off those which you heretofore have had for me—a feeling of honour and duty; only I do not wish you to be able to say that want of mutual love is the reason that induces you to the cruel plan of separation. No, you must allege another reason; whence you will draw it, I do not know, nor do I wish to know, for my resolution stands firm; I shall never accede to your proposal of divorce.

“Do not think, Rudolph, that it is through weakness, or any thought of my sad condition, that I seek to maintain for myself the rights which belong to me as your wife. No, indeed, no; for I well know that my life will be in future more desolate and joyless than heretofore; but I do it for the sake of our child, and the respect I have for the sacredness of our tie. And then, Rudolph, what have I done to you, that you wish to brand my name before the world, and draw me before a judge who will condemn me to death, while he passes sentence on my honour? For dark shadows always follow a divorce, let the cause be what it will; and this is natural. If husband and wife dissolve the holiest of connexions, some great fault on the one side or the other must necessarily be the cause of it—at least the world thinks so. The pictures you hold up to my eyes of the independence of women, who are at present trodden under foot by men, are, I fear, more imaginary than true. Has not God himself ordained that they should be subordinate? And they will do well not to violate the laws of nature, and force themselves upon the field where man is accustomed to rule. Woman need, on that account, be no ‘despotic animal.’ She has her peculiar power in her heart, which must suffice, when outward storms are raging around her.

“The picture which you draw in relation to the children in an unlawful marriage, is gloomy; but I ask you if there can be more unfortunate beings than those who grow up without having, properly, either father or mother, since they stand equally removed from both, and have no home-like fireside round which they may gather in child-like delight? You will, no doubt, answer ‘No,’ to this, unless you have determined both to speak and act against nature; and with this ‘No,’ you must also admit that the example of separated parents must be of a still more baneful effect upon the moral education of children, than that which you portrayed in colours too glowing.

“Oh, Rudolph! if you will not spare me, think, at least, of your son; he is innocent, and yet you mean to cast a shadow upon his tender head, you mean to sow in his heart a seed of discord, which will shoot up between him and us—for who is right, and who is wrong? Is it our child who is to decide? No; he will not be able so to do, and therefore his young heart will close itself against us both. If we had not this child—and if I were perfectly convinced that you could not become happy, and ever find joy in life unless separated from me, then I think I could say ‘Yes,’ to your unnatural request, though my heart should break by it. But now hope is whispering to me that time will bring up some friendly star that may give light to the present night. But, however this may be, so long as our son lives, I deem that my own honour, as well as the care for his future, demand from me to say, ‘No,’ to your proposition.

“Rudolph! I cannot bring you back to us, and yet my very soul shudders at the mere thought to put my name to a paper which would deprive me of all hope of happiness.

“MARIA.”

* * * * *

Seiler was, indeed, deeply moved by the letter of his wife; but it was not so much through the confession itself, as through the impediment that was thrown in the way of his plans. As his eyes flew over the lines of the letter, he must allow, against his will, that, as she really loved him, and had never in the least offended her conjugal duties, a separation was out of all question, despite his passionate feeling for Alfild. Without her consent, he had no hopes of being freed from the yoke which he could bear no longer.

* * * * *

The thought of what his wife during this time suffered, occurred to him but seldom. The selfishness of man has no time to occupy itself with the sufferings of others, if he himself is a prey to pains whose weight oppresses his breast, and checks the full flow of his blood. Besides, Seiler thought, when he sometimes felt himself drawn to his wife by a secret power, and against his will, “Who knows if a word is true of all she writes to me of her feelings? She only intended to put a new and stronger chain on me, by this invention I will inform myself of it more minutely. I will see with my own eyes.”

And he might have added, I will be blind, lest I might be disturbed in the execution of my plan that I have formed.

The consequence of it was, that Seiler resolved to return home, and attempt to induce her to consent, by appealing to her generosity; and he was so certain that Maria would become happier by the separation, that he conquered his pride, which would otherwise have forbidden him to call upon the generosity of a woman.

The answer which he sent his wife, after a long delay, was cold, short, expressive of regret, and evasive. The allusion to her love to him was so subtle and calculated, that it could hardly be found; and the letter stated, in fact, nothing farther than that he would come home by Christmas, to consult with her on the affair in question, personally.

Seiler had put the love of his wife, with the greatest skill, in such a light, that poor Maria could throw her eyes neither upon the letter nor upon herself without blushing at her weakness. It answered, therefore, perfectly its purpose. The rejected heart, offended, withdrew within itself. All hope was now gone; but she would have despaired herself, if a sound of complaint had escaped her lips.

In the mean time, her child grew more ill, and the hours in which she watched in prayer and tears, were full of all that earth can approve most—most anguished and oppressive.

When Seiler unexpectedly arrived—he had not appointed the day of his arrival before—there was little hope left for the life of the boy. With what grief did the mother see the hour approach when her last hopes should be carried to the grave!

From the same.

THE DIVORCE.

Night had spread her dark mantle over the earth, and the day, so bitter for Seiler and his wife, which we described at the end of the first Part, had sunk in the wide ocean of eternity.

Maria lay on her knees in her solitary chamber, and prayed to God to give her strength and courage to drain the bitter cup. But peace would not come to her breast. At each look into the future she startled, for she saw herself alone, without the slightest hope of mending her condition, and doomed to bleed to death from the wounds of her breast. Yet Maria did not cease to pray, and not only for herself alone, but also for him who had caused her these bitter pangs.

The love of woman, though she cannot but condemn it as a weakness, remains, if it was true love, so entirely without selfishness, that she forgets herself on account of the beloved object. Maria had loved her husband thus, and loved him still, after the last star in the heaven of hope was quenched, and the last rose lay scattered at her feet.

This night became for her memorable for ever. It had seen her struggle, her prayer, her tears and her anguish; it became also witness of the victory in the painful struggle with her heart! It was long past midnight when, trembling with cold and excitement, she sought her lonesome couch. Mechanically she stretched out her hand, as she was wont to do, toward the place where the bed of her child used to stand. It was empty, and as her hand sank powerless by her side, she felt a violent pain shoot through her heart. Sighs heaved her oppressed breast. Ah, how long and dark was the night for the poor wife, on whose brow cold drops of perspiration stood! But God is kind; morning will dawn,

“And on the thorn of pains springs up,
The rose of pure delight.”

Also this night was succeeded by a morning whose first pale beams woke Maria and dried the last tears that hung on her eye-lashes. She dressed herself, and breathing with her warm lips she made an open spot on the frozen window-panes, and looked through it up to the Creator of the world. Now that day had come, she felt a hope and trust which night had not given her; a certain peace came over her soul, and gradually her self-control obtained full power again. She knew now what he was going to do—she knew what sacrifice iron necessity demanded of her, and she was ready to make it.

Patient and beautiful in her infinite grief, Maria entered the sitting-room, and arranged the breakfast-table herself, for the first time since the return of her husband.

When Seiler entered, she rose and went, more bashful, perhaps, than a young bride, and blushing, to meet him. He gave her his hand in silence, but when he felt its light trembling, and her indescribably charming confusion, he could not but own himself, that he had never before looked upon her with impartial eyes.

“How do you do to-day, good, dear Maria? Your cheeks appear to me to be fresher than they have been of late.”

“I am glad if you find that! Indeed, I feel somewhat better. But the coffee grows cold; allow me to wait upon you to-day.”

At the word “to-day,” her voice became evidently tremulous; there lay an almost superhuman exertion in her usual tranquillity.

Husband and wife took seats opposite to each other, and Maria was able even to smile, as she reached to him the cup. But there are hours in life when a smile pains us more than the bitterest and sharpest word. This was now the case with Seiler. Maria’s smile pierced through his soul, and caused him more pain than a thousand tears and reproaches would have done. He knew her, and was aware that her deeply-wounded feelings forbade her to show the real state of her soul, and that with death in her heart, she was strong enough to smile, in order not to excite his compassion, since she could no more excite another feeling.

“By heaven!” thought Seiler, and brought Maria’s hands to his lips with a degree of respect and emotion which he had never shown before—“Bloom is right! I never knew her before. She is a noble high-minded woman; and had she not been so proud, so politely cold while my heart longed, often in past years, for a warmer ray of sun, or if she had only tried to conquer it in the usual ways of little stratagems, she would certainly have succeeded. But now, now it is past. My heart has found a being that does not know what is disguise, or what is the meaning of such strength of mind, which commands to conceal the warmest feelings, and to show an icy coldness, while the blood is seething in the veins, and each beat of the pulse announces to the restless heart that another second is passed without hope. No, Alfild, my pure white dove, she clings with warmth and yearning desire to my breast, seeking there protection, and her cheek reddens or grows pale, according to the expression she finds in my looks. Thus, thus must be a woman's love; wholly given up to and dependent on, the man to whom she devotes herself. All her thoughts, feelings and conceptions must unite in the one consciousness that she loves. She must have desire for nothing else. The word of her beloved, or husband, must suffice her; her confidence in it must be her world, and his will the only thing that she consults. The only arithmetic which she needs to understand is, 'to be able to calculate the change of his humour.'"

In thus comparing the love of his wife with that of his beloved, which he carried through with the greatest selfishness, he forgot entirely, which is frequently done, to consider justice; for he took into no account at all his own behaviour toward the two beings, which, if he had done so, would have convinced him that he had to seek for the cause of the different conduct of the two women in himself, and not in them.

CAREY, ALICE,

HAS, within the last few years, written poetry that justly places her among the gifted daughters of America. The lyre seems to obey her heart as the Æolian harp does the wind, every impulse gushing out in song. The father of Miss Carey was a native of Vermont, who removed to Ohio whilst it was a territory. The wild place where he settled has become a pleasant village, not far from Cincinnati; there Alice was born, and has always resided. The father has been greatly blessed in his children: he has another talented daughter, Phoebe, (whom we shall notice;) surely, with such treasures he must be rich indeed. The excellent mother of these sweet singers is no longer living; the daughters are thus invested with the matronly duties of house-keeping, and, to their praise be it recorded, they never neglect domestic duties even for the wooings of the Muse.

Miss Carey has written for many periodicals; few, if any, of our young poets have given so much to the public as she has done during the last five or six years. The *author, of "The Female Poets of America," has, in his critical notice, admirably described the characteristics of these sisters—he says: "Alice Carey evinces in many poems a genuine imagination and a creative energy that challenges peculiar praise. We have perhaps no other author, so young, in whom the poetical faculty is so largely developed. Her sister writes with vigour, and a hopeful and genial spirit, and there are many felicities of expression, particularly in her later pieces. She refers more than Alice to the common experience, and has, perhaps, a deeper sympathy with that philosophy and those movements of the day, which look for a nearer approach to equality, in culture, fortune, and social relations."

Two striking peculiarities enhance the interest of the poems of Alice; the absence of learning, properly so called; and the capacity of the heart to endow the true poet for the high office of interpreter of nature without the aid of learning. Doubtless, these sisters would find great benefit from such a course of study as Mrs. Hemans pursued, or such advantages as Mrs. Norton has enjoyed. Still the magic of genius is felt most powerfully, when it triumphs over obstacles seemingly insuperable; the poems we are now considering are fairly entitled to higher praise than though written by a scholar, with all appliances and means for study and composition at command. That, "in the West, song gushes and flows, like the springs and rivers, more imperially than elsewhere" may be true; but it is chiefly from the soul of woman that these beautiful strains are thus, bird-like, poured. In the sentiment of these songs we find the secret of their inspiration; the BIBLE is the fount from which these young poetesses have quaffed. With the Bible in her hand, and its spirit in her heart, woman can nourish her genius, and prove a guiding angel to all who look heaven-ward for the Temple of Fame.

A volume of "Poems," by "Alice and Phoebe Carey," was published in 1850. "Hualco, a Romance of the Golden Age of Tezcuco," by Alice Carey, appeared in 1851. The poem is founded upon adventures of a Mexican Prince, before the conquest, as related by Clavigero, Torquemada, and other historians.

From "Poems," by Alice Carey

LIGHTS OF GENIUS.

Upheaving pillars, on whose tops
The white stars rest like capitals,
Whence every living spark that drops
Kindles and blazes as it falls!
And if the arch-fiend rise to pluck,
Or stoop to crush their beauty down,
A thousand other sparks are struck,
That glory settles in her crown.
The huge ship, with its brassy share,
Ploughs the blue sea to speed their course,
And veins of iron cleave the air,
To waft them from their burning source!
All, from the insect's tiny wings,
And the small drop of morning dew,
To the wide universe of things,
The light is shining, burning through,
Too deep for our poor thoughts to gauge
Lie their clear sources, bright as truth,
Whence flows upon the locks of age
The beauty of eternal youth.

* Rev. Rufus W. Griswold

Think, oh my faltering brother! think,
If thou wilt try, if thou hast tried,
By all the lights thou hast, to sink
The shaft of an immortal tide!

PICTURES OF MEMORY.

Among the beautiful pictures
That hang on Memory's wall
Is one of a dim old forest,
That seemeth best of all:
Not for its gnarled oaks olden,
Dark with the mistletoe;
Not for the violets golden
That sprinkle the vale below;
Not for the milk-white lilies,
That lead from the fragrant hedge,
Coquetting all day with the sunbeams,
And stealing their golden edge;
Not for the vines on the upland
Where the bright red berries rest,
Nor the pinks, nor the pale, sweet cowslip
It seemeth to me the best.

I once had a little brother,
With eyes that were dark and deep —
In the lap of that old dim forest
He lieth in peace asleep:
Light as the down of the thistle,
Free as the winds that blow,
We roved there the beautiful summers,
The summers of long ago;
But his feet on the hills grew weary,
And, one of the autumn eves,
I made for my little brother
A bed of the yellow leaves.

Sweetly his pale arms folded
My neck in a meek embrace,
As the light of immortal beauty
Silently covered his face:
And when the arrows of sunset
Lodged in the tree-tops bright,
He fell in his saint-like beauty,
Asleep by the gates of light.
Therefore, of all the pictures
That hang on Memory's wall,
The one of the dim old forest
Seemeth the best of all.

THE TWO MISSIONARIES.

In the pyramid's heavy shadows,
And by the Nile's deep flood,
They leaned on the arm of Jesus,
And preached to the multitude:
Where only the ostrich and parrot
Went by on the burning sands,
They builded to God an altar,
Lifting up holy hands.

But even while kneeling lowly
At the foot of the cross to pray,
Eternity's shadows slowly
Stole over their pilgrim way:
And one, with the journey weary,
And faint with the spirit's strife,
Fell sweetly asleep in Jesus,
Hard by the gates of life.

Oh, not in Gethsemane's garden,
And not by Genesareth's wave,
The light, like a golden mantle,
O'erspreadeth his lowly grave;
But the bird of the burning desert
Goes by with a noiseless tread,
And the tent of the restless Arab
Is silently near him spread.

Oh, could we remember only,
Who shrink from the lightest ill,
His sorrows, who, bruised and lonely,
Wrought on in the vineyard still —

Surely the tale of sorrow
Would fall on the mourner's breast,
Hushing, like oil on the waters,
The troubled wave to rest.

THE CHARMED BIRD.

"Mother, oh, mother! this morning when Will
And Mary and I had gone out on the hill,
We stopped in the orchard to climb in the trees,
And broke off the blossoms that sweetened the breeze,
And still as it chirped, and kept eddying round
In narrower circles and nearer the ground,
We looked, and all hid in the leaves of the brake,
We saw, don't you think, oh! the ugliest snake!"

"Its crest was so glossy, so bright were its eyes,
And its wings, oh! their colour was just like the skies
And still as it chirped, and kept eddying round
In narrower circles and nearer the ground,
We looked, and all hid in the leaves of the brake,
We saw, don't you think, oh! the ugliest snake!"

Caressingly folding the child in her arms,
With thoughts of sweet birds in a world full of charms
"My child," said the mother, "in life's later hours
Remember the morning you stopped for the flowers;
And still when you think of the bird in the air,
Forget not, my love, that the serpent was there."

TO THE EVENING ZEPHYR.

I sit where the wild-bee is humming,
And listen in vain for thy song;
I've waited before for thy coming,
But never, oh, never so long!
How oft with the blue sky above us,
And waves breaking light on the shore,
Thou, knowing they would not reprove us,
Hast kissed me a thousand times o'er! —
Alone in the gathering shadows,
Still waiting, sweet Zephyr, for thee
I look for the waves of the meadows,
And dimples to dot the blue sea.
The blossoms that waited to greet thee
With heat or the noontide oppressed,
Now flutter so lightly to meet thee,
Thou'rt coming, I know, from the west.
Alas! if thou findest me pouting,
'Tis only my love that alarms;
Forgive, then, I pray thee, my doubting,
And take me once more to thine arms!

THE PAST AND PRESENT.

Ye everlasting conjurors of ill,
Who fear the Samiel in the lightest breeze,
Go, moralize with Marius, if you will,
In the old cradle of the sciences!
Bid the sarcophagi uncloseth their lids —
Drag the colossal sphinxes forth to view —
Rouse up the builders of the pyramids,
And raise the labyrinthian shrines anew;
And see the haughty favourite of the fates —
The arbiter of myriad destinies;
Thebes, with her "feast of lights" and hundred gates, —
And Carthage, mother of sworn enmities,
Not mantled with the desolate weeds and dust
Of centuries, but as she sat apart,
Nursing her lions, ere the eagle thrust
His bloody talons deep into her heart; —
Then say, what was she in her palmiest times
That we should mourn for ever for the past?
In fame, a very Babylon — her crimes
The plague-spot of the nations to the last!

And Rome! the seven-hilled city: she that rose Girt with the majesty of peerless might,
From out the ashes of her fallen foes —
She in whose lap was poured, like streams of light,
The wealth of nations: was she not endowed
With that most perilous gift of beauty — pride?
And spite of all her glories blazoned loud,
Idolatrous, voluptuous, and allied

Closer to vice than virtue? Hark! the sounds
 Of tramping thousands in her stony street!
 And now the amphitheatre resounds
 With acclamations for the engrossing feat!
 Draw near, where men of wars and senates stood,
 And see the pastime, whence they joyance drank,—
 The Libyan lion lapping the warm blood
 Oozed from the Dacian's bosom. On the bank
 Of the sweet Danube, smiling children wait
 To greet their sire, unconscious of his fate.
 Oh, draw the wildering veil a little back,
 Ye blind idolaters of things that were;
 Who, through the glory trailing in their track,
 See but the whiteness of the sepulchre;

Then to the Present turning, ye will see
 Even as one, the universal mind
 Rousing, like genius from a reverie,
 With the exalted aim to serve mankind;
 Lo! as my song is closing, I can feel
 The spirit of the Present in my heart;
 And for the Future, with a wiser zeal,
 In life's great drama I would act my part:
 That they may say, who see the curtain fall
 And from the closing scene in silence go,
 Haply as some light favour they recall,
 Peace to her ashes,—she hath lessened woe!

THE HANDMAID.

Why rests a shadow on her woman's heart?
 In life's more girlish hours it was not so;
 Ill hath she learned to hide, with harmless art,
 The soundings of the plummet-line of woe!

Oh, what a world of tenderness looks through
 The melting sapphire of her mournful eyes;
 Less softly moist are violets full of dew,
 And the delicious colour of the skies.

Serenely amid worship doth she move,
 Counting its passionate tenderness as dross;
 And tempering the pleadings of earth's love,
 In the still, solemn shadows of the cross.

It is not that her heart is cold or vain,
 That thus she moves through many worshippers;
 No step is lighter by the couch of pain,
 No hand on fever's brow lies soft as hers.

From the loose flowing of her amber hair,
 The summer flowers we long ago unknot,
 As something between joyance and despair
 Came in the chamber of her soul to sit.

In her white cheek the crimson burns as faint
 As red doth in some cold star's chastened beam
 The tender meekness of the pitying saint
 Lends all her life the beauty of a dream.

Thus doth she move among us day by day,
 Loving and loved—but passion can not move
 The young heart that hath wrapped itself away
 In the soft mantle of a Saviour's love.

DEATH'S FERRYMAN.

Boatman, thrice I've called thee o'er,
 Waiting on life's solemn shore,
 Tracing, in the silver sand,
 Letters till thy boat should land.

Drifting out alone with thee,
 Toward the clime I can not see,
 Read to me the strange device
 Graven on thy wand of ice.

Push the curls of golden hue
 From thy eyes of starlit dew,
 And behold me where I stand
 Beckoning thy boat to land.

Where the river mist, so pale,
 Trembles like a bridal veil,
 O'er yon lowly drooping tree,
 One that loves me waits for me.

Hear, sweet boatman, hear my call!
 Last year, with the leaflet's fall,
 Resting her pale hand in mine,
 Crossed she in that boat of thine.

When the corn shall cease to grow,
 And the rye-field's silver flow
 At the reaper's feet is laid,
 Crossing, spake the lovely maid.

Dearest love, another year
 Thou shalt meet this boatman here—
 The white fingers of despair
 Playing with his golden hair.

From this silver-sanded shore,
 Beckon him to row thee o'er:
 Where yon solemn shadows be,
 I shall wait thee—come and see!

There! the white sails float and flow,
 One in heaven and one below:
 And I hear a low voice cry,
 Ferryman of Death am I.

WATCHING.

Thy smile is sad, Ellella,
 Too sad for thee to wear,
 For scarcely have we yet untwined
 The rosebuds from thy hair!
 So, dear one, hush thy sobbing.
 And let thy tears be dried—
 Methinks thou shouldst be happier,
 Three little months a bride!

Hark! how the winds are heaping
 The snow-drifts cold and white—
 The clouds like spectres cross the sky—
 Oh, what a lonesome night!
 The hour grows late and later,
 I hear the midnight chime:
 Thy heart's fond keeper, where is he?
 Why comes he not?—'tis time!

Here make my heart thy pillow,
 And, if the hours seem long,
 I'll wile them with a legend wild,
 Or fragment of old song—
 Or read, if that will soothe thee,
 Some poet's pleasant rhymes;
 Oh, I have watched and waited thus,
 I can not tell the times!

Hush, hark! across the neighbouring hills
 I hear the watch-dog bay—
 Stir up the fire, and trim the lamp,
 I'm sure he's on the way!
 Could that have only been the winds,
 So like a footstep near?
 No, smile Ellella, smile again,
 He's coming home—he's here!

VISIONS OF LIGHT.

The moon is rising in beauty,
 The sky is solemn and bright,
 And the waters are singing like lovers,
 That walk in the valleys at night.

Like the towers of an ancient city,
 That darken against the sky,
 Seems the blue mist of the river
 O'er the hill-tops far and high.

I see through the gathering darkness
 The spire of the village church,
 And the pale white tombs, half hidden
 By the tasselled willow and birch.

Vain is the golden drifting
 Of morning light on the hill;
 No white hand opens the windows
 Of those chambers low and still.

But their dwellers were all my kindred,
 Whatever their lives might be,
 And their sufferings and achievements
 Have recorded lessons for me.

Not one of the countless voyagers
 Of life's mysterious main,
 Has laid down his burden of sorrows,
 Who hath lived and loved in vain.

From the bards of the elder ages
 Fragments of song float by,
 Like flowers in the streams of summer,
 Or stars in the midnight sky.

Some plumes in the dust are scattered,
 Where the eagles of Persia flew,
 And wisdom is reaped from the furrows
 The plough of the Roman drew.

From the white tents of the crusaders
 The phantoms of glory are gone,
 But the zeal of the barefooted hermit
 In humanity's heart lives on.

Oh, sweet as the bell of the Sabbath
 In the tower of the village church,
 Or the fall of the yellow moonbeams
 In the tasselled willow and birch—

Comes a thought of the blessed issues
 That shall follow our social strife,
 When the spirit of love maketh perfect
 The beautiful mission of life:

For visions of light are gathered
 In the sunshine of flowery nooks,
 Like the shades of the ghostly Fathers
 In their twilight cell of books!

CAREY, PHOEBE,

SISTER of the preceding, and usually named with her, though their poetical genius differs, as a double star, when viewed by a telescope, which makes the two distinctly visible, shows different colours of light. The elder sister is superior in genius to the younger, whose light seems to be rather a reflexion of the other's mental power, than an original gift of poetic fancy. The sympathies of the younger have made her a poet. All that we need say of the history of Phœbe Carey, is contained in that of her sister Alice.

From "Poems" by Phœbe Carey.

SONG OF THE HEART.

They may tell for ever of worlds of bloom
 Beyond the skies and beyond the tomb;
 Of the sweet repose, and the rapture there,
 That are not found in a world of care;
 But not to me can the present seem
 Like a foolish tale or an idle dream.

Oh, I know that the bowers of heaven are fair,
 And I know that the waters of life are there;
 But I do not long for their happy flow,
 While there burst such fountains of bliss below;
 And I would not leave, for the rest above,
 The faithful bosom of trusting love.

There are angels here; they are seen the while
 In each love-lit brow and each gentle smile,
 There are seraph voices, that meet the ear
 In the kindly tone and the word of cheer;
 And light, such light as they have above,
 Beams on us here, from the eyes of love.

Yet, when it cometh my time to die,
 I would turn from this bright world willingly;
 Though, even then, would the thoughts of this
 Tinge every dream of that land of bliss;
 And I fain would lean on the loved for aid,
 Nor walk alone through the vale and shade.

And if 'tis mine, till life's changes end,
 To keep the heart of one faithful friend,
 Whatever the trials of earth may be,—
 On the peaceful shore, or the restless sea,
 In a palace home, or the wilderness,—
 There is heaven for me in a world like this!

RESOLVES.

I have said I would not meet him; have I said the words in vain?

Sunset burns along the hill-tops, and I'm waiting here again;
 But my promise is not broken, though I stand where once we met;

When I hear his coming footsteps, I can fly him even yet.

We have stood here oft when evening deepened slowly o'er the plain,

But I must not, dare not, meet him in the shadows here again;
 For I could not turn away and leave that pleading look and tone,

And the sorrow of his parting would be bitter as my own.

In the dim and distant ether the first star is shining through,
 And another and another tremble softly in the blue:

Should I linger but one moment in the shadows where I stand,

I shall see the vine-leaves parted, with a quick impatient hand.

But I will not wait his coming! he will surely come once more;

Though I said I would not meet him, I have told him so before;

And he knows the stars of evening see me standing here again—

Oh, he surely will not leave me now to watch and wait in vain!

'Tis the hour, the time of meeting! in one moment 'twill be past;

And last night he stood beside me; was that blessed time the last?

I could better bear my sorrow, could I live that parting o'er;
 Oh, I wish I had not told him that I would not come once more!

Could that have been the night-wind moved the branches thus apart?

Did I hear a coming footstep, or the beating of my heart?

No! I hear him, I can see him, and my weak resolves are vain;

I will fly, but to his bosom, and to leave it not again!

OUR HOMESTEAD.

Our old brown homestead reared its walls,
 From the wayside dust aloof,
 Where the apple boughs could almost cast
 Their fruitage on its roof:
 And the cherry-tree so near it grew,
 That when awake I've lain,
 In the lonesome nights I've heard the limbs,
 As they creaked against the pane;
 And those orchard trees, oh, those orchard trees!
 I've seen my little brothers rocked
 In their tops by the summer breeze.

The sweet-brier under the window sill,
 Which the early birds made glad,
 And the damask rose by the garden fence,
 Were all the flowers we had.

I've looked at many a flower since then,
 Exotics rich and rare,
 That to other eyes were lovelier,
 But not to me so fair;

For those roses bright, oh, those roses bright!
 I have twined them with my sister's locks,
 That are laid in the dust from sight!

We had a well, a deep old well.

Where the spring was never dry,
 And the cool drops down from the mossy stone—
 Were falling constantly:

And there never was water half so sweet
 As that in my little cup,
 Drawn up to the curb by the rude old sweep,
 Which my father's hand set up;
 And that deep old well, oh, that deep old well
 I remember yet the plashing sound
 Of the bucket as it fell.

Our homestead had an ample hearth,
 Where at night we loved to meet;
 There my mother's voice was always kind,
 And her smile was always sweet;
 And there I've sat on my father's knee,
 And watched his thoughtful brow,
 With my childish hand in his raven hair—
 That hair is silver now!
 But that broad hearth's light, oh, that broad hearth's light!
 And my father's look, and my mother's smile,
 They are in my heart to-night.

PARTING AND MEETING.

On the casement, closed and lonesome,
 Is falling the autumn rain,
 And my heart to-night is heavy
 With a sense of unquiet pain.

Not that the leaves are dying
 In the kiss of the traitor frost,
 And not that the summer flowers
 On the bitter winds are tossed.

And not that the reaper's singing
 The time no longer cheers,
 Bringing home through the merry starlight
 The sheaves and the yellow ears.

No, not from these am I sighing,
 As the hours pass slow and dull,
 For God in his own time maketh
 All seasons beautiful.

But one of our household number
 Sits not by the hearth-fire's light,
 And right on her pathway beating
 Is the rain of this autumn night.

And therefore my heart is heavy
 With a sense of unquiet pain,
 For, but Heaven can tell if the parted
 Shall meet in the earth again.

But knowing God's love extendeth
 Wherever his children are,
 And tenderly round about them
 Are the arms of his watchful care;

With him be the time and the season
 Of our meeting again with thee,
 Whether here on these earthly borders,
 Or the shore of the world to be.

CHILD, LYDIA MARIA,

WIFE of David Lee Child, was born in Massachusetts, but passed the early portion of her youth in Maine, whither her father, Mr. Francis, had removed when she was quite young. She found few literary privileges in the place of her residence, but she had the genius that nourishes itself on nature; and from the influence of the wild scenes which surrounded her home in childhood, she, doubtless, draws even now much of the freshness of thought and vigour of style which mark her productions.

In 1823, being on a visit to her brother, the Rev. Conyers Francis, then pastor of the Unitarian Church at Watertown, Massachusetts, Miss Francis commenced her literary life with "Hobomok, a Story of the Pilgrims;" and, considering the circumstances under which it was written, a very remarkable production. As the scene has been graphically described by Dr. Griswold, author of "The Prose Writers of America," we will quote his account:—"One Sunday noon, soon after her arrival at her brother's, Miss Francis took up a number of the 'North American Review,' and read Doctor Palfrey's article on 'Yamoyden,' in which he eloquently describes the adaptation of early New England history to the purposes of fiction. She had never written a word for the press,—never had dreamed of turning author,—but the spell was on her, and seizing a pen, before the bell rang for the afternoon meeting she had composed the first chapter of the novel, just as it is printed; when it was shown to her brother, her young ambition was flattered by the exclamation,—'But, Maria, did you really write this? Do you mean what you say, that it is entirely your own?" The excellent Doctor little knew the effect of his words. Her fate was fixed: in six weeks 'Hobomok' was finished." The book was published in 1824; ever since that time its author has kept her place as a faithful labourer in the field of literature, and, perhaps, no one of our female writers has had wider influence, or made more earnest efforts to do good with her talents. Her next work, "The Rebels," was published in 1825; soon afterwards Miss Francis became Mrs. Child, and her married life has been a true and lovely exemplification of the domestic concord which congenial minds produce as well as enjoy.

In 1827, Mrs. Child engaged as editor of "The Juvenile Miscellany," the first monthly periodical issued in our Union for children. Under her care the work became very popular; she has a warm sympathy with the young—her genius harmonized with the undertaking, and some of the articles in this "Miscellany" are among the best she has written. During the six following years, Mrs. Child's pen was incessantly employed. Besides her editorial duties, she published, successively—"The Frugal Housewife," written as she said in the preface, "for the poor," and one of the most useful books of its kind extant—"The Mother's Book," an excellent manual in training children, though the author has never been a mother—and "The Girl's Book," designed as a holiday present and descriptive of children's plays. She also prepared five volumes for "The Ladies' Family Library," comprising "Lives of Madame de Staël and Madame Roland;" "Lady Russell and Madame Guyon;" "Biographies of Good Wives;" and the "History and Condition of Woman;" which works were published in Boston. Besides all these she published in 1833, "The Coronal," a collection of miscellaneous pieces, in prose and verse. This year is also important in her history for the first step she took with the abolitionists, by issuing her "Appeal for that class of Americans called Africans." This appeal was written with that earnest and honest enthusiasm pervading all Mrs. Child's benevolent efforts. She was true to the generous sympathies of her own heart; but did she carefully examine, in all its bearings, the cause she so ardently advocated? The philanthropist may do incalculable injury to humanity by urging a system of reform or relief which removes old abuses it is true, but introduces and cherishes other and far greater evils. Las Casas introduced negro slavery to save the red man from extirpation—behold the result! Philanthropy established “Foundling Hospitals” in Stockholm to save illegitimate infants from exposure; one out of every three children now born in that city are illegitimate! We might multiply illustrations,—but there is no need. The precepts and examples of the Saviour should be the guide of woman’s benevolent efforts. In no case did He lend aid or encouragement to the agitation of political questions. His Gospel is “peace and good-will;” which it seems woman’s province to illustrate in its deeds till men shall be imbued with its spirit. Wherever there are two modes of attaining a righteous end, is it not better that our sex should follow that which requires ever the gentle ministry of love, mercy and good works, than enter on that which stirs up partisan jealousy, and the thousand evils attendant on political or polemical strife? The design of the abolitionists, let us believe, is the improvement and happiness of the coloured race; for this end Mrs. Child devoted her noblest talents, her holiest aspirations. Seventeen years ago she consecrated her powers to this work. The result has been, that her fine genius, her soul’s wealth has been wasted in the struggle which party politicians have used for their own selfish purposes. Had Mrs. Child taken the more quiet, but far more efficient mode of doing good to the coloured race, by aiding to establish schools in Liberia—preparing and sending out free coloured emigrants, who must there become teachers and exemplars to thousands and millions of the poor black heathen; if she had written for this mission of peace as she has poured her heart out in a cause only tending to strife, what blessed memorials of these long years, would now be found to repay her disinterested exertions! Since 1833, only three works of her’s have been published: “Philothea” appeared in 1835, a charming romance, filled with the pure aspirations of genius, and rich in classical lore; the scene being laid in Greece in the time of Pericles and Aspasia. The work is in one volume, and was planned and partly written before its author entered the arena of party; but the bitter feelings engendered by the strife, have prevented the merits of this remarkable book from being appreciated as they deserve.

In 1841, Mr. and Mrs. Child removed from Boston to the city of New York, and became conductors of “The National Anti-Slavery Standard.” Mrs. Child, while assisting in her husband’s editorial duties, now commenced a Series of Letters, partly for the “Boston Courier,” a popular newspaper, and partly for the “Standard,” (her own paper,) which after being thus published, were collected and reissued in two volumes, entitled, “Letters from New York.” This work has been very popular. Mrs. Child is a close observer, she knows “how to observe,” and better still, she has a poetical imagination and a pure, warm, loving heart, which invests her descriptions with a peculiar charm. An English Reviewer has well remarked concerning Mrs. Child:—“Whatever comes to her from without, whether through the eye or the ear, whether in nature or art, is reflected in her writings with a halo of beauty thrown about it by her own fancy; and thus presented, it appeals to our sympathies and awakens an interest which carves it upon the memory in letters of gold. But she has yet loftier claims to respect than a poetical nature. She is a philosopher, and, better still, a religious philosopher. Every page presents to us scraps of wisdom, not pedantically put forth, as if to attract admiration, but thrown out by the way in seeming unconsciousness, and as part of her ordinary thoughts.”

This is high praise, but truly deserved. Her last work,—excepting a little book, “Spring Flowers,” for children,—was “Fact and Fiction,” published in 1846. It is a collection of tales, each one possessing some characteristic excellence, but the one we select is such a beautiful illustration of the power of kindness over the human heart, and moreover, it discloses the impulse of her own nature, always seeking to do good, that we prefer it to those in which fancy predominates. Mrs. Child’s residence is now in Massachusetts.

THE NEIGHBOUR-IN-LAW.

Who blesses others in his daily deeds,
Will find the healing that his spirit needs;
For every flower in others’ pathway strown,
Confers its fragrant beauty on our own.

“So you are going to live in the same building with Hetty Turnpenny,” said Mrs. Lane to Mrs. Fairweather; “you will find nobody to envy you. If her temper does not prove too much even for your good nature, it will surprise all who know her. We lived there a year, and that is as long as anybody ever tried it.”

“Poor Hetty!” replied Mrs. Fairweather; “she has had much to harden her. Her mother died too early for her to remember; her father was very severe with her; and the only lover she ever had, borrowed the savings of her years of toil, and spent them in dissipation. But Hetty, notwithstanding her sharp features, and sharper words, certainly has a kind heart. In the midst of her greatest poverty, many were the stockings she knit, and the warm waistcoats she made, for the poor drunken lover, whom she had too much good sense to marry. Then you know she feeds and clothes her brother’s orphan child.”

“If you call it feeding and clothing,” replied Mrs. Lane. “The poor child looks cold, and pinched, and frightened all the time, as if she were chased by the east wind. I used to tell Miss Turnpenny she ought to be ashamed of herself, to keep the poor little thing at work all the time, without one minute to play. If she does but look at the cat, as it runs by the window, Aunt Hetty gives her a rap over the knuckles. I used to tell her she would make the girl just such another sour old crab as herself.”

“That must have been very improving to her disposition,” replied Mrs. Fairweather, with a good-humoured smile. "But in justice to poor Aunt Hetty, you ought to remember that she had just such a cheerless childhood herself. Flowers grow where there is sunshine."

"I know you think everybody ought to live in the sunshine," rejoined Mrs. Lane; "and it must be confessed that you carry it with you wherever you go. If Miss Turnpenny has a heart, I dare say you will find it out, though I never could, and I never heard of any one else that could. All the families within hearing of her tongue call her the neighbour-in-law."

Certainly the prospect was not very encouraging; for the house Mrs. Fairweather proposed to occupy, was not only under the same roof with Miss Turnpenny, but the buildings had one common yard in the rear, and one common space for a garden in front. The very first day she took possession of her new habitation, she called on the neighbour-in-law. Aunt Hetty had taken the precaution to extinguish the fire, lest the new neighbour should want hot water, before her own wood and coal arrived. Her first salutation was, "If you want any cold water, there's a pump across the street; I don't like to have my house slopped all over."

"I am glad you are so tidy, neighbour Turnpenny," replied Mrs. Fairweather; "it is extremely pleasant to have neat neighbours. I will try to keep everything as bright as a new five cent piece, for I see that will please you. I came in merely to say good morning, and to ask if you could spare little Peggy to run up and down stairs for me, while I am getting my furniture in order. I will pay her sixpence an hour."

Aunt Hetty had begun to purse up her mouth for a refusal; but the promise of sixpence an hour relaxed her features at once. Little Peggy sat knitting a stocking very diligently, with a rod lying on the table beside her. She looked up with timid wistfulness, as if the prospect of any change was like a release from prison. When she heard consent given, a bright colour flushed her cheeks. She was evidently of an impressible temperament, for good or evil. "Now mind and behave yourself," said Aunt Hetty; "and see that you keep at work the whole time. If I hear one word of complaint, you know what you'll get when you come home." The rose-colour subsided from Peggy's pale face, and she answered, "Yes ma'am," very meekly.

In the neighbour's house all went quite otherwise. No switch lay on the table; and instead of, "Mind how you do that—if you don't, I'll punish you," she heard the gentle words, "There, dear, see how carefully you can carry that up stairs. Why, what a nice, handy little girl you are!" Under this enlivening influence, Peggy worked like a bee, and soon began to hum much more agreeably than a bee. Aunt Hetty was always in the habit of saying, "Stop your noise, and mind your work." But the new friend patted her on the head, and said, "What a pleasant voice the little girl has. It is like the birds in the fields. By-and-by, you shall hear my music-box." This opened wide the windows of the poor little shut-up heart, so that the sunshine could stream in, and the birds fly in and out, carolling. The happy child tuned up like a lark, as she tripped lightly up and down stairs, on various household errands. But though she took heed to observe all the directions given her, her head was all the time filled with conjectures what sort of a thing a music-box might be. She was a little afraid the kind lady would forget to show it to her. She kept at work, however, and asked no questions; she only looked very curiously at everything that resembled a box. At last, Mrs. Fairweather said, "I think your little feet must be tired, by this time. We will rest awhile, and eat some gingerbread." The child took the offered cake, with a humble little courtesy, and carefully held out her apron to prevent any crumbs from falling on the floor. But suddenly the apron dropped, and the crumbs were all strewn about. "Is that a little bird?" she exclaimed eagerly. "Where is he? Is he in this room?" The new friend smiled, and told her that was the music-box; and after awhile she opened it, and explained what made the sounds. Then she took out a pile of books from one of the baskets of goods, and told Peggy she might look at the pictures, till she called her. The little girl stepped forward eagerly to take them, and then drew back, as if afraid. "What is the matter?" asked Mrs. Fairweather; "I am very willing to trust you with the books. I keep them on purpose to amuse children." Peggy looked down with her finger on her lip, and answered, in a constrained voice, "Aunt Turnpenny won't like it if I play." "Don't trouble yourself about that; I will make it all right with Aunt Hetty," replied the friendly one. Thus assured, she gave herself up to the full enjoyment of the picture-books; and when she was summoned to her work, she obeyed with a cheerful alacrity that would have astonished her stern relative. When the labours of the day were concluded, Mrs. Fairweather accompanied her home, paid for all the hours she had been absent, and warmly praised her docility and diligence. "It is lucky for her that she behaved so well," replied Aunt Hetty; "if I had heard any complaint, I should have given her a whipping, and sent her to bed without her supper."

* * * * *

But a source of annoyance presented itself, which could not easily be disposed of. Aunt Hetty had a cat—a lean, scraggy animal—that looked as if she were often kicked and seldom fed; and Mrs. Fairweather had a fat, frisky little dog, always ready for a caper. He took a distaste to poor poverty-stricken Tab, the first time he saw her; and no coaxing could induce him to alter his opinion. His name was Pink; but he was anything but a pink of behaviour in his neighbourly relations. Poor Tab could never set foot out of doors without being saluted with a growl, and a short sharp bark, that frightened her out of her senses, and made her run into the house, with her fur all on end. If she even ventured to doze a little on her own door-step, the enemy was on the watch, and the moment her eyes closed, he would wake her with a bark and a box on the ear.

and off he would run. Aunt Hetty vowed she would scald him. It was a burning shame, she said, for folks to keep dogs to worry their neighbours' cats. Mrs. Fairweather invited Tabby to dine, and made much of her, and patiently endeavoured to teach her dog to eat from the same plate. But Pink sturdily resolved he would be scalded first; that he would. He could not have been more obstinate in his opposition, if he and Tab had belonged to different sects in Christianity. While his mistress was patting Tab on the head, and reasoning the point with him, he would at times manifest a degree of indifference, amounting to toleration; but the moment he was left to his own free will, he would give the invited guest a hearty cuff with his paw, and send her home spitting like a small steam-engine. Aunt Hetty considered it her own peculiar privilege to cuff the poor animal, and it was too much for her patience to see Pink undertake to assist in making Tab unhappy. On one of these occasions, she rushed into her neighbour's apartments, and faced Mrs. Fairweather, with one hand resting on her hip, and the forefinger of the other making very wrathful gesticulations. "I tell you what, madam, I won't put up with such treatment much longer," said she; "I'll poison that dog; see if I don't; and I shan't wait long, either, I can tell you. What you keep such an impudent little beast for, I don't know, without you do it on purpose to plague your neighbours."

"I am really sorry he behaves so," replied Mrs. Fairweather, mildly. "Poor Tab!"

"Poor Tab!" screamed Miss Turnpenny; "what do you mean by calling her poor? Do you mean to fling it up to me that my cat don't have enough to eat?"

"I did n't think of such a thing," replied Mrs. Fairweather. "I called her poor Tab, because Pink plagues her so, that she has no peace of her life. I agree with you, neighbour Turnpenny; it is not right to keep a dog that disturbs the neighbourhood. I am attached to poor little Pink, because he belongs to my son, who has gone to sea. I was in hopes he would soon leave off quarrelling with the cat; but if he won't be neighbourly, I will send him out in the country to board. Sally, will you bring me one of the pies we baked this morning? I should like to have Miss Turnpenny taste of them."

The crabbed neighbour was helped abundantly; and while she was eating the pie, the friendly matron edged in many a kind word concerning little Peggy, whom she praised as a remarkably capable, industrious child.

"I am glad you find her so," rejoined Aunt Hetty: "I should get precious little work out of her, if I didn't keep a switch in sight."

"I manage children pretty much as the man did the donkey," replied Mrs. Fairweather. "Not an inch would the poor beast stir, for all his master's beating and thumping. But a neighbour tied some fresh turnips to a stick, and fastened them so that they swung directly before the donkey's nose, and off he set on a brisk trot, in hopes of overtaking them"

Aunt Hetty, without observing how very closely the comparison applied to her own management of Peggy, said, "That will do very well for folks that have plenty of turnips to spare."

"For the matter of that," answered Mrs. Fairweather, "whips cost something, as well as turnips; and since one makes the donkey stand still, and the other makes him trot, it is easy to decide which is the most economical. But, neighbour Turnpenny, since you like my pies so well, pray take one home with you. I am afraid they will mould before we can eat them up."

Aunt Hetty had come in for a quarrel, and she was astonished to find herself going out with a pie. "Well, Mrs. Fairweather," said she, "you are a neighbour. I thank you a thousand times." When she reached her own door, she hesitated for an instant, then turned back, pie in hand, to say, "Neighbour Fairweather, you need n't trouble yourself about sending Pink away. It's natural you should like the little creature, seeing he belongs to your son. I'll try to keep Tab in doors; and perhaps after awhile they will agree better."

"I hope they will," replied the friendly matron: "we will try them awhile longer, and if they persist in quarrelling, I will send the dog into the country." Pink, who was sleeping in a chair, stretched himself and gaped. His kind mistress patted him on the head, "Ah, you foolish little beast," said she, "what's the use of plaguing poor Tab?"

* * * * *

That same afternoon, the sunshiny dame stepped into Aunt Hetty's rooms, where she found Peggy sewing, as usual, with the eternal switch on the table beside her. "I am obliged to go to Harlem, on business," said she: "I feel rather lonely without company, and I always like to have a child with me. If you will oblige me by letting Peggy go, I will pay her fare in the omnibus."

"She has her spelling lesson to get before night," replied Aunt Hetty. "I don't approve of young folks going a pleasuring, and neglecting their education."

"Neither do I," rejoined her neighbour; "but I think there is a great deal of education that is not found in books. The fresh air will make Peggy grow stout and active. I prophesy that she will do great credit to your bringing up." The sugared words, and the remembrance of the sugared pie, touched the soft place in Miss Turnpenny's heart, and she told the astonished Peggy that she might go and put on her best gown and bonnet. The poor child began to think that this new neighbour was certainly one of the good fairies she read about in the picture-books. The excursion was enjoyed as only a city child can enjoy the country. The world seems such a pleasant place, when the fetters are off, and Nature folds the young heart lovingly on her bosom! A flock of real birds and two living butterflies put the little orphan in a perfect ecstasy. She ran and skipped. One could see that she might be graceful, if she were only free. She pointed to the fields covered with dandelions, and said, "See how pretty! It looks as if the stars had come down to lie on the grass." Ah, our little stunted Peggy has poetry in her, though Aunt Hetty never found it out. Every human soul has the germ of some flowers within, and they would open, if they could only find sunshine and free air to expand in.

Mrs. Fairweather was a practical philosopher, in her own small way. She observed that Miss Turnpenny really liked a pleasant tune; and when winter came, she tried to persuade her that singing would be excellent for Peggy's lungs, and perhaps keep her from going into a consumption.

"My nephew, James Fairweather, keeps a singing school," said she; "and he says he will teach her gratis. You need not feel under great obligation; for her voice will lead the whole school, and her ear is so quick, it will be no trouble at all to teach her. Perhaps you would go with us sometimes, neighbour Turnpenny? It is very pleasant to hear the children's voices."

The cordage of Aunt Hetty's mouth relaxed into a smile. She accepted the invitation, and was so much pleased, that she went every Sunday evening. The simple tunes, and the sweet young voices, fell like dew on her dried-up heart, and greatly aided the genial influence of her neighbour's example. The rod silently disappeared from the table. If Peggy was disposed to be idle, it was only necessary to say, "When you have finished your work, you may go and ask whether Mrs. Fairweather wants any errands done." Bless me, how the fingers flew! Aunt Hetty had learned to use turnips instead of the cudgel.

When spring came, Mrs. Fairweather busied herself with planting roses and vines. Miss Turnpenny readily consented that Peggy should help her, and even refused to take any pay from such a good neighbour. But she maintained her own opinion that it was a mere waste of time to cultivate flowers. The cheerful philosopher never disputed the point; but she would sometimes say, "I have no room to plant this rose-bush. Neighbour Turnpenny, would you be willing to let me set it on your side of the yard? It will take very little room, and will need no care." At another time, she would say, "Well, really my ground is too full. Here is a root of Lady's-delight. How bright and pert it looks. It seems a pity to throw it away. If you are willing, I will let Peggy plant it in what she calls her garden. It will grow of itself, without any care, and scatter seeds, that will come up and blossom in all the chinks of the bricks. I love it. It is such a bright, good-natured little thing." Thus, by degrees, the crabbed maiden found herself surrounded by flowers; and she even declared, of her own accord, that they did look pretty.

One day, when Mrs. Lane called upon Mrs. Fairweather, she found the old weed-grown yard bright and blooming. Tab, quite fat and sleek, was asleep, in the sunshine, with her paw on Pink's neck, and little Peggy was singing at her work, as blithe as a bird.

"How cheerful you look here," said Mrs. Lane. "And so you have really taken the house for another year. Pray, how do you manage to get on with the neighbour-in-law?"

"I find her a very kind, obliging neighbour," replied Mrs. Fairweather.

"Well, this is a miracle!" exclaimed Mrs. Lane. "Nobody but you would have undertaken to thaw out Aunt Hetty's heart."

"That is probably the reason why it was never thawed," rejoined her friend. "I always told you, that not having enough of sunshine was what ailed the world. Make people happy, and there will not be half the quarrelling, or a tenth part of the wickedness, there is."

From the "Mother's Book."

POLITENESS.

In politeness, as in many other things connected with the formation of character, people in general begin outside, when they should begin inside; instead of beginning with the heart, and trusting that to form the manners, they begin with the manners, and trust the heart to chance influences. The golden rule contains the very life and soul of politeness. Children may be taught to make a graceful courtesy, or a gentlemanly bow,—but, unless they have likewise been taught to abhor what is selfish, and always prefer another's comfort and pleasure to their own, their politeness will be entirely artificial, and used only when it is their interest to use it. On the other hand, a truly benevolent, kind-hearted person will always be distinguished for what is called native politeness, though entirely ignorant of the conventional forms of society.

BEAUTY.

Perhaps there is no gift with which mortals are endowed, that brings so much danger as beauty, in proportion to the usefulness and happiness it produces. It is so rare for a belle to be happy, or even contented, after the season of youth is past, that it is considered almost a miracle. If your daughter is handsome, it is peculiarly necessary that she should not be taught to attach an undue importance to the dangerous gift; and if she is plain, it certainly is not for her happiness to consider it as a misfortune.

It certainly is natural to admire beauty, whether it be in human beings, animals, or flowers; it is a principle implanted within the human mind, and we cannot get rid of it. Beauty is the outward form of goodness; and that is the reason we love it instinctively, without thinking why we love it. The truth is, beauty is really of some consequence; but of very small consequence compared with good principles, good feelings, and good understanding. In this manner children ought to hear it spoken of. There should be no affected indifference on this or any other subject. If a child say, 'Everybody loves Jane Snow—she is so pretty.' I would answer, 'Is Jane Snow a good, kind little girl? I should be pleased with her pretty face, and should want to kiss her, when I first saw her; but if I found she was cross and selfish, I should not love her; and I should not wish to have her about me.' In this way the attention will be drawn from the subject of beauty, to the importance of goodness; and there is no affectation in the business—the plain truth is told. We do love beauty at first sight; and we do cease to love it, if it is not accompanied by amiable qualities.

CLARKE, MARY COWDEN,

AN English lady, residing near London, who has prepared "The Complete Concordance to Shakspeare." It was a gigantic undertaking, and like "Cruden's Concordance to the Scriptures," would appear to leave nothing to be desired to complete a reference to the works of the immortal dramatist. Mrs. Clarke devoted sixteen years to this study; and seems to have felt such honest enthusiasm in her pursuit as made it a real pleasure. The book is large octavo, three columns on each page, and there are 860 pages, sufficient labour for a lifetime, and her ambition may well be satisfied with the result. From her very sensible preface we will give a quotation, showing the estimation Shakspeare holds in her mind; nor do we think she overrates the influence of his works. Next to genius comes the faculty to appreciate it thus lovingly and truthfully.

"Shakspeare, the most frequently quoted, because the most universal-minded genius that ever lived, of all authors, best deserves a complete Concordance to his works. To what subject may we not with felicity apply a motto from this greatest of Poets? The Divine, commending the efficacy and 'twofold force of prayer—to be forestalled, ere we come to fall, or pardoned, being down;' the Astronomer, supporting his theory by allusions to 'the moist star, upon whose influence Neptune's empire stands;' the Naturalist striving to elucidate a fact respecting the habits of 'the singing masons,' or 'heavy-gaited toads;' the Botanist, lecturing on the various properties of the 'small flower, within whose infant rind poison hath residence, and medicine power;' or, on the growth of 'summer grass, fastest by night unseen, yet cressive in his faculty;' the Philosopher, speculating upon 'the respect that makes calamity of so long a life,'—'the dread of something after death, the undiscovered country, from whose bourn no traveller returns;' 'the Lover, telling his 'whispering tale in a fair lady's ear,' and vowing the 'winnowed purity' and 'persistive constancy' of his 'heart's dear love;' the Lawyer, discussing some 'nice sharp quillet of the law;' the Musician, descanting on the 'touches of sweet harmony;' the Painter, describing his art, that 'pretty mocking of the life;' the Novel-writer, seeking an illustrative heading to a fresh chapter, 'the baby figure of the giant mass to come at large;' the Orator, labouring an emphatic point in an appeal to the passions of assembled multitudes, 'to stir men's blood;' the Soldier, endeavouring to vindicate his profession, by vaunting the 'pomp and circumstance of glorious war;' or the Humanist, advocating 'the quality of mercy,' urging that 'to revenge is no valour, but to bear;' and maintaining that 'the earth is wronged by man's oppression,' may all equally adorn their page, or emblazon their speech with gems from Shakspeare's works."

The "Concordance" was published in London, in 1846. So carefully was the process of correcting proofs, &c., performed, that four years was spent in printing the book.

CLARKE, SARA JANE,

BEST known as "Grace Greenwood," was born in Onondaga, a village in the interior of New York. Her parents were from New England, being connected with some of the most distinguished of the Pilgrim and Huguenot families. Mr. Clarke removed to New Brighton, whilst his gifted daughter was yet a child; her home is still there among the wild, bold and picturesque scenery of western Pennsylvania.

In 1844, Miss Clarke commenced her career of authorship in a series of letters, under the signature of "Grace Greenwood," addressed to the Editors of the New Mirror, published in the city of New York. These editors, Messrs. Morris and Willis, were struck with the vivacity of thought, energy of expression, and poetic fancy displayed by the writer; they kindly encouraged her, and soon her nomme de plume became celebrated among our readers of literary periodicals. Previous to this, however, Miss Clarke had written several poems under her real name; the discovery that the earnest, impassioned poet, and the "witty, saucy, dashing, brilliant letter-writer," were one and indivisibly the same person, increased the curiosity and admiration; "Grace Greenwood" was at once a favourite.

That she has not only sustained, but increased this wide popularity, seemingly so easily gained, is proof that her talents are of the genuine stamp. An inferior genius would have been satisfied with the honours won; a fearful mind would have hesitated to risk, by any effort to widen her sway, a failure. Genius, however, makes no interested calculations, but pours out its musings and melodies as prayer gushes from a heart filled with the love of heaven. Miss Clarke has written much during the last four or five years; and though these "Greenwood leaves," both poetry and prose, have been scattered about in various periodicals, and prepared without that concentration of thought and purpose which a great work requires, yet she has made good progress, and is a writer of whom her country may be justly proud.

The characteristics of her prose are freshness, vigour, and earnestness of thought, combined with exquisite humour and sprightliness; and although she is distinguished by great freedom and fearlessness of expression, she never transcends the bounds of strict feminine delicacy. A slight vein of playful satire is discernible here and there, which adds to the piquancy of her style, but which, like the heat lightning of a summer night, flashes and coruscates, while it does not blast. As an instance of this, in speaking of men's appreciation of elevated womanhood, she says—

"I know that the sentiment of men, even great men, often is, from a perfect woman, 'good Lord, deliver us'—and He generally hears their prayer. Speak to them of feminine natures exalted by genius, or great goodness, and they will put at you, as they understand it, the poet's idea of loveable womanhood—

'A Creature not too bright, nor good,
For human nature's daily food.'

Which, probably, is also a New Zealander's highest ideal of a missionary."

The high, almost passionate appreciation of the holy dignity of womanhood is a striking characteristic of Miss Clarke's poetry: this elevates her soul, and gives the strength of expression nearly approaching masculine sternness and depth of passion to her most remarkable production—"Ariadne." It is from this intenseness of feminine feeling, that we predict her future poetical triumphs, when throwing aside the pretty trifles of verse in which she now too often sportively indulges, she chooses the theme worthiest of her high powers—and bending her brave benevolent spirit to the work, in her burning words shall picture forth the moral mission of woman!

In person, Miss Clarke is neither large nor small. Her height is a little above the middle size. Her form combines delicacy with agility and vigour. Her mien, and carriage, voice, gesture, and action, all manifest, by the most perfect correspondence of a natural language, her rich variety of intellectual powers and moral sentiments. The physical answering to the mental, in all that susceptible nobility of temperament which endows genius with its "innate experiences" and universality of life. Her head is of the finest order, and larger than the Grecian model, whose beauty it rivals in symmetrical development. The forehead is high, broad, and classic. Her brows are delicately pencilled. Her complexion is a light olive, or distinct brunette, and as changeable as the play of fancy and the hues of emotion. Her eyes are deep, full orbs of living light; their expression is not thoughtfulness, but its free revealings—not feeling, but its outgoings. Just as her poetry is never penned till perfectly matured, so her thoughts and feelings leap, and play, and flow in the flashing light, free from all sign of mental elaboration.

A volume of Miss Clarke's prose writings, was published in Boston, by Ticknor, Reed & Fields, under the title of "Greenwood Leaves," in 1850; and a small volume of "Poems," in 1851; also a book for children, entitled "My Pets"

From "Poems"

MY LAYS.

My lays, my lays, would they might find
An echo in my country's heart!
Be in its home-affections shrined,
Form of its cherished things a part;
Be like wild flowers and common air,
Blooming for all, breathed everywhere—
Or like the song of forest bird,
Gushing for all, felt more than heard.
Earnest, untiring, might they be
Like barques before a breeze at sea,
Whose dashing prow's point home—
Like good knights bound for Palestine,
Like artists, warmed by fire divine,
O'er icy Alp and Apennine,
Holding their way to Rome—
Like arrows flashing through the light,
Like eagles on their sunward flight,
Like to all things, in which we see
An errand and a destiny.

ARIADNE.*

Daughter of Crete—how one brief hour,
E'en in thy young love's early morn,
Sends storm and darkness o'er thy bower—
Oh doomed, oh desolate, oh torn!
The breast which pillowed thy fair head,
Rejects its burden—and the eye
Which looked its love so earnestly,
Its last cold glance hath on thee shed;
The arms which were thy living zone,
Around thee closely, warmly thrown,
Shall others clasp, deserted one!

Yet, Ariadne, worthy thou
Of the dark fate which meets thee now,
For thou art grovelling in thy woe:
Arouse thee! joy to bid him go;
For god above, or man below,
Whose love's warm and impetuous tide
Cold interest or selfish pride
Can chill, or stay, or turn aside,
Is all too poor and mean a thing
One shade o'er woman's brow to fling
Of grief, regret, or fear;
To cloud one morning's golden light—
Disturb the sweet dreams of one night—
To cause the soft flash of her eye
To droop one moment mournfully,
Or tremble with one tear!

'Tis thou shouldst triumph; thou art free
From chains which bound thee for a while,
This, this the farewell meet for thee,
Proud princess on that lonely isle:

"Go—to thine Athens bear thy faithless name,
Go, base betrayer of a holy trust!
Oh, I could bow me in my utter shame,
And lay my crimson forehead in the dust,
If I had ever loved thee as thou art,
Folding mean falsehood to my high, true heart!

"But thus I loved thee not: before me bowed
A being glorious in majestic pride,
And breathed his love, and passionately vowed
To worship only me, his peerless bride;
And this was thou, but crowned, enrobed, entwined,
With treasures borrowed from my own rich mind!

*The demigod Theseus having won the love of Ariadne, daughter of the king of Crete, deserted her on the isle of Naxos. In Miss Bremer's H— Family, the blind girl is described as singing "Ariadne á Naxos," in which Ariadne is represented as following Theseus, climbing a high rock to watch his departing vessel, and calling upon him in her despairing anguish.

"I knew thee not a creature of my dreams,
And my rapt soul went floating into thine;
My love around thee poured such halo-beams,
Hadst thou been true, had made thee all divine.
And I, too, seemed immortal in my bliss,
When my glad lip thrilled to thy burning kiss!

"Shrunk and shrivelled into Theseus now
Thou standst: behold, the gods have blown away
The airy crown that glittered on thy brow —
The gorgeous robes which wrapped thee for a day;
Around thee scarce one fluttering fragment clings —
A poor lean beggar in all glorious things!

"Nor will I deign to cast on thee my hate —
It were a ray to tinge with splendour still
The dull, dim twilight of thy after-fate —
Thou shalt pass from me like a dream of ill —
Thy name be but a thing that crouching stole
Like a poor thief, all noiseless from my soul!

"Though thou hast dared to steal the sacred flame
From out that soul's high heaven, she sets thee free;
Or only chains thee with thy sounding shame:
Her memory is no Caucasus for thee;
And e'en her hovering hate would o'er thee fling
Too much of glory from its shadowy wing!

"Thou thinkst to leave my life a lonely night —
Ha! it is night all glorious with its stars!
Hopes yet unclouded beaming forth their light,
And free thoughts rolling in their silver cars!
And queenly pride, serene, and cold, and high,
Moves the Diana of its calm, clear sky!

"If poor and humbled thou believest me,
Mole of a demigod, how blind art thou!
For I am rich — in scorn to pour on thee:
And gods shall bend from high Olympus' brow,
And gaze in wonder on my lofty pride;
Naxos be hallowed, I be deified!"

On the tall cliff where cold and pale
Thou watchest his receding sail,
Where thou, the daughter of a king,
Wail'st like a wind-harp's breaking string,
Bendst like a weak and wilted flower
Before a summer evening's shower —
There shouldst thou rear thy royal form,
Like a young oak amid the storm,
Uncrushed, unbowed, unruined!
Let thy last glance burn through the air,
And fall far down upon him there,
Like lightning stroke from heaven!
There shouldst thou mark o'er billowy crest
His white sail flutter and depart;
No wild fears surging at thy breast,
No vain hopes quivering round thy heart,
And this brief, burning prayer alone
Leap from thy lips to Jove's high throne:
"Just Jove! thy wrathful vengeance stay,
And speed the traitor on his way;
Make vain the siren's silver song,
Let nereids smile the wave along —
O'er the wild waters send his bark
Like a swift arrow to its mark!
Let whirlwinds gather at his back,
And drive him on his dastard track;
Let thy red bolts behind him burn,
And blast him, should he dare to turn!"

THE MARCH OF MIND.

See yon bold eagle, toward the sun
Now rising free and strong,
And see yon mighty river roll
Its sounding tide along:
Ah! yet near the earth the eagle tires;
Lost in the sea, the river;
But naught can stay the human mind,—
'Tis upward, onward, ever!
It yet shall tread its stait paths,
By highest angels trod,
And pause but at the farthest world
In the universe of God.

'Tis said that Persia's baffled king,
In mad tyrannic pride,
Cast fetters on the Hellespont,
To curb its stormy tide;
But freedom's own true spirit heaves
The bosom of the main —
It tossed those fetters to the skies,
And bounded on again!
The scorn of each succeeding age
On Xerxes' head was hurled,
And o'er that foolish deed has pealed
The long laugh of a world.
Thus, thus defeat, and scorn, and shame,
Be his who strives to bind
The restless, leaping waves of thought,
The free tide of the mind!

"THERE WAS A ROSE."

There was a rose, that blushing grew
Within my life's young bower;
The angels sprinkled holy dew
Upon the blessed flower:
I glory to resign it, love,
Though it was dear to me;
Amid thy laurels twine it, love,
It only blooms for thee.
There was a rich and radiant gem
I long kept hid from sight,
Lost from some seraph's diadem —
It shone with Heaven's own light!
The world could never tear it, love,
That gem of gems from me;
Yet on thy fond breast wear it, love,
It only shines for thee.
There was a bird came to my breast,
When I was very young;
I only knew that sweet bird's nest,
To me she only sung;
But, ah! one summer day, love,
I saw that bird depart:
The truant flew thy way, love,
And nestled in thy heart.

I NEVER WILL GROW OLD.

Oh, no, I never will grow old;
Though years on years roll by,
And silver o'er my dark brown hair,
And dim my laughing eye.
They shall not shrivel up my soul,
Nor dim the glance of love
My heart casts on this world of ours,
And lifts to that above!
Now, with a passion for those haunts
Where wild, free nature reigns,
With life's tide leaping through my heart
And revelling through my veins,—
'Tis hard to think the time must come
When I can seek no more,
With step bold as a mountain child's,
Deep dell and rocky shore;—
No longer on my swift young steed,
Bound o'er the hills as now,
And meet half way the winds that toss
The loose locks from my brow!
Yet still my spirit may go forth
Where fearless fancy leads,
May take at will as glorious rides,
On wild, invisible steeds!
Ye tell me as a morning dream
Shall pass away, ere long,
My humble, yet most passionate,
Adoring love of song.
No, no! life's ills may throng my way,
And pride may bend the knee,
And Hope's bright banner kiss the dust;—
But lofty Poesy

Shall fling their slavish chains aside,
And spurn their dark control;
They never, never shall lay waste
That Italy of the soul!

My father, — pleasant years may pass,
Ere his last sun shall set;
And — blessed be the God of life! —
My mother liveth yet.

My sisters blend their souls with mine,
A laughing, loving band;
A heaven-set guard along our paths,
Our six brave brothers stand.

While God thus pours the light of joy
As sunshine round my home,
O, I'll lay up such a store of loves
For the stormy days to come!

In the joy and grief of every one
I'll seek to share a part,
Till grateful thoughts and wishes foud
Come thronging to my heart.

The earnest praises of the young,
The blessings of the old, —
I'll gather them in, I'll hoard them up,
As a miser hoards his gold!

Those loves may die, yet hopeful trust
Shall leave me, fail me, never;
I will plant roses on their graves, —
Vive la jeunesse for ever!

Smile on, doubt on, say life is sad,
The world is false and cold —
I'll keep my heart glad, true, and warm, —
I never will grow old!

MY FIRST FISHING.

Please picture to yourself, my obliging reader, a tall, slender girl of thirteen, just out of short frocks, but retaining still her long, black, Kenwigian braids, having a downward look with her eyes commonly, and gifted with a

"Complexion

The shadowed livery of the burnished sun," and you have my daguerreotype at that period of my humble existence.

It was summer, and Harry came home for a vacation, accompanied by two college friends. As one of the young gentlemen was hopelessly lame, hunting was out of the question, and fishing parties on the lake took its place. Every favourable morning their boat put off the shore, and every evening they returned, famously dirty and hungry, and generally, with the exception of Harry, cursing their luck. I well recollect that, however large the party, Harry always insisted on furnishing the fishing tackle. The colonel once remonstrated with him on this extravagance, but was archly reminded, that "he who spares the rod spoils the child," and that as a good parent he should "give line upon line" as well as "precept upon precept." So the old gentleman turned laughingly away, being like all other amateur soldiers, proverbially good-natured.

Those parties were, I regret to say, made up of the sterner sex exclusively, but after Harry's friends had left, I proposed one morning that he should take cousin Alice and myself to the lake on a fishing excursion.

"Alice is quite skilful," he replied; "but do you understand angling?"

"No, but there's nothing which I cannot learn."

"Very well, my modest coz, put on your bonnet, and we will go down and practise awhile by catching small fish for bait in the old mill-pond."

The sheet of water to which my cousin referred, was nothing more than an enlargement and deepening of the stream which ran through the town. The mill which its waters once turned had been destroyed by fire, and all the fixtures, &c., fallen to decay; and Henry remarked, that as a mill-pond it was not worth a dam, but a capital place for catching bait, nevertheless. I did not smile approvingly at this profane pun, not I; but reminded the offender, with chilling dignity, that I should be full fourteen in eleven months and nine days.

After spending a half hour in initiating me into the mysteries of angling, Harry took a station farther up stream. Near me lay a small log, extending out into the pond, the top only lying above the water. Wearied at last with sitting on the bank, and catching not even a "glorious nibble," I picked my way out to the very end of this log, and cast my bait upon the waters. Presently I marked an uncommonly large "shiner" glancing about hither and thither, now and then tantalizingly turning up his glittering sides to the sunlight. My heart was in my throat. Could I manage to capture that fish by hook or by crook, it were glory enough for one day. Reader, have you ever seen a "shiner?" Is he not the most finifine dashing, dandyish, D'Orsay of the waves that ever cut a swell among "sheep-heads," or coquetted with a young trout?

The conduct of this particular fish was peculiarly provoking. It was in vain that I clad the uninviting hook in the garb of a fresh young worm, and dropped it, all quick and quivering, down before his very nose. Like a careful wooer, who fears "a take in," he would not come to the point; he had evidently dined, and, unlike the old Reformer, played shy of the Diet of Worms.

At last, as though a sudden appetite had been given him which required abatement, he caught the worm, and the hook caught him, and — and — but language fails me —

Ye may tell, oh, my sisters, in author-land, of the exquisite joy, the intoxicating bliss which whelms a maiden's heart when love's first kiss glows on her trembling lip; but give to me the rapturous exultation which coursed through every vein, and thrilled along every nerve, as my first fish bent the top of the slender cane-rod towards the water!

But, ah, the instability of human happiness! that unfortunate "shiner" was strong — very. I had just balanced myself on the rounded three inches of the log; I now saw that I must drop the rod and lose the fish, or lose my balance and win a plunge. Like a brave girl, as I flatter myself that I am, I chose the latter. Down, down I went into six feet depth of water, pertinaciously grasping the rod, which, immediately on rising, I flung with its glittering pendant, high and dry on the shore; and having given one scream, only one, went quietly down again.

Just then, Harry, who had heard my fall at first, reached the spot, plunged in, caught and bore me safely to the bank. When I had coughed the water from my throat, and wiped it from my eyes, I pointed proudly toward my captive "shiner." Alas! what did I behold! — that fish, my fish, releasing himself from the hook, and floundering back into his native element! Yes, he was gone, gone for ever, and for one dark moment,

"Naught was everything, and everything was naught."

I need not tell of our walk homeward, of the alarm and merriment which our appearance created; or how I was placed in bed and half smothered with blankets, how a nauseous compound was sent up to me, which Harry kindly quaffed, and grew ill as I grew well. All such matters can be safely left to the imagination of my intelligent reader.

I will but add, that though of late years I have angled more extensively and successfully, have flung a lucky hook into the beautiful rivers and glorious lakes of the West, and have dropped occasional lines into the waters of American literature, I have never since known that pure, young delight, that exquisite zest, that wild enthusiasm, which led me to stake all on one mad chance, and brave drowning for a "shiner."

THE INTELLECTUAL WOMAN.

The intellectual woman should be richest in "social and domestic ties," she should have along her paths a guard of friendship, and about her life a breastwork of love. True feminine genius is ever timid, doubtful, and clingingly dependent; a perpetual childhood. A true woman shrinks instinctively from greatness, and it is "against her very will and wish transgressing," and in sad obedience to an inborn and mighty influence, that she turns out the "silver lining" of her soul to the world's gaze; permits all the delicate workings of her inner-nature to be laid open; her heart passed round, and peered into as a piece of curious mechanism. In her loftiest soarings, when we almost think to see the swift play of her pinion lost in the distant heaven, even then, her wildest and most exalting strains come down to us with a delicious thrill of home-music. The radiant realms of her most celestial visions have always a ladder leading earthward. Her ways and words have nothing of the lofty and severe; over her face, sun-gleams and shadows succeed each other momentarily; her eyes are alternately dreamy and tender, and their intensest fire quivers through tears. Her lips, moulded in love, are tremulously full of the glowing softness they borrow from the heart, and electrically obedient to its impulses.

WOMAN'S HEART.

Never unsex yourself for greatness. The worship of one true heart is better than the wonder of the world. Don't trample on the flowers, while longing for the stars. Live up to the full measure of life; give way to your impulses, loves, and enthusiasms; sing, smile, labour, and be happy. Adore poetry for its own sake; yearn for, strive after, excellence; rejoice when others attain it; feel for your contemporaries a loving envy; steal into your country's heart; glory in its greatness, exult in its power; honour its gallant men, and immortalize its matchless women. Then shall that grateful country throw around you a fame which shall be like the embrace of fond arms; a joy to cheer, and a strength to support you.

There is a joy which must, I think, be far more deep and full than any which the million can bestow; one which precedes, and is independent of, the fame which sometimes results rather from the caprice than the justice of the world. This is the joy of inspiration. I have elsewhere expressed my meaning thus:—

Oh, when the heaven-born soul of song is blending
With the rapt poet's, in his burning strains,
'Tis like the wine drunk on Olympus, sending Divine intoxication through the veins!

But this is for the masters of the lyre; it can never be felt by woman with great intensity; at least, can never satisfy her. I repeat, that her well-spring of joy is in the heart.

WOMAN'S GRATITUDE.

So she did not yield to woman's amiable weakness, and love because she was loved; did not let gratitude lead her blindfold to the altar. I know I should put on gloves while handling this dear pet-fault of my sex. But, my charming sisters, why are you grateful? Just bring your every-day tenderness, your patient, fond, worshipping, self-sacrificing love; and then place man's holiday admiration, his fanciful, patronizing, exacting, doubting affection, in the opposite scale, and see in what a passion of haste they will go up. Thank a man for reading you five unacted acts from his drama, for writing an acrostic on your name, for asking an introduction to a rival belle, for saying you are surprisingly like his maiden aunt; but never for the honour of his preference. Be grateful to him for the offer of his mouchoir to hem, or his gloves to mend, but never for that of his heart and hand. In love matters, fling away gratitude; 'tis but a charity-girl sort of virtue, at the best.

THE POET'S MISSION.

One long-cherished hope of my life is, that in the world of letters, heart, the feminine spirit of man's nature, is to be exalted to the throne of intellect, and they are to reign together.

* * * * *

It is no longer enough that a poet has imagination, fancy, and passion; he must possess a genial philosophy, an unselfish sympathy, a cheerful humanity—in short, heart. And not a heart like a walled-up well, undisturbed, and holding fast its own, till some thirsty mortal, with toil and pains, draws up a draught for his fevered lips; but as a laughing, leaping fountain, flinging its living waters far and wide, creating to itself an atmosphere of freshness, and making beauty and melody its surroundings. The world will tolerate no longer an arrogant disbelief in its most cherished and sacred truths. It will waste no more of its admiring sympathy on the egotism of misanthropy, or the childishness of a sickly sentimentality: its poets must look up to heaven in faith, on the earth with love, and revel in the rich joy of existence. They must beguile us of our sorrows, and lighten us of our cares; must turn to us the sunny side of nature, and point us to the rainbows amid the storms of life: and they must no longer dare to wed vice to poetry—a lost spirit to a child of light.

COLERIDGE, SARA HENRY,

AN English poetess, daughter of the distinguished poet, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and wife of his nephew, Henry Nelson Coleridge, well known for his contributions to classical learning, and as editor of his uncle's posthumous works, has shown herself worthy of her birth-right as a "poet's daughter," and of her station as the bosom-companion of an eminent scholar.

The first work of Mrs. Coleridge was a translation of the "History of the Abipones," from the Latin of Dobrizhoffer; her next was a beautiful fairy-tale, called "Phantasmion," published in 1837, and deservedly admired as an exquisite creation of feminine genius. Besides these, she has written poems, evincing talent of no common order. A distinguished critic remarks thus, concerning her:—"With an imagination like a prism shedding rainbow changes on her thoughts, she shows study without the affectation of it, and a Greek-like closeness of expression."

From "Fugitive Pieces."

A MOTHER OVER HER CHILD DEVOTED TO DEATH.

O sleep, my babe! Hear not the rippling wave,
Nor feel the breeze that round thee lingering strays,
To drink thy balmy breath,
And sigh one long farewell.

Soon shall it mourn above thy watery bed,
And whisper to me on the wave-beat shore,
Deep murmur'ing in reproach
Thy sad, untimely fate.

Ere those dear eyes had opened on the light,
In vain to plead, thy coming life was sold,
O! wakened but to sleep,
Whence it can wake no more!

A thousand and a thousand silken leaves
The tufted beach unfolds in early spring
All clad in tenderest green,
All of the self-same shape;

A thousand infant faces, soft and sweet,
Each year sends forth, yet every mother views
Her last, not least, beloved
Like its dear self alone.

No musing mind hath ever yet foreshaped
The face to-morrow's sun shall first reveal,
No heart hath e'er conceived
What love that face will bring.

O sleep, my babe! nor heed how mourns the gale
To part with thy soft locks and fragrant breath,
As when it deeply sighs
O'er autumn's latest bloom.

LOVE.

One face alone, one face alone,
These eyes require;
But when that longed-for sight is shown,
What fatal fire
Shoots thro' my veins a keen and liquid flame
That melts each fibre of my wasting frame!

One voice alone, one voice alone,
I pine to hear;
But when its meek, mellifluous tone
Usurps mine ear,
Those slavish chains about my soul are wound,
Which ne'er, till death itself, can be unbound.

One gentle hand, one gentle hand,
I fain would hold;
But when it seems at my command,
My own grows cold;
Then low to earth I bend in sickly swoon
Like lilies drooping 'mid the blaze of noon

COOK, ELIZA,

Is deservedly distinguished for her poetical productions, which are popular with "the people" everywhere in our American nation as in her own country, England. Miss Cook resides in London; her childhood and youth were passed partly in Southwark, where her father, a calker by trade, resided, and partly in the country. She was the "youngling of the flock" by eleven years, and, like a babe born out of due season, was tenderly cherished by her excellent mother, whose character, disciplined by suffering, seems to have exerted a great and beneficial influence over her gifted child.

The death of this beloved mother, when Miss Cook was about fifteen, left her in that heart-desolation which is the ordeal of woman's character, often developing new talents and energies, chastening the spirit of youthful hope for its tasks of duty, and thus, by exalting her aims in life, such sorrows serve to kindle the torch of her genius. It was thus with Miss Cook. Her home, after her beloved mother was withdrawn, was neither pleasant nor happy, and the young girl was compelled to find in intellectual pursuits her means of contentment. She gave expression to her earnest thoughts and generous feelings: the language seems to have flowed spontaneously in rhyme, for there is hardly a trace of labour or study in her poetry. But there is that which is for a woman, perhaps, better than classical learning; as an elegant critic has well observed—"There is a heartiness and truthful sympathy with human kind, a love of freedom and of nature, in this lady's productions which, more even than their grace and melody, charms her readers. She writes like a whole-souled woman, earnestly and unaffectedly, evidently giving her actual thoughts, but never transcending the limits of taste or delicacy. The favour with which her numerous pieces have been received, and the ease with which she writes, encourage us to hope for much future delight and instruction from her generous pen. It may be hoped, also, that she will take more pains in the finishing of her verses, than she has hitherto done, and avoid a repetition of ideas, a fault to which she is somewhat prone."

The closing remark is not without reason. Miss Cook has hitherto written exclusively for the class in which she was born, the people; but so, also, did Burns; yet he studied his art, and thus elevated the lowliest subject he sung by the flower-breath of true poesy, whose course is always upward. We allude to the "Rural Bard," because we think Miss Cook resembles him in her ardent philanthropy of soul, and in its direction: her love of the virtues and enjoyments of humble English life, as he sung of his "Old Scotia." She is far more fortunate than was poor Burns, for she gathers not only praise but large profits from her writings, and enjoys her own popularity, probably the greatest, counting by the number of those who read rhyme, of any living female poet.

Miss Cook's poetry began to appear in various London journals about 1836. In 1839, an American poetess, Mrs. Osgood, met Miss Cook in London, and thus describes her—"Eliza Cook is just what her noble poetry would lead you to imagine her; a frank, generous, brave, and warm-hearted girl, about twenty years of age; rather stout and sturdy looking, with a face not handsome but very intelligent. Her hair is black, and very luxuriant, her eyes grey and full of expression, and her mouth indubitably sweet."

In 1840, the poems of Miss Cook were collected and republished in London, under the title of "Melaia, and other Poems." The beautiful volume was soon republished in New York; and, with many additions from the fertile mind of the author, these poems have passed through a variety of editions both in England and America.

In September, 1849, the poetess made her appearance in a new character, as editor of a work, styled "Eliza Cook's Journal," published weekly, in London. The introductory paper from her pen, has some remarks which so clearly describe the feelings of this interesting and noble-minded woman, that we must give them, while thanking her for this daguerreotype sketch of her inner-self.—She says—"I have been too long known by those whom I address, to feel strange in addressing them. My earliest rhymes, written from intuitive impulse, before hackneyed experience or politic judgment could dictate their tendency, were accepted and responded to by those whose good word is a 'tower of strength.' The first active breath of nature that swept over my heart-strings, awoke wild but earnest melodies, which I dotted down in simple notes; and when I found that others thought the tune worth learning—when I heard my strains hummed about the sacred altars of domestic firesides, and saw old men, bright women, and young children scanning my ballad strains, then was I made to think that my burning desire to pour out my soul's measure of music was given for a purpose. My young bosom throbbed with rapture, for my feelings had met with responsive echoes from honest and genuine Humanity, and the glory of heaven seemed partially revealed, when I discovered that I held power over the affections of earth.

* * * *

"I am anxious to give my feeble aid to the gigantic struggle for intellectual elevation now going on, and fling my energies and will into a cause where my heart will zealously animate my duty.

"It is too true, that there are dense clouds of Ignorance yet to be dissipated—huge mountains of Error yet to be removed; but, there is a stirring development of progressive mind in 'the mass,' which only requires steady and free communion with Truth to expand itself into that enlightened and practical wisdom on which ever rests the perfection of social and political civilization; and I believe that all who work in the field of Literature with sincere desire to serve the many by arousing generous sympathies and educational tastes, need make little profession of their service, for 'the people' have sufficient perception to thoroughly estimate those who are truly 'with' and 'for' them."

From "Melaia."

SILENCE.

The whirling blast, the breaker's dash,
The snapping ropes, the parting crash,
The sweeping waves that boil and lash,
The stunning peal, the hissing flash,
The hasty prayer, the hopeless groan,
The stripling sea-boy's gurgling tone,
Shrieking amid the flood and foam,
The names of mother, love, and home,
The jarring clash that wakes the land,
When, blade to blade, and hand to hand,
Unnumbered voices burst and swell,
In one unceasing war-whoop yell;
The tramp of discord ringing out,
The clamour strife, the victor shout;—
Oh! these are noises any ear
Will dread to meet and quail to hear;
But let the earth or waters pour
The loudest din or wildest roar;
Let Anarchy's broad thunders roll,
And Tumult do its worst to thrill,
There is a silence to the soul
More awful, and more startling still.

To hear our very breath intrude
Upon the boundless solitude,
Where mortal tidings never come,
With busy feet or human hum;
All hushed above, beneath, around—
No stirring form, no whispered sound;—
This is a loneliness that falls
Upon the spirit, and appals
More than the mingled rude alarms
Arising from a world in arms.

This is a silence bids us shrink,
As from a precipice's brink;
But ye will rarely meet it, save
In the hot desert, or cold grave.
Cut off from life and fellow-men,
This silence was around me then.

BUTTERCUPS AND DAISIES.

I never see a young hand hold
The starry bunch of white and gold,
But something warm and fresh will start
About the region of my heart
My smile expires into a sigh;
I feel a struggling in the eye,
"Twixt humid drop and sparkling ray,
Till rolling tears have won their way;
For soul and brain will travel back
Through memory's chequered mazes,
To days when I but trod life's track
For buttercups and daisies.

Tell me, ye men of wisdom rare,
Of sober speech and silver hair,
Who carry counsel, wise and sage,
With all the gravity of age;
Oh! say, do ye not like to hear
The accents ringing in your ear,
When sportive urchins laugh and shout,
Tossing those precious flowers about,
Springing with bold and gleesome bound,
Proclaiming joy that crazes,
And chorusing the magic sound
Of buttercups and daisies?

Are there, I ask, beneath the sky
Blossoms that knit so strong a tie
With childhood's love? Can any please
Or light the infant eye like these?
No, no; there's not a bud on earth,
Of richest tint or warmest birth,
Can ever fling such zeal and zest
Into the tiny hand and breast.
Who does not recollect the hours
When burning words and praises
Were lavished on those shining flowers,
Buttercups and daisies?

There seems a bright and fairy spell
About their very names to dwell;
And though old Time has marked my brow
With care and thought, I love them now.
Smile, if ye will, but some heart-strings
Are closest linked to simplest things;
And these wild flowers will hold mine fast,
Till love, and life, and all be past;
And then the only wish I have
Is, that the one who raises
The turf-sod o'er me, plant my grave
With buttercups and daisies.

A LOVE SONG.

Dear Kate, I do not swear and vow,
Or sigh sweet things, as many can;
But though my lip ne'er plays the slave,
My heart will not disgrace the man.
I prize thee — ay, my bonny Kate,
So firmly fond this breast can be,
That I would brook the sternest fate
If it but left me health and thee.

I do not promise that our life
Shall know no shade on heart or brow;
For human lot and mortal strife
Would mock the falsehood of such vow.
But when the clouds of pain and care
Shall teach us we are not divine,
My deepest sorrows thou shalt share,
And I will strive to lighten thine.

We love each other, yet perchance
The murmurs of dissent may rise;
Fierce words may chase the tender glance,
And angry flashes light our eyes.
But we must learn to check the frown,
To reason rather than to blame;
The wisest have their faults to own,
And you and I, girl, have the same.

You must not like me less, my Kate,
For such an earnest strain as this;
I love thee dearly, but I hate
The puling rhymes of "kiss" and "bliss."
There's truth in all I've said or sung;
I woo thee as a man should woo;
And though I lack a honied tongue,
Thou'lt never find a breast more true.

I MISS THEE, MY MOTHER.

I miss thee, my mother! Thy image is still
The deepest impressed on my heart,
And the tablet so faithful in death must be chill
Ere a line of that image depart.
Thou wert torn from my side when I treasured thee most —
When my reason could measure thy worth;
When I knew but too well that the idol I'd lost
Could be never replaced upon earth.

I miss thee, my mother, in circles of joy,
Where I've mingled with rapturous zest;
For how slight is the touch that will serve to destroy
All the fairy-web spun in my breast!
Some melody sweet may be floating around —
'Tis a ballad I learnt at thy knee;
Some strain may be played, and I shrink from the sound,
For my fingers oft woke it for thee.

I miss thee, my mother; when young health has fled,
And I sink in the languor of pain,
Where, where is the arm that once pillowed my head,
And the ear that once heard me complain?
Other hands may support, gentle accents may fall —
For the fond and the true are yet mine:
I've a blessing for each; I am grateful to all —
But whose care can be soothing as thine?

I miss thee, my mother, in summer's fair day,
When I rest in the ivy-wreathed bower,
When I hang thy pet linnet's cage high on the spray,
Or gaze on thy favourite flower.
There's the bright gravel-path where I played by thy side
When time had scarce wrinkled thy brow,
Where I carefully led thee with worshipping pride
When thy scanty locks gathered the snow.

I miss thee, my mother, in winter's long night:
I remember the tales thou wouldst tell —
The romance of wild fancy, the legend of fright —
Oh! who could e'er tell them so well?
Thy corner is vacant; thy chair is removed:
It was kind to take that from my eye:
Yet relics are round me — the sacred and loved —
To call up the pure sorrow-fed sigh.

I miss thee, my mother! Oh, when do I not?
Though I know 'twas the wisdom of Heaven
That the deepest shade fell on my sunniest spot,
And such tie of devotion was riven;
For when thou wert with me my soul was below,
I was chained to the world I then trod;
My affections, my thoughts, were all earth-bound; but now
They have followed thy spirit to God!

OH! NEVER BREATHE A DEAD ONE'S NAME.

Oh! never breathe a dead one's name
When those who loved that one are nigh;
It pours a lava through the frame
That chokes the breast and fills the eye;
It strains a chord that yields too much
Of piercing anguish in its breath;
And hands of mercy should not touch
A string made eloquent by death.

Oh! never breathe a lost one's name
To those who called that one their own:
It only stirs the smouldering flame
That burns upon a charnel-stone.
The head will ache and well-nigh break
To miss that one for ever fled;
And lips of mercy should not wake
A love that cherishes the dead.

THE FREE.

The wild streams leap with headlong sweep
In their curbless course o'er the mountain steep,
All fresh and strong they foam along,
Waking the rocks with their cataract song.
My eye bears a glance like the beam on a lance
While I watch the waters dash and dance;
I burn with glee, for I love to see
The path of anything that's free.

The skylark springs with dew on his wings,
And up in the arch of heaven he sings
Trill-la, trill-la — oh, sweeter far
Than the notes that come through a golden bar
The joyous bay of a hound at play,
The caw of a rook on its homeward way —
Oh! these shall be the music for me,
For I love the voices of the free.

The deer starts by with his antlers high,
Proudly tossing his head to the sky;
The barb runs the plain unbroke by the rein,
With steaming nostrils and flying mane;
The clouds are stirred by the eaglet bird,
As the flap of its swooping pinion is heard.
Oh! these shall be the creatures for me,
For my soul was formed to love the free.

The mariner brave, in his bark on the wave,
May laugh at the walls round a kingly slave;
And the one whose lot is the desert spot
Has no dread of an envious foe in his cot.
The thrall and state at the palace-gate
Are what my spirit has learnt to hate;
Oh! the hills shall be a home for me,
For I'd leave a throne for the hut of the free.

THE CLOUDS.

Beautiful clouds! I have watched ye long,
Fickle and bright as a fairy throng;
Now ye have gathered golden beams,
Now ye are parting in silver streams,
Now ye are tinged with a roseate blush,
Deepening fast to a crimson flush;
Now, like aerial sprites at play,
Ye are lightly dancing another way;
Melting in many a pearly flake,
Like the cygnet's down on the azure lake;
Now ye gather again, and run
To bask in the blaze of a setting sun;
And anon ye serve as Zephyr's car,
Flitting before the evening star.

Now ye ride in mighty form,
With the arms of a giant, to nurse the storm;
Ye grasp the lightning, and fling it on earth,
All flashing and wild as a maniac's mirth;
Ye cavern the thunder, and bravely it roars,
While the forest groans, and the avalanche pours;
Ye launch the torrent with headlong force,
Till the rivers hiss in their boiling course;
Ye come, and your trophies are scattered around
In the wreck on the waters, the oak on the ground.
Oh! where is the eye that doth not love
The glorious phantoms that glide above?
That hath not looked on the realms of air
With wondering soul and bursting prayer?
Oh! where is the spirit that hath not bowed
To its God at the shrine of a passing cloud?

HALLOWED BE THY NAME.

List to the dreamy tone that dwells
In rippling wave or sighing tree;
Go, hearken to the old church bells,
The whistling bird, the whizzing bee.
Interpret right, and ye will find
'Tis "power and glory" they proclaim:
The chimes, the creatures, waters, wind,
All publish, "hallowed be thy name!"

The pilgrim journeys till he bleeds,
To gain the altar of his sires;
The hermit pores above his beads,
With zeal that never wanes nor tires;
But holiest rite or longest prayer
That soul can yield or wisdom frame,
What better import can it bear
Than, "FATHER! hallowed be thy name!"

The savage kneeling to the sun,
To give his thanks or ask a boon;
The raptures of the idiot one
Who laughs to see the clear round moon;
The saint well taught in Christian lore;
The Moslem prostrate at his flame —
All worship, wonder, and adore;
Ah end in, "hallowed be thy name!"

Whate'er may be man's faith or creed,
Those precious words comprise it still:
We trace them on the bloomy mead,
We hear them in the flowing rill.
One chorus lauds the Great Supreme,
Each varied breathing tells the same.
The strains may differ; but the theme
Is, "FATHER! hallowed be thy name!"

THROUGH THE WATERS.

Through the forest, through the forest, oh! who would not like to roam,
Where the squirrel leaps right gaily and the shy fawn makes a home;
Where branches, spreading high and wide, shut out the golden sun,
And hours of noontide steal away all shadowy and dun?
'Tis sweet to pluck the ivy sprigs or seek the hidden nest,
To track the spot where owlets hide, and wild deer take their rest;
Through the forest, through the forest, oh, 'tis passing sweet to take
Our lonely way 'mid springy moss, thick bush, and tangled brake.

Through the valley, through the valley, where the glittering harebells peep,
Where laden bees go droning by, and hum themselves to sleep;
Where all that's bright with bloom and light springs forth
to greet the day,
And every blade pours incense to the warm and cloudless
ray;
Where children come to laugh away their happy summer
hours,
To chase the downy butterfly, or crown themselves with flowers;
Through the valley, through the valley, oh! who does not like to bask
Amid the fairest beauties Heaven can give or man can ask?

Through the desert, through the desert, where the Arab takes his course,
With none to bear him company except his gallant horse;
Where none can question will or right, where landmarks
ne'er impede,
But all is wide and limitless to rider and to steed.
No purling streamlet murmurs there, no chequered shadows fall;
'Tis torrid, waste, and desolate, but free to each and all.
Through the desert, through the desert! Oh, the Arab would not change
For purple robes or olive-trees his wild and burning range.

Through the waters, through the waters, ah! be this the joy
for me,
Upon the flowing river or the broad and dashing sea;
Of all that wealth could offer me the choicest boon I'd crave
Would be a bold and sturdy bark upon the open wave.
I love to see the wet sails fill before the whistling breath,
And feel the ship cleave on, as though she spurned the flood beneath.
Through the waters, through the waters, can ye tell me what below
Is freer than the wind-lashed main, or swifter than the proa?

I love to see the merry craft go running on her side;
I laugh to see her splashing on before the rapid tide;
I love to mark the white and hissing foam come boiling up,
Fresh as the froth that hangs about the Thunderer's nectar cup.

All sail away: ah! who would stay to pace the dusty land
If once they trod a gallant ship, steered by a gallant band.
Through the waters, through the waters, oh! there's not a joy for me

Like racing with the gull upon a broad and dashing sea!

STANZAS TO THE YOUNG.

Long have the wisest lips confessed
That minstrel ones are far from wrong
Who "point a moral" in a jest,
Or yield a sermon in a song.

So be it! Listen ye who will,
And, though my harp be roughly strung,
Yet never shall its lightest thrill
Offend the old or taint the young.

Mark me! I ne'er presume to teach
The man of wisdom, grey and sage:
'Tis to the growing I would preach
From moral text and mentor page.

First, I would bid thee cherish truth,
As leading star in virtue's train:
Folly may pass, nor tarnish youth,
But falsehood leaves a poison stain.

Keep watch, nor let the burning tide
Of impulse break from all control:
The best of hearts needs pilot-guide
To steer it clear from error's shoal.

One wave of passion's boiling flood
May all the sea of life disturb;
And steeds of good but fiery blood
Will rush on death without a curb.

Think on the course ye fain would run,
And moderate the wild desire;
There's many a one would drive the sun,
Only to set the world on fire.

Slight not the one of honest worth,
Because no star adorns his breast:
The lark soars highest from the earth,
Yet ever leaves the lowest nest.

Heed but the bearing of a tree,
And if it yield a wholesome fruit
A shallow, envious fool is he
Who spurns it for its forest root.

Let fair humanity be thine,
To fellow-man and meanest brute:
'Tis nobly taught; the code's divine —
Mercy is God's chief attribute.

The coward wretch whose hand and heart
Can bear to torture aught below,
Is ever first to quail and start
From slightest pain or equal foe.

Be not too ready to condemn
The wrong thy brothers may have done;
Ere ye too harshly censure them
For human faults, ask — "Have I none?"

Live that thy young and glowing breast
Can think of death without a sigh;
And be assured that life is best
Which finds us least afraid to die

WASHINGTON.

Land of the West! though passing brief the record of thine age,

Thou hast a name that darkens all on history's wide page!
Let all the blasts of fame ring out — thine shall be loudest far:

Let others boast their satellites — thou hast the planet star.

Thou hast a name whose characters of light shall ne'er depart;

'Tis stamped upon the dullest brain, and warms the coldest heart;

A war-cry fit for any land where freedom's to be won.

Land of the west! it stands alone — it is thy Washington!

Rome had its Cæsar, great and brave; but stain was on his wreath:

He lived the heartless conqueror, and died the tyrant's death.

France had its Eagle; but his wings, though lofty they might soar,

Were spread in false ambition's flight, and dipped in murder's gore.

Those hero-gods, whose mighty sway would fain have chained the waves —

Who fleshed their blades with tiger zeal, to make a world of slaves —

Who, though their kindred barred the path, still fiercely waded on —

Oh, where shall be their "glory" by the side of Washington?

He fought, but not with love of strife; he struck but to defend;

And ere he turned a people's foe, he sought to be a friend.

He strove to keep his country's right by reason's gentle word,

And sighed when fell injustice threw the challenge — sword to sword.

He stood the firm, the calm, the wise, the patriot and sage;
He showed no deep, avenging hate — no burst of despot rage.

He stood for liberty and truth, and dauntlessly led on,

Till shouts of victory gave forth the name of Washington.

No car of triumph bore him through a city filled with grief;
No groaning captives at the wheels proclaimed him victor chief:

He broke the gyves of slavery with strong and high disdain,
And cast no sceptre from the links when he had crushed the chain.

He saved his land, but did not lay his soldier trappings down
To change them for the regal vest, and don a kingly crown.
Fame was too earnest in her joy — too proud of such a son —
To let a robe and title mask a noble Washington.

England, my heart is truly thine — my loved, my native earth! —

The land that holds a mother's grave, and gave that mother birth!

Oh, keenly sad would be the fate that thrust me from thy shore,

And faltering my breath, that sighed, "Farewell for evermore!"

But did I meet such adverse lot, I would not seek to dwell
Where olden heroes wrought the deeds for Homer's song to tell.

Away, thou gallant ship! I'd cry, and bear me swiftly on:
But bear me from my own fair land to that of Washington.

THE LAST GOOD-BYE.

Farewell! Farewell! is often heard

From the lips of those who part:

'T is a whispered tone, 't is a gentle word,

But it springs not from the heart.

It may serve for the lover's lay,

To be sung 'neath a summer sky;

But give me the lips that say

The honest words, "Good-bye!"

Adieu! Adieu! may greet the ear

In the guise of courtly speech;

But when we leave the kind and dear,

'T is not what the soul would teach.

Whene'er we grasp the hands of those

We would have for ever nigh,

The flame of friendship burns and glows

In the warm, frank words, "Good-bye!"

The mother sending forth her child

To meet with cares and strife,

Breathes through her tears her doubts and fears

For the loved one's future life.

No cold "adieu," no "farewell," lives
 Within her choking sighs;
 But the deepest sob of anguish gives,
 "God bless thee, boy!—good-bye!"

Go, watch the pale and dying one,
 When the glance has lost its beam—
 When the brow is cold as the marble stone,
 And the world a passing dream;
 And the latest pressure of the hand,
 The look of the closing eye,
 Yield what the heart must understand—
 A long, a last "Good-bye."

COUTTS, ANGELA GEORGINA BURDETT,

Is distinguished as possessing more wealth than any other private woman in the world; and a far higher distinction is hers also, that she is using her immense riches in the noblest works of charity.

Miss Burdett Coutts is the youngest daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, Bart., late of Bramcote, county of Warwick, a philanthropist and reformer, whose political career is well known; her mother was Sophia, youngest daughter of Thomas Coutts, Esq., the opulent banker of the Strand. The family of Burdett, enriched by alliances with the houses of Camville of Arrow, Bruin of Bramcote, and Fraunceys of Foremark, can be traced to one of the soldiers of the Conquest. But whatever the ancestry of Miss Burdett Coutts might have been, it can confer no honour on her name so noble as do her own benevolent deeds. She was born April 25th, 1814, and carefully trained in those religious sentiments which develop the best faculties of the female mind. She was not educated as an expectant heiress, because her grandfather's marriage with Miss Mellon,* the actress, and his gift by will of his whole fortune to this, comparatively, young wife, must have deprived his children of any expectancy from the step-mother, who subsequently married the young Duke of St. Albans. But the amiable, interesting and affectionate Angela Burdett, was ever a favourite with her step-grandmother; and as the latter had no children or near relations of her own, she justly determined the fortune she had received from her first husband, should return to his family, and wisely selected the youthful Angela Georgina Burdett, as her heiress. One condition only was annexed to the possession of this vast property—that the heiress should assume the additional surname and arms of Coutts, which, by royal license was permitted. In September, 1837, the subject of our sketch took the style and surname, and came into possession of her fortune; she was then twenty-three years of age. The few simple facts we have narrated, strikingly illustrate the differences in the masculine and feminine nature. Harriet Mellon, the self-educated actress, was far more disinterested, more generous, more just, than either of her two husbands,—one versed in all the knowledge of the world of business, the other born to high rank, and educated in a nobleman's notions of honour and morality; and that this great wealth, accumulated by the elder Coutts, is now in the hands of a woman, should be a subject of thankfulness to all who wish the advancement of piety, morality, and Christian education among the people.

Since Miss Burdett Coutts came into possession of her fortune, she has been indefatigable in her works of benevolence. Besides her private charities, which are innumerable, she has given largely for missionary purposes; to assist religious societies; endowed the see of a bishopric in Adelaide, South Australia; and bestowed thirty thousand pounds sterling to build and endow a church, with parsonage-house and schools in Westminster, London! Who, among all the living noble and rich men of England, has done deeds of disinterested benevolence to be compared with these? A woman is now the leader of British charities; and the name of Miss Burdett Coutts is honoured throughout the Christian world.

An interesting account of the ceremonies attendant on laying the foundation-stone of this new church was given in a London paper. The site was Rochester-Row, selected by the Bishop of London, in one of the most densely populated portions of the city and liberties. Tuesday, the 20th of July, 1847, was fixed for the ceremonies. The site was enclosed, and accommodations were prepared for spectators. "Before two o'clock, the appointed hour, several galleries were occupied, and ladies were accommodated with seats on the platform, whereon were made the requisite arrangements for laying the stone, suspended from a truck, travelling along an elevated tramway. At two o'clock, the several authorities engaged in the ceremony entered the inclosure in procession, preceded by the officials, bearing their silver staves. Amongst those present were, Miss Angela Burdett Coutts (who was accompanied by Lady King, Lady Antrobus, Miss Burdett, and Mrs. Ramsden;) the Lord Bishop of London, the Lord Bishop of Oxford; Earl Brownlow, Lord Sandom, M. P., Lord Ashley: the Very Rev. Dr. Buckland, Dean of Westminster; the Venerable John Sinclair, M. A., Archdeacon of Middlesex; the Rev. Lord John Thynne, M. A., Canon of Westminster: the Venerable Archdeacon Bentinck; Foster Owen, Esq., High Constable of Westminster; the Right Rev. Dr. Short, Bishop of Adelaide, South Australia, (the new see endowed by Miss Coutts;) the Lord Bishop of Tasmania; Sir Frederick Trench, Col. Sturt; the Rev. Edward Repton, M. A., Canon of Westminster, and a large number of clergy.

"The general arrangements were under the superintendence of the High Constable, and were very satisfactory. A large concourse of persons had assembled in the neighbourhood; and the walls and house-tops, commanding a view of the ceremony, were fringed with spectators.

"The appointed office was read by the Bishop of London, and three of the Canons of the Abbey Church of Westminster. It consisted of the 84th Psalm, the Lord's Prayer, and the following Collect:—

'Almighty God, whom the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain, who yet vouchsafest to dwell with thy Church upon earth; look down with thy favour upon us, thine unworthy servants, who are now about to lay the foundation of a house, to be dedicated to thy service, and to the glory of thy Holy Name; through Jesus Christ our Lord, who liveth and reigneth with Thee, in the unity of the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.'

"The bottle of coins, &c., and the inscription-plate, being placed within the stone, Miss Coutts spread the mortar with an elegant silver trowel; the stone was then lowered from the tramway, and it being adjusted, the Founder said, 'We place this Foundation Stone in faith and hope, to the glory of God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.' Miss Coutts then slightly struck the stone thrice with the mallet.

"A hymn was next sung by the children of the Grey Coat, Green Coat, Blue Coat, and Emery Hill's Schools.

"The singing of this hymn, the spectators being uncovered, had a very impressive effect.

"A Psalm and three other Prayers and Collects were then read; and the Bishop of London addressed the assembly at some length, dwelling on the pious munificence of the lady who had so handsomely contributed to the provision of spiritual instruction through the instrumentality of the Church, in that densely populated district. Miss Coutts's father (Sir Francis Burdett) had represented that ancient city in Parliament during a course of thirty years, and this new Church would serve to perpetuate his memory. The ancient parish churches and cathedrals had been reared through the Christian liberality of benevolent individuals, but none, he regretted to say, had of late years been equal to the work they were now commencing, and he trusted it would be one of those bright examples which would redound to the strength of the Church and the ultimate security of the country.

"The Bishop then pronounced the Blessing; 'God save the Queen' was sung, and the congregation dispersed; three cheers being given as they retired from the platform."

The church will accommodate one thousand persons; the two schools educate four hundred children, two hundred and thirty boys and one hundred and seventy girls. In the present low state of popular education in England, we look upon these schools as calculated to produce more benefit to the cause of morality and true piety, than will be done by the preacher in the church. We wish, however, that the relative proportion between the sexes of the pupils had been reversed, for we believe the education of female children more important than that of boys. If the mother has been instructed, she will impart whatever she has learned to her children; the father uses his knowledge more for his own benefit. Popular education has been so utterly neglected by the English government, that there are now, it is calculated, nearly eight millions of persons in England and Wales, who do not know how to read! The larger proportion of the neglected is females. To instruct these poor, ignorant women and girls till they can read, and place a copy of the Bible in every family, would be the greatest boon human philanthropy could confer on the British nation.

Miss Burdett Coutts has now in her keeping a power of doing good, which an angel might joyfully leave the mansions of bliss to wield. To provide the means of education for her own sex, seems the special privilege entrusted to her. Normal schools, for the training of female teachers, are wanted in England, as the preparatory step to popular education; male teachers are not fitted by nature to have the care of children; and never will universal education be enjoyed, till women are the instructors of the young.

CROWE, CATHARINE,

Whose maiden name was Stevens, was born at Borough Green, in the county of Kent, England. She married Lt. Colonel Crowe, of the British army. She has one child—a son; the family reside chiefly at Edinburgh, or in the neighbourhood. Her published books are pretty numerous, and she has written much for the periodicals and other serials, within the last ten years. One only of her works has been reprinted in America,—"The Night-Side of Nature,"—celebrated for the undeniable evidence it affords of the belief of Mrs. Crowe in "those things" which the philosophy of schools does not teach as abstract truths—namely, the belief in dreams, omens, wraiths, ghosts, and other transcendental matters pertaining to the world of spirits. Her writings have attracted considerable attention among the learned, and attained, as might have been expected, a wide popularity among those who like to read ghost-stories, though stoutly denying any belief in such nonsense. The term, "Night-Side of Nature," Mrs. Crowe explains as being borrowed from the German, signifying "that side of a planet which is turned from the sun; and during this interval, external objects loom upon us but strangely and imperfectly: the Germans draw a parallel between these vague and misty perceptions and the similar obscure and uncertain glimpses we get of that veiled department of nature, of which, whilst comprising, as it does, the solution of questions concerning us more nearly than any other, we are yet in a state of entire and wilful ignorance."

The principal works of Mrs. Crowe are:—“Susan Hopley,” “Lilly Dawson,” “Manorial Rights,” and “Aristodemus,” a tragedy. But the “Night-Side of Nature” is her great work, and had she done as the Sibyl of old, burnt two-thirds of her matter, the book would have been much more valued. The truth is, so many foolish, inconsistent, and useless examples of preternatural appearances and warnings are given, that the reader, even though a little inclined to believe there may be more things in heaven and earth than philosophy has explained, will yet become disgusted with the trivial scenes in which these spiritual influences are represented as chiefly engaged. A few selections will best show the character of the work and bias of the author.

From “The Night-Side of Nature.”

THE FUTURE THAT AWAITS US.

In all ages of the world, and in all parts of it, mankind have earnestly desired to learn the fate that awaited them when they had “shuffled off this mortal coil;” and those pretending to be their instructors have built up different systems, which have stood in the stead of knowledge, and more or less satisfied the bulk of the people. The interest on this subject is, at the present period, in the most highly civilized portions of the globe, less than it has been at any preceding one. The great proportion of us live for this world alone, and think very little of the next; we are in too great a hurry of pleasure or business to bestow any time on a subject of which we have such vague notions. Notions so vague, that, in short, we can scarcely, by any effort of the imagination, bring the idea home to ourselves; and when we are about to die, we are seldom in a situation to do more than resign ourselves to what is inevitable, and blindly meet our fate; whilst, on the other hand, what is generally called the religious world, is so engrossed by its struggles for power or money, or by its sectarian disputes and enmities, and so narrowed and circumscribed by dogmatic orthodoxies, that it has neither inclination nor liberty to turn back or look around, and endeavour to gather up, from past records and present observation, such hints as are now and again dropt in our path, to give us an intimation of what the truth may be. The rationalistic age, too, out of which we are only just emerging, and which succeeded one of gross superstition, having settled, beyond appeal, that there never was such a thing as a ghost—that the dead never do come back to tell us the secrets of their prison-house—and that nobody believes such idle tales but children and old women, seemed to have shut the door against the only channel through which any information could be sought. Revelation tells us very little on this subject, reason can tell us nothing; and if nature is equally silent, or if we are to be deterred from questioning her from the fear of ridicule, there is certainly no resource left for us but to rest contented in our ignorance; and each wait till the awful secret is disclosed to ourselves. A great many things have been pronounced untrue and absurd, and even impossible, by the highest authorities in the age in which they lived, which have afterwards, and, indeed, within a very short period, been found to be both possible and true. I confess myself, for one, to have no respect whatever for these dogmatic denials and affirmations, and I am quite of opinion that vulgar incredulity is a much more contemptible thing than vulgar credulity. We know very little of what is, and still less of what may be; and till a thing has been proved by induction logically impossible, we have no right whatever to pronounce that it is so. As I have said before, a priori conclusions are perfectly worthless; and the sort of investigation that is bestowed upon subjects of the class of which I am treating, something worse; inasmuch as they deceive the timid and the ignorant, and that very numerous class which pins its faith on authority, and never ventures to think for itself, by an assumption of wisdom and knowledge, which, if examined and analyzed, would very frequently prove to be nothing more respectable than obstinate prejudice and rash assertion.

DREAMS.

A gentleman, who resided near one of the Scottish lakes, dreamt that he saw a number of persons surrounding a body, which had just been drawn out of the water. On approaching the spot, he perceives that it is himself, and the assistants are his own friends and retainers. Alarmed at the life-like reality of the vision, he resolved to elude the threatened destiny by never venturing on the lake again. On one occasion, however, it became quite indispensable that he should do so; and, as the day was quite calm, he yielded to the necessity, on condition that he should be put ashore at once on the opposite side, whilst the rest of the party proceeded to their destination, where he would meet them. This was accordingly done: the boat skimmed gaily over the smooth waters, and arrived safely at the rendezvous, the gentlemen laughing at the superstition of their companion, whilst he stood smiling on the bank to receive them. But, alas! the fates were inexorable: the little promontory that supported him had been undermined by the water; it gave way beneath his feet, and life was extinct before he could be rescued. This circumstance was related to me by a friend of the family.

PRESENTIMENT.

One of the most remarkable cases of presentiment I know, is that which occurred, not very long since, on board one of her Majesty's ships, when lying off Portsmouth. The officers being one day at the mess-table, a young Lieutenant P—— suddenly laid down his knife and fork, pushed away his plate, and turned extremely pale. He then rose from the table, covering his face with his hands, and retired from the room. The president of the mess, supposing him to be ill, sent one of the young men to inquire what was the matter. At first, M. P. was unwilling to speak; but on being pressed, he confessed that he had been seized by a sudden and irresistible impression that a brother he had then in India was dead. "He died," said he, "on the 12th of August, at six o'clock; I am perfectly certain of it!" No arguments could overthrow this conviction, which, in due course of post, was verified to the letter. The young man had died at Cawnpore, at the precise period mentioned.

APPARITIONS.

A maid-servant, in one of the midland counties of England, being up early one morning, heard her name called in a voice that seemed to be her brother's, a sailor, then at sea; and running up, she found him standing in the hall; he said he was come from afar, and was going again, and mentioned some other things, when her mistress, hearing voices, called to know who she was talking to; she said it was her brother, from sea. After speaking to her for some time, she suddenly lost sight of him, and found herself alone. Amazed and puzzled, she told her mistress what had happened, who being thus led to suspect the kind of visitor it was, looked out of the window to ascertain if there were any marks of footsteps, the ground being covered with snow. There were, however, none; and it was therefore clear that nobody could have entered the house. Intelligence afterwards arrived of the young man's death.

TROUBLED SPIRITS.

There is an old saying, that we should never lie down to rest at enmity with any human being; and the story of the ghost of the Princess Anna of Saxony, who appeared to Duke Christian of Saxe-Eisenburg, is strongly confirmatory of the wisdom of this axiom.

Duke Christian was sitting one morning in his study, when he was surprised by a knock at his door—an unusual circumstance, since the guards, as well as the people in waiting, were always in the ante-room. He, however, cried, "Come in!" When there entered, to his amazement, a lady in an ancient costume, who, in answer to his inquiries, told him that she was no evil spirit, and would do him no harm, but that she was one of his ancestors, and had been the wife of Duke John Casimer of Saxe-Coburg. She then related that she and her husband had not been on good terms at the period of their deaths, and that although she had sought a reconciliation, he had been inexorable, pursuing her with unmitigated hatred, and injuring her by unjust suspicions; and that, consequently, although she was happy, he was still wandering in cold and darkness, betwixt time and eternity. She had, however, long known that one of their descendants was destined to effect this reconciliation for them, and they were rejoiced to find the time for it had at length arrived. She then gave the duke eight days to consider if he were willing to perform this good office, and disappeared; whereupon he consulted a clergyman, in whom he had great confidence, who, after finding the ghost's communications verified by a reference to the annals of the family, advised him to comply with her request.

As the duke had yet some difficulty in believing it was really a ghost he had seen, he took care to have his door well watched; she, however, entered at the appointed time, unseen by the attendants; and having received the duke's promise, she told him that she would return with her husband on the following night; for that although she could come by day, he could not; that then, having heard the circumstances, the duke must arbitrate between them, and then unite their hands and bless them. The door was still watched, but nevertheless the apparitions both came, the Duke Casimer in full royal costume, but of a livid paleness; and when the wife had told her story, he told his. Duke Christian decided for the lady, in which judgment Duke Casimer fully acquiesced. Christian then took the ice-cold hand of Casimer, and laid it in that of his wife, which felt of a natural heat. They then prayed and sang together, and the apparitions disappeared, having foretold that Duke Christian would ere long be with them. The family records showed that these people had lived about one hundred years before Duke Christian's time, who himself died in the year 1707, two years after these visits of his ancestors. He desired to be buried in quick-lime—it is supposed, from an idea that it might prevent his ghost from walking the earth. The costume in which they appeared, was precisely that they had worn when alive, as was ascertained by a reference to their portraits.

The expression, that her husband was wandering in cold and darkness, betwixt time and eternity, are here very worthy of observation; as are the circumstances that his hand was cold, whilst hers was warm; and, also, the greater privilege she seemed to enjoy. The hands of the unhappy spirits appear, I think, invariably to communicate a sensation of cold.

CUSHMAN, CHARLOTTE,

AN American Artiste who has, deservedly, become celebrated in her profession, holding now the highest rank for original genius, in the personation of those female characters which display the passions in their greatest intensity and power, of any living actress either of England or her own country.

Charlotte Cushman was born in Boston, being the eldest of five children, who, by the decease of their father, were left, when young, wholly dependent on their mother's care and instruction. Mrs. Cushman seems to have sustained the part of double guardianship over her children, which devolves on a widowed mother, with a noble courage and firm faith in God; this early training has, no doubt, had great influence on her gifted daughter. The sketch we shall give of Miss Cushman, is chiefly taken from "The People's Journal," published in London, and edited by William Howitt. The sketch is from the pen of Mrs. Mary Howitt.

"Charlotte Cushman inherited from her mother, who was a beautiful singer, a fine taste for music. As a child, she was remarkable for her grave and earnest character; she was not fond of playing with other children, but retired apart, where she read tragedies and practised singing.

Seeing her great taste for music, her mother wisely determined to cultivate it to the utmost in her power. She was not wealthy enough, however, to obtain the first-rate masters for her daughter; but native talent is like love, give it only breathing-room, and it will struggle into day; so it was here. Her first teacher was but himself at that time a pupil; but she improved under his tuition.

"She sang in the chapel, and at a public concert, where she was heard by a gentleman of great wealth and taste in the city, who resolved that such extraordinary promise should not fail for lack of cultivation. Through his means, therefore, the best instruction was afforded her, and she was placed as an article-pupil for three years with the master of her former pupil-teacher, an Englishman of the name of Paddon, formerly an organist in London. After two years, being invited by some wealthy relations in New York to visit them for a month, she went there. Her relations were delighted with their young and wonderfully gifted kinswoman, and wished much to adopt her, and provide for her for life. She wrote for her mother's consent or opinion; and three months, instead of one, were spent in deciding the matter. The mother would not consent to parting with her daughter, and Charlotte returning home, found that this long visit had broken her articles with Mr. Paddon. This caused her the less regret, as she had found that he could give her but limited instruction which would not, in the end, qualify her for more than a teacher herself.

"Soon after this, Mrs. Wood, formerly Miss Paton, came to Boston, and with her she sung in a concert. Mrs. Wood, who was astonished and delighted with her voice, declared it to be the finest contralto she had ever heard, and advised her to turn her attention to singing on the stage. This advice was greatly against the wishes and views of her family and connexions. Both in former and later times, her family, on her father's and mother's side, had been rigid Presbyterians, and the sons, through many generations, had often been preachers; there was, therefore, in the minds of all, an inborn horror of the stage; it was to their ideas a place of sin and degradation. All, therefore, steadfastly set their faces against such a misuse and abuse of talent. The young genius was strong in her own wilfulness; she felt that a great and pure spirit was in her, and she feared no evil.

"Mrs. Wood had brought over with her a young musical director, an Irishman, of the name of Maeder, who afterwards married Clara Fisher; and under his care, Charlotte Cushman was brought out as a public singer, in the character of the Countess, in the Marriage of Figaro. She was then just nineteen, and her success was complete. She bade fair to be one of the first singers of the age; an engagement was made for her by Maeder, in which, as prima donna, she was to accompany himself and his wife to New Orleans, where a new theatre had been erected, and here she became acquainted with Decamp, and Mrs. Frederick Brown, the brother and sister of Mrs. Charles Kemble.

"At New Orleans, however, a misfortune befel our young singer, which must inevitably have crushed any spirit less buoyant than her own; and but for her own scope of untried powers, which, as it were, lay in reserve for the evil day, she must have sunk under it. The change of climate from the north to the south, the severity of practice requisite, and the unwise attempt to overstrain her voice from a pure contralto to an available soprano, certainly destroyed it. No situation can be conceived more distressing, or more calculated to drive to utter despair. There she was, in a strange city, away from her own friends and family—disappointed, ruined, as it seemed, by the step she had taken against their counsel. What was to be done? She could not return to her mother a beggar, after having left her with a fortune, as she believed, in her voice. What, indeed was to be done?

"With a noble resolution not to sink, she took heart, although she knew not then upon what plank she was to be saved. She had one true friend, however, in the tragedian of the theatre, a gentleman named Barton, now a professor of elocution in the West of England, a noble-hearted man and a fine scholar. From him she asked advice in her difficult and painful circumstances; and he, appreciating her yet untried talent for acting, recommended that as a profession. With him, therefore, she read such plays as Venice Preserved, Macbeth, &c.; but as all this was in opposition to the will of Maeder, who would have discountenanced any attempt of the kind, she was obliged to keep it secret from him, and her studies were carried on in a little garret, where, at least, she could ensure privacy; and here, in this little mean room, she studied and conceived all those great tragedy parts in which she has so remarkably distinguished herself. Any one but she must have been daunted by the outward circumstances that surrounded her; but the strength of real greatness was in her, and few, indeed, are the untoward and adverse circumstances which genius, and a high, clear moral nature will not overcome. Charlotte Cushman is one of these; they are among the noblest of God's creatures, whose strength and truth are only the more called out by trial. Such cannot be subdued, and, like the acanthus leaf under the tile, the very pressure which would have crushed a meaner weed, fashions them into beauty, which becomes a decoration for the temple of the gods.

"The time now drew near when she was to have a trial in her new vocation. To the utter astonishment of every one connected with the theatre she was announced for Lady Macbeth on the occasion of the benefit of her friend Mr. Barton. She had no dress whatever for the character, and fearing that if this were known it would throw an insuperable impediment in the way, she did not mention it until the very morning of rehearsal. It was then too late to make any alteration, and the manager, in great dismay and anger, sent her with a note to Madame Clozel, of the French Theatre, with whose personal appearance she was not even acquainted. She took the note, requesting the loan of a dress for lady Macbeth, herself. She was tall, and at that time very slender; of course, therefore, she imagined that the lady whose dress she was to wear was of a figure similar to her own. Her consternation and dismay may be imagined, therefore, when we say that Madame Clozel was a very short and immensely stout woman, whose waist alone would measure nearly two yards round. However, no lions, real or imaginary, ever stood in Miss Cushman's path. Nothing could equal the ready good nature of the kind-hearted French woman; and by dint of taking in huge seams, and letting down broad hems, a dress was manufactured, in which the new aspirant for tragedy fame made a very respectable appearance. The theatrical corps had from the first held up their hands and foretold defeat, and many a one came to laugh. But the performance was a complete triumph; the most unanimous applause showered upon her, and there no longer existed any doubt regarding her being a great tragic actress. The piece was repeated many nights, and then, with her fame established, as far as New Orleans was concerned, she returned to New York, happy in the possession of a new path to fame and independence, and thinking, in her young imagination, that she was about to set the world on fire.

"However, all was not as smooth and easy as she had anticipated. At the principal theatre in New York she found it impossible to obtain an engagement without first acting on trial. An engagement was at once offered her by a minor theatre. Pride warred against it; but pecuniary considerations induced her to accept it; more especially as by so doing she was enabled to assist those dearest to her, and who now needed assistance. Her engagement here was for three years; and during this time she determined to establish such a reputation as should enable her to make her own terms with any theatre. She sent accordingly for her family to New York; but scarcely had she entered on her engagement when she was attacked by a violent illness, which completely prostrated her strength, and brought her very low. She suffered extremely both in body and mind; she was unable to fulfil her engagement, and she had induced, in the certain hope of success, others to depend upon her. Her anxieties may be imagined. As soon as she was at all convalescent she entered upon her theatrical duties; but she had done this before her strength was equal to it. For one whole week she acted and every night a fresh character; the exertion was immense; and on the Saturday night she went ill to her bed, and a violent and long attack of fever was the consequence. On the following Monday the theatre was burnt to the ground, and with it perished all her theatrical wardrobe.

"Thus was she left penniless, without an engagement, on a bed of sickness, and with her family dependent upon her."

* * * *

About this time, her young sister, Mrs. Merriman, a deserted wife, who was soon left a widow, and, reassuming her maiden name, was known as Miss Susan Cushman, became, with her infant child, dependent on Charlotte for support. The elder persuaded the younger to enter on a theatrical life. Mrs. Howitt thus describes the result:

"The most beautiful feature in this narrative, perhaps, is the affection of these two noble-hearted sisters. Charlotte's was a character on which her sister, disappointed and heart-broken, could lean, and from which she could derive strength. She was her teacher; they worked hard together, and, as was natural, the sick heart, if it grew not well, at least grew stronger.

"Mrs. Merriman, or Miss Susan Cushman, as she was theatrically called, made her first appearance before the public in a manuscript play called The Genoese, written by a young American, in which, to encourage her sister, Miss Cushman took the part of the lover. And here let a few words be said on a subject which has excited some remarks, and, as we think, needlessly, to Miss Cushman's disadvantage—we mean on her taking male parts. We can assert it as a fact, and it is a fact full of generosity and beautiful affection, that it is solely on her sister's account that she has done so. By taking herself the male character, for which she was in many cases admirably suited, she was enabled to obtain the first female character for her sister; there being, as is well known, no plays written in which two prominent female characters are found. Affection for one who, if not possessed of her strong, original masculine talent, had yet beauty, grace, tenderness, and many requisites for a successful actress, made her willing to give her every support and advantage she could, even where she herself had, as it seemed, to step out of a woman's province.

* * * *

"The two sisters now took a high stand together, and for one season they performed in Philadelphia all the principal characters. The next year they returned to New York. During this season, while that celebrated comedy of London Assurance was in vogue, they acted in it upwards of ninety nights.

"The following season, Miss Cushman assumed the management of the Philadelphia Theatre, where she remained until Mr. Macready came to America, when he, being so much satisfied with the assistance she rendered him, solicited her to accompany him in his engagements to the North.

"Soon after this, a desire which had long operated upon her mind took a more determinate shape, and she resolved to carry it into effect; this was no other than the coming to England, and trying her powers before a higher tribunal than any which her native country could afford her. Throughout the whole of her career, a noble ambition had ever urged her onward; she was not satisfied to come short in any way of that excellence at which she aimed. While yet young in her art, she aspired to stand side by side with Mrs. Siddons. Mrs. Siddons, or rather the fame which she had left behind, was the grand ideal after which she strove. But supposing she equalled, or even, were such a thing possible, surpassed Mrs. Siddons, it would have availed her very little to have fame awarded to her by America alone. To England she must come. It was an idea that haunted her, night and day. To be loved and appreciated by England, that was her great ambition, and nothing short of that would satisfy her.

"Like all Miss Cushman's great steps in life, this also was destined to be taken alone. It was at the commencement of winter, 1845, that she set out alone, excepting for one female attendant. Many difficulties and painful circumstances conspired at the last moments to throw a gloom upon her departure. A timid, doubtful mind must have turned back even then; but with her, to resolve was to act. On the voyage, however, the full sense of the bold, uncertain venture on which she had hazarded so much, fell heavily on her mind; she was depressed and unhappy. The gloom, however, of her melancholy thoughts was greatly diverted by the kindness of an American family, her fellow-voyagers, and from them, on her first arrival in that vast world of London, where the friendless feel friendless indeed, she continued to receive the utmost attention. With them, soon after her arrival in this country, she paid a short visit to Scotland and Paris, being really and naturally anxious to see something of this wonderful old world, with its famous cities, and realms of poetry and romance, while her mind was yet untasked, and free to enjoy all things fully; for she knew, as who would not have known? that in case of failure in her great trial with the British public, she would be disheartened and depressed beyond the power of enjoyment. To Scotland and Paris, therefore, she went; and parting from her kind country-people at the latter place, she returned alone to London, to put her fortune at once to the trial.

"She received offers from the managers of Covent-Garden Theatre—then open, from St. James's, and one or two others; but here, again, a difficulty arose, which made her additionally unhappy. She knew not what was best or wisest for her to decide upon or do. She wanted at that moment a friend and counsellor; but she had none.

However, the circumstance of Mr. Forrest coming to England afforded her an opportunity of performing her own peculiar characters with a better chance of success, and, in the end, she accepted an engagement at the Princess's, and resolved to make her débüt before a London audience in the character of Bianca, in Milman's tragedy of Fazio. But here a new difficulty presented itself in the unwillingness there existed on the part of the gentlemen to take the character of Fazio, which is considered inferior to that of the lady. At length, one more self-forgetting than the rest was found in the person of Mr. Graham, who admirably supported her in her part. Her success was great and unquestioned, nor must it be forgotten, that at that time she was not known to a dozen persons in London, and no means had been taken to prepare the press, or dispose the public mind to her favour. All depended upon her own merit and original power; yet only one opinion prevailed regarding her.

"One engagement at the Princess's succeeded another, until she had acted there eighty-four nights, during which she appeared as Emilia to Mr. Forrest's Othello, as Lady Macbeth, Julia, in the Hunchback, Mrs. Haller, Beatrice, Lady Teazle, Meg Merrilies, Rosalind, and Juliana, in the Honeymoon—a range of characters which required extraordinary ability and power.

"Her success in London induced her sister to hope that the same audience which received with such distinguished favour her efforts to please them, would also receive hers with kindness. She accordingly, accompanied by her mother, joined her sister in July, 1846, and made her first appearance before a London public in the following December, at the Haymarket, in the character of Juliet.

"Since then, they have visited together all the principal towns in the three kingdoms, and everywhere, whilst their distinguished talent is acknowledged by the public at large, their personal accomplishments, and their qualities of heart and mind, win for them the firmest friends."

Thus far we have quoted the interesting narrative of Mrs. Howitt, and need only add, that in the autumn of 1849 Miss Cushman returned to New York, where she was welcomed by the friends of dramatic representations with warm enthusiasm. She has since performed in her celebrated characters, not only in New York, but in all the large cities of our country, with great applause. Her sister Susan married in England, where she now resides.

D.

DACRE, LADY,

Is English by birth, and in 1833 published a series of tales, written with taste, feeling and passion, which were favourably received by the public. Another work of hers, "Trevelyan," a novel of considerable interest, appeared the following year, though by no means justifying the comparison which a leading British journal made between it and Miss Edgeworth's "Vivian." The best work of Lady Dacre is "Recollections of a Chaperone," containing several stories. Dr. Johnson has been often quoted for his saying, that it is a wonderful effort of mind to frame a good plot, even if it be indifferently filled up. The first of these stories has certainly surmounted this difficulty; the plot of "Ellen Wareham" is strikingly interesting; it has been dramatized with a success that some of our best novels have failed to obtain, when thus prepared for the stage, because their merit was of the sort that did not admit condensation. The other "Recollections" are interesting stories; the second has some admirable scenes of common life, describing the ludicrous bathos of high-flown romance, when "love in a cottage" has to descend to the common cares of cookery and children. We must not omit to notice that "Ellen Wareham" has, most unjustifiably, been taken from its rightful author, and brought out in America with the name of the late "Ellen Pickering," who being favourably distinguished by her own numerous and popular works, does not need to borrow reputation from the very different pen of Lady Dacre.

DASH, MADAME LA COMTESSE,

BORN and residing in Paris, is considered, by that large class of novel-readers who love romantic incident and sentimental characters, as a charming writer. Her works are numerous, comprising over thirty volumes, usually found in the "Circulating Libraries" of Paris; but we believe none of her novels have been translated into English, nor republished in America. The best we have read, is entitled "Madame Louise de France," a work of considerable merit; among the others, may be named, "Arabelle," "Les Bals Masqués," "Les Châteaux en Afrique," "La Chaîne d'Or," "Le Jeu de la Reine," "Madame de la Sablière," "Maurice Robert," &c. &c. We know nothing of the private history of the Comtesse Dash; but, judging from her writings, should rank her among those who seek to promote good morals through the medium of what they consider innocent amusements. Like "The Children of the Abbey," and other fictions of the sentimental, romantic kind, the works of this writer are read, at first, with interest, but leave little impression on the mind.

DUDEVANT, MARIE AURORE,

BETTER known as George Sand, the most remarkable French woman of our time, was born in the province of Berry, within the first ten years of the present century. A royal descent is claimed for her, through her paternal grandmother, a daughter of Marshal Saxe, well known to be a son of Augustus II., king of Poland. Her father, Maurice Dupin, was an officer in the Imperial service. Dying young, he left his daughter to the care of her grandmother, by whom she was brought up, à la Rousseau. At the age of fourteen, she was transferred to the aristocratic convent of the Dames Anglaises, in Paris; the religious reaction which followed the restoration, rendering some modification of Madame Dupin's philosophical system of education necessary. Here the ardent, excitable imagination of the young Marie Aurore exhibited itself in a fervour of devotion so extreme as to call for the interposition of her superior. Young, rich, and an orphan, she suffered herself, at the age of twenty, to be led into one of those marriages — called "suitable," by the French — with a retired Imperial officer; an upright, honest, but very dull man. Utterly unsuited to one another, and neither of them willing to make sacrifices to duty, the unhappy pair struggled on through some years of wretchedness, when the tie was snapt by the abrupt departure of Madame Dudevant, who fled from her husband's roof to the protection of a lover. While living in obscurity with this lover, her first work, "Indiana," was published. This connexion, which had a marked and most deleterious influence upon her mind and career, did not continue long. She parted from her lover, assumed half of his name, and has since rendered it famous by a series of writings, amounting to more than forty volumes, which have called forth praise and censure in their highest extremes.

Madame Dudevant's subsequent career has been marked by strange and startling contrasts. Taking up her residence in Paris, and casting from her the restraints and modesty of her sex, she has indulged in a life of license, such as we shrink from even in man. Step by step, however, her genius has been expanding, and working itself clear of the dross which encumbered it. Her social position having been rendered more endurable by a legal separation from her husband, which restored her to fortune and independence, a healthier tone has become visible in her writings, the turbulence of her volcanic nature is subsiding, and we look forward, hopefully, to the day of better things. She has lately written a dramatic piece, called "François le Chamfri," which has been highly successful in Paris, and is represented to be a production of unexceptionable moral character; it is said to have been greatly applauded.

Much has been said and written of the intention of Madame Dudevant's early writings. That she had any "intention" at all, save the almost necessary one of wreaking upon expression the boiling tide of emotions which real or fancied wrongs, a highly poetic temperament, and violent passions engendered, we do not believe. Endowed with genius of an order capable of soaring to the most exalted heights, yet eternally dragged to earth by the clogs of an ill-regulated mind, never disciplined by the saving influences of moral and Christian training, she dipped her pen into the gall and wormwood of her own bitter experience, and we have the result. We cannot say that works have an immoral intention, which contain as much that is high, good and elevating, as there is of an opposite character. We might as soon declare those arrows pointed by design, which are flung from the bow of a man stung and wounded to blindness.

Of their tendency, we cannot speak so favourably. Among her thousands of readers, how many are there who pause, or who are capable of pausing, to reflect that life is seen from only one point of view by this writer, and that that point was gained by Madame Dudevant when she lost the approval of her own conscience, abjured her womanhood, and became George Sand!

However, we are willing—ay, more, we are glad—to hope Madame Dudevant will henceforth strive to remedy the evils she has caused, and employ her wonderful genius on the side of virtue and true progress. To do this effectually, she must throw by her miserable affectation of manhood, and the wearing of man's apparel, which makes her a recreant from the moral delicacy of her own sex, without attaining the physical power of the other. Surely, one who can write as she has lately written, must be earnestly seeking for the good and true. It was, probably, this which led her, in the Revolution of 1848, to connect herself with the Socialist Party; but she will learn, if she has not already, that political combinations do not remove moral evils. Her genius should teach truth, and inspire hearts to love the good; thus her influence would have a mightier effect on her country than any plan of social reform political expediency could devise. That she does now write in this manner, a glance at one of her late works will show. "La Mare au Diable," (The Devil's Pond,) notwithstanding its name, is as sweet a pastoral as we have ever read. There is a naive tenderness in its rural pictures, which reminds one of the "Vicar of Wakefield," while its feminine purity of tone invests it with a peculiar charm. We will make some extracts from the preface, which will show what are Madame Dudevant's present views as to works of fiction.

"Certain writers of our day, looking seriously upon the world, apply themselves to describing pain, wretchedness, poverty, the dung-hill of Lazarus. This may enter into the domain of art, and of philosophy; but in depicting poverty so hideous, so debased, often so vicious and so criminal, have they effected their purpose? and is the effect as salutary as might be desired? We do not presume to decide upon this point. They may say, that in showing the mine prepared under the hollow ground of opulence, they frighten Dives. They point out the bandit breaking open his door, and the assassin invading his slumbers. We confess that we cannot well see how he is to be reconciled to humanity that he despises, how he is to be rendered compassionate to the evils of poverty, by showing him the poor man, under the form of an escaped felon, and a nocturnal plunderer. Albert Durer, Michael Angelo, Holbein, and Callot, composed forcible satires on the evils of their age. These are immortal works, and historical pages of incontestable value. We do not deny artists their right to probe the wounds of society, to take off the bandages before our eyes; but can art do nothing but present these loathsome and terrifying pictures? In this literature of the mysteries of iniquity, that talent and imagination have brought into fashion, we greatly prefer the mild and gentle personages to the terrible dramatic villains. The former may allure to virtuous thoughts and resolutions; the others awaken fear, and fear does not cure egotism—it increases that unworthy sentiment.

"We believe that the mission of Art is a mission of feeling and of love; that the modern novel should take the place of the parable of primitive times, and that the author has a task more lofty and more poetic than that of proposing municipal measures of prudence and conciliation, to soften the fright his pictures inspire. His aim should be to awaken an interest for the objects of his solicitude by engaging representations; and I would not be extreme to mark a little heightening and embellishing of his portraits. Art is not confined to positive, dry reality; it is a search after ideal beauty; and the 'Vicar of Wakefield' is a book more useful and salutary to the mind, than 'The Profligate Countryman,' or the 'Dangerous Intrigues.'"

The story that follows these strictures is of the most simple construction, a very artless tale of peasant life; but the characters are so individualized and so perfectly drawn, that the interest never fails. Yet though we are brought into an atmosphere of simplicity and innocence, there is enough of human error to keep up the sympathy we have with our own imperfect world, to relieve us from the unreal insipidity of the golden age. The shepherds and peasants are not the elegant operatic figures of Florian, talking far-fetched sentiment in poetical language; they are just such folks in manners and discourse as we would be likely to meet among the inhabitants of comfortable farm-houses and decent cabins. Germain, a young widower, who resides with his father-in-law, Maurice, a rich farmer, is urged by the latter to marry again, that he may have a help-mate in rural labour, and especially that his children may be withdrawn from hanging as a burden upon their old grandmother. Germain is at first unwilling, still dwelling tenderly on the memory of his late wife; but filial obedience and the excellent reasoning of Maurice at last obtained his consent, and he agreed to go on Saturday afternoon to visit a widowed daughter of one of the father's friends: this dame lives at a place called 'The Forks;' one of the neighbours, a poor widow, solicits the good Maurice to persuade his son to take her little daughter Mary with him, as she is to go to service in the vicinity of the Forks, and has no means of getting there. This proposal is cheerfully acceded to, and at the appointed time, they set out on a famous mare that is accustomed to carrying the farmer and his wife to church. After proceeding some distance they find Pièrre, the little son of Germain, who has waylaid his father, hoping to be taken with him on the journey: the tears of the child, added to the persuasion of little Mary, induce the father to consent, and the three continue their route. Germain is not well acquainted with the way, being delayed by the child, night comes on, a mist arises and they become completely lost; all their efforts to recover the track only involve them in thicker woods, till at last they are compelled to wait till morning in this wild spot, called the 'Devil's Pond.' Here little Mary develops extraordinary genius for expedients, and adroitness in arrangements. She makes a fire, a bed for the child, even cooks a supper, when Germain had quite given up every idea of comfort. Joined with all this usefulness and ability, there is a childish simplicity, and a sweet disinterestedness of character manifesting itself continually, and Germain begins to think he would rather marry little Mary, poor and young as she is, than the rich widow of the Forks. Upon visiting the latter, he finds her vain and disagreeable, and decides that she never can become his wife. Little Mary has found her place unsuitable, and they return as they went. The family of Germain observe that he has lost his spirits, and seems to work without heart; the old grandmother undertakes to win his confidence, and upon discovering that he cannot be happy without obtaining little Mary as his wife,—every body consents; and, to the great delight of little Pièrre, Mary is taken into the family,—he is delighted to call her mother, and 'they all lived happy'—as fairy tales were wont to end. This is a very meagre outline of the book, but the details are charming—the purity, truth, and thorough integrity of little Mary, form a character one loves to dwell on. The old folks, as befits experience in this sordid world, are keen to see and value the goods of life—they are by no means indifferent to money, but their good hearts and sterling principles, never allow the cares of pelf to predominate over what is due to feeling and kindness. Germain is the beau ideal of an unlettered hero, spirited, gentle, courageous, and true. The child, too, is remarkably well drawn. If we are to judge of a book by the impression it leaves, we must pronounce this a very valuable one, since all our feelings and reflections are drawn to the side of probity, charity and virtue.

Of 'Consuelo,' which was published in 1842, we must say, that though circumstances, unconnected with the author, have given this novel, unfortunately, a bad reputation in our own country—it does not deserve the obloquy. On the contrary, Madame Dudevant, doubtless, intended to be very good; it was the first of her works which decidedly manifested the reform, in her views of life, to which we have already alluded. It is true, her ideas on the subject of morals are not yet grounded, as a woman's should be, on the Word of God; and there are, in this novel, extravagant philosophical theories, and too much German mysticism; still it was intended to exhibit in the character of Consuelo the heroism of chastity, genius, truth and disinterestedness, and their triumph in exalting a female soul. The English reviewers gave the work, when it appeared, warm praise, acknowledging its wonderful genius, and also its freedom from the usual immoralities of French novels. We need not go over the long list of Madame Dudevant's works, (would that the greater part could be blotted out for ever!) the last of which, 'True Love,' has been translated into English, elegantly illustrated and published in Philadelphia; we select the following beautiful thoughts from another of her works.

From "Letters of a Traveller."

In doing good to our fellow-creatures, it is from God alone, that we must seek a recompense! To labour in the service of mankind with either gratitude or applause in view, is merely courting the triumphs of vanity, and benevolence of this kind must necessarily die, at the first check or disappointment it meets.

Let us never expect any thing for ourselves, when we enter the barren road of self-devotion. Our own heart must suffice for the task, and then God will renew it, and fortify it when it begins to fail.

* * * * *

I believe that the smallest virtue put in action, and sustained with energy, will do more good than all the wisdom of the age diffused through literary disquisitions, or packed away in philanthropic meetings.

* * * * *

A man of good sense, and pure conscience, with perseverance and firmness, may accomplish great things, if he act at a propitious moment, and when the sympathies of mankind pave the way—while the most profound theories, and the most subtle demonstrations will profit nothing to their propounder, if he trust to the moral action of his unseasonable revelations.

Raising my hand towards my head, I breathed the perfume of a flower, whose leaves I had touched some hours before. This little plant was still flourishing on its mountain several leagues from me; I had only carried away part of its exquisite smell. How could it be thus imparted? What a precious thing is the perfume which without any loss to the plant from which it emanates adheres to the hands of a friend, and follows him in his travels to charm him, and recall to him the beauty of the flower he loves! The perfume of the soul is memory; it is the sweetest and most delicate part of the heart, that detaches itself to cling to another's heart, and follow it every where. The affection of the absent is but a perfume; but how sweet and refreshing it is! What comforting thoughts and hopes it brings to the sick and bruised spirit!

From "Consuelo."

*PORPORA TELLS CONSUELO HER LOVER IS FALSE.

'Consuelo,' said Porpora, in a low tone, 'it is useless to hide your features, I heard your voice, and cannot mistake it. What are you come to do here at this hour, poor child, and whom do you look for in this house?' 'I seek my betrothed,' replied Consuelo, catching the arm of her master, 'and I know not why I should blush to own it to my best friend. You blame my attachment, but I cannot tell you a falsehood. I am anxious. Since the day before yesterday at the theatre I have not seen Anzoletto. I fear he may be ill.' 'He,' said the Professor, shrugging his shoulders,—'come with me, poor girl; we must talk together: and since you decide at last on opening your heart to me, mine must be laid open also. Give me your arm, we will talk as we go on. Listen, Consuelo, and mark well what I say to you. You cannot, you must not be the wife of this young man; I forbid you in the name of the living God who gave me for you the heart of a father.' 'Oh, my master,' she replied, sorrowfully, 'ask the sacrifice of my life, not that of my love.' 'I do not ask, I exact it,' replied Porpora, firmly; 'your lover is accursed: he will cause your torment and your shame if you do not renounce him now.' 'Dear master,' she replied, with a sad caressing smile, 'you have told me this very often, and I have vainly tried to obey you: you hate the poor youth because you do not know him, you will abjure your prejudices.'

'Consuelo,' said the maestro more forcibly, 'I have till now made vain objections, and issued useless commands: I know it. I spoke as an artist to an artist, for in him I saw the artist only. But I speak now as a man, and of a man, and as to a woman: that woman has ill placed her love, that man is unworthy of it: he who tells you so is certain.' 'Oh, God! Anzoletto unworthy! my friend, my protector, my brother! you do not know what his support and respect have been ever since I came into the world.' And Consuelo told the details of her life and her love, which was one and the same story. Porpora was affected but not shaken. 'In all this,' said he, 'I see your innocence, your fidelity, your virtue, and in him the need of your society, and your instruction, to which, whatever you may think, he owes the little he has learned and the little he is worth; but it is not less true that this pure lover is the discarded of the frailest of Venice.' 'Beware of what you say,' replied Consuelo, in a stifled voice, 'I am accustomed to believe in you as in Heaven. O, my master; but in what concerns Anzoletto, I close to you mine ears and my heart. Let me quit you,' she added, striving to unlink her arm from that of the Professor. 'You destroy me.' 'I will destroy your unhappy passion, and by truth I will restore you to life,' he replied, pressing the child's arm against his generous and indignant breast. 'I know I am rough and rude, Consuelo; I have not learned to be otherwise; and it was for this I retarded as long as I could the blow I was to deal to you. I had hoped that your eyes would open; that you would comprehend what was passing round you; but, in place of being enlightened, you cast yourself into the abyss like the blind. I will not let you fall: you are the sole being I have esteemed during ten years: it must not be that you shall perish; no, it must not.' 'But, my friend, I am in no danger. Do you think I speak falsely when I swear to you by all that is sacred that I have respected the oath sworn by the mother's deathbed? Anzoletto respects it also. I am not yet his wife, therefore nothing to him.' 'Let him say the word, and you will be all.' 'My mother made us promise.' 'And you came here to-night to seek the man who cannot and will not be your husband?' 'Who says this?' 'Would Corilla permit him?' 'What has he in common with Corilla?' 'We are close to her habitation; you sought your betrothed, let us go there to find him.' 'No, no! a thousand times no,' replied Consuelo, staggering as she stepped, and supporting herself against the wall, 'do not kill me ere I have lived! Leave me life, O my master, I tell you I shall die.' 'You must drink of this cup,' said the inexorable old man, 'I perform here the part of destiny. Having caused only ingratitude and consequently sorrow by my tenderness and mild caution, I must speak the truth to those I love. It is the sole good which can issue from a heart dried up and petrified by its own suffering. I pity you, my poor child, in having no gentler friend to support you in this fatal crisis; but formed as I am, I must light as by the ray of the lightning, since I cannot vivify as by the warmth of the sun. Thus then, Consuelo, let there be between us no weakness! Come to this palace. If you cannot walk, I will drag you; if you fall, I will carry you. Old Porpora is strong still, when the fire of divine anger burns in his heart.' 'Mercy, mercy!' exclaimed Consuelo, grown paler than death; 'let me doubt still. Give me one day more, only one day, to believe in him; I am not prepared for this torture.' 'No, not a day, not an hour,' he replied in an inflexible tone; 'for this hour which passes, I shall not find again to place the truth before your eyes; and this day which you demand, the wretch would profit by to bow you again beneath the yoke of his falsehood. You shall come with me, I command you.' 'Well then, yes, I will go,' said Consuelo, recovering her strength by a violent revulsion of feeling: 'I will go to prove your injustice and his faith; for you deceive yourself unworthily, and you would have me deceived along with you. Go then! I follow and do not fear you.'

E.

ELLET, ELIZABETH F.,

DAUGHTER of Dr. William A. Lummis, a man honourably distinguished in his profession, was born at Sodus, a small town on the shores of Lake Ontario, in the State of New York. Her mother was the daughter of General Maxwell, an officer in our Revolutionary war; and thus the subject of this sketch was in childhood imbued with patriotic feelings, which, next to the religious, are sure to nourish in the female mind the seeds of genius. Miss Lummis was early distinguished for vivacity of intellect and a thirst for learning, which her subsequent life has shown was no evanescent fancy, but the natural stamp of her earnest mind. She was married, before she was seventeen, to Dr. William H. Ellet, an accomplished scholar, and then Professor of Chemistry in Columbia College, New York city, whither he removed his youthful bride. There she had such advantages of study as she had never before enjoyed, and her proficiency was rapid. She soon began to write for the periodicals; her first piece, a poem, appeared in 1833 in the "American Ladies' Magazine," published at Boston. Her articles were favourably noticed, and the name of Mrs. Ellet became known among literary circles.

* The great Italian composer and teacher of singing.

In 1834, appeared her translation of "Euphemia of Messina," one of the most admired productions of Silvio Pellico; and in the following year, an original tragedy from her pen, "Teresa Contarini," was successfully represented in New York, and also in some of the western cities. In the same year, 1835, she published her "Poems—Translated and Original." For several succeeding years, Mrs. Ellet wrote chiefly for periodicals; to the American Review, she contributed "Papers on Italian Tragedy," "Italian Poets," "Lamar-tine's Poems," "Andreini's Adam," &c.

Dr. Ellet receiving the appointment of Professor of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy in the college at Columbia, South Carolina, removed thither, and Mrs. Ellet found herself among new scenery and new friends, but her old love of literature remained unchanged. Besides contributing to the North American Review, Southern Quarterly Review, "The Lady's Book," and other periodicals, in 1841 she produced "The Characters of Schiller," an analysis and criticism of the principal persons in Schiller's plays, with an essay on Schiller's genius, and translated extracts from his writings. "Joanna of Sicily" was her next work; soon followed by "Country Rambles," a spirited description of the scenery she had observed in her journeyings through the United States.

In the autumn of 1848, her most elaborate, as well as important work, was published in New York, "The Women of the American Revolution," in two volumes, to which she has since added a third. This contribution to American history, and the ability with which it was executed, has, deservedly, given Mrs. Ellet a high place among our female writers. Of the plan and object, we shall quote her own exposition, written in the unaffected but fervid style which characterizes the work. Her activity of mind is remarkable, and also the judgment and taste with which she disposes of the materials her researches accumulate. In 1850, she published "Domestic History of the American Revolution," in one volume, designed to exhibit the spirit of that period, to portray, as far as possible, the social and domestic condition of the colonists, and the state of feeling among the people during the war. Though dealing with the same great events which developed the peculiar characteristics of "The Women of the American Revolution," this last work is not a continuation, but a novel and interesting view of that tremendous struggle which resulted in gaining for America a place among nations. Another work of hers, "Pictures from Bible History," was also published in 1850.

Mrs. Ellet has tried nearly all varieties of literature, original and translation—poetry, essay, criticism, tragedy, biography, fiction, history, and stories for children; to say, as we truly can, that she has not failed in any, is sufficient praise. Still she has not, probably, done her best in any one department; the concentration of genius is one of the conditions of its perfect development. She is yet young, hopeful, and studious. Nor are her accomplishments confined to the merely literary; in music and drawing she also excels; and in the graces that adorn society, and make the charm of social and domestic intercourse, she is eminently gifted. Her residence is now fixed in the city of New York.

From "The Women of the American Revolution."

PRELIMINARY REMARKS.

All Americans are accustomed to view with interest and admiration the events of the Revolution. Its scenes are vivid in their memory, and its prominent actors are regarded with the deepest veneration. But while the leading spirits are thus honoured, attention should be directed to the source whence their power was derived—to the sentiment pervading the mass of the people. The force of this sentiment, working in the public heart, cannot be measured; because, amidst the abundance of materials for the history of action, there is little for that of the feeling of those times. And, as years pass on, the investigation becomes more and more difficult. Yet it is both interesting and important to trace its operation. It gave statesmen their influence, and armed heroes for victory. What could they have done but for the some-sentiment to which they appealed, and which sustained them in the hour of trial and success? They were thus aided to the eminence they gained through toils and perils. Others may claim a share in the merit, if not the fame, of their illustrious deeds. The unfading laurels that wreath their brows had their root in the hearts of the people, and were nourished with their life-blood.

The feeling which wrought thus powerfully in the community depended, in great part, upon the women. It is always thus in times of popular excitement. Who can estimate, moreover, the controlling influence of early culture! During the years of the progress of the British encroachment and colonial discontent, when the sagacious politician could discern the portentous shadow of events yet far distant, there was time for the nurture, in the domestic sanctuary, of that love of civil liberty, which afterwards kindled into a flame, and shed light on the world. The talk of matrons, in American homes, was of the people's wrongs, and the tyranny that oppressed them, till the sons who had grown to manhood, with strengthened aspirations towards a better state of things, and views enlarged to comprehend their invaded rights, stood up prepared to defend them to the utmost. Patriotic mothers nursed the infancy of freedom. Their counsels and their prayers mingled with the deliberations that resulted in a nation's assertion of its independence. They animated the courage, and confirmed the self-devotion of those who ventured all in the common cause. They frowned upon instances of coldness or backwardness; and in the period of deepest gloom, cheered and urged onward the desponding. They willingly shared inevitable dangers and privations, relinquished without regret prospects of advantage to themselves, and parted with those they loved better than life, not knowing when they were to meet again. It is almost impossible now to appreciate the vast influence of woman's patriotism upon the destinies of the infant republic. We have no means of showing the important part she bore in maintaining the struggle, and in laying the foundations on which so mighty and majestic a structure has arisen. History can do it no justice; for history deals with the workings of the head, rather than the heart. And the knowledge received by tradition, of the domestic manners, and social character of the times, is too imperfect to furnish a sure index. We can only dwell upon individual instances of magnanimity, fortitude, self-sacrifice, and heroism, bearing the impress of the feeling of Revolutionary days, indicative of the spirit which animated all, and to which, in its various and multiform exhibitions, we are not less indebted for national freedom, than to the swords of the patriots who poured out their blood.

"'Tis true, Cleander," says a writer in one of the papers of the day,* "no mean merit will accrue to him who shall justly celebrate the virtues of our ladies! Shall not their generous contributions to relieve the wants of the defenders of our country, supply a column to emulate the Roman women, stripped of their jewels when the public necessity demanded them?" Such tributes were often called forth by the voluntary exertions of American women. Their patriotic sacrifices were made with an enthusiasm that showed the earnest spirit ready on every occasion to appear in generous acts. Some gave their own property, and went from house to house to solicit contributions for the army. Colours were embroidered by fair hands, and presented with the charge never to desert them; and arms and ammunition were provided by the same liberal zeal. They formed themselves into associations renouncing the use of teas, and other imported luxuries, and engaging to card, spin, and weave their own clothing. In Mecklenburgh and Rowan counties, North Carolina, young ladies of the most respectable families pledged themselves not to receive the addresses of any suitors who had not obeyed the country's call for military service.

The needy shared the fruit of their industry and economy. They visited hospitals daily; sought the dungeons of the provost, and the crowded holds of prison-ships; and provisions were carried from their stores to the captives whose only means of recompense was the blessing of those who were ready to perish. Many raised grain, gathered it, made bread, and carried it to their relatives in the army, or in prisons, accompanying the supply with exhortations never to abandon the cause of their country. The burial of friends slain in battle, or chance-encounters, often devolved upon them; and even enemies would not have received sepulture without the service of their hands.

When the resources of the country scarcely allowed the scantiest supply of clothing and provisions, and British cruisers on the coast destroyed every hope of aid from merchant vessels; when, to the distressed troops, their cup of misfortune seemed full to overflowing, and there appeared no prospect of relief, except from the benevolence of their fellow-citizens; when even the ability of these was almost exhausted by repeated applications—then it was that the women of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, by their zealous exertions and willing sacrifices, accomplished what had been thought impossible. Not only was the pressure of want removed, but the sympathy and favour of the fair daughters of America, says one of the journals, "operated like a charm on the soldier's heart—gave vigour to exertion, confidence to his hopes of success, and the ultimate certainty of victory and peace." General Washington, in his letter of acknowledgment to the committee of ladies, says, "The army ought not to regret its sacrifices or its sufferings, when they meet with so flattering a reward, as in the sympathy of your sex; nor can it fear that its interests will be neglected, when espoused by advocates as powerful as they are amiable." An officer in camp writes, in June, 1780: "The patriotism of the women of your city is a subject of conversation with the army. Had I poetical genius, I would sit down and write an ode in praise of it. Burgoyne, who, on his first coming to America, roasted that he would dance with the ladies, and coax the men to submission, must now have a better understanding of the good sense and public spirit of our females, as he has already heard of the fortitude and inflexible temper of our men." Another observes: "We cannot appeal in vain for what is good, to that sanctuary where all that is good has its proper home—the female bosom."

How the influence of women was estimated by John Adams, appears from one of his letters to his wife:

"I think I have sometimes observed to you in conversation, that upon examining the biography of illustrious men, you will generally find some female about them, in the relation of mother, or wife, or sister, to whose instigation a great part of their merit is to be ascribed. You will find a curious example of this in the case of Aspasia, the wife of Pericles. She was a woman of the greatest beauty, and the first genius. She taught him, it is said, his refined maxims of policy, his lofty imperial eloquence, nay, even composed the speeches on which so great a share of his reputation was founded.

"I wish some of our great men had such wives. By the account in your last letter, it seems the women in Boston begin to think themselves able to serve their country. What a pity it is that our generals in the northern districts had not Aspasias to their wives.

"I believe the two Howes have not very great women for wives. If they had, we should suffer more from their exertions than we do. This is our good fortune. A smart wife would have put Howe in possession of Philadelphia a long time ago."

The venerable Major Spalding, of Georgia, writes, in reply to an application to him for information respecting the revolutionary women of his state: "I am a very old man, and have read as much as any one I know, yet I have never known, and never read of one—no, not one!—who did not owe high standing, or a great name, to his mother's blood, or his mother's training. My friend Randolph said he owed every thing to his mother. Mr. Jefferson's mother was a Randolph, and he acknowledged that he owed every thing to her rearing. General Washington, we all know, attributed every thing to his mother. Lord Bacon attributed much to his mother's training. And will any one doubt that even Alexander believed he owed more to the blood and lofty ambition of Olympia, than the wisdom or cunning of Philip?"

The sentiments of the women towards the brave defenders of their native land, were expressed in an address widely circulated at the time, and read in the churches of Virginia. "We know," it says—"that at a distance from the theatre of war, if we enjoy any tranquillity, it is the fruit of your watchings, your labours, your dangers. * * * And shall we hesitate to evince to you our gratitude? Shall we hesitate to wear clothing more simple, and dress less elegant, while at the price of this small privation, we shall deserve your benedictions?"

The same spirit appears in a letter found among some papers belonging to a lady of Philadelphia. It was addressed to a British officer in Boston, and written before the Declaration of Independence. The following extract will show its character:

"I will tell you what I have done. My only brother I have sent to the camp with my prayers and blessings. I hope he will not disgrace me; I am confident he will behave with honour, and emulate the great examples he has before him; and had I twenty sons and brothers they should go. I have retrenched every superfluous expense in my table and family; tea I have not drunk since last Christmas, nor bought a new cap or gown since your defeat at Lexington; and what I never did before, have learned to knit, and am now making stockings of American wool for my servants; and this way do I throw in my mite to the public good. I know this—that as free I can die but once; but as a slave I shall not be worthy of life. I have the pleasure to assure you that these are the sentiments of all my sister Americans. They have sacrificed assemblies, parties of pleasure, tea drinking and finery, to that great spirit of patriotism that actuates all degrees of people throughout this extensive continent. If these are the sentiments of females, what must glow in the breasts of our husbands, brothers, and sons! They are as with one heart determined to die or be free. It is not a quibble in politics, a science which few understand, that we are contending for; it is this plain truth, which the most ignorant peasant knows, and is clear to the weakest capacity—that no man has a right to take their money without their consent. You say you are no politician. Oh, sir, it requires no Machiavelian head to discover this tyranny and oppression. It is written with a sunbeam. Every one will see and know it, because it will make every one feel; and we shall be unworthy of the blessings of Heaven if we ever submit to it.

* * * * *

"Heaven seems to smile on us; for in the memory of man, never were known such quantities of flax, and sheep without number. We are making powder fast, and do not want for ammunition."

From all portions of the country thus rose the expression of woman's ardent zeal. Under accumulated evils, the manly spirit that alone could secure success, might have sunk but for the firmness and intrepidity of the weaker sex. It supplied every persuasion that could animate to perseverance, and secure fidelity.

The noble deeds in which this irrepressible spirit breathed itself, were not unrewarded by persecution. The case of the Quakeress, Deborah Franklin, who was banished from New York by the British commandant for her liberality in relieving the sufferings of the American prisoners, was one among many. In our days of tranquillity and luxury, imagination can scarcely compass the extent or severity of the trials endured; and it is proportionately difficult to estimate the magnanimity that bore all, not only with uncomplaining patience, but with a cheerful forgetfulness of suffering in view of the desired object. The alarms of war—the roar of the strife itself, could not silence the voice of woman, lifted in encouragement or prayer. The horrors of battle or massacre could not drive her from her post of duty. The effect of this devotion cannot be questioned, though it may not now be traced in particular instances. These were, for the most part, known only to those who were themselves actors in the scenes, or who lived in the midst of them. The heroism of the Revolutionary women has passed from remembrance with the generation who witnessed it; or is seen only by faint and occasional glimpses, through the gathering obscurity of tradition.

To render a measure of justice—inadequate it must be—to a few of the American matrons, whose names deserve to live in remembrance—and to exhibit something of the domestic side of the Revolutionary picture—is the object of this work. As we recede from the realities of that struggle, it is regarded with increasing interest by those who enjoy its results; while the elements which were its life-giving principle, too subtle to be retained by the grave historian, are fleeting fast from apprehension. Yet without some conception of them, the Revolution cannot be appreciated. We must enter into the spirit, as well as master the letter.

While attempting to pay a tribute but too long withheld, to the memory of women who did and endured so much in the cause of liberty, we should not be insensible to the virtues exhibited by another class, belonging equally to the history of the period. These had their share of reverse and suffering. Many saw their children and relatives espousing opposite sides; and with ardent feelings of loyalty in their hearts, were forced to weep over the miseries of their families and neighbours. Many were driven from their homes, despoiled of property, and finally compelled to cast their lot in desolate wilds and an ungenial climate.* And while their heroism, fortitude, and spirit of self-sacrifice were not less brightly displayed, their hard lot was unpitied, and they met with no reward.

In the library of William H. Prescott, at his residence in Boston, are two swords, crossed above the arch of an alcove. One belonged to his grandfather, Colonel William Prescott, who commanded the American troops in the redoubt at Bunkerhill. The other was the sword of Captain Linzee, of the royal navy, who commanded the British sloop of war—The Falcon, then lying in the Mystic; from which the American troops were fired upon as they crossed to Bunkerhill. Captain Linzee was the grandfather of Mrs. Prescott. The swords of those two gallant soldiers who fought on different sides upon that memorable day—now in the possession of their united descendants, and crossed—an emblem of peace, in the library of the great American historian—are emblematic of the spirit in which our history should be written. Such be the spirit in which we view the loyalists of those days.

SODUS BAY.

I bless thee, native shore!
Thy woodlands gay, and waters sparkling clear!
'Tis like a dream once more
The music of thy thousand waves to hear
As, murmuring up the sand,
With kisses bright they lave the sloping land
The gorgeous sun looks down,
Bathing thee gladly in his noontide ray;
And o'er thy headlands brown
With loving light the tints of evening play:
Thy whispering breezes fear
To break the calm so softly hallowed here.

Here, in her green domain,
The stamp of Nature's sovereignty is found;
With scarce disputed reign
She dwells in all the solitude around:
And here she loves to wear
The regal garb that suits a queen so fair.

Full oft my heart hath yearned
For thy sweet shades and vales of sunny rest.
Even as the swan returned,
Stoops to repose upon thy azure breast,
I greet each welcome spot
Forsaken long—but ne'er, ah, ne'er forgot.

'T was here that memory grew—
'T was here that childhood's hopes and cares were left
Its early freshness, too—
Ere droops the soul, of her best joys bereft:
Where are they?—o'er the track
Of cold years, I would call the wanderers back!

They must be with thee still:
Thou art unchanged—as bright the sunbeams play
From not a tree or hill
Hath time one hue of beauty snatched away:
Unchanged alike should be
The blessed things so late resigned to thee.

Give back, oh, smiling deep,
The heart's fair sunshine, and the dreams of youth
That in thy bosom sleep—
Life's April innocence, and trustful truth!
The tones that breathed of yore
In thy lone murmurs, once again restore.

Where have they vanished all?—
Only the heedless winds in answer sigh;
Still rushing at thy call,
With reckless sweep the streamlet flashes by?
And idle as the air,
Or fleeting stream, my soul's insatiate prayer.

Home of sweet thoughts—farewell!
Where'er through changeable life my lot may be
A deep and hallowed spell
Is on thy waters and thy woods for me.
Though vainly fancy craves
Its childhood with the music of thy waves

TO THE LANCE-FLY.

Forth with the breezy sweep
Of spirit wings upon thy path of light,
Thou creature of the sunbeam! upward keep Thine earth-defying flight!
The glowing west is still;
In hallowed slumber sinks the restless sea;
And heaven's own tints have wrought o'er tree and hill
A purpling canopy.

Go—bathe thy gaudy wing
In freshened azure from the deepening sky—
In the rich gold yon parting sunbeams fling,
Ere yet their glories die.

* The ancient Acadia, comprising Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, was settled by many of the refugee loyalists from the United States.

The boundless air is thine,
The gorgeous radiance of declining day,
Those painted clouds their living hues entwine,
To dark thy heavenward way.

Soar on! my fancies too
Would quit awhile the fading beauties here,
To roam with thee that waste of boundless blue,
And view yon heaven more near!

Lost—in the distant page,
Ere my bewildered thoughts for flight were free;
Farewell! in vain upon the void I gaze,—
I cannot soar like thee!

ELLIS, SARAH STICKNEY,

WAS first known as a writer by her maiden name, Miss Sarah Stickney; one of her early works—"The Poetry of Life"—giving her not only celebrity in her own country, England, but also introducing her favourably to the reading public of America. In 1837, Miss Stickney was married to the Rev. William Ellis, widely known and highly respected for his indefatigable labours, as a Christian missionary, to promote education, and a knowledge of the true God among the people of the South Sea Islands, then just emerging from the most awful idolatry and barbarism. Mr. Ellis was sent out in 1817, by the London Missionary Society, and he it was who established at Tahiti the first printing-press ever erected in the "Green Islands of the Pacific." He devoted ten years to this arduous and effective service, and then returned to London; and some years after the decease of his first wife, who had been his faithful helper and tender comforter in his missionary trials and toils, he found in Miss Sarah Stickney, a second partner worthy to share his home, and aid in the plans, and sympathize in the high hopes of benefiting society which he had cherished. "A good wife is from the Lord;" surely the man who has been thus "twice blest," may well consider the female sex as deserving peculiar honour. That Mr. Ellis does consider woman's education and influence of paramount importance in the progress of true Christian civilization, we infer from Mrs. Ellis's constant devotion to this cause. The wife, doubtless, expresses in her books the moral sentiments, and inculcates the principles which her husband approves, and sees verified in his own family. Such an union of souls as well as hearts and hands, gives the most perfect idea of the Eden happiness true marriage was designed to confer on the human race, which our fallen world exhibits.

Mrs. Ellis, since her marriage, has written many books, almost every year sending forth a new one; among which the series addressed particularly to the women of her own land, is most important. "The Women of England," appeared in 1838, and was followed by "The Daughters of England;" "The Wives of England;" "Hints to Make Home Happy;" "The Iron Rule;" "Summer and Winter in the Pyrenees;" "The Sons of the Soil;" "A Voice from the Vineyard;" "Family Secrets;" &c., &c. In considering the writings of Mrs. Ellis, an estimate of praise must be awarded far beyond that which falls to the more brilliant productions of the day. Candid and conscientious, her principles grounded on sincere religion, it seems the aim of this excellent woman, to be humbly useful in her generation, and make the utmost use of her talents in doing good. Madame de Staël has wittily said—"good intentions are nothing in respect to fine writing." In respect to fine writing this is true; but in respect to useful literature, a very earnest wish to do good, added to moderate abilities and untiring industry, will produce much fruit. There are very many of the half-educated, and wholly untrained, whom Mrs. Ellis's works will improve, and whom they have improved. To such persons, the eloquence and originality of a higher flight, would be but dazzling, and in no wise illuminating. Nor must it be forgotten, how many need common-places, sensibly and clearly expressed. "The Women of England," and the other manuals of this series, are written professedly to direct the young, the unwise, and the ignorant. Neither metaphysical subtlety nor novelty was required to strike the sage and the philosopher. Well known truths, and the sensible reiteration of useful advice are plainly set forth, and the guide of the whole is Christian doctrine. Such works must do good.

The novels of Mrs. Ellis, as novels, are not, certainly, of a high character. According to Rochefoucault, there are two classes of persons unfitted to delineate human nature; those who never look into themselves, and those who never look out of themselves. In a good sense, not an egotistic one, Mrs. Ellis is of this latter class. She has a certain set of characters, framed out of her own fancy, not found in the wide world, and these she fits into her moralities as is convenient for the occasion. Perhaps we underrate her power of observation; but we are loth to believe she pictures truly the condition of her own countrywomen, because, if she does, the character of the men of England must be selfish, sensual, hard and coarse! Where women are represented, not only as subordinate but inferior to men, there can be no true progress in Christian morals; where women are constantly reminded that they must prepare for suffering, we know there must be oppression of the worst sort—even domestic tyranny. Both "Home, or The Iron Rule," and "Family Secrets," leave the impression that, among the middle classes in England, the husband is what Jane Eyre calls Mr. Rochester—the "master" of his wife, as well as his house. Where there is not companionship there can be no sympathy, nor that mutual love and trust which makes the married pair one, as God designed, as Christ directed. Artistically speaking, "The Poetry of Life," is the best work of Mrs. Ellis; without much originality of thought, or any peculiar beauty of style, it shows refined taste and a well-cultured mind; and, like all the books of this authoress, an attempt at something more than merely pleasing, the wish to inculcate the purest morality based upon the religion of the Bible.

MAN AND WOMAN.

Man is appointed to hold the reins of government, to make laws, to support systems, to penetrate with patient labour and undeviating perseverance into the mysteries of science, and to work out the great fundamental principles of truth. For such purposes he would be ill qualified, were he liable to be diverted from his object by the quickness of his perception of external things, by the ungovernable impulse of his own feelings, or by the claims of others upon his regard or sensibility; but woman's sphere being one of feeling rather than of intellect, all her peculiar characteristics are such as essentially qualify her for that station in society which she is designed to fill, and which she never voluntarily quits without a sacrifice of good taste—I might almost say, of good principle. Weak, indeed, is the reasoning of those who would render her dissatisfied with this allotment, by persuading her that the station, which it ought to be her pride to ornament, is one too insignificant or degraded for the full exercise of her mental powers. Can that be an unimportant vocation to which peculiarly belong the means of happiness and misery? Can that be a degraded sphere which not only admits of, but requires the full development of moral feeling? Is it a task too trifling for an intellectual woman, to watch, and guard, and stimulate the growth of reason in the infant mind? Is it a sacrifice too small to practise the art of adaptation to all the different characters met with in ordinary life, so as to influence, and give a right direction to their tastes and pursuits? Is it a duty too easy, faithfully and constantly to hold up an example of self-government, disinterestedness, and zeal for that which constitutes our highest good—to be nothing, or anything that is not evil, as the necessities of others may require—to wait with patience—to endure with fortitude—to attract by gentleness—to soothe by sympathy judiciously applied—to be quick in understanding, prompt in action, and what is perhaps more difficult than all, pliable yet firm in will—lastly, through a life of perplexity, trial, and temptation, to maintain the calm dignity of a pure and elevated character, earthly in nothing but its suffering and weakness; refined almost to sublimity in the seraphic ardour of its love, its faith, and its devotion.

THE LOT OF WOMAN.

In looking at the situation of woman merely as regards this life, we are struck with the system of unfair dealing by which her pliable, weak and dependent nature is subjected to an infinite variety of suffering, and we are ready to exclaim, that of all earthly creatures she is the most pitiable. And so unquestionably she is, when unenlightened by those higher views which lead her hopes away from the disappointments of the present world, to the anticipated fruition promised to the faithful in the world to come.

* * * * *

When we think of the falsehood practised towards women, at that season of life when their minds are most capable of receiving impressions, and when their intellectual powers, just arriving at maturity, are most liable to serious and important bias, we can only wonder that there should be any substantial virtue found amongst them.

WOMAN'S DISINTERESTEDNESS.

In the natural delicacy of woman's constitution, however, we see only one of the slightest causes of suffering peculiar to her character and station in society; because her feelings are so entirely relative and dependent, that they can never be wholly, or even half absorbed by that which is confined to her own experience, without reference to that of others. There are unquestionably many exceptions to this rule, but the rule is the same notwithstanding; and I desire to be understood to speak not of women individually, but of the essential characteristics of woman as a genius. Amongst these characteristics, I am almost proud to name her personal disinterestedness, shown by the unhesitating promptness with which she devotes herself to watchfulness, labour, and suffering of almost every kind, for, or in lieu of others. In seasons of helplessness, misery, or degradation, who but woman comes forward to support, to console, and to reclaim? From the wearisome disquietudes of pining infancy, to the impatience and decrepitude of old age, it is woman alone that bears with all the trials and vexations which the infirmities of our nature draw down upon those around us. Through the monotony of ceaseless misery, it is woman alone that will listen to the daily murmurings of fruitless anxiety, and offer again the cup of consolation after it has been petulantly dashed at her feet.

* * * * *

It is considered a mere duty, too common for observation, and too necessary for praise, when a woman forgets her own sorrows to smile with the gay, or lays aside her own secret joys to weep with the sad. But let lordly man make the experiment for one half hour, and he will then be better acquainted with this system of self-sacrifice, which woman in every station of society, from the palace to the cottage, maintains through the whole of her life, with little commendation, and with no reward, except that which is attached to every effort of disinterested virtue. It is thought much of, and blazoned forth to the world, when the victim at the stake betrays no sign of pain; but does it evince less fortitude for the victim of corroding care to give no outward evidence of the anguish of a writhing soul?—to go forth arrayed in smiles, when burning ashes are upon the heart?—to meet, as a woman can meet, with a never-failing welcome the very cause of all her suffering?—and to woo back with the sweetness of her unchangeable love, him who knows neither constancy nor truth?

From "Home; or The Iron Rule."

THE HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Stephen Grey, the father of this promising family, was a man who gravely and thoughtfully studied the laws of his country, its politics, and the religion of his forefathers; he had even obtained a smattering of philosophy under some of its most practical forms; but of the study of the human heart he had scarcely condescended so much as to think. He loved his children because they were his own; he determined to make them good citizens because it was decent and politic to be so; and good Christians, let us hope, for a better reason. In business, his alacrity, promptness, and ability, were such as to render his influence extensive; while in his household, the will of the master was law. Whatever he chose to plan or put into execution, passed without question or comment, unless behind the scenes; for like Falstaff, he refused to tell his reasons on compulsion.

* * * * *

He believed that all human beings were to be governed by the same iron rule, and that the errors of all might be corrected by the same chastisement. The principle upon which he maintained his authority was that of implicit obedience; but he overlooked the most important part of moral government, the necessity of making obedience a matter of choice, and not of compulsion. Had Stephen Grey permitted the good-will he really felt for his fellow-creatures sometimes to appear before the eyes of men, more especially had he occasionally been known to sacrifice his own personal gratification for that of others, he might have won more affection from the warm young hearts around him; but it is not in human nature to love long or consistently the being who never makes any sacrifice of self, or who never exhibits such natural signs of tenderness as create a bond of protection and dependence between the powerful and the weak.

Let who would be sick or sorry around the board or the hearth of Stephen Grey, his was the choice portion, and the warmest place. Not but that these privileges would have been willingly conceded to him as a right; but his manner was one that conveyed the idea of seizing rather than receiving; and it is wonderful the difference these two ideas produce in the feelings of the party whose place it is to resign.

Yet with all these alarming peculiarities, Stephen Grey was a good neighbour, a lover of peace, an impartial judge, a powerful defender of the injured, and, in short, a man who maintained both in his private and public life a character of the most scrupulous integrity and independence. Indeed, this feeling of independence was carried to such an extreme in all his pecuniary affairs, that it became questionable whether money-making was not the primary object of his existence; not certainly for the purpose of hoarding, for he was penurious in nothing but his domestic management. Here the same rule pervaded the kitchen, the parlour, and the school-room, where industry—that is, the industry of turning every effort and every talent into gold, was established as the cardinal virtue. 'How much will it save,' or 'how much will it cost,' was the universal interlude between every childish petition and its invariable denial; and as the expenses of clothing and education increased with his children's growth, he marked their necessities with as many reproaches as if it had been unnatural to grow, or a crime to learn.

Nor were the religious observances of this family more tempered with the leaven of humanity. There was no pleasure, no congeniality, no meeting of the wants and wishes of our weak nature, in the religious discipline of Stephen Grey; but public justice for the erring, a sure sentence for the culprit, the strong arm for the rebellious, and the same uniform law of implicit obedience, from which there was no appeal, for all.

It may reasonably be asked, how such a man as we have here described could ever stoop to solicit the love of woman—a question which, on the plea of utter ignorance, the writer declines to answer; it having always appeared to her one of the greatest mysteries in life, how men whose very birth-right seems to be the inalienable privilege of commanding, should humble themselves to the common language of love; yet that they do actually solicit, and not command, we cannot for the honour of the female sex permit ourselves to doubt. And certain it is, that Stephen Grey did lead to the altar a fair and gentle bride, who found little difficulty in conforming to the very letter of her vow. It is true, she was hardly prepared for all that followed; for being considered merely as a piece of domestic machinery, whose office was to keep the rest of the household furniture in order; she was not prepared to have all her womanish wishes thwarted as if for very pastime, or to bring up children whose infantine caresses should never meet a father's tenderness; and for some time she persisted in introducing them occasionally to his notice. When they looked their loveliest, and sometimes when her heart was lightest, she would suffer them to reach so far as the sober page upon which her husband's eye was fixed, while the merry urchins would laugh and crow, and pat the rustling paper, until an angry growl, or a sharp stroke upon the little rosy fingers, sent both mother and children into the nursery, to hide their disappointment and their tears. Here it was that Mrs. Grey learned, like many other weak women, to seek the sympathy she was denied, elsewhere; for with her servants she could converse about her children, and in the society of her humble friends she could freely enjoy their playful prattle.

Dangerous as this system of confidence was, it would have been well if the stern discipline of her husband had driven the helpless wife to no other resource; but there was one more lamentable means of escaping the harshness she dared not brook, to which poor Mrs. Grey at last descended, and that was to deceive. It was not her nature, and still less her wish, but she was harassed, frightened, and systematically denied every trifling request, merely because it was a woman's; and though she could have borne all this for herself, for her children she thought it not only justifiable, but meritorious, to find some way of escape. Hence followed the forbidden wish secretly indulged; the detected transgression covered with an evasion—perhaps with more; the unlawful treat when papa was gone from home; and all that fatal undermining of domestic comfort, of social union, and of moral rectitude, so sure to follow when the wide field of deception is once thrown open.

From "The Daughters and Wives of England."

SECRET SORROWS.

Observation and experience have taught me to believe that many of the secret sorrows of woman's life, owe half their poignancy to the disappointment of not being able to maintain the degree of admiration which has been studiously sought. A popular and elegant writer has said—'How often do the wounds of our vanity form the secret of our pathos!' And to the situation, and the feelings of woman, this observation is more especially applicable. Still there is much to be said for woman in this respect. By the nature of her own feelings, as well as by the established rules of polished life, she is thrown, as it were, upon the good-will of society. Unable to assert her own claims to protection, she must endeavour to ensure it by secondary means, and she knows that the protection of man is best ensured by recommending herself to his admiration.

DELICACY.

Though truth should be engraven upon every thought, and word, and act, which occurs in your intercourse with the man of your choice, there is implanted in the nature of woman, a shrinking delicacy, which ought ever to prompt her to keep back some of her affection for the time when she becomes a wife. No woman ever gained, but many, very many have been losers, by displaying all at first. Let sufficient of your love be told, to prevent suspicion, or distrust; and the self-complacency of man will be sure to supply the rest. Suffer it not, then, to be unfolded to its full extent. In the trials of married life, you will have ample need for an additional supply. You will want it for sickness, for sorrow, for all the different exigencies of real experience; but, above all, you will want it to re-awaken the tenderness of your husband, when worldly cares and pecuniary disappointments have too much absorbed his better feelings; and what surprise so agreeable to him, as to discover in his farther progress through the wilderness of life, so sweet, so deep a fountain, as woman's perfect love!

FLATTERY.

To speak of the popular style of conversation used by gentlemen when making themselves agreeable to young ladies, as trifling, is the best thing we can say of it. Its worst characteristic is its falsehood, while its worst tendency is to call forth selfishness, and to foster that littleness of mind, for which man is avowedly the despoiser of woman. If intellectual conversation occupies the company, how often does he turn to whisper nonsense to woman; if he sees her envious of the beauty of her friend, how often does he tell her that her own charms are unrivalled; if he discovers that she is foolishly elated with the triumph of having gained his attentions, how studiously does he feed her folly, waiting only for the next meeting with a boon companion, to treat the whole with that ridicule which it deserves—deserves, but not from him.

It may be—I would fain believe it is, his wish that woman should be simple-hearted, intelligent, generous, frank, and true; but how is his influence in society exercised to make her any one of these? Woman is blamed, and justly so, for idle thoughts, and trifling conversation; but, I appeal to experience, and ask, whether, when a young girl first goes into society, her most trifling conversation is not that which she shares with men. It is true that woman has the power to repel by a look, a word, or even a tone of her voice, the approach of falsehood or folly; and admirable are the instances we sometimes find of woman thus surrounded as it were by an atmosphere of moral purity, through which no vulgar touch can penetrate. But all are not thus happily sustained, and it seems hard that the weaker sex should not only have to contend with the weakness of their own hearts; but that they should find in this conflict, so much of the influence of man on the side of evil.

SINGLE LIFE.

I imagine there are few, if any, who never have had a suitable or unsuitable offer at some time in their lives; and wise, indeed, by comparison, are those who, rather than accept the latter, are content to enjoy the pleasures, and endure the sorrows of life, alone. Compare their lot for an instant with that of women who have married from unworthy motives. How incomparably more dignified, more happy, and more desirable in every way, does it appear! It is true there are times in their experience when they will have to bear what woman bears so hardly—the consciousness of being alone; but they escape an evil far more insupportable—that of being a slighted or an unloved wife.

EMBURY, EMMA CATHARINE,

WAS born in the city of New York, where her father, Dr. James R. Manley, was a distinguished physician. Miss Manley began to write when very young, her first effusions appearing in the periodicals of the day, under the name of "Ianthé."

In 1828, she was married to Daniel Embury, of Brooklyn; and soon afterwards a volume of her youthful compositions was published—entitled "Guido, and other Poems." The choice of subjects for the principal poems was unfortunate. The writer had entered the circle in which L. E. L., Barry Cornwall, and other English writers were then strewing their flowers of fancy, sentiment and genius; no wonder the delicate blossoms offered by our young poetess were considered merely exotics which she had trained from a foreign root; imitations in style, if not in thought.

It is the natural impulse of poetic and ardent minds to admire the genius and glory of Italy, and to turn to that land of bright skies and passionate hearts for themes of song. Mrs. Embury did but follow the then expressed opinion of all European critics, and the admitted acknowledgment of most Americans—that our new world afforded no subjects propitious for the muses.

Yet surely, in a land where the wonders of nature are on a scale of vast and glorious magnificence which Europe cannot parallel; and the beautiful and the fertile are opening their treasures on every side; and enterprise and change, excitement and improvement, are the elements of social life,—there must be poetry! happily "Gertrude of Wyoming," to say nothing of what American poets have written, has settled the question. We have named this subject, chiefly for the purpose of entreating our American writers to look into their own hearts, not into the poems of others, for inspiration, and to sing, in accordance with nature and human life around them,

"The beauteous scenes of our own lovely land."

Mrs. Embury has a fertile fancy, and her versification flows with uncommon ease and grace. In her later poems she has greatly improved her style—that is, she writes naturally, from her own thoughts and feelings, and not from a model; and some of her short pieces are very beautiful. She is, too, a popular prose writer; many sketches and stories from her pen enrich our periodical literature. She is also warmly engaged in the cause of improving her own sex, and has written well on the subject of "Female Education." Since her marriage, Mrs. Embury has published more prose than verse; her contributions to the various periodicals, amount to about one hundred and fifty original tales, besides her poetical articles, all written within the last twenty years. Her published works, during the same time, are "Constance Latimer, or The Blind Girl;" "Pictures of Early Life;" "Nature's Gems, or American Wild Flowers;" "The Waldorf Family;" "Glimpses of Home Life." An eminent American critic remarks of Mrs. Embury's works—"Her stories are founded upon a just observation of life, although not a few are equally remarkable for attractive invention. In point of style, they often possess the merit of graceful and pointed diction, and the lessons they inculcate are invariably of a pure moral tendency." Mrs. Embury has been very fortunate, (we do not say singularly so, because American marriages are usually happy,) in her married life. Mr. Embury is a scholar as well as a banker, and not only has he the taste to appreciate the talents of his gifted wife, but he has had also the good sense to encourage and aid her. The result has been the most perfect concord in their domestic as well as literary life; the only aim of each being to secure and increase the happiness of the other, the highest improvement and happiness of both have been the result. Nor have the pursuits of literature ever drawn Mrs. Embury aside from her duties as a mother; her three children have been trained under her careful supervision, and her daughter's education she has entirely conducted. These traits of character, corresponding so fitly with the principles she has inculcated, increase greatly the value of her works for the young. Consistency is a rare and excellent quality; Mrs. Hannah More placed it high among female virtues.

From "Glimpses of Home Life."

THE ONE FAULT.

I wonder if it ever occurred to a discontented husband that much of the discomfort of his married life might be attributed to this over-estimation which is so general a characteristic of the days of courtship. To man, love is but the interlude between the acts of a busy life—the cares of business, or the severe studies of a profession are the duties of his existence, while the attentions which he bestows on the young and fair being whom he has chosen to share his future lot, are the actual pleasures of his life. He comes to her weary with the sordid anxieties or the oppressive intellectual labours in which he has been engaged, and he finds her ever the gentle minister to his happiness, while the atmosphere which surrounds her is one of such purity and peace, that all his better nature is awakened by her presence. What marvel, then, that he should make her the idol of his dreams, and en throne her on high in his imagination, as the good genius of his life? Wilfully blind to every defect in her character, he views her through the medium of his own excited feelings, and thus, like one who should pretend to judge of the real landscape by beholding its reflection in a Claude Lorraine glass, he sees only the softened lineaments of the actual being. Then comes the hour of disenchantment. In the familiar intercourse of wedded life, he ceases to be the worshipper at an idol's shrine. The love still exists, perhaps even increases in its fervour, but the blind worship is at an end; she is now his fellow-traveller through the rugged and dusty path of life, and she must bear with him the heat and burden of the day.

But it often happens that the past has not been without its evil influence upon her. She has been taken from among her companions, and set on high as an object of adoration; the intellect of man has been humbled before her, and her very caprices have been laws to him. Is it to be wondered at, if she cannot at once resign her queenly station, and become the gentle and submissive and forbearing woman? Is it strange that the reproof or the cold rebuke of him who once taught her that she was all perfection, should sound strangely to her ear, and fall with bitterness upon her heart? The change which takes place in the mere manners of him who was once the devoted lover, is hard to understand. "I cannot describe," said a lady, who was by no means remarkable for sensitiveness of feeling, "I cannot describe how unhappy I felt the first time after my marriage, that my husband put on his hat and walked out of the house to his daily business, without bidding me farewell. I thought of it all the morning, and wondered whether he was displeased with me, nor until I had questioned him on the subject, did I discover, (what was perhaps equally painful to me then,) that he was so occupied with his business, as to have forgotten it." Many a misunderstanding in married life has arisen out of circumstances as trifling as the one just recorded; for when a woman has been made to believe that she is the sole object of her lover's thoughts, it is difficult for her to realize that the act which transfers to him the future guardianship of her happiness, exonerates him from those minute attentions, which have hitherto contributed so much to her enjoyment. Do not, mistake me, gentle reader; I do not mean to say as some have ventured to assert, that "Courtship is a woman's Paradise, and Marriage her Purgatory," for many a blessed experience would quickly give the lie to any such false theory; but I would merely suggest whether this exaltation of a mistress into something more than woman, before marriage, does not tend to produce a reaction of feeling, which is apt to degrade her into something less than the rest of her sex afterwards; and whether he who saw no faults in his "ladye-love" will not be likely to see more than she ever possessed, in his wife?

Charles Wharton had certainly committed this common error. Loving his mother and sisters with the most devoted affection, he had learned to regard them as models of feminine virtue and grace, yet there was something of sombre and grave in their characters, which did not exactly agree with his beau-ideal of woman,

"Skilled alike to dazzle and to please."

He was therefore peculiarly susceptible to the charms of playful wit and gayety in his beloved Mary, and finding her thus in possession of the only gift which was wanting in his home circle, he, by a very natural error, attributed to her all the other qualities which he found there in such perfection. He had created an imaginary being, who should unite the lighter graces with the nobler virtues, and fascinated by the beauty, and the sunny temper of Miss Lee, he found no difficulty in embodying in her form his ideal mistress. For a time he was perfectly enchanted, but the familiar intercourse of married life at length discovered some defects in the character of the young and light-hearted wife, and Wharton, feeling as men are apt to do,

"As charm by charm unwinds,
That robbed their idol,"

was almost tempted to believe that he had utterly deceived himself.

But in this opinion he was as far wrong as when he had fancied her all perfection. Mary possessed all the material for forming an estimable woman, but she was young, thoughtless, and untaught. She was one of a family who lived but for society, and whose deportment to each other was an exemplification of the old copy-book apophthegm, "Familiarity breeds contempt." The self-respect which inculcates personal neatness as a duty—the respect towards each other, which should be as carefully cherished between brothers and sisters, as the affection which, in truth, will not long exist without it—were entirely unknown among them. In society, they were models of propriety, but, in the domestic circle, there was a want of method, and a neglect of neatness, which could not fail to be injurious to every member of the family. I may be mistaken, but, it seems to me, that habitual slovenliness cannot fail to have its effect upon the mental as well as the bodily habits. To a well balanced mind, external order seems as essential as intellectual purity, and however great may be the genius, there is surely something wanting to a perfect equilibrium of the faculties, when the body—through the medium of which ideas must necessarily be conveyed to the mind—is habitually neglected, and consequently exposed to disgusting rather than agreeable images. But whatever may be the effect of a want of neatness on one's individual character, there is no doubt as to its influence on others. No man can have a proper respect for female purity and delicacy, when he has been accustomed, from childhood, to witness slovenly habits in his mother and sisters; for that chivalric feeling towards the gentler sex, which has preserved many a man from the early attacks of vice, never exists in the heart of him who has had the barriers of refinement broken down, ere he left his childhood's home.

Mrs. Wharton was not deficient in personal cleanliness; few women are found guilty of so revolting a fault; but she wanted personal neatness and order. She had learned to treat her husband as she was accustomed to do her brothers, and while she never appeared before company in an undress, scarcely ever honoured him with anything else. Her breakfast dress has already been described, and if the day happened to be rainy, or anything else occurred to induce her to deny herself to visitors, she generally greeted her husband's eye in the same loose and flowing robes at dinner, as well as tea. Her total ignorance of everything like method, was visible throughout all her domestic arrangements. Instead of directing her servants, she only reproved them, for she found it much easier to scold when a thing was ill done, than to attend to having it well done. Her domestics soon became familiar with her ignorance of the details of housekeeping, and availed themselves of it to neglect their duty as much as possible; and, when she began to add to her other defects, that of indolence, her household fell into a state which cannot be better designated than by the expressive Irish word, "Througthotherness."

Such was the state of things at the end of the first two years of their married life. Mrs. Wharton, disheartened and dispirited, took little interest in her family concerns, while her husband, accustomed to seek his enjoyments elsewhere, found always something to censure at home. Fortunately his good principles kept him from the haunts of dissipation, or he might have added another to the list of those who have been driven, by an ill-ordered home, to a well-ordered tavern or billiard-room. His mother had long seen and mourned his evident disquiet, and, while she partially divined its cause, was in doubt as to the course which she ought to pursue. She was aware of the danger of interference in the domestic concerns of another, but she could not bear to see her son and his sweet-tempered wife so estranged from each other.

"You are unhappy, Charles," said the old lady, one day, when they were alone. "Will you not tell me the cause of your trouble? Is it your business?"

"No, mother, my business was never in a more prosperous condition."

"Then something is wrong at home, my son; can you not confide in me?"

"Oh, there is nothing to tell; Mary is one of the best-hearted and good-tempered creatures in the world, but—"

"But what, Charles?"

"She has one fault, mother, and it is about the worst she could have."

"The worst, Charles? Is she ill-tempered, or deficient in affection for you? Does she run into extravagant excesses for dress or company?"

"Why, mother, you know she has none of these defects?"

"Then, Charles, she has not the worst faults she might have."

"Well, well, perhaps I used too strong a term, but really I am heart-sick—I have a house, but no home—I have servants, but no service for them—I have a wife, but no helpmeet; I cannot yet afford to keep a housekeeper, and until I can, I see no probability of finding comfort at home. Mary is as ignorant as a baby, of all that the mistress of a family ought to know, and I am tired of living at the mercy of a pack of careless domestics."

"Mary has been unfortunate in not learning such duties in her early home, Charles, but certainly there is no difficulty in acquiring a knowledge of them now; did you ever try to teach her?"

"Try to teach housekeeping, mother? no, indeed; I should as soon think of teaching a woman how to put on her dress; who ever heard of a man teaching his wife how to keep house?"

"I will tell you, Charles, what you might have taught her; you have such habits of order, and are so systematic in your arrangement of time, that you could easily have imparted to her your notions on such subjects, without appearing to meddle with woman's affairs, and when she had once learned them, half her task would have been accomplished."

"A woman ought not to be married till she knows her duties. The parent who allows a daughter to marry, when conscious that she is utterly ignorant of these, is guilty of an actual imposition upon the luckless husband."

"You would scarcely expect a parent to blazon his child's defects, Charles; a man chooses a wife for himself—he marries with his eyes open."

"No, I'll be hanged if he does! he is blinded by a pretty face, at first, and then the lady and her friends take good care to noose him, before he gets his eyes open."

"You are angry, Charles, and I am afraid you have used bitter words, rather than arguments, with poor Mary."

"Mother, I am as unhappy as ever was mortal man; I love home—I love my wife, but when I seek both, I am disgusted by the sight of a disordered house and a slovenly woman, and my feelings are instantly changed into anger and almost dislike. I shall break up housekeeping in the spring; I can't bear it any longer."

"I think I could remedy the evil of which you complain, if I was only sure that Mary would not resent my interference."

"Resent! why, mother, she never resents any thing; I never heard an angry word from her in my life, and I have given her many a one." Mrs. Wharton looked significantly at her son, as he made this acknowledgment, and smiled, as she promised to make the attempt.

It happened, not long after the conversation above narrated, that Charles Wharton was taken seriously ill, and his mother became an inmate of his family until his recovery. There is nothing which so effectually subdues wrathful feelings, and obliterates the recollection of past unkindness, as the touch of sickness. When death sits watching beside the bed of pain, the animosity of a life-long enemy seems like a sin against the charities of life, and how much more vain and wicked seem the angry bickerings of those whom love has bound together! Charles saw nothing of the sloven in the attentive and devoted nurse, who untiringly ministered to his wants, and Mary felt more happiness, notwithstanding her apprehensions, than she had enjoyed for many months. But Mrs. Wharton, the mother, now obtained a clear insight into the difficulties which had marred their domestic comfort, and, no sooner was Charles restored to convalescence, than she set herself to the task of subduing them. Fortunately for her scheme, Mary possessed that perfect good temper which was not to be ruffled even by the interference of a mother-in-law, and Mrs. Wharton had sufficient tact to know just how far that interference could be carried with success. In the course of the frequent confidential conversations which occurred between the mother and wife, during the time when both were engrossed in the care of the invalid, Mary learned much of her husband's early tastes and habits, of which she had before been utterly ignorant. She heard, but not in the language of personal rebuke, of his peculiar notions of order and system, and her mind, which had unconsciously acquired habits of reflection and thought in her hours of solitude, began to understand the benefit of a regular and well-ordered plan of life. But still she was at a loss to know exactly how to arrange such a plan, and it was not until she had summoned sufficient moral courage, (smile not, reader, it required no small share of it,) to explain her dilemma, and ask the aid of her mother-in-law, that she was enabled to enter upon her new course of life.

Following the advice of Mrs. Wharton, the first bad habit which she corrected, was that of indulging in morning slumbers. Early rising afforded her the time to attire herself with neatness and propriety, while it also gave her the opportunity of visiting the important domain of the 'Land of Cookery,' and of inspecting the arrangement of the morning meal. It required a serious struggle with that hardest of all tyrants, Indolence, but Mrs. Wharton soon found that bad habits are like the bonds with which the Lilliputians fettered the slumbering Gulliver—united, it was impossible to break the fragile threads, but if taken singly each could be severed by the movement of a finger. One by one she contended against her former faults. It required not only resolution, but the rarer virtue of perseverance, to carry all her good intentions into effect, for many a week and month elapsed, ere she could fully arrange the mechanism of her domestic concerns. In truth, it is no small task to regulate the microcosm of a household—to manage in such a manner as to bestow the greatest proportion of comfort upon each individual—to divide the duties of domestics, so as to secure the performance of business in its proper time, and the enjoyment of leisure when the tasks are over—to remember and provide for the wants of all—to study the peculiar tastes of each—to preserve order and neatness throughout the multifarious departments of domestic life—and to do all this without neglecting the claims of friendship and society—without relinquishing the cultivation of one's mind, and the study of one's own heart—without becoming a mere household drudge. It is no easy task, yet it may be done; the first steps in this, as in all other labours, are the most difficult; only employ the aid of system in the beginning, and all may be fully accomplished.

From "Poems."

THE WIDOW'S WOOLER.

He woos me with those honied words
That women love to hear,
Those gentle flatteries that fall
So sweet on every ear.
He tells me that my face is fair,
Too fair for grief to shade;
My cheek, he says, was never meant
In sorrow's gloom to fade.

He stands beside me, when I sing
The songs of other days.
And whispers, in love's thrilling tones,
The words of heartfelt praise;
And often in my eyes he looks,
Some answering love to see—
In vain! he there can only read
The faith of memory.

He little knows what thoughts awake,
With every gentle word;
How, by his looks and tones, the founts
Of tenderness are stirred.
The visions of my youth return,
Joys far too bright to last;
And while he speaks of future bliss,
I think but of the past.

Like lamps in Eastern sepulchres,
Amid my heart's deep gloom,
Affection sheds its holiest light
Upon my husband's tomb.
And as those lamps, if brought once more
To upper air, grow dim,
So my soul's love is cold and dead,
Unless it glow for him.

NEVER FORGET.

Never forget the hour of our first meeting,
When, mid the sounds of revelry and song,
Only thy soul could know that mine was greeting
Its idol, wished for, waited for, so long.
Never forget.

Never forget the joy of that revelation,
Centring an age of bliss in one sweet hour,
When Love broke forth from friendship's frail concealment
And stood confest to us in godlike power:
Never forget.

Never forget my heart's intense devotion,
Its wealth of freshness at thy feet flung free—
Its golden hopes, whelmed in that boundless ocean,
Which merged all wishes, all desires, save thee:
Never forget.

Never forget the moment when we parted—
When from life's summer-cloud the bolt was hurled
That drove us, scathed in soul and broken-hearted,
Alone to wander through this desert world.
Never forget.

STANZAS.

"The night cometh, when no man can work."

Ye who in the field of human life
Quickening seeds of wisdom fain would sow,
Pause not for the angry tempest's strife,
Shrink not from the noontide's fervid glow,
Labour on, while yet the light of day
Sheds upon your path its blessed ray,
For the Night cometh!

Ye who at man's noblest engine stand,
Moulding noble thought into opinion,
Oh! stay not for weariness your hand,
Till ye fix the bounds of truth's dominion,
Labour on while yet the light of day
Sheds upon your path its blessed ray,
For the Night cometh!

Ye to whom a prophet-voice is given,
Stirring men as by a trumpet call:
Utter forth the oracles of Heaven,
Earth gives back the echoes as they fall;
Oh, speak not, while yet the light of day
Breaks life's slumber with its blessed ray,
For the Night cometh!

Ye who in home's narrow circle dwell,
Feeding love's flame upon the household hearth,
Weave the silken bond, and wake the spell,
Binding heart to heart throughout the earth:
Gentle toil is yours, the light of day
On nought holier sheds its blessed ray,
Yet the Night cometh!

Diverse though our paths in life may be,
Each is sent some mission to fulfil,
Fellow-workers in the world are we
While we seek to do our Master's will,
But our doom is labour, while the light of day
Lights us to our tasks with blessed ray,
For the Night cometh!

Fellow-workers are we,—hour by hour,
Human tools are shaping Heaven's great schemes,
Till we see no limit to man's power,
And reality outstrips old dreams:
Toil and struggle, therefore, work and weep,
In "God's Acre" ye shall calmly sleep,
When the Night cometh!

FANTASTICI, ROSELLINA MASSIMINA,

Is an Italian, born in the city of Pisa, near the close of the last century. The daughter of a very accomplished mother, Rosellina had, from maternal care, uncommon advantages of education. She appeared at an early age to have a remarkable talent for miniature-painting, and attained great excellence in that art. Her marriage displayed her good qualities as a wife and mother, and also as the manager of household economy; but these occupations, though properly fulfilled, do not, or need not, suspend the intellectual improvement of women. Madame Fantastici found time to pursue her painting, until after the birth of her fifth child; when her eyes failing her, she was obliged to give up entirely the practice of this art. She then occupied her leisure hours with literature, and obtained the silver medal from the Academy of Pistoia for one of her poems. When her children were old enough to require her constant attention, she devoted her time entirely to their education, and wrote nothing but little plays and stories, expressly for their improvement. She experiences the reward of these cares in the love and reverence with which her children regard her. She is now emancipated from her duties as teacher, and has returned with renewed ardour to her beloved studies, the fruits of which will no doubt in time enrich the literature of her country. Her published works are—"A Collection of Sonnets and Odes," "Cefale e Procri," a poem in octave-rhyme, and "Four little plays for children." She now resides in Pisa.

FARLEY, HARRIET,

WELL and widely known as editor of "The Lowell, or New England Offering," a monthly magazine of industry, the contributors being factory girls, employed in the mills at Lowell, Massachusetts. This work has excited more interest in Europe than any other written by American female authors, because it is entirely unparalleled in the annals of factory life; and in no country, except America, is such a proof of female intellect yet possible. As one of the pioneers in this new development of mental culture and moral progress, and the chief agent by whom it has been upheld, Miss Farley deserves the good celebrity she has gained. We design to let her tell her own story, as it is impossible to give so true an impression of her character by any other delineation. The simplicity and earnest sincerity of spirit in which her letter is written, make this scrap of autobiography a model of its kind. Yet, lest there might be one reader who would be offended by this open-hearted sketch, and call it egotistic, we add, that Miss Farley had no idea that her language would be quoted.

"My father is a congregational clergyman, and at the time of my birth was settled in the beautiful town of Claremont, in the state of New Hampshire. Though I left this place when six years of age, I still remember its natural beauties, which even then impressed me deeply. The Ashcutney Mountain, Sugar River, with its foaming falls, the distant hills of Vermont, all are in my memory. My mother was descended from the

*The German name of a burial ground.

Moody's, somewhat famous in New England history. One of them was the eccentric and influential Father Moody. Another was Handkerchief Moody, the one who wore, so many years, 'the minister's veil.' One was the well-known Trustee Moody, of Dummer Academy, who educated my grandmother. She was a very talented and estimable lady.

"My father was of the genuine New Hampshire stock—from a family of pious, industrious, agricultural people; his brothers being deacons, and some of his sisters married to deacons. I have not learned that any one of them ever committed a disgraceful act. His grandmother was eminent for her medical knowledge and skill, and had as much practice as is usually given to a country doctor. His mother was a woman of fine character, who exerted herself, and sacrificed much, to secure his liberal education. His sisters were energetic in their coöperation with their husbands, to secure and improve homes among the White and the Green Mountains, and Wisconsin. So much for progenitors.

"I was the sixth of ten children, and, until fourteen, had not that health which promises continued life. I was asthmatic, and often thought to be in a consumption. I am fortunate now in the possession of excellent health, which may be attributed to a country rearing, and an obedience to physical laws, so far as I understand them. At fourteen years of age, I commenced exertions to assist in my own maintenance, and have at different times followed the various avocations of New England girls. I have plaited palm-leaf and straw, bound shoes, taught school, and worked at tailoring; besides my labours as a weaver in the factory, which suited me better than any other.

"After my father's removal to the little town of Atkinson, New Hampshire, he combined the labours of preceptor of one of the two oldest Academies in the State with his parochial duties; and here, among a simple but intelligent people, I spent those years which give the tone to female character. At times, there was a preceptress to the academy; but it was in the summer, when I was debilitated, and my lessons were often studied on my bed. I learned something of French, drawing, ornamental needle-work, and the usual accomplishments; for it was the design of my friends to make me a teacher—a profession for which I had an instinctive dislike. But my own feelings were not consulted. Indeed, perhaps it was not thought how much these were outraged; but their efforts were to suppress the imaginative and cultivate the practical. This was, undoubtedly, wholesome discipline; but it was carried to a degree that was painful, and drove me from my home. I came to Lowell, determined that if I had my own living to obtain, I would get it in my own way; that I would read, think and write, when I could, without restraint; that if I did well, I would have the credit of it; if ill, my friends should be relieved from the blame, if not from the stigma. I endeavoured to reconcile them to my lot, by a devotion of all my spare earnings to them and their interests. I made good wages; I dressed economically; I assisted in the liberal education of one brother; and endeavoured to be the guardian angel to a lovely sister, who, after years of feebleness, is now, perhaps, a guardian angel to me in heaven. Twice before this had I left "the mill," to watch around the death-beds of loved ones—my older sister and a beautiful and promising brother. Two others had previously died; two have left their native State for a Texan home. So you will see that my feelings must have been severely tried. But all this has, doubtless, been beneficial to me.

"It was something so new to me to be praised, and encouraged to write, that I was at first overwhelmed by it, and withdrew as far as possible from the attentions that some of my first contributions to the 'Offering' directed towards me. It was with great reluctance that I consented to edit, and was quite as unwilling at first to assist in publishing. But circumstances seem to have compelled me forward as a business woman, and I have endeavoured to do my duty.

"I am now the proprietor of 'The New England Offering.' I do all the publishing, editing, canvassing, and, as it is bound in my office, I can, in a hurry, help fold, cut covers, stitch, &c. I have a little girl to assist me in the folding, stitching, &c.; the rest, after it comes from the printer's hand, is all my own work. I employ no agents, and depend upon no one for assistance. My edition is four thousand.

"These details, I trust, are not tedious; I have given them, because I thought there was nothing remarkable about the 'Offering' but its source, and the mode in which it was conducted.

"Indeed, I thought at one time of begging you not to insert my name in your book; and was only dissuaded by the reflection that you could not be expected to unearth all the gems which may be hidden in the caverns of this age, or prophesy of those who are to be famous in the future, but only to note those whose names, from whatever adventitious or meretricious circumstances, have gone forth, even if thrown from the point of a shuttle.

"I consider myself superior to many of my sex, principally in qualities where they all might equal me—in hope, perseverance, content and kindness."

Thus frankly, but with true modesty, does this singularly gifted young woman close her reminiscences, without one allusion to her genius, or a complaint that she has only had a few fragments of time to give to the pursuit of literature, which is, in truth, the desire of her heart.

The greater portion of all she has written has appeared in the "Offering;" but in 1847 she selected from these pieces, and added a few original, making a volume, published in Boston under the title of "Shells from the Strand of the Sea of Genius." In the dedication of this book, Miss Farley touches a string which should make every parental heart vibrate—"To my Father and Mother, who gave me that education which has enlivened years of labour; and, while constituting my own happiness, has enabled me to contribute to the enjoyment of others." Let those who think education unnecessary for "operatives," consider what it has done for Harriet Farley, and what sweet reward she has rendered to those who trained her!

Indeed we may truly say, that few poets, philosophers, or fine writers, have accomplished half that has been effected by the Editor of the "New England Offering." Without unnecessary flourishes, we may call the consequences that must follow the impulse she has given to her own order, immense and wonderful. Her energy, her example, her own life, standing forth to prove her theories, have been of more value than a library of dissertations, to advance intellectual improvement and elevated morality among thousands of the young countrywomen of America now found in the large and constantly increasing class of "factory girls." To submit these unpretending compositions, written to improve the leisure hours of actual labour, to the rules of criticism, made for those who have been fed upon learning in college halls, or who have lived in an atmosphere of literature, art, and elegance, would be both foolish and ungenerous. Yet this "Offering," the production wholly of female operatives, is a work of which any country might be justly proud. The good sense, good principles, and useful information found in its pages, prove the respectable, we may say, dignified, position in which industry and laudable ambition for intellectual culture, may maintain the operative portion of our community. The shocking pictures English writers give us of factory life in their own land, form a painful contrast to this.

Miss Farley stands at the head of her collaborateurs, not only in her capacity of editor, but in her superiority as a writer; yet she has many and talented assistants, contributors, who deserve to share with her in the honour of this new literature. "Mind among the Spindles," is the title given to a handsome volume, selected from the "Lowell Offering," and published in London in 1849. The English critics have acknowledged the merit of the work, and also their astonishment at the intellectual progress which it proves the American people to have made. But we do not rate the genius displayed in the "Offering" as constituting a tithe of its merit. It is the moral goodness, the true Gospel sentiment pervading every page which stamps its inestimable value. Rejecting all the fashionable isms of the day, resisting all persuasions from those who have striven to draw their journal into the arena of party, these noble-minded young women have been true to their sex and to their Saviour. The "Lowell Offering" was first issued in January, 1841; in 1843, Miss Harriet F. Curtis, an operative, was associated with Miss Farley in the editorial department, in which she continued two years. We quote the following sound doctrine from the pen of the former—

"We started with no lance or spear to fight battles, not even our own—our aim was 'to elevate the humble, and show that good might come out even of Nazareth.' Individually we have no sentiments or sympathies in unison with that spirit which would reform its neighbour and leave its own heart the abode of every bitter, malignant passion—which devotes so much time to hunting the mote in a brother's eye, that it has no time to find the beam in its own, and which publishes upon the folds of its banner, that its aim is, to level, not to elevate. We would not pull down the superior to the position of the more humble, but would raise the humble to the elevation of the superior. And this, we feel assured, can never be done but by the moral means of education, and the all-pervading influence of true Christianity."

But we must return to the subject of our sketch. The following are from Miss Farley's writings.

From "The Lowell Offering."

THE WINDOW DARKENED.

I had a lovely view from my window, but it was not of a level landscape, nor a group of towering hills; it was neither city nor country exclusively, but a combination of both. I looked from the central street of a city across a narrow strip of vacant land, divided by a quiet stream, to a slope, covered with the residences of those who prefer the comparative stillness of the suburb to the bustle of the heart of a city.

It was like a beautiful picture—that glittering panorama—when the sunshine flashed back from the whitened dwellings, as they rose one above another upon the green amphitheatre—the mansions more distinct and more splendid as they approached the summit of the hill, and but two or three magnificent dwellings graced like a radiant crown its verdant brow. Yes, it was beautiful in the glorious sunlight, when countless windows flashed forth a diamond radiance, but just as lovely, though more subdued in the influence of its charms, in the grey twilight, or at eve, or moonlit night.

I have watched the footsteps of Night, as she crept slowly up the hill, her dark shadow falling before her, until the roof-tree of the highest mansion lay hid beneath her shroud. And then the moon, like a gentle conqueror, stole placidly above the brightening horizon, and Night awoke to smiles and peace. She lifted her shroud from the fair earth, and a gentle day had dawned upon the world. Another day—yes, for that was no time to sleep—it was no night—while so soft, so exquisite a brilliance bathed that congregated mass of life and beauty.

My window!—it was my only constant companion. It told me of sunshine and of storm; it heralded the morn, and warned me of the waning light of day. It gave me, gratis, a ticket to that picture-gallery, where my eye wandered on an involuntary, though oft-repeated, tour of pleasure.

My window!—it has taught me much in quiet pantomime; and its lessons did not weary, for they were ever varying, and ever new.

My window!—it gave me light for constant occupations—it gave me daily bread with the pleasure and instruction which it afforded me, and my window was to be darkened.

I have alluded to the narrow waste beyond the stream. My window told me that there was to be laid the foundation of a mighty structure. It was a sad tale to hear, but, as if to make amends, my window each day exhibited an active, bustling and novel scene, such as it had not shown me before. There were shouting crowds of men, digging deep the trenches for the foundation stones, and boats came up the monotonous stream with the solid granite for their freight. This continued so long that I almost wearied of my window's show; but after a time it was over, and the walls were commenced. Now boats came up the stream laden with brick, and huge red piles arose upon its banks. The red walls arose—red, the colour of the conqueror—and they proclaimed a victory over my pleasures. With one story of the great fabric was screened from me whole streets of pleasant dwellings. The early sunrise was gone—the blush of morn—those brilliant clouds, the orphans of departed Night, and happy wards of coming day. The first soft glance of moonlight was forever hid, and it seemed as though my best treasures were taken from me. But I clung more fervently to those which were left, and the more tenaciously as I saw them departing. This beautiful dwelling, and that majestic tree, were never to me so lovely as when they were shut from my window's view. Then I began to measure with my eye the scene, and to calculate how long I should retain this or that beauty, and what might remain at the last. The church spire—that I should always have—and those highest houses, and the brow of the hill. But no! I had not calculated wisely. They began to recede from me—for the huge building rose still higher and higher. Men walked around the scaffoldings, as of old they patrolled the ramparts of some giant castle, and at night the unfinished walls, relieved against the dark sky, might well remind a reader of romance of the descriptions of ancient chateaux, with their high massive turreted walls.

Higher, higher still, arose the fabric. The mansions were gone—the church—the brow of the hill—and at last the very tip of the spire was taken from me. Oh! how was my window darkened!—but not quite dark, for there still was light from the skies above.

And thus, methought, it is in life. We look, with the eye of youth, through Hope's magical window, upon a fair world. Earth lies like a glorious panorama before us. Our own path leads on at first like the crowded street, amidst the hum of business, but it soon stretches forward to the place where lie combined the pleasures and leisure of the country. Yes, our anticipated life seems like that brilliant amphitheatre, crowded and exciting at first, but more quiet, more imposing and beautiful, as we look upward. The minor details of the scenery are not carefully scanned. We look not at the narrow dusty paths through which we must trace our steps, nor at the stones against which we may often dash our feet, nor the intruders who will dispute our way. We consider not that we may falter, or faint, or fall; and there is always at the top of the hill some mansion which is to us the temple of riches, fame and pleasure.

But while we look upon the scene, it sinks from our view. The stern realities of life arise before us like the brick-built wall, and we see the prose where we have before but witnessed the poetry of this world's scenes.

We know that our pleasures are passing away—that our window is darkening—but we think that the tallest trees, the highest mansions, the summit of the hill, will yet be left. But sterner and higher still arises the wall before us. One hope after another is gone—one pleasure after another has been taken away—one image after another, which has been lovely to our eye, and dear to our heart, has forever disappeared. The church-spire, with its heaven-pointing finger, leaves us last. But finally it has been taken, and we must turn to whatever temple we may have prepared within.

How has the scene changed! How is our window darkened! Yet we grope not in utter darkness, for there still is light from the heavens above. We are subdued—with hearts rightly attuned not miserable. We look forward less, but upward more. We are more peaceful, if less joyful; and we transfer the bright pictures, which the window has daguerreotyped upon our memories, to another and more enduring world. We think that had the wall been still higher—had it encircled us yet more closely, there would still have been light above; and, unless, Heaven itself is shut from our view, there will be bright starbeams, and calm moonlight, and blessed sunshine, coming down, and struggling towards us through the darkened window.

DEAL GENTLY.

"Can you name her now so lightly?"

Once the idol of you all:—

When a star has shone so brightly.

Can you glory in its fall?" T. MOORE.

There were loud voices in Madam Bradshaw's little sitting-room: tones of anger, derision, and reproach, uttering words of detraction. Madam sat silently listening to her young visitors, but her brow contracted, and her lips compressed, as harsh feelings seemed to strengthen by an open expression of them. She remembered that just one year before this Sophy Melton had come to visit her, with the same young ladies who were now paying her their annual visit.

Madam Bradshaw was the widow of the old village clergyman; who, when he died, left her poor, though not destitute. In the parish she had been much respected and beloved, and there was no fear that Madam would ever be left to want, among so many friends. They had a very delicate way of bestowing their bounty, and made several annual parties; when they went to the old parsonage always "carrying their welcome." The children went when her cherries were ripe; the married ladies, at Thanksgiving time, bringing their bounties; the elderly spinsters—considerate souls—just after Fast, and did her spring cleaning for her, and replenished her exhausted winter stores. The misses came when her roses were in blossom, and her front garden was one little wilderness of fragrant beauty. Then they did up her summer caps, collars, and neckerchiefs, and saw that her wardrobe needed no addition.

Among those who came with the roses, "herself a fairer flower," had been Sophy Melton; but this year she was absent, and Madam missed her bright smile and sweet voice. The morning was busily passed by the girls in washing, starching, and ironing—the afternoon in mending and making for the good old lady.

But now the sewing was all done, the tea-table had been nicely cleared away, and, as twilight came on, the girls sat in the old parlour talking of their past and future annual visits. How they loved this old room—the old pictures in their heavy frames—the dark mahogany, polished to the brightness of crystal—the worn and faded but spotless carpet, the old china, as perfect as ever—the well kept silver, and her store of curiosities, as curious as ever. Then there were her portraits, upon which they all loved to gaze. There was the old pastor himself, looking at them from the canvass as benignly as he had ever done from the pulpit. There was the son, who had gone a missionary to foreign lands, and left name and fame, if nought else, to his fond mother. There was the noble boy, too, who left his mother for a long voyage to the Arctic seas, and was never heard of more. There was the mild but steadfast daughter, who had gone to the far West, and laid down her life in that home missionary enterprise, the education of the young. The girls loved to look upon those relics, and feel, awakening in themselves, aspirations for that excellence which had been embodied and lived by those who had now passed away.

Perhaps they imagined they were showing respect for virtue by their severe remarks upon Sophy Melton; but Madam Bradshaw was evidently displeased. At length she spoke:

"Can you name her now so lightly?" &c.

The girls were abashed for a moment.

But Caroline Freeman replied, "Ma' Bradshaw, I have not yet spoken; but I have not attempted to stop my friends, for it has always appeared to me that the reproach of the good was but the just penalty for this violation of the laws of virtue. Sophy's error has not brought upon her poverty, pain, or any diminution of the physical enjoyments of life. If her friends must still, from motives of compassion or philanthropy, countenance her, where is the punishment society should inflict for contempt of its opinions?"

"I asked you not to countenance her, or associate with her, not to speak lightly of her sin, or accustom yourselves to think of it as a venial error; but, my dear girls, I only beg of you to deal gently. Let compassion, rather than resentment, influence your thoughts of her. I have seen anger where I would have beheld grief. Moreover, may there not be too much self-confidence exhibited in such remarks? You place yourselves among the good. Sophy has perhaps once thought herself as good, as safe as either of you. She was the most beautiful, the most fascinating of you all, therefore, the most tried and tempted. Be not angry with me, when I bid you ask yourselves whether there is not a little gratified envy in all these aspersions of your fallen sister; whether there is not a slight feeling of triumph, that the first has now become the last; that she who was greatest is now the least among you?"

"O, Ma' Bradshaw! deal gently with us. We never envied her; we were proud that one so beautiful, and, as we thought, so good, was of our little band. We do not rejoice, we mourn that the most beautiful star is lost from our little constellation. But, how are we to show our hatred of wickedness, unless we speak severely of sin? Were we to speak mildly of this fault, might we not be misunderstood? You must remember that our principles have not been tested by a long life, as our dear Ma' Bradshaw's have been."

"My dear girls," said Madam, "do not think there is no better way of showing your detestation of sin than by reproach or vituperation of the fellow-being who has fallen into it. Keep your own garments spotless, your own hearts clean, your own hands unstained, and then fear not that your commiseration of the sinful and guilty will ever be misunderstood—that pity will be mistaken for sympathy, that kindness will be thought weakness. Never fear, with a clear conscience and a firm heart, to deal gently."

FERRIER, MARY,

Was born in Edinburgh. Her father, James Ferrier, Esq., was a writer to the Signet, "one of Sir Walter Scott's brethren of the clerk's table;" and the great novelist, at the conclusion of the "Tales of my Landlord," alluded to his "sister shadow," the author of "the very lively work entitled Marriage," as one of the labourers capable of gathering in the large harvest of Scottish character and fiction. In his private diary, Sir Walter has thus jotted down his reminiscences of Miss Ferrier:—"She is a gifted personage, having, besides her great talents, conversation the least exigeante of any author, female at least, whom I have ever seen, among the long list I have encountered; simple, full of humour, and exceedingly ready at repartee; and all this without the least affectation of the blue-stocking." Commenting on this, Mr. Chambers, in his "Cyclopædia of Literature," thus endorses the opinion of the great novelist:—"This is high praise; but the readers of Miss Ferrier's novels will at once recognise it as characteristic, and exactly what they would have anticipated. Miss Ferrier is a Scottish Miss Edgeworth—of a lively, practical, penetrating cast of mind; skilful in depicting character, and seizing upon national peculiarities; caustic in her wit and humour, with a quick sense of the ludicrous; and desirous of inculcating sound morality and attention to the courtesies and charities of life. In some passages, indeed, she evinces a deep religious feeling, approaching to the evangelical views of Hannah More; but the general strain of her writing relates to the foibles and oddities of mankind, and no one has drawn them with greater breadth of comic humour or effect. Her scenes often resemble the style of our best old comedies.

and she may boast, like Foote, of adding many new and original characters to the stock of our comic literature."

"Marriage," the first work of Miss Ferrier, was published in 1818. "The Inheritance" appeared in 1824, and "Destiny, or the Chief's Daughter," in 1831—all novels in three volumes each. It is rather strange that, as all these works were successful, the author has never tried another venture in literature. She resides chiefly in Edinburgh, where she is highly honoured. Mr. Chambers, from whom we have before quoted, pays a just and elegant tribute to her genius; his opinion of her merits coincides entirely with our own, and as he is the best judge of her Scotticisms, we subjoin his remarks.

"Miss Ferrier's first work is a complete gallery of new and original characters. The plot is very inartificial; but after the first twenty pages, when Douglas conducts his pampered and selfish Lady Juliana to Glenfern castle, the interest never flags. The three maiden aunts at Glenfern—Miss Jacky, who was all over sense, the universal manager and detector, Miss Grizzy, the letter-writer, and Miss Nicky, who was not wanting for sense either, are an inimitable family group. Mrs. Violet Mac-shake, the last remaining branch of the noble race of Girnachgowl, is a representative of the old hard-featured, close-handed, proud, yet kind-hearted Scottish matron, vigorous and sarcastic at the age of ninety, and despising all modern manners and innovations. Then there is the sentimental Mrs. Gaffaw, who had weak nerves and headaches; was above managing her house, read novels, dyed ribbons, and altered her gowns according to every pattern she could see or hear of. There is a shade of caricature in some of these female portraits, notwithstanding the explanation of the authoress that they lived at a time when Scotland was very different from what it is now—when female education was little attended to, even in families of the highest rank; and, consequently, the ladies of those days possessed a raciness in their manners and ideas that we should vainly seek for in this age of cultivation and refinement. It is not only, however, in satirizing the foibles of her own sex that Miss Ferrier displays such original talent and humour. Dr. Redgill, a medical hanger-on and diner-out, is a gourmand of the first class, who looks upon bad dinners to be the source of much of the misery we hear of in the married life, and who compares a woman's reputation to a beefsteak—'if once breathed upon, 'tis good for nothing.' Many sly satirical touches occur throughout the work. In one of Miss Grizzy's letters, we hear of a Major MacTavish, of the militia, who, independent of his rank, which Grizzy thought was very high, distinguished himself, and showed the greatest bravery once when there was a very serious riot about the raising the potatoes a penny a peck, when there was no occasion for it, in the town of Dunoon. We are told, also, that country visits should seldom exceed three days—the rest day, the dressed day, and the wressed day. There is a great shrewdness and knowledge of human nature in the manner in which the three aunts got over their sorrow for the death of their father, the old laird. 'They sighed and mourned for a time, but soon found occupation congenial to their nature in the little department of life: dressing crape; reviving black silk; converting narrow hems into broad hems; and, in short, who so busy, so important, as the ladies of Glenfern?'

"Aware, perhaps, of the defective outline or story of her first novel, Miss Ferrier has bestowed much more pains on the construction of the 'Inheritance.' It is too complicated for an analysis in this place; but we may mention that it is connected with high life and a wide range of characters, the heroine being a young lady born in France, and heiress to a splendid estate and peerage in Scotland, to which, after various adventures and reverses, she finally succeeds. The tale is well arranged and developed. Its chief attraction, however, consists in the delineation of characters. Uncle Adam and Miss Pratt—the former a touchy, sensitive, rich East Indian, and the latter another of Miss Ferrier's inimitable old maids—are among the best of the portraits; but the canvass is full of happy and striking sketches. 'Destiny' is connected with Highland scenery and Highland manners, but is far from romantic. Miss Ferrier is as human and as discerning in her tastes and researches as Miss Edgeworth. The chief, Glenroy, is proud and irascible, spoiled by the fawning of his inferiors, and in his family circle is generous without kindness, and profuse without benevolence. The Highland minister, Mr. Duncan MacDow, is an admirable character, though no very prepossessing specimen of the country pastor, and, either in his single or married state, is sufficiently amusing. Edith, the heroine, is a sweet and gentle creation, and there is strong feeling and passion in some of the scenes. In the case of masculine intellects, like those of the authoress of 'Marriage' and the great Irish novelist, the progress of years seems to impart greater softness and sensibility, and call forth all the gentler affections."

From "Destiny; or, the Chief's Daughter."

A BUSTLING WIFE.

Why Mr. Malcolm had married Mrs. Malcolm was one of those mysteries which had baffled all conjecture, for she had neither beauty, money, connexions, talents, accomplishments, nor common sense. Not that she was ugly, for she would have looked very well in a toy-shop window. She had pink cheeks, blue eyes, and a set of neat yellow curls ranged round her brow. She was much younger than her husband, and looked still more juvenile than she really was, for not all the contempt and obloquy that had been poured upon her for upwards of twenty years had ever made her change either countenance or colour; in fact, she had neither passions, feelings, nerves—scarcely sensations. She seemed precisely one of those whom nature had destined to "suckle fools and chronicle small-beer;" but fate had denied her the fools, and Inch Orran had debarred her from all interference even with the small-beer; for such was his contempt for the sex in general, and for his own portion of it in particular, that he deemed a woman quite incompetent to regulate a household. His domestic concerns were therefore conducted ostensibly by himself, but virtually by his fat serving-man, who was his foster-brother, and had been his factotum long before he married. Even his dress, to the most minute article, was all of Simon's providing. Simon alone knew to a hair the cut and colour of his wig, the pattern of his pocket-handkerchiefs, the texture of his shirts and neckcloths, the precise latitude and longitude of his flannel waistcoats, with various other particulars incident to a particular man. Now, the chief occupation of Mrs. Malcolm's life was trailing from shop to shop, in search of anything or nothing, and she would have liked to have the dressing of Mr. Malcolm for the pleasure of buying bargains for him. She had therefore attempted to wrest this privilege out of Simon's hands, but in vain; she had picked up a pennyworth of a wig, which she said "looked remarkably neat on the head," but which Simon turned up his nose at, and his master threw into the fire. She had haggled till she was hoarse about a dozen of cotton pocket-handkerchiefs, which, after all, Simon pronounced to be perfectly useless, as they were of the diamond pattern, and his master would not blow his nose with anything but a spot. Her improvements upon flannel jackets had very nearly caused a formal separation, and from that time her active energies not being permitted to exercise themselves either upon her household affairs or her husband's wardrobe, had centered entirely in her own person. She lived in a perpetual, weak, impotent bustle about nothing, spent her money in buying hoards of useless clothes, and her time in looking at them, folding and unfolding them, airing them, locking them up, protecting them from the moths in summer, and mildew in winter, and so on. To crown the whole, she set up for being a sensible woman, and talked maudlin nonsense by the yard; for she was one of those who would ask if the sea produced corn, rather than hold her tongue. Here it may be remarked, that it requires a great deal of mind to be silent at the right time and place. True, there are some few gifted individuals, whose conversation flows like a continued stream, fertilizing all around, enriching others without impoverishing themselves; but how different from the idle chatter of empty heads, whose only sounds are caused by their own hollowness! "Two things there are indicative of a weak mind," says Saadi, the Persian sage, "to be silent when it is proper to speak, and to speak when it is proper to be silent." Such was the helpmate of Inch Orran.

"I am happy to see you, gentlemen," said she, in her little tiresome croaking voice; "indeed I am thankful to see anybody, for this is such a lonely out-of-the-way place. I was just saying this morning, what an improvement a town would be on the water-side; it would be a great ornament, and of great use in making a stir, and giving employment to poor people, and very convenient too. I'm surprised it has never struck any body to set such a thing a-going, when there's such a want of employment for the poor."

"Rome was not built in a day, you know, ma'am," said the facetious Mr. M'Dow, with one of his loud laughs: "but if you will use your influence with Inch Orran, and prevail upon him to begin, there's no saying where it may end"—another peal—"and I hope the kirk and the manse will not be forgot, Inch Orran."

"Still less the stipend, sir," said Inch Orran, with one of his vicious sneers.

"I'll answer for it the stipend will no get leave to be forgot," returned the incorrigible Mr. M'Dow, with one of his loudest roars; "you may trust the minister for keeping you in mind of that."

"I believe I may, sir."

"And let it be a good one at the first, Inch Orran, that he may not have such a battle to fight for his augmentation as I have had. I really think the Teind Court has taken an entire wrong view of the subject there, or they would have given me the decret at once. You'll no go along with me there, Glenroy."

But Glenroy disdained to reply; so the little old man said, "It was the saying, sir, of one of the wisest judges who ever sat upon the Scottish bench, that a poor clergy made a pure clergy—a maxim which deserves to be engraven in letters of gold on every manse in Scotland."

"Deed, then, I can tell you, Inch Orran, the gold would be very soon picket off," returned Mr. M'Dow, with redoubled bursts of laughter. "Na, na, you must keep the gold for your fine English Episcopalian palaces, where it's no so scarce as it's among us;" and Mr. M'Dow perfectly revelled in the delight of this jeu d'esprit. Mrs. Malcolm now struck in. "I'm quite tormented with these midges. I don't think they'll leave the skin upon me. I wish they would bite you, Mr. Malcolm."

SUNDAY.

The next day was Sunday—day of rest to the poor and the toil-worn—of weariness to the rich and the idle. Ah! little do they enter into the feelings of many who look forward to this day as the day when even the "wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest," as the day blessed and hallowed to those on whom rests, in its full force, the primeval command, "Six days shalt thou labour;" and which makes the Sabbath lovely in the sight

"Of blessed angels, pitying human cares;"

as the day when heavenly truths are proclaimed alike to all from the prince to the beggar; from the man of grey hairs standing on the threshold of the grave, to the young who have lately entered the arena of this life;—there, in the house of God, "the rich and the poor meet together;" and there they are reminded of those impressive truths, so humbling to the haughty, so elevating to the lowly—"that the Lord is the maker of them all," and that one day they shall stand before his judgment-seat, without respect of persons, to "receive the reward of the deeds done in the body." On that day, how many a sorrowing heart can more freely pour forth its griefs to that gracious ear which is ever open to the cry of the afflicted!

DISAPPOINTED LOVE.

And now Edith felt as though her destiny was sealed. Never more, did it seem, could her heart awaken to the love of aught that life could bestow. The idol her imagination had fashioned had fallen; but even while it lay in shivers at her feet, still her fond, credulous heart had unconsciously hovered amid the broken fragments, in the vain hope that the image it had so adored might again rise, to receive the homage of a still enslaved soul. But now it had turned to very dust and ashes in her sight—now the illusion was dispelled, and the selfish, hollow character of her lover appeared in its true colours. It was then a purer light dawned upon the darkness of her spirit. She now discerned that the image of the creature had held that place in her heart, and exercised that sway over her mind which belonged only to the Creator. The enchantment of life was then indeed dissolved, but what heir of immortality would wish to remain the dupe of this world's enchantments?

* * * * *

Edith felt as all must feel, more or less, at the breaking of so dear and sacred a tie. Friendship and love, dear and holy affections as they may be, are the affections we ourselves have formed and chosen—we can look back upon the time when as yet they were not, and their existence was not linked with ours; but from the first dawn of consciousness, it was a parent's love that beamed upon our hearts, and awakened all their best and holiest sympathies. Friends may meet as strangers—the tenderest bands of love, even wedded love, may be broken—but 'tis God himself who has formed that one indissoluble bond which neither human power nor human frailty ever can dissolve.

SUDDEN POVERTY.

It is not those who have been born and bred in affluence who can all at once comprehend the nature of absolute poverty—those who have been accustomed to will their every gratification can ill conceive the privations of want—the shifts and expedients of fallen fortune—the difficulty which the mind has to contract its desires, and the habits of self-indulgence and luxury which have to be overcome or annihilated; in short, no things differ more than abstract and actual poverty.

SECOND LOVE.

How like a dream, a vision of the night, did this brief and passing scene appear to Edith!—Again and again she asked herself, could it be that the lost, the lamented, had thus, as it were, started into life—that the loved companion of her childish days was now the chosen of her matured affections? And these affections, had they been lightly transferred—could affections, once so blighted as hers had been, ever again revive, and own a second spring? Was it indeed love that she now owned and felt? Oh, how different from that which had cast its dazzling and delusive glare over her young imagination, and tinged so many of the radiant years of youth with colours fair, 'tis true, but fading as the tints of the rainbow!

Love had formerly been a sentiment—a false, narrow, exclusive sentiment—shared only by the object which inspired it; now, it was a noble, generous, diffusive principle, which glowed in her heart, and sought to impart a portion of its own blessedness around. She had loved Reginald, as she could have loved anything that fancy had painted to her as fair and fascinating. She had invested him with every noble and generous attribute which the young and imaginative so lavishly bestow on those they love. But the illusion had long since been dispelled, never again to gather over her heart. Again she loved, but by a light which could not deceive; by that divine light which taught her not to love the mere perishing idol of life's passing hour, but the immortal being with whose soul her own might joy to claim kindred throughout eternity. And the dear ones who still mourned his loss—Oh, theirs would be rapture almost to agony! But she dared not allow her thoughts to dwell on such a theme.

FOLLEN, ELIZA LEE,

Whose maiden-name was Cabott, was born in Boston, Mass. In 1828, she married Charles Follen, a native of Germany, and Professor of the German language and literature in Harvard College. He was lost or perished in the conflagration of the Lexington, January 13th, 1840. Mrs. Follen is a well-known writer. Her principal works are—"Sketches of Married Life," "The Skeptic," and a "Life of Charles Follen," published in 1844. She has also edited the works of her late husband, in four volumes, besides contributing to various literary periodicals, and has written a volume of Poems, which appeared in 1839. And, moreover, she has prepared several books for the young; her talents as an educator being, perhaps, more successful than in literary pursuits. Mrs. Follen, on the death of her lamented husband, was left to provide for the education of their only child, a son, of nine or ten years of age. She resolved to conduct the instruction of her son, and receiving into her home a few boys, sons of her beloved and true friends, as companions for her child and pupils of her care, she fitted these youths for Harvard University. Such honourable exertions to perform faithfully the duty of father as well as mother to her son, demand a warmer tribute of praise than the highest genius, disconnected from usefulness, can ever claim for a Christian woman.

From "Poems."

THE EXILED STRANGER.

Hark! what sweetly solemn sound
Rises on the morning air?
Shedding gentle peace around,
And stilling busy earthly care.

The mighty city holds its breath,
As the sacred music swells;
And discord dies a transient death,
While listening to those Sabbath bells.

Hearts that had forgot to pray,
Eyes that had been fixed below,
Now look to Heaven, and ask the way,
As to the house of God they go.

But there is one who hears those notes,
To whom like angels' songs they seem;
O'er whose glad soul the music floats,
Like memory of a youthful dream;—

Far from his well-loved father-land,
From early friends, and blessed home,
Chased by the tyrant's bloody hand,
An exiled stranger, doomed to roam:

In freedom's land a home to find,
He hastens o'er the dark blue sea,
Leaving each youthful joy behind,
And asking only to be free.

And now the blessed tones he hears
Of those soft, soothing Sabbath bells;
And as the shore the vessel nears,
More full and strong the anthem swells.

And as he hears the solemn sound,
He leaps with rapture on the shore:
He feels he stands on holy ground;
Feels that his perils are all o'er.

And see, amidst the gazing crowd,
Unheeding all, he's kneeling there:
To the free earth his head is bowed;
His full wrapt soul is lost in prayer.

That prayer shall not be breathed in vain;
Nor vain the sacrifice be made:
There is a Hand will give again
The wreath that's on his altar laid.

WINTER SCENES IN THE COUNTRY.

The short, dull, rainy day drew to a close;
No gleam burst forth upon the western hills,
With smiling promise of a brighter day,
Dressing the leafless woods with golden light;
But the dense fog hung its dark curtain round,
And the unceasing rain poured like a torrent on.
The wearied inmates of the house draw near
The cheerful fire; the shutters all are closed;
A brightening look spreads round, that seems to say,
Now let the darkness and the rain prevail;
Here all is bright! How beautiful is the sound
Of the descending rain! how soft the wind
Through the wet branches of the drooping elms!
But hark! far off, beyond the sheltering hills
Is heard the gathering tempest's distant swell,
Threatening the peaceful valley ere it comes.
The stream that glided through its pebbly way
To its own sweet music, now roars hoarsely on;
The woods send forth a deep and heavy sigh;
The gentle south has ceased; the rude northwest,
Rejoicing in his strength, comes rushing forth.
The rain is changed into a driving sleet,
And when the fitful wind a moment lulls,
The feathery snow, almost inaudible,
Falls on the window-panes as soft and still
As the light brushings of an angel's wings,
Or the sweet visitings of quiet thoughts
'Midst the wild tumult of this stormy life.
The tightened strings of nature's ceaseless harp
Send forth a shrill and piercing melody,
As the full swell returns. The night comes on,
And sleep upon this little world of ours,
Spreads out her sheltering, healing wings; and man—
The heaven-inspired soul of this fair earth,
The bold interpreter of nature's voice,
Giving a language even to the stars—
Unconscious of the throbbings of his heart,—
Is still; and all unheeded is the storm,
Save by the wakeful few who love the night;
Those pure and active spirits that are placed
As guards o'er wayward man; they who show forth
God's holy image on the soul impressed,
They listen to the music of the storm,

And hold high converse with the unseen world;
They wake, and watch, and pray, while others sleep.
The stormy night has passed; the eastern clouds
Glow with the morning's ray; but who shall tell
The peerless glories of this winter day?
Nature has put her jewels on, one blaze
Of sparkling light and ever-varying hues
Bursts on the enraptured sight.
The smallest twig with brilliants hangs its head;
The graceful elm and all the forest trees
Have on a crystal coat of mail, and seem
All decked and tricked out for a holiday,
And every stone shines in its wreath of gems.
The pert, familiar robin, as he flies
From spray to spray, showers diamonds around,
And moves in rainbow light where'er he goes.
The universe looks glad; but words are vain,
To paint the wonders of the splendid show.
The heart exults with uncontrolled delight.
The glorious pageant slowly moves away,
As the sun sinks behind the western hills.
So fancy, for a short and fleeting day,
May shed upon the cold and barren earth
Her bright enchantments and her dazzling hues;
And thus they melt and fade away, and leave
A cold and dull reality behind.

But see where in the clear, unclouded sky,
The crescent moon, with calm and sweet rebuke,
Doth charm away the spirit of complaint.
Her tender light falls on the snow-clad hills,
Like the pure thoughts that angels might bestow
Upon this world of beauty, and of sin,
That mingle not with that whereon they rest;—
So should immortal spirits dwell below.
There is a holy influence in the moon,
And in the countless hosts of silent stars,
The heart cannot resist: its passions sleep,
And all is still; save that which shall awake
When all this vast and fair creation sleeps.

FULLER, SARAH MARGARET, *

Was the daughter of Timothy Fuller, a member of the Boston bar, but a resident of Cambridge, Massachusetts, where Margaret was born. From 1817 until 1825, Mr. Fuller was sent to Congress, representative of the district of Middlesex. At the close of these political duties, he retired from his profession and settled in the country as an agriculturist; soon afterwards he died.

Margaret was the oldest child of the family, and at an early age evinced remarkable aptitude for study; it became her father's pride and pleasure to cultivate her intellect to the utmost degree. We are told that his tasks were often oppressive, and that her juvenile brain was taxed to the disadvantage of her physical healthy development. Most particularly did the father instruct his daughter in the learning he considered of the first importance—the classic tongues. An acquaintance with these, subsequently led her to study the modern languages, and Miss Fuller was, from her youth, distinguished for her extraordinary philological accomplishments. Of course, the German literature exercised a potent sway over her taste and genius; such influence being now-a-days too common, with both adepts and dabbles in learning, to excite wonder. Yet why is this enthusiasm for German? this peculiar reverence for its unpronounceable vocabularies, and

* We give the name by which only she was known in America; and we give her a place among the living, where she was numbered when our Third Era was completed. Her death can hardly yet be realized: she seems only to have withdrawn, not passed away forever unfathomable philosophy? Where all is mysticism, nothing can be clear; even truth, when thus shadowed, loses its strength as well as simplicity.

Miss Fuller was, however, besides her classical studies, most thoroughly exercised in every solid and elegant department of literature, and probably no American woman was ever before so fully educated, as that term is usually applied. After her father's decease, she devoted her talents and acquirements to the assistance of her mother and sisters, by opening classes for the instruction of ladies, both single and married, first in Boston, then in Providence, Rhode Island; and afterwards in Boston again. During this period her womanly characteristics,—self-sacrificing generosity, industry, untiring kindness in the domestic circle,—were beautifully displayed. Her memory is more sanctified by the love her exemplary qualities called forth in the privacy of home, than by all the literary laurels her admirers wish to offer her.

In 1839, she made a translation of Goëthe's "Conversations;"—this is her first work. She was, in the following year, concerned with Ralph Waldo Emerson in editing the "Dial," a periodical of some note in its day; to which both these writers contributed essays, highly applauded by their transcendental readers. To those who require perspicuity as a condition of excellence in literature, such "wanderings round about a meaning," however fine may be the diction, are never appreciated; yet it is but fair to say, that the meaning of Miss Fuller was always honest and generous. She was so far from being in adoration before herself, that she seemed ever aiming to enlarge the moral good of her "brother man and sister woman."

In 1843, she published a volume—"Summer on the Lakes," being an account of a tour to Illinois. This book contains, with much irrelevant matter, some sensible remarks; but there is little in it, as far as regards style or story, beyond what might be found in the letters of any well-educated gentlewoman of moderate abilities, who thought it worth while to journalize on a summer's ramble. About this period Miss Fuller resided for a time in New York, where she edited the literary department of the "Tribune," contributing papers on various subjects, but chiefly critical notices of the works of distinguished authors, for which task both education and genius seemed peculiarly to fit her.

In 1845, her most important work, "Woman in the Nineteenth Century," was published in New York. It is evident that a strong wish to benefit her own sex, moved her heart and guided her pen. One male critic, whose title of Reverend should have inspired more charity, has flippantly remarked, that Miss Fuller wrote because she was vexed at not being a man.—Not so. Though discontented with her woman's lot, she does not seek to put aside any duty, or lower the standard of virtue in order to escape the pressure of real or imagined evils in her position. Nor was it for herself that she sought freedom; she wanted a wider field of usefulness for her sex; and unfortunately for her own happiness, which would have been secured by advancing that of others, she mistook the right path of progress. With her views we are far from coinciding; she abandoned the only safe guide in her search for truth. Whatever be the genius or intellectual vigour possessed by a woman, these avail her nothing without that moral strength which is nowhere to be obtained, save from the aid God has given us in His revealed Word. Experience and observation prove that the greater the intellectual force, the greater and more fatal the errors into which women fall who wander from the Rock of Salvation, Christ the Saviour, who, "made of a woman," is peculiarly the stay and support of the sex.

But though Miss Fuller's theories led to mazes and wanderings, her mind was honest in its search for truth, though with much that is visionary and impracticable, "Woman in the Nineteenth Century" contains many useful hints and noble sentiments.

In 1844, a selection from her contributions to various periodicals was issued, under the title of "Papers on Literature and Art;" a work much admired by those who profess to understand the new thoughts, or new modes of expressing old apothegms, which the transcendental philosophy has introduced. It was her last published work. In the summer of 1845, Miss Fuller accompanied some dear friends to Europe; after visiting England, Scotland, France, and passing through Italy to Rome, they spent the ensuing winter in the "Eternal City," where she continued, while her friends returned to America. In the following year, Miss Fuller was married, in Rome, to Giovanni Marquis d'Ossoli, an Italian. She remained in Rome till the summer of 1849, when, after the surrender of that city to the French, the Marquis d'Ossoli and his wife, having taken an active part in the Republican movement, considered it necessary to emigrate. They went to Florence, and remained there till June, 1850, when they determined to come to the United States, and accordingly embarked at Leghorn, in the brig Elizabeth, bound for New York. The deplorable and melancholy catastrophe is well known; the ship, as she neared our coast, encountered a fearful storm, and on the morning of the 8th of August was wrecked on Fire Island, south of Long Island; and the D'Ossoli family—husband, wife, infant son and nurse—all perished!

Margaret Fuller, or the Marchioness d'Ossoli, possessed among a host of professed admirers, many grateful, loving friends, to whom her sad, untimely death was a bitter grief. These mourn also, that she left her mission unfinished, because they believe a work she had prepared "On the Revolution in Italy," (the MS. was lost with her), would have given her enduring fame. One indication of true mental improvement she exhibited—her enthusiasm for Goëthe had abated; and a friend of hers, a distinguished scholar, asserts that, "with the Reformers of the Transcendental School she had no communion, nor scarcely a point in common." Whatever she might have done, we are constrained to add, that of the books she has left, we do not believe that they are destined to hold a high place in female literature. There is no true moral life in them. The simple "Prose Hymns for Children," of Mrs. Barbauld, or the "Poems" of Jane Taylor, will have a place in the hearts and homes of the Anglo-Saxon race, as long as our language endures; but the genius of Margaret Fuller will live only while the tender remembrance of personal friendship shall hold it dear. Her fame, like that of a great actor, or singer, was dependent on her living presence,—gained more by her conversational powers than by her writings. Those who enjoyed her society declare, that her mind shone most brightly in collision with other minds, and that no adequate idea of her talents can be formed by those who never heard her talk. This was also true of Coleridge; and Dr. Johnson is certainly a greater man in Boswell's Reports than in the "Rambler." Margaret Fuller had no reporter.

A NIGHT IN MICHIGAN.

No heaven need wear a lovelier aspect than earth did this afternoon, after the clearing up of the shower. We traversed the blooming plain, unmarked by any road, only the friendly track of wheels which tracked, not broke the grass. Our stations were not from town to town, but from grove to grove. These groves first floated like blue islands in the distance. As we drew nearer, they seemed fair parks, and the little log houses on the edge, with their curling smokes, harmonized beautifully with them.

One of these groves, Ross's grove, we reached just at sunset. It was of the noblest trees I saw during this journey, for the trees generally were not large or lofty, but only of fair proportions. Here they were large enough to form with their clear stems pillars for grand cathedral aisles. There was space enough for crimson light to stream through upon the floor of water which the shower had left. As we slowly plashed through, I thought I was never in a better place for vespers.

That night we rested, or rather tarried at a grove some miles beyond, and there partook of the miseries so often jocosely portrayed, of bed-chambers for twelve, a milk-dish for universal hand-basin, and expectations that you would use and lend your "handkerchief" for a towel. But this was the only night, thanks to the hospitality of private families, that we passed thus, and it was well that we had this bit of experience, else might we have pronounced all Trollopian records of the kind to be inventions of pure malice.

With us was a young lady who showed herself to have been bathed in the Britannic fluid, wittily described by a late French writer, by the impossibility she experienced of accommodating herself to the indecorums of the scene. We ladies were to sleep in the bar-room, from which its drinking visitors could be ejected only at a late hour. The outer door had no fastening to prevent their return. However, our host kindly requested we would call him, if they did, as he had "conquered them for us," and would do so again. We had also rather hard couches, (mine was the supper-table;) but we yankees, born to rove, were altogether too much fatigued to stand upon trifles, and slept as sweetly as we would in the "bigly bower" of any baroness. But I think England sat up all night, wrapped in her blanket shawl, and with a neat lace cap upon her head; so that she would have looked perfectly the lady, if any one had come in; shuddering and listening. I know that she was very ill next day, in requital. She watched, as her parent country watches the seas, that nobody may do wrong in any case, and deserved to have met some interruption, she was so well prepared. However, there was none, other than from the nearness of some twenty sets of powerful lungs, which would not leave the night to a deadly stillness. In this house we had, if not good beds, yet good tea, good bread, and wild strawberries, and were entertained with most free communications of opinion and history from our hosts. Neither shall any of us have a right to say again that we cannot find any who may be willing to hear all we may have to say. "A's fish that comes to the net," should be painted on the sign at Papaw grove.

THE PRAIRIE.

In Chicago I first saw the beautiful prairie flowers. They were in their glory the first ten days we were there—

"The golden and the flame-like flowers."

The flame-like flower I was taught afterwards, by an Indian girl, to call "Wickapee;" and she told me, too, that its splendours had a useful side, for it was used by the Indians as a remedy for an illness to which they were subject.

Beside these brilliant flowers, which gemmed and gilt the grass in a sunny afternoon's drive near the blue lake, between the low oakwood and the narrow beach, stimulated, whether sensuously by the optic nerve, unused to so much gold and crimson with such tender green, or symbolically through some meaning dimly seen in the flowers,

I enjoyed a sort of fairy-land exultation never felt before, and the first drive amid the flowers gave me anticipation of the beauty of the prairies.

At first, the prairie seemed to speak of the very desolation of dulness. After sweeping over the vast monotony of the lakes to come to this monotony of land, with all around a limitless horizon,—to walk, and walk, and run, but never climb, oh! it was too dreary for any but a Hollander to bear. How the eye greeted the approach of a sail, or the smoke of a steamboat; it seemed that any thing so animated must come from a better land, where mountains gave religion to the scene.

The only thing I liked at first to do, was to trace with slow and unexpected step the narrow margin of the lake. Sometimes a heavy swell gave it expression; at others, only its varied colouring, which I found more admirable every day, and which gave it an air of mirage instead of the vastness of ocean. Then there was a gr^{andeur} in the feeling that I might continue that walk, if I had any seven-leagued mode of conveyance to save fatigue, for hundreds of miles without an obstacle and without a change.

But after I had rode out, and seen the flowers and seen the sun set with that calmness seen only in the prairies, and the cattle winding slowly home to their homes in the "island groves"—peacefullest of sights—I began to love because I began to know the scene, and shrank no longer from "the encircling vastness."

It is always thus with the new form of life; we must learn to look at it by its own standard. At first, no doubt my accustomed eye kept saying, if the mind did not, What! no distant mountains? what, no valleys? But after a while I would ascend the roof of the house where we lived, and pass many hours, needing no sight but the moon reigning in the heavens, or starlight falling upon the lake, till all the lights were out in the island grove of men beneath my feet, and felt nearer heaven that there was nothing but this lovely, still reception on the earth; no towering mountains, no deep tree-shadows, nothing but plain earth and water bathed in light.

AMERICAN WOMEN.

In our own country, women are, in many respects, better situated than men. Good books are allowed, with more time to read them. They are not so early forced into the bustle of life, nor so weighed down by demands for outward success. The perpetual changes, incident to our society, make the blood circulate freely through the body politic, and, if not favourable at present to the grace and bloom of life, they are so to activity, resource, and would be to reflection, but for a low materialist tendency, from which the women are generally exempt in themselves, though its existence, among the men has a tendency to repress their impulses and make them doubt their instincts, thus, often, paralyzing their action during the best years.

But they have time to think, and no traditions chain them, and few conventionalities compared with what must be met in other nations. There is no reason why they should not discover that the secrets of nature are open, the revelations of the spirit waiting for whoever will seek them. When the mind is once awakened to this consciousness, it will not be restrained by the habits of the past, but fly to seek the seeds of a heavenly future.

Their employments are more favourable to meditation than those of men.

Woman is not addressed religiously here, more than elsewhere. She is told she should be worthy to be the mother of a Washington, or the companion of some good man. But in many, many instances, she has already learnt that all bribes have the same flaw; that truth and good are to be sought solely for their own sakes. And, already, an ideal sweetness floats over many forms, shines in many eyes.

Already deep questions are put by young girls on the great theme: What shall I do to enter upon the eternal life?

Men are very courteous to them. They praise them often, check them seldom. There is chivalry in the feeling towards "the ladies," which gives them the best seats in the stage-coach, frequent admission, not only to lectures of all sorts, but to courts of justice, halls of legislature, reform conventions. The newspaper editor "would be better pleased that the Lady's Book should be filled up exclusively by ladies. It would then, indeed, be a true gem, worthy to be presented by young men to the mistresses of their affections." Can gallantry go further?

In this country is venerated, wherever seen, the character which Goëthe spoke of an Ideal, which he saw actualized in his friend and patroness, the Grand Duchess Amelia. "The excellent woman is she, who, if the husband dies, can be a father to the children." And this, if read aright, tells a great deal.

LOVE.

To you, women of America, it is more especially my business to address myself on this subject, and my advice may be classed under three heads:

Clear your souls from the taint of vanity.

Do not rejoice in conquests, either that your power to allure may be seen by other women, or for the pleasure of rousing passionate feelings that gratify your love of excitement.

It must happen, no doubt, that frank and generous women will excite love they do not reciprocate, but, in nine cases out of ten, the woman has, half consciously, done much to excite. In this case she shall not be held guiltless, either as to the unhappiness or injury to the lover. Pure love, inspired by a worthy object, must ennoble and bless, whether mutual or not; but that which is excited by coquettish attraction of any grade of refinement, must cause bitterness and doubt, as to the reality of human goodness, so soon as the flush of passion is over. And that you may avoid all taste for these false pleasures,

"Steep the soul
In one pure love, and it will last thee long."

TRUE MARRIAGE.

We are now in a transition state, and but few steps have yet been taken. From polygamy, Europe passed to the marriage de convenance. This was scarcely an improvement. An attempt was then made to substitute genuine marriage, (the mutual choice of souls inducing a permanent union,) as yet baffled on every side by the haste, the ignorance, or the impurity of man.

Where man assumes a high principle to which he is not yet ripened; it will happen, for a long time, that the few will be nobler than before; the many worse. Thus now. In the country of Sidney and Milton, the metropolis is a den of wickedness, and a sty of sensuality; in the country of Lady Russell, the custom of English Peeresses, of selling their daughters to the highest bidder, is made the theme and jest of fashionable novels by unthinking children who would stare at the idea of sending them to a Turkish slave-dealer, though the circumstances of the bargain are there less degrading, as the will and thoughts of the person sold are not so degraded by it, and it is not done in defiance of an acknowledged law of right in the land and the age.

I must here add that I do not believe there ever was put upon record more depravation of man, and more despicable frivolity of thought and aim in woman, than in novels which purport to give the picture of English fashionable life, which are read with such favour in our drawing-rooms, and give the tone to the manners of some circles. Compared with the hard-hearted cold folly there described, crime is hopeful, for it, at least, shows some power remaining in the mental constitution.

FEMALE PROGRESS.

Another sign of the times is furnished by the triumphs of female authorship. These have been great and constantly increasing. Women have taken possession of so many provinces for which men had pronounced them unfit, that though these still declare there are some inaccessible to them, it is difficult to say just where they must stop.

The shining names of famous women have cast light upon the path of the sex, and many obstructions have been removed. When a Montagu could learn better than her brother, and use her lore afterward to such purpose, as an observer, it seemed amiss to hinder women from preparing themselves to see, or from seeing all they could, when prepared. Since Somerville has achieved so much, will any young girl be prevented from seeking a knowledge of the physical sciences, if she wishes it? De Stael's name was not so clear of offence; she could not forget the woman in the thought; while she was instructing you as a mind, she wished to be admired as a woman; sentimental tears often dimmed the eagle glance. Her intellect too, with all its splendour, trained in a drawing-room, fed on flattery, was tainted and flawed; yet its beams make the obscurest school-house in New England warmer and lighter to the little rugged girls, who are gathered together on its wooden bench. They may never through life hear her name, but she is not the less their benefactress.

The influence has been such, that the aim certainly is, now, in arranging school instruction for girls, to give them as fair a field as boys. As yet, indeed, these arrangements are made with little judgment or reflection; just as the tutors of Lady Jane Grey, and other distinguished women of her time, taught them Latin and Greek, because they knew nothing else themselves, so now the improvement in the education of girls is to be made by giving them young men as teachers, who only teach what has been taught themselves at college, while methods and topics need revision for these new subjects, which could better be made by those who had experienced the same wants. Women are often at the head of these institutions, but they have, as yet, seldom been thinking women, capable to organize a new whole for the wants of the time, and choose persons to officiate in the departments. And when some portion of instruction is got of a good sort from the school, the far greater proportion which is infused from the general atmosphere of society contradicts its purport. Yet books and a little elementary instruction are not furnished in vain. Women are better aware how great and rich the universe is, not so easily blinded by narrowness or partial views of a home circle. "Her mother did so before her," is no longer a sufficient excuse. Indeed, it was never received as an excuse to mitigate the severity of censure, but was adduced as a reason, rather, why there should be no effort made for reformation.

Whether much or little has been done or will be done, whether women will add to the talent of narration, the power of systematizing, whether they will carve marble, as well as draw and paint, is not important. But that it should be acknowledged that they have intellect which needs developing, that they should not be considered complete, if beings of affection and habit alone, is important.

Yet even this acknowledgment, rather conquered by woman than proffered by man, has been sullied by the usual selfishness. So much is said of women being better educated, that they may become better companions and mothers for men. They should be fit for such companionship, and we have mentioned with satisfaction, instances where it has been established. Earth knows no fairer, holier relation than that of a mother. It is one which, rightly understood, must both promote and require the highest attainments. But a being of infinite scope must not be treated with an exclusive view to any one relation. Give the soul free course, let the organization, both of body and mind, be freely developed, and the being will be fit for any and every relation to which it may be called. The intellect, no more than the sense of hearing, is to be cultivated merely that she may be a more valuable companion to man, but because the Power who gave a power, by its mere existence, signifies that it must be brought out towards perfection.

In this regard of self-dependence, and a greater simplicity and fulness of being, we must hail as a preliminary the increase of the class contemptuously designated as old maids.

From "Poems."

ON LEAVING THE WEST.

Farewell, ye soft and sumptuous solitudes!
Ye fairy distances, ye lordly woods,
Haunted by paths like those that Poussin knew,
When after his all gazers' eyes he drew:
I go — and if I never more may steep
An eager heart in your enchantments deep,
Yet ever to itself that heart may say,
Be not exacting — thou hast lived one day —
Hast looked on that which matches with thy mood,
Impassioned sweetness of full being's flood,
Where nothing checked the bold yet gentle wave,
Where naught repelled the lavish love that gave.
A tender blessing lingers o'er the scene,
Like some young mother's thought, fond, yet serene,
And through its life new born our lives have been.
Once more farewell — a sad, a sweet farewell;
And if I never must behold you more,
In other worlds I will not cease to tell
The rosary I here have numbered o'er;
And bright-haired Hope will lend a gladdened ear,
And Love will free him from the grasp of Fear,
And Gorgon critics, while the tale they hear,
Shall dew their stony glances with a tear,
If I but catch one echo from your spell:
And so farewell — a grateful, sad farewell!

TO ALLSTON'S PICTURE, "THE BRIDE."

Not long enough we gaze upon that face,
Nor pure enough the life with which we live,
To be full tranced by that softest grace,
To win all pearls those lucid depths can give;
Here Fantasy has borrowed wings of Even,
And stolen Twilight's latest, sacred hues,
A soul has visited the woman's heaven,
Where palest lights a silver sheen diffuse.
To see aright the vision which he saw,
We must ascend as high upon the stair
Which leads the human thought to heavenly law,
And see the flower bloom in its natal air;
Thus might we read aright the lip and brow,
Where Thought and Love beam too subduing for our senses now.

THE SACRED MARRIAGE

And has another's life as large a scope?
It may give due fulfilment to thy hope,
And every portal to the unknown may ope.
If, near this other life, thy inmost feeling
Trembles with fateful prescience of revealing
The future Deity, time is still concealing:
If thou feel thy whole force drawn more and more
To launch that other bark on seas without a shore,
And no still secret must be kept in store —
If meannesses that dim each temporal deed,
The dull decay that mars the fleshly weed,
And flower of love that seems to fall and leave no seed —
Hide never the full presence from thy sight
Of mutual aims and tasks, ideals bright,
Which feed their roots to-day on all this seeming blight.

Twin stars that mutual circle in the heaven,
Two parts for spiritual concord given,
Twin sabbaths that inlock the sacred seven —
Still looking to the centre for the cause,
Mutual light giving to draw out the powers,
And learning all the other groups by cognizance of one another's laws:

The parent love the wedded love includes,
The one permits the two their mutual moods,
The two each other know mid myriad multitudes;
With childlike intellect discerning love,
And mutual action energizing love,
In myriad forms affiliating love.
A world whose seasons bloom from pole to pole,
A force which knows both starting-point and goal,
A home in heaven — the union in the soul.

G.

GAY, SOPHIE,

WAS born in Paris, where she now resides. She is a writer of considerable talent and great industry, and has long been a favourite with French novel readers. None of her works have been translated into English, nor are the French editions often met with in America. Her style is pleasing; she describes a drawing-room circle with liveliness; her dialogues are natural and appropriate, and she sometimes rises to the pathetic. "Anatole" is, perhaps, her most finished production. "La Duchesse de Chateroux," "Marie Louise d'Orleans," "Salons Célèbres," "Souvenirs d'une Vieille Femme," have all enjoyed a very favourable reputation. But greater interest has attached to the name of Madame Sophie Gay from her motherhood than her authorship. Her celebrated daughter, Delphine, now Madame Emile Girardin, is the living page which enlarges as well as reflects the genius of Sophie Gay.

GILMAN, CAROLINE,

ONE of those estimable women, true-born Americans, who are doing good in whatever way duty opens before them, be it to write, teach, or work, with unfailing zeal and cheerfulness. We are glad to give the reminiscences of her early days in her own pleasant vein; such glimpses of the inner workings of a female mind have great value on the question of female education.

"I am asked for some 'particulars of my literary and domestic life.' It seems to me, and I suppose at first thought it seems to all, a vain and awkward egotism to sit down and inform the world who you are. But if I, like the Petrarchs and Byrons, and Hemanses, greater or less, have opened my heart to the public for a series of years, with all the pulses of love, and hatred, and sorrow, so transparently unveiled, that the throbs may be almost counted, why should I or they feel embarrassed in responding to this request? Is there not some inconsistency in this shyness about autobiography?"

"I find myself, then, at nearly sixty years of age, somewhat of a patriarch in the line of American female authors—a kind of past-master in the order.

"The only interesting point connected with my birth, which took place, October 8th, 1794, in Boston, Mass., is that I first saw the light where the Mariner's Church now stands, in the North Square. My father, Samuel Howard, was a shipwright; and, to my fancy, it seems fitting that seamen should assemble on the former homestead of one, who spent his manhood in planning and perfecting the noble fabrics which bear them over the waves. All the record I have of him is, that on every State Thanksgiving-Day he spread a liberal table for the poor; and for this, I honour his memory.

"My father died before I was three years old, and was buried at Copp's Hill. My mother, who was an enthusiastic lover of nature, retired into the country with her six children, and placing her boys at an academy at Woburn, resided with her girls, in turn, at Concord, Dedham, Watertown, and Cambridge, changing her residence almost annually, until I was nearly ten years old, when she passed away, and I followed her to her resting-place, in the burial-ground at North Andover.

"My education was exceedingly irregular—a perpetual passing from school to school—from my earliest memory. I drew a very little, and worked the Babes in the Wood on white satin; my teacher and my grandmother being the only persons who recognised, in the remarkable individuals that issued from my hands, a likeness to those innocent sufferers. I taught myself the English guitar, at fifteen, from hearing a school-mate take lessons, and composed a tune, which I doubt if posterity will care to hear. By depriving myself of some luxuries, I purchased an instrument, over which my whole soul was poured in joy and sorrow for many years. A dear friend was kind enough to work out all my sums for me, while I wrote a novel in a series of letters, under the euphonious name of Eugenia Fitz-Allen. The consequence is, that, so far as arithmetic is concerned, I have been subject to perpetual mortifications, and shudder to this day when any one asks me how much is seven times nine.

"The religious feeling was always powerful within me, and at sixteen I joined the communion at the Episcopal church in Cambridge. At the age of eighteen, I made another sacrifice in dress to purchase a Bible, with a margin sufficiently wide to enable me to insert a commentary. To this object I devoted several months of study, transferring to its pages my deliberate convictions. I am glad to class myself with the few who first established the Sabbath-school and benevolent society at Watertown, and to say, that I have endeavoured under all circumstances, wherever my lot has fallen, to carry on the work of social love.

"At sixteen, I wrote 'Jephthah's Rash Vow,' and was gratified by the request of an introduction from Miss Hannah Adams, the erudite, the simple-minded, and gentle-mannered author of 'The History of Religions.' The next effusion of mine was 'Jairus' Daughter,' which I inserted, by request, in 'The North American Review,' then a miscellany. A few years later, I passed four winters at Savannah, Ga., and remember still vividly the love and sympathy of that genial community.

"In 1819, I married Samuel Gilman, and came to Charleston, South Carolina, where he was ordained pastor of the Unitarian church.

"In 1832, I commenced editing the 'Rose Bud,' a hebdomadal, the first juvenile newspaper, if I mistake not, in the Union. From this periodical I have reprinted, at various times, the following volumes: 'Recollections of a New England Housekeeper,' 'Recollections of a Southern Matron,' 'Ruth Raymond, or Love's Progress,' 'Poetry of Travelling in the United States,' 'Tales and Ballads,' 'Verses of a Life-Time,' 'Letters of Eliza Wilkinson during the invasion of Charleston.' Also several volumes for youth, now collected in one, and recently published as 'Mrs. Gilman's Gift-Book.'

"On the publication of 'The Recollections of a New England Housekeeper,' I received thanks and congratulations from every quarter, and I attribute its popularity to the fact, that it was the first attempt, in that particular mode, to enter into the recesses of American homes and hearths—the first unveiling of what I may call the altar of the Lares in our cuisine.

"I feel proud to say, that a chapter in that work was among the first heralds of the temperance movement—a cause to which I shall cheerfully give my later as well as my earlier powers.

"I have purposely confined myself to my earlier recollections, believing that my writings will be the best exponents of my views and experience.

"My Heavenly Father has called me to various trials of joy and sorrow, and I trust they have all drawn me nearer to Him. I have resided in Charleston thirty-one years, and shall probably make my final resting-place in the beautiful cemetery adjoining my husband's church—the church of my faith and my love."

The character of Mrs. Gilman's writings, both prose and poetry, is that of a healthy imagination and cheerful mind—just what her reminiscences would lead us to expect. She sees no "lions in her path," and she never parades fictitious woes. She admires nature, delights in social enjoyments, and chooses the dear domestic affections and household virtues for themes of story and song. Her pictures of southern life are vivid and racy; she excels in these home-sketches, and her moral lessons evince the true nobility of her soul.

FAMILY EDUCATION.

After the departure of our Connecticut teacher, Mr. Bates, papa resolved to carry on our education himself. We were to rise by daylight, that he might pursue his accustomed ride over the fields after breakfast. New writing-books were taken out and ruled, fresh quills laid by their side, our task carefully committed to memory, and we sat with a mixture of docility and curiosity to know now he would manage as a teacher. The first three days, our lessons being on trodden ground, and ourselves under the impulse of novelty, we were very amiable, he very paternal; on the fourth, John was turned out of the room, Richard was pronounced a snub, and I went sobbing to mamma, as if my heart would break, while papa said he might be compelled to ditch rice-fields, but he never would undertake to teach children again.

A slight constraint was thrown over the family for a day or two, but it soon wore off, and he returned to his good-nature. For three weeks we were as wild as fawns, until mamma's attention was attracted by my sun-burnt complexion, and my brother's torn clothes.

"This will never answer," said she to papa. "Look at Cornelia's face! It is as brown as a chinquapin. Richard has ruined his new suit, and John has cut his leg with the carpenter's tools. I have half a mind to keep school for them myself."

Papa gave a slight whistle, which seemed rather to stimulate than check her resolution. "Cornelia," said she, "go directly to your brothers, and prepare your books for to-morrow. I will teach you."

The picture about to be presented is not overwrought. I am confident of the sympathy of many a mother, whose finger has been kept on a word in the lesson, amid countless interruptions, and finished with a frolic.

One would suppose that the retirement of a plantation was the most appropriate spot for a mother and her children to give and receive instruction. Not so; for instead of a limited household, her dependants are increased to a number which would constitute a village. She is obliged to listen to cases of grievance, is a nurse to the sick, and distributes the half-yearly clothing; indeed, the mere giving out of thread and needles is something of a charge on so large a scale. A planter's lady may seem indolent, because there are so many under her who perform trivial services; but the very circumstance of keeping so many menials in order is an arduous one, and the keys of her establishment are a care of which a northern housekeeper knows nothing, and include a very extensive class of duties. Many fair, and even aristocratic girls, if we may use this phrase in our republican country, who grace a ball-room, or loll in a liveried carriage, may be seen with these steel talismans, presiding over store-rooms, and measuring, with the accuracy and conscientiousness of a shopman, the daily allowance of the family, or cutting homespun suits, for days together, for the young and the old negroes under their charge; while matrons, who would ring a bell for their pocket-handkerchief to be brought to them, will act the part of a surgeon or physician with a promptitude and skill which would excite astonishment in a stranger. Very frequently, servants, like children, will only take medicine from their superiors, and in this case the planter's wife or daughter is admirably fitted to aid them.

There are few establishments where all care and responsibility devolves on the master; and even then the superintendence of a large domestic circle, and the rites of hospitality, demand so large a portion of the mistress's time, as leaves her but little opportunity for systematic teaching in her family. In this case she is wise to seek an efficient tutor, still appropriating those opportunities which perpetually arise under the same roof to improve their moral and religious culture, and cultivate those sympathies which exalt these precious beings from children to friends.

The young, conscientious, ardent mother must be taught this by experience. She has a jealousy at first of any instruction that shall come between their dawning minds and her own; and is only taught by the constantly thwarted recitation, that in this country, at least, good housekeeping and good teaching cannot be combined.

But to return to my narrative. The morning after mamma's order, we assembled at ten o'clock. There was a little trepidation in her manner, but we loved her too well to annoy her by noticing it. Her education had been confined to mere rudiments, and her good sense led her only to conduct our reading, writing, and spelling.

We stood in a line.

"Spell irrigate," said she. Just then the coachman entered, and bowing, said,

"Maussa send me for de key for get four quart o' corn for him bay horse."

The key was given.

"Spell imitate," said mamma.

"We did not spell irrigate," we all exclaimed.

"Oh, no," said she; "irrigate."

By the time the two words were well through, Chloe, the most refined of our coloured circle, appeared.

"Will mistress please to medjure out some calomel for Syphax, who is feverish and onrestless?"

During mamma's visit to the doctor's-shop, as the medicine-closet was called, we turned the inkstand over on her mahogany table, and wiped it up with our pocket-handkerchiefs. It required some time to cleanse and arrange ourselves; and just as we were seated, and had advanced a little way on our orthographical journey, Maum Phillis entered with her usual drawl,

"Little maussa want for nurse, marm."

While this operation was going on, we gathered round mamma to play bo-peep with the baby, until even she forgot our lessons. At length the little pet was dismissed, with the white drops still resting on his red lips, and our line was formed again.

Mamma's next interruption, after successfully issuing a few words, was to settle a quarrel between Lafayette and Venus, two little blackies, who were going through their daily drill in learning to rub the furniture, which, with brushing flies at meals, constitutes the first instruction for house-servants. These important and classical personages rubbed about a stroke to the minute on each side of the cellaret, rolling up their eyes and making grimaces at each other. At this crisis, they had laid claim to the same rubbing-cloth; mamma stopped the dispute, by ordering my seamstress, Flora, who was sewing for me, to apply the weight of her thimble, that long-known weapon of offence, as well as implement of industry, to their organ of firmness.

"Spell accentuate," said mamma, whose finger had slipped from the column.

"No, no, that is not the place," we exclaimed, rectifying the mistake.

"Spell irritate," said she, with admirable coolness; and John fairly succeeded, just as the overseer's son, a sallow little boy, with yellow hair and blue homespun dress, came in with his hat on, and kicking up one foot for manners, said,

"Fayther says as how he wants Master Richard's horse to help tote some tetterers to tother field."

This pretty piece of alliteration was complied with, after some remonstrance from brother Dick, and we finished our column. At this crisis, before we were fairly seated at writing, mamma was summoned to the hall to one of the field-hands, who had received an injury in the ankle from a hoe. Papa and the overseer being at a distance, she was obliged to superintend the wound. We all followed her, Lafayette and Venus bringing up the rear. She inspected the sufferer's great foot, covered with blood and perspiration, superintended a bath, prepared a healing application, and bound it on with her own delicate hands, first quietly tying a black apron over her white dress. There was no shrinking, no hiding of the eyes; and while extracting some extraneous substance from the wound, her manner was as resolute as it was gentle and consoling. This episode gave Richard an opportunity to unload his pockets of groundnuts, and treat us therewith. We were again seated at our writing-books, and were going on swimmingly with "Avoid evil company," when a little crow-minder, hoarse from his late occupation, came in with a basket of eggs, and said,

"Mammy Phillis send missis some eggs for buy, ma'am; she an't so berry well, and ax for some 'baccor."

It took a little time to pay for the eggs and send to the store-room for the Virginia weed, of which opportunity we availed ourselves to draw figures on our slates. Mamma reproved us, and we were resuming our duties, when the cook's son approached, and said,

"Missis, Daddy Ajax say he been broke de axe, and ax me for ax you for len him de new axe."

This made us shout with laughter, and the business was scarcely settled, when the dinner-horn sounded. That evening a carriage full of friends arrived from the city to pass a week with us, and thus ended mamma's experiment in teaching.

YOUNG MEN.

There is no moral object so beautiful to me as a conscientious young man! I watch him as I do a star in the heavens: clouds may be before him, but we know that his light is behind them, and will beam again; the blaze of others' prosperity may outshine him, but we know that, though unseen, he illumines his true sphere. He resists temptation not without a struggle, for that is not virtue, but he does resist and conquer; he hears the sarcasm of the profligate, and it stings him, for that is the trial of virtue, but he heals the wound with his own pure touch; he heeds not the watch-word of fashion, if it leads to sin; the atheist who says, not only in his heart but with his lips, "There is no God," controls him not, for he sees the hand of a creating God, and reverences it—of a preserving God, and rejoices in it. Woman is sheltered by fond arms, and guided by loving counsel; old age is protected by its experience, and manhood by its strength; but the young man stands amid the temptations of the world like a self-balanced tower. Happy he who seeks and gains the prop and shelter of Christianity.

Onward, then, conscientious youth! raise thy standard and nerve thyself for goodness. If God has given thee intellectual power, awaken it in that cause; never let it be said of thee, he helped to swell the tide of sin, by pouring his influence into its channels. If thou art feeble in mental strength, throw not that poor drop into a polluted current. Awake, arise, young man! Assume the beautiful garments of virtue! It is easy, fearfully easy, to sin; it is difficult to be pure and holy. Put on thy strength, then; let thy chivalry be aroused against error—let truth be the lady of thy love—defend her.

THE SOUTHERN WIFE.

This club engagement brought on others. I was not selfish, and even urged Arthur to go to hunt and to dinner-parties, although hoping that he would resist my urging. He went frequently, and a growing discomfort began to work upon my mind. I had undefined forebodings; I mused about past days; my views of life became slowly disorganized; my physical powers enfeebled; a nervous excitement followed; I nursed a moody discontent, and ceased a while to reason clearly. Woe to me, had I yielded to this irritable temperament! I began immediately, on principle, to busy myself about my household. The location of Bellevue was picturesque—the dwelling airy and commodious; I had, therefore, only to exercise taste in external and internal arrangement, to make it beautiful throughout. I was careful to consult my husband in those points which interested him, without annoying him with mere trifles. If the reign of romance was really waning, I resolved not to chill his noble confidence, but to make a steadier light rise on his affections. If he was absorbed in reading, I sat quietly waiting the pause when I should be rewarded by the communication of ripe ideas; if I saw that he prized a tree which interfered with my flowers, I sacrificed my preference to a more sacred feeling; if any habit of his annoyed me, I spoke of it once or twice calmly, and then bore it quietly if unreformed; I welcomed his friends with cordiality, entered into their family interests, and stopped my yawns, which, to say the truth, was sometimes an almost desperate effort, before they reached eye or ear.

This task of self-government was not easy. To repress a harsh answer, to confess a fault, and to stop (right or wrong) in the midst of self-defence, in gentle submission, sometimes requires a struggle like life and death: but these three efforts are the golden threads with which domestic happiness is woven; once begin the fabric with this woof, and trials shall not break or sorrow tarnish it.

Men are not often unreasonable; their difficulties lie in not understanding the moral and physical structure of our sex. They often wound through ignorance, and are surprised at having offended. How clear is it, then, that woman loses by petulance and recrimination! Her first study must be self-control, almost to hypocrisy. A good wife must smile amid a thousand perplexities, and clear her voice to tones of cheerfulness when her frame is drooping with disease, or else languish alone. Man, on the contrary, when trials beset him, expects to find her ear and heart a ready receptacle; and, when sickness assails him, her soft hand must nurse and sustain him.

I have not meant to suggest that, in ceasing to be a mere lover, Arthur was not a tender and devoted husband. I have only described the natural progress of a sensible, independent married man, desirous of fulfilling all the relations of society. Nor in these remarks would I chill the romance of some young dreamer, who is reposing her heart on another. Let her dream on. God has given this youthful, luxurious gift of trusting love, as he has given hues to the flower and sunbeams to the sky. It is a superadded charm to his lavish blessings; but let her be careful that when her husband

"Wakes from love's romantic dream,
His eyes may open on a sweet esteem."

Let him know nothing of the struggle which follows the first chill of the affections; let no scenes of tears and apologies be acted to agitate him, until he becomes accustomed to agitation; thus shall the star of domestic peace arise in fixedness and beauty above them, and shine down in gentle light on their lives, as it has on ours.

MISTAKES OF STRANGERS.

I was prepared one morning to call on a stranger, when visitors were announced; and, glancing round the drawing-room, I perceived on the sofa a rattan, which had been brought in by one of my young brothers. I caught it up, and, twisting it in a coil, thrust it into my velvet reticule, and received my guests. As soon as they departed, I sprang into the carriage, which was in waiting, and drove away. The ladies were at home. In the course of conversation, I unthinkingly drew my scented pocket-handkerchief from my bag, when out flew the rattan with a bound, and rolled to the feet of the stranger. My deep and inextinguishable blush probably helped on any uncharitable surmises that she might have made, and who can blame her, after such evidence, for reporting that Charleston ladies carried cow-skins in their pockets!

From "Poems."

THE MOCKING-BIRD IN THE CITY.

Bird of the South! is this a scene to waken
Thy native notes in thrilling, gushing tone?
Thy woodland nest of love is all forsaken —
Thy mate alone!

While stranger-tongues roll by, thy song is lending
Joy to the happy, soothing to the sad;
O'er my full heart it flows with gentle blending,
And I am glad.

And I will sing, though dear ones, loved and loving,
Are left afar in my sweet nest of home;
Though from that nest, with backward yearnings moving
Onward I roam!

And with heart-music shall my feeble aiding
Still swell the note of human joy aloud;
Nor, with untrusting soul kind Heaven upbraiding
Sigh 'mid the crowd.

GIRARDIN, DELPHINE DE,

A DAUGHTER of the celebrated Sophia Gay, and the wife of the poet de Girardin, was born in Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1808. She has gained a high reputation among French poets. In 1820, she obtained the prize of the Academie Française; her theme was "An Eulogy on the Sacrifice and Devotion of the French Physicians and Nuns during the prevalence of the Cholera." In 1827, she was chosen a member of the Tiber Academy, at Rome, an honour never before conferred on a woman. Her larger poems are "Le Retour," and "Napoléon." A collection of her smaller poems has been published under the title of "Essais Poétiques." But her prose works, written chiefly since her marriage, are now more popular than her poems. Perhaps she has gained, not only in intellectual culture, but in the art of using her resources to the best advantage, by her union with a man of such acknowledged talents as M. Emile de Girardin, who has shown the real nobleness of genius—that which does not fear a rival in his wife. Certain it is, that her fictitious narratives evince intellectual powers of the highest order. She has a very striking originality of thought, while her skill in the development of characters, her penetration into motives, and her power of unravelling the twisted threads that impel human inconsistency, are really wonderful. "Le Marquis de Pontignac;" "La Canne de M. de Balzac;" "Contes d'une vieille Fille;" "L'Ecole des Journalistes," are amongst the best.

The novels of Madame de Girardin are written with an artistic perfection, that prevents extracting the highest spiritual and poetic ideas. Every evolvment of character, every moral sentiment is so incorporated with the person or incident described, that taken separately it loses its essence. The subjoined extracts will give some notion of the sparkling vivacity and wit which she possesses to perfection, but she manifests also much sensibility—much tenderness—and the little poems here and there introduced are quite equal to any French verses of that sort; her style is peculiarly elegant and appropriate.

From "La Canne de Balzac."

[We must premise, for the understanding of the following extract, by a little explanation. Mr. Tancred Dorimont is a young gentleman, lately arrived in Paris to seek employment, and has a letter of recommendation to Mr. Poirceau, President of an Insurance Company, to whose house he goes.]

"Is Mr. Poirceau at home?"

"Yes, sir—shall I trouble you to step this way."

Trouble, was the exact word, for to get through the interposing barriers was like entering by siege.

The hall—the landing-place of the stair-case—were barricaded by benches set one upon another cross-ways—and every possible way—and completely barring up the road.

Tancred, with great difficulty, worked his way to the ante-chamber—here he had to stop again. An enormous roll of carpeting obstructed the passage—behind this carpet was the large dinner-table covered with chairs sitting in one another's laps—behind that more benches—then a step-ladder, then a stand covered with china, then flower-pots waiting for flowers, then candelabras waiting for candles, then the marble top of a table, on which were heaped cushions, shovel and tongs, stools, bellows, and coffee-pot.

Tancred traversed this chaos without accident, and got into the dining-room.

New difficulties.—In the dining-room was cast into a general melée, all the parlour furniture, sofa, arm-chairs, divans—then came valuable articles—the mantel-clock with its tottering shade—vases for flowers too beautiful ever to put flowers in them—bust of the uncle, the general, so like—work-table, work-box, above all the piano. Tancred felt as if he were standing over the wreck of the world, like another Attila. He had never beheld such arrangements. He imagined that this furniture had all been saved from a fire of the preceding night, and had been deposited there till its owner was furnished with another dwelling. He looked—climbed over a pile of chairs—skirted round an enormous sofa as one skirts a mountain—encountered many things on the way, but saw no person.

"Is Mr. P— in?" asked he, a second time.

"This way, this way,"—cried a distant voice.

Tancred saw nothing still. He arrived, at last, at the parlour-door. In the parlour, the bedchamber furniture, proud of its promotion, spread itself about.—But—still—nobody.

Tancred turned towards the chamber-door—the same voice: "Here's a present for you!"

At the same moment a great bundle, thrown by an invisible hand, struck Tancred in the face. and he felt himself stifled, covered up by a deluge of little petticoats and frocks of every colour, and every size, from which he had the greatest difficulty to free himself—some had a thousand little strings that hooked on to his buttons—others had little sleeves that his hand went in—the whole pretty well seasoned with dust.

When Tancred was able to see, he found himself face to face with a great gawky servant, armed with a brush and duster; the fellow looked frightened and awkward.

"I beg your pardon, sir, I thought it was the upholsterer's boy, who is coming to take down the bedstead, and I thought I'd have a little fun with him."

"Is Mr. P— in,"—interrupted Tancred—then seeing that the room was quite without furniture; "but I am afraid I cannot see him—I suppose you are moving?"

"Oh, no! we are not moving," answered the man; "things are topsy-turvy, it is because of the ball and that confounded upholsterer who has not come."

"A ball to-night? I will come another time."

"Oh, this is not the first time we have a ball; Mr. P— will see you; step into the office."

* * * * *

She had one of those faces; beautiful to talk about, not at all to look at; large eyes, aquiline nose, little mouth, oval face, well-turned chin. If Madame P— had been courted by an ambassador, like a princess, she would have done well to send her description, not her portrait. No matter—she was what is called a handsome woman; a perfect doll, never out of order, never in undress: always laced, pinched, corseted; not a hair out of place, not a ribbon floating. She looked dressed in a wrapper, and armed in a ball-dress; she followed every fashion—because she was fond of it? No—but as a matter of conscience. Her coiffeur was the best in Paris, and whatever head-dress it pleased him to arrange for her, she respected it, and would not dare to put a finger to it. Suppose this head-dress unbecoming? What matter—it is not her responsibility. If a hair-pin hurts her? No matter—it would not do to spoil the head-dress. The same respect for the mantua-maker. She followed the laws of fashion rigorously—the laws of the world scrupulously—the laws of nature when they did not clash with the other more important ones. She said, with a pe dantic air, that women ought not to occupy themselves with literature—but she talked of house keeping like a professor—her mind was slow, and she looked upon every piece of wit she could not comprehend as something improper. Her presence had a chilling effect—it was like the opening of a door in a box at the theatre.

* * * * *

When a disagreeable man is described, they say, he is so satisfied with himself! Very well. I know what is more disagreeable—a man who is dissatisfied with himself. With him there is no getting along; no way of pleasing; flattery irritates him—politeness seems to him pity; a present—charity; he is desperately humble, and nervously tenacious. If you ask him to dinner, he answers, “Thank you, no—I am not good company—I know you don’t want me.” If you invite him to hear music; “No, I thank you,” says he, “I am too insignificant to go to such gay parties.” If you propose a picnic; “No, I thank you,” he answers, “such expeditions require gayety—invite your agreeable friends—I am not suitable.” This man enjoys nothing—is fit for nothing; he is eaten up with modesty—but a disagreeable modesty; it is an imaginary leprosy which makes him shun his fellow-creatures.

This malady is fortunately very rare in our country; I only speak of it to announce the fact of its existence.

GORE, MRS. CHARLES,

Is one of the most popular of the living female novelists of England; the number of her works would give her celebrity, had she no other claim. She is, however, a powerful and brilliant writer, and it seems almost a paradox to assert, that her surprising fertility of imagination should be an obstacle to her attaining the high literary reputation she merits. But her works are so unfailingly presented to the public, so constantly poured out, that they are received like the flowers and fruits, acceptable and delightful, but not to be sought for and praised, as some rare occasional production. We revel in our showers of roses, but they are common-place, while we make a wonder of some prickly production of a foreign bed. We are led to these thoughts while looking over a notice of Mrs. Gore's writings, which appeared in Chambers's Cyclopædia: the critic says,—“This lady is a clever and prolific writer of tales and fashionable novels. Her first work (published anonymously) was, we believe, a small volume containing two tales, ‘The Lettre de Cachet,’ and ‘The Reign of Terror,’ 1827. One of these relates to the times of Louis XIV., and the other to the French Revolution. They are both interesting, graceful tales—superior, we think, to some of the more elaborate and extensive fictions of the authoress. In 1830, appeared ‘Women as They Are; or, The Manners of the Day,’ three volumes—an easy sparkling narrative, with correct pictures of modern society—much lady-like writing on dress and fashion, and some rather misplaced derision or contempt for ‘excellent wives,’ and ‘good sort of men.’ This novel soon went through a second edition, and Mrs. Gore continued the same style of fashionable portraiture. In 1831, she issued ‘Mothers and daughters, a Tale of the Year,’ 1830. Here the manners of gay life—balls, dinners, and fêtes—with clever sketches of character, and amusing dialogues, make up the customary three volumes. The same year, we find Mrs. Gore compiling a series of narratives for youth, entitled ‘The Historical Traveller.’ In 1832, she came forward with ‘The Fair of May Fair,’ a series of fashionable tales that were not so well received. The critics hinted that Mrs. Gore had exhausted her stock of observation, and we believe she went to reside in France, where she continued some years. Her next tale was entitled ‘Mrs. Armitage.’ In 1838, she published ‘The Book of Roses, or the Rose-Fancier’s Manual,’ a delightful little work on the history of the rose, its propagation and culture. France is celebrated for its rich varieties of the queen of flowers, and Mrs. Gore availed herself of the taste and experience of the French floriculturists. A few months afterwards came out ‘The Heir of Selwood, or Three Epochs of a Life,’ a novel in which were exhibited sketches of Parisian as well as English society, and an interesting though somewhat confused plot. The year 1839 witnessed three more works of fiction from this indefatigable lady, ‘The Cabinet Minister,’ the scene of which is laid during the regency of George IV., and includes among its characters the great name of Sheridan; ‘Preferment, or my Uncle, the Earl,’ containing some good sketches of drawing-room society, but no plot; and the ‘Courtier of the Days of Charles II.,’ and other tales. Next year we have the ‘Dowager, or the New School for Scandal;’ and in 1841 ‘Greenville, or a Season in Paris;’ ‘Dacre of the South, or the Olden Time’ (a drama); and ‘The Lover and her Husband,’ &c., the latter a free translation of M. Bertrand’s Gerfaut. In 1842, Mrs. Gore published ‘The Banker’s Wife, or Court and City,’ in which the efforts of a family in the middle rank to outshine a nobleman, and the consequences resulting from this silly vanity and ambition, are truly and powerfully painted. The value of Mrs. Gore’s novels consists in their lively caustic pictures of fashionable and high society. ‘The more respectable of her personages are affectors of an excessive prudery concerning the decencies of life—nay, occasionally of an exalted and mystical religious feeling. The business of their existence is to avoid the slightest breach of conventional decorum. Whatever, therefore, they do, is a fair and absolute measure of the prevailing opinions of the class, and may be regarded as not derogatory to their position in the eyes of their equals. But the low average standard of morality thus depicted, with its conventional distinctions, cannot be invented. It forms the atmosphere in which the parties live; and were it a compound, fabricated at the author's pleasure, the beings who breathe it could not be universally acknowledged as fantastical and as mere monstrosities; they would, indeed, be incapable of acting in harmony and consistence with the known laws and usages of civil life. Such as a series of parliamentary reports, county meetings, race-horse transactions, &c., they will be found, with a reasonable allowance of artistic colouring, to reflect accurately enough the notions current among the upper classes respecting religion, politics, domestic morals, the social affections, and that coarse aggregate of dealing with our neighbours, which is embraced by the term common honesty.* Besides the works we have mentioned, Mrs. Gore has published 'The Desennuyée,' 'The Peeress,' 'The Woman of the World,' 'The Woman of Business,' 'The Ambassador's Wife,' and other novels. She contributes tales to the periodicals, and is perhaps unparalleled for fertility. Her works are all of the same class—all pictures of existing life and manners; but the want of genuine feeling, of passion and simplicity, in her living models, and the endless frivolities of their occupations and pursuits, make us sometimes take leave of Mrs. Gore's fashionable triflers in the temper with which Goldsmith parted from Beau Tibbs—'The company of fools may at first make us smile, but at last never fails of rendering us melancholy.'

The defects of Mrs. Gore's works, which these critics point out, seem rather to belong to English fashionable life, than to the delineator thereof; nor do we think she has had justice rendered her genius. Two or three of her novels might be selected, which would found a reputation for an author who had written nothing else; nay, we will go farther—"Cecil," one of her most vivacious but least satisfactory works, would by itself confer celebrity, as was plainly seen when, upon its anonymous appearance, it was hailed with eagerness as the débüt of a new and clever masculine pen. Mrs. Gore possesses great knowledge of human nature, and is well skilled in developing the peculiarities of character; she can even be pathetic. In one of her very best tales—"Female Domination"—the sorrows of the oppressed daughter are told in a very touching manner; the character of Mrs. Armitage, in this book, is remarkably well-sustained delineation, and the evolution of the plot is effected in a masterly way. But the most remarkable quality of our authoress is wit; this she possesses in such superabundance that she actually wastes it; good things lie in out of the way places, where they are hardly recognized, and where they lose the effect they might have, if reserved for their fitting application.

It has been said of a very rich Russian prince, who visited London some years ago, that to show the little account he made of pearls, he had them loosely stitched in ornamenting his attire, on purpose that they might fall, while he walked on, heedless of their fate. Mrs. Gore is equally prodigal of the little gems of her epigrammatic wit. they fall from her when least expected, and sometimes when least needed. Her literary industry cannot be estimated, as it is well known that, together with the very wonderful number of her acknowledged works, she has sent out many without her name. Besides these narrative fictions, Mrs. Gore has made some contributions to the stage—"The Maid of Croissy," "The Sledge-Driver,"—little dramas from the French,—"The School for Coquettes," and other comedies. Sir Walter Scott showed, by the examples of Le Sage and Fielding, that a successful novelist could scarcely be fitted for dramatic compositions; his own attempt in that way came afterwards to support his theory. The plays of Mrs. Gore may, then, without disparaging her abilities, be acknowledged but mediocre achievements.

Some masculine critics have pronounced it impossible that the classical allusions and quotations, interspersed through Mrs. Gore's works, should have proceeded from herself. The Latin and Greek of these gentlemen must have found very difficult access into their brains, but they may be assured such trifling accomplishments can be, and are, acquired every year by hundreds of school-boys, who would be entirely puzzled were a single chapter, such as the most indifferent of Mrs. Gore's works would furnish, to be expected of them. Memory is a faculty possessed equally, we believe, by the sexes; but the greater vivacity of the female intellect renders the acquisition of language easier for girls than for boys; and when similar advantages shall be given to both, women will excel men in that knowledge of languages which gives facility to expression, and makes all tongues render tribute in the service of Genius. Mrs. Gore has the honour of being a leader in this learning-made-popular-style of novel-writing.

From "Self;" a novel.

Thanks to the march of civilization, privacy has been exploded among us, and individuality effaced. People feel in thousands, and think in tens of thousands. No quiet nook of earth remaining for the modern Cincinnatus to cultivate his own carrots and opinions, where humours may expand into excrecence, or originality let grow its beard! Robinson Crusoe's island has been invaded by missionary societies or colonization committees; and even in our scarcely less barbarous midland counties, railroads are cutting their way into Harlowe Place, and puffing their desecrations into the venerable face of Grandison Hall. The word "tender" has acquired, in modern parlance, a sense that would have distracted the chivalrous authors of the "Arcadia;" nor is there a vicarage in the land sufficiently remote from the shriek of the engine-driver, to foster the ingenuousness of a Dr. Primrose.

The literature of the country was just then at a discount. Prophets had appeared, indeed, but they prophesied in the wilderness. Those great writers, whose names are now inscribed on corner-stones of the temple of fame, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, were damned by an epithet; while Moore, like a frisky lord in a police-office, was fain to shelter his irregularities under a feigned name. The uproar of war's alarms had somewhat deafened the ear of the public to the music of Apollo's flute. The fashionable world, accordingly, restricted its literary enjoyments to laughing at the waggeries of the Anti-Jacobin, or shrieking at the diabolisms of Monk Lewis; dim foreshadowing of the romantic school, on the eve of its creation by Scott, or gurglings of the vitriolic Hippocrene, about to start from the earth on the stamping of Byron's Pegasus. The belles-lettres, which for two centuries past had received their impulse from France, had undergone a staggering blow at the revolution, under the effects of which they still languished; and behold, as in the case of other extenuated patients, hysteria supervened.

From "Modern Chivalry."*

HOW TO MANAGE THE WORLD.

Waterton, the naturalist, who, like Mungo Park, and other bold adventurers into lands beyond the sea, passes for the fabricator of half the marvels he was the first to witness, asserts that whenever he encountered an alligator tête-à-tête, in the wilderness, he used to leap on his back, and ride the beast to death. This feat, so much discredited by the stay-at-home critics, was an act of neither bravery nor braggartry—but of necessity. Either the man or the alligator must have had the upper hand. Il a fallu opter.

Just so are we situated with regard to the world. Either we must leap upon its back, strike our spur into its panting sides, and, in spite of its scaly defences, compel it to obey our glowing will, or the animal will mangle us with its ferocious jaws, and pursue its way toward its refuge in the cool waters, leaving us expiring in the dust. Either the world or the individual must obtain the upper hand. Happy he who hath the genius and presence of mind of a Waterton!

The greatest difficulty experienced now-a-days in accomplishing the subjugation of the brute, is to get it on foot, with the view of mounting. Lazy and over-fed, it lies ruminating, half lost amid the springing grass of its fertile meadows, like a Cheshire cow, which, when roused by an occasional impulse of friskiness, goes cumbrously frolicking round the pastures, without aim or end, save that of its own cork-screwed tail, only to subside anew into the apathetic torpor of obesity. What is to be done with such a world? A prick less penetrating than that of a goad will not awaken it from its luxurious and self-sufficing ruminations; nay, a stunning blow between the horns is absolutely indispensable to overmaster its huge, heavy, and powerful organization.

Between the somnolence and selfishness of the applauding classes, celebrity has become a thing of yesterday! There is neither courage nor energy left in the world to engender a great reputation. As of old the gods deserted Greece, great men are deserting Great Britain.

SOCIETY.

Society has become a vast platitude, like a calm at sea, painted by Vandervelde, or the Looking-Glass Prairies, described by Boz. No man blushes at being stupid and insignificant as his neighbours. The happy medium of dulness envelopes and environs every object, passive or active; and we say to each other, as Louis XIII. said to Cinq Mars, "Mon mignon! let us go and look out of the window: et ennuyons nous—ennuyons nous bien!" The moment insignificance and monotony become the normal state of a society, yawns are out of place.

The predominant growth of such an order of things is unhappily a monstrous egoism, like the hippopotamus and other frightful creatures engendered amid the verdure of the level pastures of the Nile. Self becomes the One Divinity; amalgamating the worship due to Apollo and Diana, Isis and Osiris; and superseding at once the golden image set up for public adoration and the Lares and Penates of domestic piety, a prodigious economy of devotion! For the egoist has so far the advantage over every other species of devotee, that his idol is ever present. Like the Catholic priests, who, during the Reign of Terror, carried portable altars in their pockets, and the insignia of their faith concealed in a walking-stick, he is always prepared for his devotions. The shrine and the lamp burning before it, are identical. His faith knows no misgivings, his fervour no intermission. Like the Delhai Lama, he is eternally absorbed in ecstatic contemplation of his own divinity.

From "Abednego, the Money-Lender."

THE FEMALE SPENDTHRIFT.

"We are bound, in this world, to keep up the decencies of life, due to our position in society," interrupted the Countess, in a haughty tone.

"I thoroughly agree with your ladyship," was the fearless reply of Abednego; "and it is precisely for that reason I have it at heart to see the valuables of the Countess of Winterfield removed from the custody of a money-lending Jew."

His lovely visitor blushed to the temples at this unexpected retort, but more in anger than in sorrow.

"A step lower in the scale of degradation," calmly resumed Abednego, "and they would appear among the unredeemed pledges in a pawnbroker's window. Think of the brilliant Countess of Winterfield presenting herself at court with duplicates in her pocket!"

"You presume upon my necessities to insult me thus!" cried the indignant woman, roused by this terrible sentence.

"Necessities, madam, permit me to observe, wholly of your own creation! I am not unfrequently compelled to witness the woes of my fellow-creatures,—ay, even those of your own sex. But how different is their nature from those of which you complain! Trust me, there are severer pangs in the world than arise from the rumpling of the rose-leaf! I have seen mothers of families struggling for their children's bread; I have seen devoted wives beggared by the improvidence of their husbands, yet exerting themselves diligently, humbly, and silently, to extricate themselves from ruin. Such misfortunes, madam, and such penury, I respect. Nay, I have known well-born women subject themselves to wretchedness and privation for the sake of their lovers—and even those I have respected! But I have neither respect nor pity for the wantonness of waste that purports only the entanglement of frivolous admirers. The display intended to deceive some unhappy dupe into offering you his hand, moves only my contempt. If you must needs have an opera-box, for the young Marquis to sit beside you throughout the evening as throughout the morning,—if you must needs have a succession of showy dresses, to enhance your beauty to secure these dangles,—if you must needs have brilliant equipages to fly about the town—to wander from races to breakfasts—from Greenwich parties to pic-nics at Ken Wood (your ladyship perceives that I am tolerably well versed in your movements!)—have them at other cost than mine! I have no money to throw away on the maintenance of your follies.”

Lady Winterfield started up. Galled beyond endurance by the humiliations thus inflicted upon her, she resolved to obey the harsh injunction of Abednego, and seek assistance elsewhere. But, alas! a moment's reflection served to remind her that she had already sought it, and in vain; that she had no resource—no hope—save in the insolent rebuker of her faults. She submitted, therefore,—rendered docile by the iron pressure of necessity. In a moment she subdued her temper, and humbled her pride,—reduced to tameness, like the beasts of the field, by the pangs of privation.

“You are most severe upon me,” said she, in the pretty coaxing voice that none knew better how to assume when her purpose needed, “though perhaps not more so than I deserve. But when I assure you, that if you persist in refusing me this five hundred pounds I am utterly ruined—ruined both in fortune and reputation—”

“My refusal will not render your ladyship a shilling poorer than you are now. In what way, therefore, can you charge me with your ruin?”

“You will have, at least, exposed it to the world.”

Abednego shrugged his shoulders. “You expose yourself, madam,” said he, “by using such arguments! Once for all, I repeat that you are wasting the substance of others, and of your children, merely to keep up false appearances in the world. So long as you enjoy luxuries which you do not and cannot pay for, you are shining at the cost of your coach-makers, jewellers, milliners, money-lenders—the abject obligee of humble tradesmen. At this moment—woman and Countess as you are—you stand before me as an inferior. Though you may be a Countess of the realm, and I the villified A. O., I rise above you as a capitalist,—I rise above you as a moralist, in whose hands you have placed weapons of offence.”

It was now the turn of Lady Winterfield to shrug her shoulders; but with impatience rather than contempt.

“Last week,” resumed Abednego, careless of the variations of her countenance, “there came hither to me a woman, young and lovely as yourself, who, like yourself, had exceeded her means, and broken her engagements. She came hither to me, not like your ladyship,—hoping to move me to pity by the sight of her loveliness and her affected despair,—she had other arms for the combat; and those arms, madam, prevailed! To her I assigned thrice the sum of her original debt, and at my own instigation.”

“And of what nature were those arms?” demanded Lady Winterfield, colouring deeply, and, by casting down her eyes, showing that she was prepared for expressions of gallantry and admiration on the part of one whom she loathed like a harpy.

“It avails little to explain,” replied Abednego, with an ill-repressed smile of exultation, as he rose from his chair and approached her; “for they are such as it were, perhaps, unbecoming so great a lady as the Countess of Winterfield to put to profit.”

“I am willing to use any arms,—make any concession,” faltered the fair bankrupt, a deadly paleness succeeding to her previous flush, as she contemplated the growing audacity of the Money-Lender.

Abednego folded his meagre hands carelessly before him, and, throwing back his head, stood contemplating her from head to foot, with a smile of indescribable expression. It was impossible to behold a more lovely woman; and the Money-Lender gazed upon her as if taking an appraisalment of her charms.

“The arms to which I alluded, are not at your ladyship's disposal!” was at length his sarcastic reply. “For they were tears of genuine remorse for an involuntary breach of faith; they were the worn and haggard looks which labour and want impose upon the fairest face. She was a woman of the people, madam; like you, left young, a widow—like you, with helpless children dependent upon her prudence. She told me—and her mien attested her veracity—that for them she had toiled day and night,—for them abstained from food and rest. But the outlay that was to set her up in business, (borrowed of one of the agents of A. O., and at usurious interest,) was still unrepaid. She was still poor, still insolvent, still needing indulgence; and came hither, like the fashionable Countess of Winterfield, to beg for mercy!”

Greatly relieved, even while writhing under the severe lesson imparted by Abednego, the fashionable spendthrift gasped for breath.

“I granted it,” resumed the harsh admonitor. “And I granted her also my respect—almost my affection. The old Money-Lender soothed her as a father might have done, and sent her home in peace and comfort to her children. Yours, madam, will have less to thank you for! I will not expose you,—I will not pursue you with the rigour of the law. But I choose to retain in security, for the property of mine which you have squandered, the diamonds pledged to me to that effect; and without affording you another guinea in extension of the loan,—aware that neither that, nor millions, would impede your ruin and disgrace.”

GOULD, HANNAH FLAGG,

Is a native of Lancaster, in the State of Vermont; but in her early youth her father, who was a veteran of the Revolution, removed to Newburyport, in Massachusetts, where she has since resided. Her mother died when Hannah was young, and for many years, even until the decease of her beloved father, she was his housekeeper, nurse, companion, and the chief source of his earthly happiness. She has, in several poems, touchingly alluded to incidents in the soldier-life of her venerable parent; and the patriotic glow which imbues many of her strains was, no doubt, fed by such reminiscences as the “Scar of Lexington” would suggest.

Miss Gould commenced her literary career as nearly all our American authors do, by writing for periodicals. Her contributions were chiefly poetical; these she collected, and in 1832 her first volume of poems was published in Boston. Since then, two additional volumes of her poems have been issued; and in 1846, a volume of prose, entitled “Gathered Leaves, or Miscellaneous Papers,” which had previously been contributions to annuals, appeared. In 1850, “Diosma—a perennial,” a volume of poems, selected and original, and “The Youth’s Coronal,” a little book of poems for children, were published. Miss Gould is preparing her lyrical compositions, some of which have been set to music, for publication—a task which her friends are solicitous she should perform, and thus give permanency to her productions.

The great popularity of Miss Gould we consider a most encouraging omen for the lovers of genuine poetry, of that which is true in thought and natural in description. She charms by the rare merit of imparting interest to small things and common occurrences. These make up far the greater part of life’s reality, and, if truth be the essence of poetry, they must be poetical. Unfortunately, but few poets have had the power or the inclination to invest the actual world with the beauty and attractiveness which has been lavished on ideal and false creations of fancy; and hence it is that their labours have been accounted idle, and their profession degraded. Passion has too often usurped the place of reason, and a selfish sensitiveness been fostered, instead of that healthful sentiment of complacency in the happiness of others, which all high exercise of the mental faculties should exalt and encourage. It is this enlarging and elevating the affections, which improves the heart and purifies the taste. And this is one important office of true poetry—such poetry as Miss Gould has written.

She also possesses great delicacy and scope of imagination; she gathers around her simple themes imagery of peculiar beauty and uncommon association—and yet this imagery is always appropriate. Then she has a very felicitous command of language, and the skill of making the most uncouth words “lie smooth in rhyme,” which the greatest poet of the age might envy. And she, not seldom, displays humorous turns of thought, and a sportive raillery which is very amusing.

Wit is a much rarer quality than wisdom in female writers. We shall not here enter into the inquiry why it is that women, who are, proverbially, quick in perception, and who are often accused of delighting in repartee and scandal, should nevertheless, when submitting their sentiments to the public, almost scrupulously avoid ridicule and satire, even when the subjects treated of seemed to justify or demand these forms of expression. But such is the fact—and hence Miss Gould’s sprightly wit has the advantage of appearing quite original. She, however, uses it with great delicacy, and always to teach or enforce some lesson which would not disparage “divine Philosophy” to inculcate.—In truth, the great power of her poetry is its moral application. This hallows every object she looks upon, and ennoble every incident she celebrates. She takes lowly and homely themes, but she turns them to the light of heaven, and they are beautified, and refined, and elevated. She brings to her God the rich treasures of her intellect, and the warm feelings of her heart. Everywhere and in every thing she sees and feels His presence; and her song rises in those “spiritual breathings,” which lift the hearts of her readers, to unite with her in praise to the Lord.

The mania for melancholy and despairing poetry, which the Byronian era introduced, never found any favour in the clear, calm, sensible mind of our poetess. Her philosophy is as practical and contented as her piety is ardent. Her motto seems to have been,

“The Muse should gladden the seasons,
Should strengthen the heart in pain”— and like her own, “Ground Laurel” she adds cheerfulness to every scene, however sequestered or lonely, which her fancy pictures. Truly such a genius is a blessing to the world.

Her poems will be popular while truth has friends and nature admirers, and while children are readers. And what praise is sweeter to a pure, good mind than the praise of childhood, in which the heart is always given with the lips?

THE MOON UPON THE SPIRE.

The full-orbed moon has reached no higher
Than yon old church’s mossy spire,
And seems, as gliding up the air,
She saw the fane, and, pausing there,
Would worship, in the tranquil night,
The Prince of peace—the Source of light,
Where man, for God, prepared the place,
And God, to man, unveils his face.

Her tribute all around is seen —
 She bends, and worships like a queen!
 Her robe of light, and beaming crown,
 In silence she is casting down;
 And, as a creature of the earth,
 She feels her lowliness of birth —
 Her weakness and inconstancy
 Before unchanging Purity.

Pale traveller on thy lonely way,
 'Tis well thine honours thus to pay —
 To reverence that ancient pile;
 And spread thy silver o'er the aisle,
 Which many a pious foot hath trod,
 That now is dust beneath the sod —
 Where many a sacred tear was wept,
 From eyes that long in death have slept.

The temple's builders, where are they?
 The worshippers? — all passed away;
 Who came the first to offer there
 The song of praise, the heart of prayer!
 Man's generation passes soon —
 It wanes and changes like the moon!
 He rears the perishable wall —
 But ere it crumble, he must fall!

And does he fall to rise no more?
 Hath he no part to triumph o'er
 The pallid king? — no spark to save
 From darkness, ashes and the grave?
 Thou holy place! the answer wrought
 In thy firm walls forbids the thought!
 The spirit that established thee
 Nor death nor darkness e'er shall see!

THE SNOWFLAKE.

- Now, if I fall, will it be my lot
 To be cast in some lone and lowly spot
 To melt, and to sink unseen, or forgot?
 And there will my course be ended?"
- 'Twas this a feathery Snowflake said,
 As down through measureless space it strayed,
 Or as, half by dalliance, half afraid,
 It seemed in mid air suspended.
- "Oh, no!" said the Earth, "thou shalt not lie
 Neglected and lone on my lap to die,
 Thou pure and delicate child of the sky!
 For thou wilt be safe in my keeping.
 But, then, I must give thee a lovelier form —
 Thou wilt not be a part of the wintry storm,
 But revive, when the sunbeams are yellow and warm,
 And the flowers from my bosom are peeping!"
- "And then thou shalt have thy choice, to be Restored in the lily that decks the lea,
 In the jessamine bloom, the anemone,
 Or aught of thy spotless whiteness;
 To melt, and be cast in a glittering bead
 With the pearls that the night scatters over the mead,
 In the cup where the bee and the fire-fly feed,
 Regaining thy dazzling brightness.
- "I'll let thee awake from thy transient sleep,
 When Viola's mild blue eye shall weep,
 In a tremulous tear; or, a diamond, leap
 In a drop from the unlocked fountain;
 Or, leaving the valley, the meadow, and heath,
 The streamlet, the flowers, and all beneath,
 Go up and be wove in the silvery wreath
 Encircling the brow of the mountain.
- "Or wouldst thou return to a home in the skies,
 To shine in the Iris I'll let thee arise,
 And appear in the many and glorious dyes
 A pencil of sunbeams is blending!
 But true, fair thing, as my name is Earth,
 I'll give thee a new and vernal birth,
 When thou shalt recover thy primal worth,
 And never regret descending!"
- "Then I will drop," said the trusting Flake;
 "But, bear it in mind, that the choice I make
 Is not in the flowers nor the dew to wake;
 Nor the mist, that shall pass with the morning.

For, things of thyself, they will die with thee;
 But those that are lent from on high, like me,
 Must rise, and will live, from thy dust set free,
 To the regions above returning.

- "And if true to thy word and just thou art,
 Like the spirit that dwells in the holiest heart,
 Unsullied by thee, thou wilt let me depart,
 And return to my native heaven.
 For I would be placed in the beautiful bow,
 From time to time, in thy sight to glow;
 So thou mayest remember the Flake of Snow
 By the promise that God hath given!"

THE SCAR OF LEXINGTON.

With cherub smile, the prattling boy,
 Who on the veteran's breast reclines,
 Has thrown aside his favourite toy,
 And round his tender finger twines
 Those scattered locks, that, with the flight
 Of fourscore years, are snowy white;
 And, as a scar arrests his view,
 He cries, "Grandpa, what wounded you?"

- "My child, 'tis five-and-fifty years,
 This very day, this very hour,
 Since, from a scene of blood and tears,
 Where valour fell by hostile power,
 I saw retire the setting sun
 Behind the hills of Lexington;
 While pale and lifeless on the plain
 My brothers lay, for freedom slain!"

- "And ere that fight, the first that spoke
 In thunder to our land, was o'er,
 Amid the clouds of fire and smoke,
 I felt my garments wet with gore!
 'Tis since that dread and wild affray,
 That trying, dark, eventful day,
 From this calm April eve so far,
 I wear upon my cheek the scar.

- "When thou to manhood shalt be grown,
 And I am gone in dust to sleep,
 May freedom's rights be still thine own,
 And thou and thine in quiet reap
 The unblighted product of the toil
 In which my blood bedewed the soil.
 And, while those fruits thou shalt enjoy,
 Bethink thee of this scar, my boy.

- "But should thy country's voice be heard
 To bid her children fly to arms,
 Gird on thy grandsire's trusty sword:
 And, undismayed by war's alarms,
 Remember, on the battle field,
 I made the hand of God my shield:
 And be thou spared, like me, to tell
 What bore thee up, while others fell!"

FOREST MUSIC.

There's a sad loneliness about my heart, —
 A deep, deep solitude the spirit feels Amid this multitude. The things of art
 Fall on the senses — from its pageantry,
 Loathing, my eye turns off; and my ear shrinks
 From the harsh dissonance that fills the air.

My soul is growing sick — I will away
 And gather balm from a sweet forest walk!
 There, as the breezes through the branches sweep,
 Is heard aerial minstrelsy, like harps
 Untouched, unseen, that on the spirit's ear
 Pour out their numbers till they lull in peace
 The tumult of the bosom. There's a voice
 Of music in the rustling of the leaves:
 And the green boughs are hung with living lutes,
 Whose strings will only vibrate to His hand
 Who made them, while they sound His untaught praise!

The whole wild wood is one vast instrument
 Of thousand, thousand keys; and all its notes
 Come in sweet harmony, while Nature plays
 To celebrate the presence of her God

THE SHIP IS READY.

Fare thee well! the ship is ready,
And the breeze is fresh and steady.
Hands are fast the anchor weighing,
High in air the streamer's playing.
Spread the sails — the waves are swelling
Proudly round thy buoyant dwelling.
Fare thee well! and when at sea,
Think of those who sigh for thee.

When from land and home receding,
And from hearts that ache to bleeding,
Think of those behind, who love thee,
While the sun is bright above thee!
Then, as, down to ocean glancing,
In the waves his rays are dancing,
Think how long the night will be
To the eyes that weep for thee!

When the lonely night-watch keeping,
All below thee still and sleeping —
As the needle points the quarter
O'er the wide and trackless water,
Let thy vigils ever find thee
Mindful of the friends behind thee!
Let thy bosom's magnet be Turned to those who wake for thee!

When, with slow and gentle motion,
Heaves the bosom of the ocean —
While in peace thy bark is riding,
And the silver moon is gliding
O'er the sky with tranquil splendour,
Where the shining hosts attend her;
Let the brightest visions be
Country, home, and friends, to thee!

When the tempest hovers o'er thee,
Danger, wreck, and death, before thee,
While the sword of fire is gleaming,
Wild the winds, the torrent streaming,
Then, a pious suppliant bending,
Let thy thoughts, to Heaven ascending,
Reach the mercy seat, to be Met by prayers that rise for thee!

THE GROUND LAUREL.

I love thee, pretty nursling
Of vernal sun and rain;
For thou art Flora's firstling,
And leadeast in her train.

When far away I found thee,
It was an April morn;
The chilling blast blew round thee,
No bud had decked the thorn.

And thou alone wert hiding
The mossy rocks between,
Where, just below them gliding,
The Merrinac was seen.

And while my hand was brushing
The seary leaves from thee,
It seemed as thou wert blushing
To be disclosed by me.

So modest, fair, and fragrant,
Where all was wild and rude,
To cheer the lonely vagrant
Who crossed thy solitude,—

Thou didst reward my ramble
By shining at my feet,
When, over brake and bramble,
I sought thy lone retreat.—

As some sweet flower of pleasure
Upon our path may bloom,
'Mid rocks and thorns that measure
Our journey to the tomb.

THE PEBBLE AND THE ACORN.

"I am a Pebble! and yield to none!"
Were the swelling words of a tiny stone —
"Nor time nor seasons can alter me;
I am abiding, while ages flee

The pelting hail and the drizzling rain
Have tried to soften me, long, in vain;
And the tender dew has sought to melt
Or touch my heart; but it was not felt
There's none can tell about my birth,
For I'm as old as the big, round earth
The children of men arise, and pass
Out of the world, like blades of grass;
And many a foot on me has trod,
That's gone from sight, and under the sod.
I am a Pebble! but who art thou,
Rattling along from the restless bough?"

The Acorn was shocked at this rude salute
And lay for a moment abashed and mute;
She never before had been so near
This gravelly ball, the mundane sphere;
And she felt for a time at a loss to know
How to answer a thing so coarse and low
But to give reproof of a nobler sort,
Than the angry look, or the keen retort,
At length she said, in a gentle tone,
"Since it has happened that I am thrown
From the lighter element where I grew,
Down to another so hard and new,
And beside a personage so august,
Abased, I will cover my head with dust,
And quickly retire from the sight of one
Whom time, nor season, nor storm, nor sun,
Nor the gentle dew, nor the grinding heel,
Has ever subdued, or made to feel!"

And soon in the earth she sank away
From the comfortless spot where the Pebble lay
But it was not long ere the soil was broke
By the peering head of an infant oak!
And, as it arose, and its branches spread,
The Pebble looked up, and, wondering, said,
"A modest Acorn — never to tell
What was enclosed in its simple shell!
That the pride of the forest was folded up
In the narrow space of its little cup!
And meekly to sink in the darksome earth,
Which proves that nothing could hide her worth!
And, oh! how many will tread on me,
To come and admire the beautiful tree,
Whose head is towering toward the sky,
Above such a worthless thing as I!
Useless and vain, a cumberer here,
I have been idling from year to year.
But never from this, shall a vaunting word
From the humbled Pebble again be heard,
Till something without me or within Shall show the purpose for which I've been!"
The Pebble its vow could not forget,
And it lies there wrapped in silence yet.

A NAME IN THE SAND.

Alone I walked the ocean strand;
A pearly shell was in my hand:
I stooped and wrote upon the sand
My name — the year — the day.
As onward from the spot I passed,
One lingering look behind I cast:
A wave came rolling high and fast,
And washed my lines away.

And so, methought, 'twill shortly be
With every mark on earth from me:
A wave of dark Oblivion's sea
Will sweep across the place
Where I have trod the sandy shore
Of Time, and been to be no more,
Of me — my day — the name I bore,
To leave nor track nor trace.

And yet, with Him who counts the sands,
And holds the waters in his hands,
I know a lasting record stands,
Inscribed against my name,
Of all this mortal part has wrought;
Of all this thinking soul has thought;
And from these fleeting moments caught
For glory or for shame.

GREY, MRS.

Is quite a popular English authoress, whom we may term "a Triton among the minnows." She is decidedly at the head of that class of novel-writers who administer to the amusement of those who read merely for something to do. If we find nothing very new or exciting, we find nothing injurious or distasteful to the most fastidious. Her books, with respect to the moral tone, may be safely allowed to "the fair and innocent," who will believe them to be finely written. The characters are such as, in our experience in that line of writing, we have had the opportunity to see portrayed many hundreds of times. Mrs. Grey dresses them up, however, very cleverly, and presents them to the public suitably. "The Gambler's Wife," one of her early works, has enjoyed a wonderful popularity; this argues some occult merits, which we were never able to discover. In her later works there is much improvement in the style, which is now generally correct. "Aline" is decidedly the best of her productions, where there is a very successful imitation of Mrs. Marsh; in spirit and feeling some portions of it might fairly challenge competition with "The Two Old Men's Tales." The other works of Mrs. Grey, reprinted in America, are "The Duke and the Cousin," "The Belle of the Family," "The Little Wife, a Record of Matrimonial Life," "The Manœuvring Mother," "Sybil Lennard," "The Young Prima Donna," "The Baronet's Daughters," "Hyacinthe, or the Contrast," "Lena Cameron," "The Old Dower House," "Alice Seymour," and "Harry Monk."

GROSS, AMALIE VON,

BETTER known under her nomme de plume, Amalie Winter, was born in 1803, at Weimar. Her maiden name was Leebach. In early life she became acquainted with Goëthe, and her taste and mind were formed under the influence of that remarkable man. She appeared as an authoress at the age of thirty, by contributing to a popular annual. In 1838, she published "Pictures of German Life," and afterwards novelettes; "Pictures of Women," "Recollections of a Berlin Doll," "Recollections of a Leaden Soldier," "Fairy Tales of Nature," and "The Diadem and Sceptre." She has written a great many minor tales and poems. None of her works have been translated into English.

H.

HAHN-HAHN, IDA MARIA LOUISA FREDERICA GUSTAVA, COUNTESS OF,

WAS born in June, 1805, at Tressow, in the grand-duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. She was a daughter of Count Von Hahn, an officer in the military service of the grand-duke. In 1826, she was married to another Count Von Hahn, belonging to a collateral branch of her own family.

Hence it was that she received the duplicate appellation of Hahn-Hahn. Her father, who was passionately fond of theatrical representations, became, notwithstanding his rank, the director of a dramatic corps; and from him she imbibed literary tastes which materially influenced her future destiny. The want of congeniality between her husband and herself, led to her being divorced from him in 1829. She first appeared before the public, as the author of a volume of poems, in 1835; and this was followed by her "New Poems," in 1836, the "Venetian Nights" in the same year, and a volume of "Songs and Poems," in 1837. She next composed a series of novels, depicting, in a very aristocratical spirit, the manners of high life in Germany. The most noted, and the latest of these are, "The Countess Faustina," 1841; "Ulrick," 1841; "Sigismund Forster," 1841, and "Cecil," a continuation of it, 1844. The Countess Hahn-Hahn has made her home alternately at Griefswald, Berlin, and Dresden, but has also travelled extensively. In 1835, she visited Switzerland; in 1836 and 1837, Vienna; in 1838 and 1839, Italy; in 1840 and 1841, Italy, Spain and France; in 1842, Sweden; and she has since made an excursion to Syria and the East. Her observations during these successive journeys are recorded in her "Beyond the Mountains," 2 vols. 1840; "Letters on a Journey," 2 vols. 1841; "Reminiscences of and Concerning France," 1842; "A Northern Tour," 1843; "Oriental Letters," 3 vols. 1844, &c.

An eminent English critic has thus expressed his opinion of the writings of this German lady—"The Countess Ida Hahn-Hahn's name is well known as the authoress of light and amusing novels; works which, in this instance, owe their popularity equally to the perfectly German tone of manners and morals they express, as to the brilliant talent they exhibit. These novels that appeared with a rapidity bespeaking productive powers of no common kind, were occasionally interspersed with accounts of trips to neighbouring countries, and intermingled with episodes of story or verse. Of late, however, the Countess Hahn-Hahn has appeared almost exclusively as a tourist.

"The merits and demerits of her writing are so interwoven that it is hard to pronounce upon them, without being unjust to the one or far too lenient to the other. Whether also Countess Hahn-Hahn, the novelist, has been a profitable predecessor to Countess Hahn-Hahn, the tourist, is a question which we are inclined to answer in the negative. The tourist has the same smartness of idea, lightness of step, and play of language, but she has also less scope for her fancy, and less disguise for her egotism. What, therefore, is the chief attraction of the one, viz., the personal nature of her writings, becomes the greatest drawback in the other. The whole field of emotions and feelings, the whole train of internal experiences, as German ladies call them, are Countess Hahn-Hahn's particular view. And with young, pretty, clever, rich, independent heroines to express them, and every imaginable romantic position to excite them, they are perfectly in their place, though seldom what we may approve. But the case is widely different the moment the feigned name is dropped. For when a lady invites you to accompany her in her own person, through countries suggestive of outer impressions of the utmost interest and novelty, yet pauses every moment to tell you not only her own particular thoughts and feelings, but also those habits, peculiarities, preferences and antipathies, which one would have thought even she herself on such an occasion would have forgotten, we feel tied to one who at home would be rather tiresome, but abroad becomes insufferable,—to one who never leaves self behind.

"Like almost all her countrywomen whom we have the honour of knowing in print, this lady commits the mistake of saying all she thinks—forgetful that few may, and those few don't—and not only what she thinks, but why she thinks, and how she thinks, till any process of that kind on the part of the reader becomes somewhat difficult.

"To turn, however, to those brilliant powers which so irksome a defect, and others of a far graver nature, have not been able to obscure, we have no hesitation in saying that the countess possesses some of the requisites for a traveller in a most uncommon degree. In liveliness of observation, readiness of idea, and spirited ease of expression, she is unsurpassed by any lady writer we know—far less by any of her own countrywomen. Whenever, therefore, her pen engages on a subject where the mawkish egotism of the German woman is not excited, or the decorous principle of the English reader not offended, we follow her with the admiration due to rare talents."

The cause of her later travels was a misfortune, which, doubtless, has had some influence on her character. She was afflicted with that peculiarity of vision called "a squint," and, in 1839, underwent an operation for its remedy, which resulted in the loss of the use of one eye, and for a long time she was apprehensive of becoming totally blind. To relieve her mind of the melancholy caused by such a grievous misfortune, the Countess Hahn-Hahn was induced to visit different countries; the tone of her remarks frequently shows the sufferings she endured from her affliction.

RESTLESSNESS OF SPRING.

Oh! this restlessness of spring, this longing for a new sphere, for a fresh life, for increased activity, for a more sunny existence! This impulse to rush forth, to rise to light, to beauty, to happiness, how it reveals itself throughout all nature! Must not man, with his finer senses, with his more excitable nerves, be more susceptible to its influence than the animal and vegetable creation? For my own part, I wonder every spring that I don't grow several inches taller. One thing vexes me: I must always remain myself. Whether others feel this, I know not: those, for instance, who live in the gay world, or those who are engaged in any other constant and laborious occupation. I might ask them: but who speaks the truth of himself, unless he know beforehand that the truth redounds to his praise? . . . I am myself troubled by all the restlessness to which a meditated journey naturally gives rise; and this restlessness is the greater, because I am uncertain whither I shall go, and because my poor eyes, constantly liable to inflammation, may at any time frustrate all my schemes. I cannot tell you what a new and oppressive feeling it is to me, to know that my plans are dependent on my health. The want of money, of time, or of anything else that is requisite, may frustrate one's designs just as effectually, but not so afflictively, as when the helplessness of the body is the cause. It never occurred to me before that bodily infirmity might hinder me from writing at night, or from exposing myself to wind and weather by day. I have been learning this during the last year. Alas! I receive the chastening patiently, but I would that Providence had given me less occasion to convince myself of my docility.

NICE.

I have now been a month here, and can say something more of Nice than I did when I came. My exclamation then was, "the only thing that pleases me about the place is, to know that it's the end of the journey." This was partly the effect of weariness and vexation; yet not wholly so, for Nice has an uncomfortable look to one who hopes to find simplicity and tranquillity there. It looks less like a settled place than like an embryo city. It is a huge plan, that has yet to be filled up; where dust, confusion, donkeys, bricklayers, and all that is noisy, and all that I hate, are gathered together, and have taken up their abode. A stranger seeks a temporary home, and fifty are offered to him, as he wanders among the vast barracks of hôtels garnis that are built here on speculation. The natives build as if they hope to lodge their guests by regiments. These hopes are far from being realized; many are held back by the apprehension of war, or by the dangerous vicinity of the French frontier. The consequence is, that the large empty houses, with their closed jealousies, produce a gloomy effect, which is heightened by the surrounding desolation, always inseparable from ground laid out for building, but not yet built upon. There is the sea, to be sure; but I hate to be folded in with a herd; to hear people dance over my head, sing under me, and romp about in the room next my own. I like not to be compelled to participate in the diversions of all who are under the same roof with me. I am like a forest-bird, who sings and makes the woods merry, whom every wayfarer may listen to, but who lives not the less for himself, and is seen by none. Moreover, I was obliged to sacrifice the view of the sea, because it was too dazzling for my poor eyes. . . . In the clear sunshine, it is impossible for me to look upon the bounding, foaming, azure tide, or upon the millions of glittering spangles with which it seemed to be decked. On such golden days, when heaven, water, and earth are trying which can be brightest and most beautiful, I walk into the plain, through narrow and entangled paths, that lead from garden to garden, where I may hope to find verdure and shade; but on the mother-of-pearl days, that would be leaden days in the north, I can abandon my fondness for the sea. Then a gentle cloudy breath has dimmed the brightness of the sky; the sun is not seen, though his presence is felt; he stands behind a cloud like a lamp whose light is concealed by an alabaster column; he silvers the outline, yet plays in faint prismatic colours through the mass. Sometimes, indeed, it rains on such days; but in such a case, there is nothing to be done, either here or elsewhere, but to roll oneself up like a bird in one's nest, and lie there as quiet as a mouse.

FRANCE.

I shall now go to France, Heaven knows what the consequence may be, for I hate France! I hate the spirit of vanity, fanfaronade, insolence, and superficialness; in short, I hate the national character of the French. It is unmitigated barbarism. I am of a soft and humane disposition, but love and hatred must take precedence of every other sentiment.

Steht mir das Lieben und Hassen nicht frei,
So ist es mit meinem Leben vorbei.*

AVIGNON.

We walked about the town last night, and never in my life did I behold a place so completely the picture of decline. There were small houses without windows, and large houses of which the doors had been walled up. There were towers, from which every gust of wind brought down fragments of masonry, and which, nevertheless, served as a support to the habitations of wretchedness. The shops were disgustingly dirty, and every thing had a spectral look. I lingered at a book-stall, in search of an old edition of St. Augustine. I found it not, but while I lingered darkness came on, yet not a light began to glimmer from any of the dismal windows around us. We met a few ill-clad men, and some hooded women thronged around us, importuning us for alms. I hurried back to the hotel. There a huge fire was lighted on the spacious hearth cased in black marble, and was still burning when I went to bed. The flames threw dark shadows and a lurid glare upon my red curtains, and there I lay, conjuring up images of the piles on which so many heretics and witches had here been tortured to death by papal cruelty. I thought of all the blood shed here during the revolution, and of Marshal Brune murdered, in 1815, by the mob, at the hotel opposite to mine. I shuddered as all these recollections came thronging upon my mind, and felt that a long mourning train must be still sweeping over the haunted city. I saw the forms of sorrow, the instruments and the ministers of priestly torture, and the ugly spectres seemed to hiss about by the fitful flickering light, till, fairly frightened by the shadowy creations of my own fancy, I was glad to be delivered from my ghostly visitors by sleep.

* To love and hate when I'm no longer free,
Life will itself be valueless to me.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

If none but dogs were the inhabitants of Constantinople, you would find it sufficiently difficult to make your way through a city where heaps of dirt, rubbish, and refuse of every credible and incredible composition, obstruct you at every step, and especially barricade the corners of the streets. But dogs are not the only dwellers. Take care of yourself—here comes a train of horses, laden on each side with skins of oil—all oil without as well as within. And, oh! take care again, for behind are a whole troop of asses, carrying tiles and planks, and all kinds of building materials. Now give way to the right for those men with baskets of coals upon their heads, and give way, too, to the left for those other men—four, six, eight at a time, staggering along with such a load of merchandise, that the pole, thick as your arm, to which it is suspended, bends beneath the weight. Meanwhile, don't lose your head with the braying of the asses, the yelling of the dogs, the cries of the porters, or the calls of the sweetmeat and chestnut venders, but follow your dragoman, who, accustomed to all this turmoil, flies before you with winged steps, and either disappears in the crowd or vanishes round a corner. At length you reach a cemetery. We all know how deeply the Turks respect the graves of the dead—how they visit them and never permit them to be disturbed, as we do in Europe, after any number of years. In the abstract this is very grand, and when we imagine to ourselves a beautiful cypress grove with tall white monumental stones, and green grass beneath, it presents a stately and solemn picture. Now contemplate it in the reality. The monuments are overthrown, dilapidated, or awry—several roughly paved streets intersect the space—here sheep are feeding—there donkeys are waiting—here geese are cackling—there cocks are crowing—in one part of the ground linen is drying—in another carpenters are planing—from one corner a troop of camels defile—from another a funeral procession approaches—children are playing—dogs rolling—every kind of the most unconcerned business going on. And what can be a greater profanation of the dead? But, true enough, where they were buried four hundred years ago, there they lie still.

THE PYRAMIDS.

If any one had said to me up there, between the foundation of this pyramid and that of the railroad at Vienna there are as many thousand years as there are thousands of miles from the planet Earth to the planet Sirius, I should have answered at once, "Of course there are." I seemed to be standing on an island in the midst of the ether, without the slightest connection with all that hearts are throbbing with below. Time seemed to have rent a cleft around me deeper than the deepest ravine in the highest mountain of the Alps. Then one's very view below becomes so utterly—what shall I say?—so utterly lifeless.

In the whole immense plain beneath you there is not one prominent feature. It is merely a geographical map with coloured spaces—blue-green, yellow-green, sap-green—just as the culture may be. Among them, palm-woods and gardens like dark spots, canals like silver stripes, and banks like black bars. Far and faint the brownish, formless masses of the city, wrapt in its own exhalations. And last of all, but seemingly quite near, the Desert—here no longer horrible. If in time itself there be such enormous deserts, where hundreds of years lie bare and waste, and only here and there some intellectual building, together with the builder, appear in the midst, like an oasis for the mind, why should not a few hundred miles of sand lie barren here upon earth? But even if Fairyland itself lay smiling round, it would make no difference. The pyramid is every thing. Like a great mind, it overpowers all in its vicinity. Even the Nile becomes insignificant. As the mountains attract the clouds, so does the pyramid attract the thoughts, and make them revolve perpetually round it. Dear brother, it is a wonderful sight when man gets up his creations in a kind of rivalry with Eternity, as this old Cheops has done.

HALE, SARAH JOSEPHA,

As AUTHOR of this work, "Woman's Record," may hope that her name here will not be considered out of place. From a brief account of her writings, which appeared in the Lady's Book, in 1850, she selects the following particulars; premising that her maiden name was Buell, and her birth-place, Newport, a pleasant village nestled among the green hills of New Hampshire. "By the death of her husband, David Hale, a young lawyer of distinguished abilities and great excellence of character, Mrs. Hale was left the sole protector of five children, the eldest then but seven years old; it was in the hope of gaining the means for their support and education that she engaged in the literary profession. 'Northwood,' a novel in two volumes, was her first published work; (a little volume of poems had been previously printed for her benefit by the Freemasons, of which fraternity Mr. Hale had been a distinguished member.) 'Northwood' was issued in Boston, December, 1827, under the title of 'The Book of Flowers.'

"Early in the following year, Mrs. Hale was invited from her home in the 'Old Granite State' to go to Boston and take charge of the editorial department of 'The Ladies' Magazine,' the first periodical exclusively devoted to her sex which appeared in America. She removed to Boston in 1828, and continued to edit the Ladies' Magazine until 1837, when it was united with the Lady's Book in Philadelphia, of the literary department of which work she has ever since had charge.

"Mrs. Hale continued to reside in Boston, after she became editor of the Lady's Book, for several years, while her sons were in Harvard College. In 1841, she removed to Philadelphia, where she now resides.

"Besides 'Northwood,' which was reprinted in London under the title of 'A New England Tale,' and well commended in several English journals, her published works are, 'Sketches of American Character;' 'Traits of American Life;' 'Flora's Interpreter,' (this also has been reprinted in London;) 'The Ladies' Wreath, a selection from the Female Poets of England and America;' 'The Way to Live Well, and to be Well while we Live;' 'Grosvenor, a Tragedy;' 'Alice Ray, a Romance in Rhyme;' 'Harry Guy, the Widow's Son, a Story of the Sea'—(the last two were written for charitable purposes, and the proceeds given away accordingly;) 'Three Hours, or the Vigil of Love, and other Poems,' published in 1848; 'A Complete Dictionary of Poetical Quotations, containing Selections from the writings of the Poets of England and America.' This volume contains nearly six hundred double column large octavo pages, and is the most complete work of the kind in the English language.

"Mrs. Hale has also edited several annuals—'The Opal;' 'The Crocus,' &c., and prepared quite a number of books for the young. 'The Judge; A Drama of American Life,' lately published in the 'Lady's Book,' is the latest of her writings.

"Moreover, in addition to all these productions of Mrs. Hale's fertile mind, a large number of stories, poems, essays, &c., many without her name, sufficient to fill several large volumes, lie scattered among the periodicals of the day. These she will collect and publish when she concludes her editorial duties. Of these duties it is scarcely worth our while to speak, writing, as we are, for the readers of the Lady's Book, who know so well how thoroughly and usefully they have been performed. Quite pertinent is the following extract from a newspaper in Massachusetts, which comes timely to our hands while writing. In noticing the Lady's Book, the editor says: 'Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, the lady editor, is one of the most sensible and energetic of all the conductors of the numerous magazines that are now published; and as she was the pioneer in this species of literature, no one has had a greater influence, or become more universally popular among her countrywomen.' Her success is richly deserved, and her energy, devotion, and perseverance under circumstances the most trying, afford a cheering example to her sex."

A few words respecting the influences which have, probably, caused me to become the Chronicler of my own sex, may not be considered egotistical. I was mainly educated by my mother, and strictly taught to make the Bible the guide of my life. The books to which I had access were few, very few, in comparison with the number given children now-a-days; but they were such as required to be studied—and I did study them. Next to the Bible and The Pilgrim's Progress, my earliest reading was Milton, Addison, Pope, Johnson, Cowper, Burns, and a portion of Shakspeare. I did not obtain all his works till I was nearly fifteen. The first regular novel I read was "The Mysteries of Udolpho," when I was quite a child. I name it on account of the influence it exercised over my mind. I had remarked that of all the books I saw, few were written by Americans, and none by women. Here was a work, the most fascinating I had ever read, always excepting "The Pilgrim's Progress," written by a woman! How happy it made me! The wish to promote the reputation of my own sex, and do something for my own country, were among the earliest mental emotions I can recollect. These feelings have had a salutary influence by directing my thoughts to a definite object; my literary pursuits have had an aim beyond self-seeking of any kind. The mental influence of woman over her own sex, which was so important in my case, has been strongly operative in inclining me to undertake this my latest work, "Woman's Record," &c. I have sought to make it an assistant in home education; hoping the examples shown and characters portrayed, might have an inspiration and a power in advancing the moral progress of society. Yet I cannot close without adverting to the ready and kind aid I have always met with from those men with whom I have been most nearly connected. To my brother* I owe what knowledge I possess of the Latin, and the higher branches of mathematics, and of mental philosophy. He often lamented that I could not, like himself, have the privilege of a college education. To my husband I was yet more deeply indebted. He was a number of years my senior, and far more my superior in learning. We commenced, soon after our marriage, a system of study and reading which we pursued while he lived. The hours allowed were from eight o'clock in the evening till ten; two hours in the twenty-four: how I enjoyed those hours! In all our mental pursuits, it seemed the aim of my husband to enlighten my reason,—strengthen my judgment, and give me confidence in my own powers of mind, which he estimated much higher than I. But this approbation which he bestowed on my talents has been of great encouragement to me in attempting the duties that have since become my portion. And if there is any just praise due to the works I have prepared, the sweetest thought is—that his name bears the celebrity.

As sufficient specimens of my prose will be extant in this work, I will select only from my poetical writings.

THE HAND AND ITS WORK.

The stars that shine in Afric's sky,
Lighting all lovely things,
Have seen, though hid from human eye,
Two tiny, trembling Springs,
Whose silvery, soft-ton'd flowing seems
Like whispers heard in lovers' dreams,
That wake an answering smile;—
And yet those star-kiss'd springs send forth
The proudest flood that tracks the earth—
The world-renown'd Old Nile:—
Swart Egypt's sands, beneath his wave,
Are whelm'd, as in an ocean grave;
Anon, from out his slimy tide,
Like earth from Chaos raised again,
The rich green harvest waveth wide,
And hope, and joy, and beauty reign.

*The late Judge Buell of Glen's Falls, New York.

Thus powerless, as the oozing rill,
The infant's small, soft hand appears
But wielded by stern manhood's will,
And strengthen'd by life's rolling years,
That wonder-working Hand may pour,
Like Nile, when bursting every bound,
A flood of devastation o'er
The prostrate world around;
Or, like Nile's fertilizing tide,
May scatter blessings far and wide.

The human Hand! Would'st number o'er
Its mighty works of strength and skill?
The trophies cumber every shore;—
'Mid desert wastes, — on mountains hoar,
Where foot may press, or eye explore,
Its presence meets us still;—
From Babylon's crumbling tower,
Religion's earliest dome of power,
To Zion's holy Hill,—
And downward, through the lapse of time,
Where'er is heard the voice or chime,
That summons men to praise and prayer,
From minaret or Gothic pile,
From shingled roof or pillar'd aisle—
The Workman's Hand is there.

* * * * *
Man's Work — how much the world has said!
From Mæris' Lake to fountain, set,
Like diamond in a coronet,
Within some emerald shade;
From garden-pale to China's Wall;
From Pyramid to plaything small
Which infant's touch has sway'd;
From mud-scoop'd hut to royal hall;
From burial-vault to lighthouse tall,—
The loftiest work, the lowest — all
Man's master Hand has made.

* * * * *
Art's glorious things, that give the Mind
Dominion over time and space;
The silken car, that rides the wind:
The steel, that pathless seas can trace;
The engine, breathing fire and smoke,
Which first old Neptune's trident broke,
And sails its ships 'gainst wind and tide;
The telescope, that sweeps the sky,
And brings the pilgrim planet nigh,
Familiar as the Sun's pale bride;
The microscopic lens, which finds
On every leaf a peopled land,
All these, which aid the mightiest minds,
Were wrought and fashion'd by the Hand.
* * * * *
Oh, when its gather'd trophies stand,
Like magic forms, on sea and land,
In Fancy's view, — who doth not cry,
As the bright vision glideth by,
In beauty, power, and majesty,—
"Though Mind, Aladdin's lamp might be,
His Genie was the Hand!"
* * * * *

While thus to ceaseless task-work doom'd, to make the world
his own,
— Lest, in the struggle, sense should drag the spirit from its throne,
Woman's warm heart and gentle hand, in God's eternal plan,
Were form'd to soften, soothe, refine, exalt, and comfort Man,
And win from pleasure's poison cup to life's pure fount above,
And rule him, as the angels rule, by deeds of peace and love:—
And so the tender Mother lays, on her soft pillowing breast,
With gentle hand, her infant son, and lulls him to his rest,
And dries his tears, and cheers his smiles, and by her wise control,
She checks his wayward moods, and wakes the seraph in his soul;
And when life's Work commands him forth, no more to dwell with her,
She points him to the HAND that saved the sinking mariner.
And broke the bread for famish'd men, and bids him trust that stay —
And then, her hands unclasp'd from his, are lifted up to pray

But man could never Work alone, and even in Eden's bowers
He pined for woman's smile to cheer his task of tending
flowers ;
And soon a fair young bride is sought and found to bless the youth,
Who gives, for his protecting hand, her heart of love and truth ;—
And now his Work has higher aims, since she its blessings shares,
And oft her hand will roses strew, where his would scatter
tares ;
And, like a light within a vase, his home enshrines her form,
Which brightens o'er his world-toss'd mind, like sunshine
o'er the storm ;
And when she pleads in sorrow's cause, he cannot choose but hear,
And when her soul with Heaven communes, she draws his spirit near ;
And thus they live till age creeps on, or sickness lays him
low,
Then will she gird her woman's heart to bear life's bitterest
woe,
And soothe his pain, and stay his head, and close his dying eyes—
While praying Angel hands may guide his soul to Paradise.

WORSHIP IN THE TEMPLE.

Jerusalem ! Jerusalem ! the blessing lingers yet
On the city of the Chosen, where the Sabbath seal was set ;
And though her sons are scatter'd, and her daughters weep
apart,
While desolation, like a pall, weighs down each faithful heart,—
As the palm beside the waters, as the cedar on the hills,
She shall rise in strength and beauty when the Lord Jehovah
wills ;
He has promis'd her protection, and his holy pledge is good,—
'Tis whisper'd through the olive-groves, and murmur'd by the flood,
As in the Sabbath stillness the Jordan's flow is heard,
And by the Sabbath breezes the hoary trees are stirr'd.
Oh ! glorious were the Sabbaths Jerusalem has known,
When the presence of the Highest was so wonderfully shown ;
And the holy Law was guarded by cherubim divine ;
And the Temple's awful Worship drew the nation to its shrine ;
And the "Song of songs" was sounded, till the melody profound,
Shook the golden roof and arches with its ocean power of sound ;
And wreathing clouds of incense rose, like doves upon the air,
Upbearing on their balmy wings the sacrifice of prayer ;
And sweet as angel greetings, in the mansions of the blest, O'er the heart of gather'd Israel came the Sabbath and its rest.
But the glory all departed when the Temple was laid low,
And like a childless mother, mourns the city in her woe ;
Still a people never perish who in Sabbath worship bend,—
God has kept his Chosen—He will keep them to the end.
Soon the days of expectation and of exile will be o'er,
And Israel return to his heritage once more.
Then shall bloom the rose of Sharon, and the lilies of the vale,
By the dews of Hermon freshen'd, breathe their fragrance on the gale :
As the seed for centuries buried, when laid open to the day,
Bursts forth in life and beauty 'neath the vivifying ray,
So Jerusalem shall triumph, when her children are restored,
And with songs of peace and gladness hail the Sabbath of the Lord.

WORSHIP IN THE FOREST.

What numbers, when the Sabbath comes,
Are trooping from their forest homes !
The maiden, pure as prairie rose,
Beside her bending grandsire goes ;
The fawn-eyed children bound at large,
The mother brings her nursing charge,
And, bearing some pale, sickly child,
Stalks the strong hunter of the wild.

And he may see, through copse-wood near,
The antlers of the browsing deer ;
Or, as his path through prairie goes,
Hear the dull tramp of buffaloes ;
Or savage foe, or beast of prey,
May haunt his steps, or bar his way ;
So, like a knight, he goes prepared
His foes to meet, his friends to guard :
The rifle in his ready hand
Proclaims the forester's command ;
And as his glance is onward cast,
Or wild-wood sounds go rustling past,
His flashing eye and flushing cheek
Betray the wish he may not speak ;—
But soon these fancies fade away,
Checked by the thought—'tis Sabbath-Day
And when he gains the house of prayer,
Heart, soul and mind, are centered there.

That house of prayer—how mean beside
The grand cathedral's sculptured pride !
Yet He who in a manger slept,
And in the wilds his vigils kept,
Will breathe a holy charm around,
Where His true followers are found.
Oh ! never deem it low and rude,

Though fashioned by the settler's axe,
The sap still weeping from the wood,
As loath to leave its brother trees,
That wave above it in the breeze,—

No pomp it needs, no glory lacks ;—
The holy angels are its guard,

And pious feet its planks have trod,
'T is consecrated to the Lord,

The Temple of the living God !

But when the Sabbath gatherings press,
Like armies, from the wilderness,
'T is then the dim, old woods afford
The sanctuary of the Lord !

The Holy Spirit breathes around—
That forest glade is sacred ground,
Nor Temple built with hands could vie
In glory with its majesty.

The trees like living columns rise,
Whose tops sustain the bending skies ;
And o'er those earnest worshippers,
God's love, like golden roof, is spread,

And every leaf the zephyr stirs,
Some heavenly promise seems to shed ;

The flowers' sweet breath and gladsome eyes
Recall the joys of Paradise,

When God and man were garden-friends ;
And now the loving Saviour bends—
So do they deem, those fervent bands—
With blessings in his bleeding hands !

And though the organ's ocean swell

Has never shook that woodland air,
Yet do the soul's emotions tell

That music's monarch power is there.

It lifts the mortal's hope above—

It draws to earth the angels' love—

The eye of faith may see them near,

Their golden harps forgotten when,

As breathed from lips of contrite man,

Redemption's joyful song they hear !

A BLIND GIRL'S IDEA OF LADIES.

I have a fancy ladies are like flowers,
And so I class and keep them in my mind.
The delicate and gentle are the jasmines ;
The mirthful and warm-hearted—these are pinks ;
The loving are the rose, for love is sweet,
And beautiful in mother as in bride ;
The stately and precise are dahlias, set
As they were carved and coloured for a show ;
The tulips, such as talk of love and beaux ;
The spiritual, whose pure, sweet thoughts seem given
As are the star-beams from the vault of heaven—
These are the lilies: and the violets
Are gentle-hearted ones who love the lilies,
And would be like them could they chose their fate.

A THOUGHT.

What might a single mind may wield,
With Truth for sword, and Faith for shield,
And Hope to lead the way!
Thus all high triumphs are obtain'd;
From evil, good—as God ordain'd
The night before the day.

From "Poems."

THE WATCHER.

The night was dark and fearful,
The blast went wailing by;—
A Watcher, pale and tearful,
Looked forth with anxious eye;
How wistfully she gazes,—
No gleam of morn is there!
And then her heart upraises
Its agony of prayer!

Within that dwelling lonely,
Where want and darkness reign,
Her precious child, her only,
Lay moaning in his pain:
And death alone can free him,—
She feels that this must be:
"But oh! for morn to see him
Smile once again on me!"

A hundred lights are glancing
In yonder mansion fair,
And merry feet are dancing,—
They heed not morning there:
Oh! young and joyous creatures,
One lamp, from out your store,
Would give that poor boy's features
To her fond gaze once more.

The morning sun is shining,—
She heedeth not its ray;
Beside her dead, reclining,
That pale, dead mother lay!
A smile her lip was wreathing,
A smile of hope and love,
As though she still were breathing—
"There's light for us above!"

THE LIGHT OF HOME.

My son, thou wilt dream the world is fair,
And thy spirit will sigh to roam,
And thou must go;—but never, when there,
Forget the light of Home!

Though pleasures may smile with a ray more bright,
It dazzles to lead astray;
Like the meteor's flash, 'twill deepen the night
When treading thy lonely way:—

But the hearth of home has a constant flame,
And pure as vestal fire,—
'T will burn, 'twill burn for ever the same
For nature feeds the pyre.

The sea of ambition is tempest-tossed,
And thy hopes may vanish like foam,—
When sails are shivered and compass lost,
Then look to the light of Home!

And there, like a star through midnight cloud,
Thou'lt see the beacon bright;
For never, till shining on thy shroud,
Can be quenched its holy light.

The sun of fame may gild the name
But the heart ne'er felt its ray;
And fashion's smiles that rich ones claim,
Are beams of a wintry day:

How cold and dim those beams would be,
Should Life's poor wanderer come!—
My son, when the world is dark to thee
Then turn to the light of Home.

I SING TO HIM.

I sing to him! I dream he hears
The song he used to love,
And oft that blessed fancy cheers
And bears my thoughts above.
Ye say 't is idle thus to dream—
But why believe it so?
It is the spirit's meteor gleam
To soothe the pang of woe.

Love gives to nature's voice a tone
That true hearts understand,—
The sky, the earth, the forest lone
Are peopled by his wand;
Sweet fancies all our pulses thrill
While gazing on a flower,
And from the gently whisp'ring rill
Is heard the words of power.

I breathe the dear and cherished name,
And long-lost scenes arise;
Life's glowing landscape spreads the same,
The same Hope's kindling skies;—
The violet bank, the moss-fringed seat
Beneath the drooping tree,
The clock that chimed the hour to meet,
My buried love, with thee,—

O, these are all before me, when
In fancy's realms I rove;
Why urge me to the world again?
Why say the ties of love,
That death's cold, cruel grasp has riven,
Unite no more below?
I'll sing to him—for though in heaven,
He surely heeds my woe.

IRON.

"Truth shall spring out of the earth."—Psalm lxxxv. 11.

As, in lonely thought, I pondered,
On the marv'ulous things of earth,
And, in fancy's dreaming, wondered
At their beauty, power, and worth,
Came, like words of prayer, the feeling—
Oh! that God would make me know
Through the spirit's clear revealing,
What, of all his works below,
Is to man a boon the greatest,
Brightening on from age to age,
Serving truest, earliest, latest,
Through the world's long pilgrimage.

Soon vast mountains rose before me,
Shaggy, desolate, and lone,
Their scarred heads were threatening o'er me.
Their dark shadows round me thrown;
Then a voice, from out the mountains,
As an earthquake shook the ground,
And like frightened fawns the fountains,
Leaping, fled before the sound;
And the Anak oaks bowed lowly,
Quivering, aspen-like, with fear—
While the deep response came slowly,
Or it must have crushed mine ear!

"Iron! iron! iron!"—crashing,
Like the battle-axe and shield!
Or the sword on helmet clashing,
Through a bloody battle-field:
"Iron! iron! iron!"—rolling,
Like the far-off cannon's boom;
Or the death-knell, slowly tolling,
Through a dungeon's charnel gloom!
"Iron! iron! iron!"—swinging,
Like the summer winds at play;
Or as chimes of heaven ringing
In the blest Millennial day!

Then the clouds of ancient fable
Cleared away before mine eyes;
Truth could tread a footing stable
O'er the gulf of mysteries!

Words, the prophet bards had uttered
Signs, the oracle foretold,
Spells, the weird-like sibyl muttered,
Through the twilight days of old,
Rightly read, beneath the splendour
Shining now on history's page,
All their faithful witness render —
All portend a better age.

Sisyphus, for ever toiling,
Was the type of toiling men,
While the stone of power, recoiling,
Crushed them back to earth again !
Stern Prometheus, bound and bleeding,
Imaged man in mental chain,
While the vultures on him feeding,
Were the passions' vengeful reign ;
Still a ray of mercy tarried
On the cloud, a white-winged dove,
For this mystic faith had married
Vulcan to the Queen of Love ! *

Rugged Strength and radiant Beauty —
These were one in nature's plan ;
Humble toil and heavenward duty —
These will form the perfect man !
Darkly was this doctrine taught us
By the gods of heathendom ;
But the living light was brought us,
When the Gospel morn had come !
How the glorious change, expected,
Could be wrought, was then made free,
Of the earthly, when perfected,
Rugged iron forms the key !

"Truth from out the earth shall flourish,"
This the Word of God makes known —
Thence are harvests men to nourish —
There let iron's power be shown.
Of the swords, from slaughter gory,
Ploughshares forge to break the soil ;
Then will Mind attain its glory,
Then will Labour reap the spoil —
Error cease the soul to wilder,
Crime be checked by simple good,
As the little coral builder
Forces back the furious flood.

While our faith in good grows stronger,
Means of greater good increase ;
Iron, slave of war no longer,
Leads the onward march of peace ;
Still new modes of service finding,
Ocean, earth, and air, it moves,
And the distant nations binding,
Like the kindred tie it proves ;
With its Atlas-shoulder sharing
Loads of human toil and care
On its wing of lightning bearing
Thought's sweet mission through the air !

As the rivers, farthest flowing,
In the highest hills have birth ;
As the banyan, broadest growing,
Oftenest bows its head to earth —
So the noblest minds press onward,
Channels far of good to trace ;
So the largest hearts bend downward,
Circling all the human race ;
Thus, by iron's aid, pursuing
Through the earth their plans of love,
Men our Father's will are doing,
Here as angels do above !

* This poem was written in 1845, and published in January, 1846. I name this because in 1848, Lord Morpeth — now the Earl of Carlisle — in a speech he made at Sheffield, England, introduced this idea of Vulcan and Venus representing strength and beauty in a very happy manner. I do not know that he was indebted to my poem ; but as the thoughts were similar, and as I might be accused of imitation, I here give the date of "Iron." One merit I may justly claim for my poems — a negative one — they are not imitations nor versifications of the thoughts of others.

THE POWER OF MUSIC.

When Orpheus struck his burning lyre,
Mute nature caught creative fire,—
Rough stones obeyed the swelling sound,
In mystic measure moved around,
Till, polished by the harmony,
The finished structure, grand and free,
Rose like the star that heralds day,
To show Man's Mind its work and way *

The sword may sever slavery's chain —
The strong arm crush the tyrant's reign,
As lightning from the lurid sky
Shatters and scathes the Temple high ;
But 'tis the sweet-voiced Spring that calls
The ivy o'er the broken walls,
And gently swaying in the blasts,
The fragile plant the Pile outlasts.

And thus the power of Music's breath
Re-clothes the wastes of Time and Death
The "blind old man" begins his strain,
And Greece is "living Greece" again !
The Songs that flowed on Zion's Hill
Are chanted in God's Temples still.
And to the eye of faith unfold
The glories of His House of old

Each Prophet-Bard of ancient days
Still breathes for us his lofty lays ;
The words that bear a mission high,
If Music-ballooned, never die ; —
And thus Religion, Law and Art,
Sow their choice seeds in every heart ;
From age to age the Song flows on,
And blends fresh life with glories gone.

A mystery this—but who can see
The soft south wind that sways the tree
And warms its vital flood to flow,
And wakes its folded buds to blow ?—
Even thus the power of Music, felt,
The soul is swayed, the heart will melt,
Till Love and Hope so bless the Hours,
Life's dial-plate is marked by flowers.

And every Temple Art has reared
Some truth has taught, some error cleared,
But only Music's voice leads on
When Time is o'er and Heaven is won ;
The Angel-Art to mortals taught,—
The golden chord of human thought,
When pure and tuned by Faith and Love,
Linked with the golden harps above !

IT SNOWS.

"It snows !" cries the School-boy—"hurrah !" and his shout
Is ringing through parlour and hall,
While swift, as the wing of a swallow, he's out
And his playmates have answered his call :
It makes the heart leap but to witness their joy,—
Proud wealth has no pleasures, I trow,
Like the rapture that throbs in the pulse of the boy,
As he gathers his treasures of snow ;
Then lay not the trappings of gold on thine heirs,
While health, and the riches of Nature, are thine.

"It snows !" sighs the Imbecile—"Ah !" and his breath
Comes heavy, as clogged with a weight ;
While from the pale aspect of Nature in death,
He turns to the blaze of his grate :
And nearer, and nearer, his soft-cushioned chair
Is wheeled tow'ards the life-giving flame —
He dreads a chill puff of the snow-burdened air,
Lest it wither his delicate frame :
Oh ! small is the pleasure existence can give,
When the fear we shall die only proves that we live !

"It snows !" cries the Traveller—"Ho !" and the word
Has quickened his steed's lagging pace ;
The wind rushes by, but its howl is unheard —
Unfelt the sharp drift in his face ;

For bright through the tempest his own home appeared —
 Ay, though leagues intervened, he can see;
 There's the clear, glowing hearth, and the table prepared,
 And his wife with their babes at her knee.
 Blest thought! how it lightens the grief-laden hour,
 That those we love dearest are safe from its power.

"It snows!" cries the Belle—"Dear, how lucky!" and turns
 From her mirror to watch the flakes fall;
 Like the first rose of summer, her dimpled cheek burns
 While musing on sleigh-ride and ball:
 There are visions of conquest, of splendour, and mirth,
 Floating over each drear winter's day;
 But the tintings of Hope, on this storm-beaten earth,
 Will melt, like the snow-flakes, away;
 Turn, turn thee to Heaven, fair maiden, for bliss,
 That world has a fountain ne'er opened in this.

It snows!" cries the Widow — "Oh God!" and her sighs
 Have stifled the voice of her prayer;
 Its burden ye'll read in her tear-swollen eyes,
 On her cheek, sunk with fasting and care.
 'Tis night — and her fatherless ask her for bread —
 But "He gives the young ravens their food,"
 And she trusts, till her dark hearth adds horror to dread
 And she lays on her last chip of wood.
 Poor sufferer! that sorrow thy God only knows —
 'Tis a pitiful lot to be poor, when it snows!

THE MOTHER'S GIFT TO MISSIONS.

"Oh! had I mines of treasure,
 How would I pour them forth,
 And send the Messengers of love
 To bless the waiting earth!
 How can the heathen woman
 Her hopeless lot endure?
 Would I had power to give her light,
 But I am weak and poor!"

Thus thought a gentle mother,
 While, bowed in love and awe,
 She heard the fervent preacher's voice
 Enforce the Saviour's law —
 Go ye to every nation,
 And teach the Gospel lore;
 My spirit, while the world endures,
 Is with you evermore."

She felt, that meek-eyed mother,
 How sweet the Christian's trust;
 As flowers from winter's icy shroud
 Beneath the warm Spring burst,
 So from the blight of sorrow,
 Of winter-like despair,
 Her heart to Faith's warm light had turned,
 And bloomed in hope and prayer.

But now her soul was saddened —
 What mite had she to give?
 Her feeble efforts scarce can gain
 The scanty means to live;
 The widow's lot, like killing frost,
 Her world had desert made —
 All, save one flower, had passed away —
 All, save one hope, decayed.

She wept, that pale young mother,
 In humble grief she wept,
 While pillowed on her heaving breast,
 In peace her fair child slept;
 She wept to think the Saviour's love
 Heaven's grace for her had won,
 And she no gift to aid his cause, —
 "Oh! mother, give thy son!"

Thus, in her soul's deep chambers,
 The Spirit's voice was heard;
 And though before her shrinking sense,
 The thorns, the cross appeared, —
 The parting, and the dangers,
 Fear, doubt, and dread combine,
 She clasped him to her throbbing heart —
 "Yes, Lord, he shall be thine!"

Oh! when the "Books" are opened
 And deeds and motives known,
 And honour to the holiest
 Before the world is shown,
 How high above the queens of earth,
 The rich, the proud above,
 Will stand that lowly mother's name
 Joined with her gift of love!

HALL, ANNA MARIA,

Is a native of Ireland; her birth-place was in Wexford county, where her family, whose name was Fielding, was of high respectability. When Miss Fielding was about fifteen, she was taken by her mother to England, and there they resided several years, before revisiting her native country. But the scenes which were familiar to her as a child, must have made a vivid and lasting impression on her mind; and all her sketches evince so much freshness and vigour, that her readers might easily imagine she had passed her life among the scenes she describes. An able critic observes that, "To her early absence from her native country is probably to be traced one strong characteristic of all her writings—the total absence of party feeling on subjects connected with politics or religion."*

Miss Fielding was very fortunate in her marriage connexion with her husband, Mr. S. C. Hall, an English gentleman, whose talents and taste, as a successful writer and artist, are widely known. Soon after her marriage, Mrs. Hall commenced her literary career; no doubt the sympathy and approval of her husband incited her genius, and assisted materially in developing her powers. Her first work, entitled "Sketches of Irish Character," appeared in 1829. Of this, and her succeeding works, the following is, probably, a correct, though by no means a flattered estimate. "Mrs. Hall's sketches bear a closer resemblance to the tales of Miss Mitford than to the Irish stories of Banim or Griffin, though the latter may have tended to direct Mrs. Hall to the peculiarities of Irish character. They contain some fine rural description, and are animated by a healthy tone of moral feeling and a vein of delicate humour. The coquetry of her Irish girls (very different from that in high life) is admirably depicted. Next year, Mrs. Hall issued a little volume for children, "Chronicles of a School-Room," consisting also of a series of tales, simple, natural, and touching. The home-truths and moral observations conveyed in these narratives, reflect great credit on the heart and the judgment of the writer. Indeed, good taste and good feeling may be said to preside over all the works of our authoress. In 1831, she issued a second series of "Sketches of Irish Character," fully equal to the first, which was well received. The "Rapparee" is an excellent story, and some of the satirical delineations are hit off with great truth and liveliness. In 1832, she ventured on a larger and more difficult work—an historical romance in three volumes, entitled "The Buccaneer." The scene of this tale is laid in England, at the time of the Protectorate, and Oliver himself is among the characters. The plot of "The Buccaneer" is well managed, and some of the characters (as that of Barbara Iverk, the Puritan) are skilfully delineated; but the work is too feminine, and has too little of energetic passion for the stormy times in which it is cast. In 1834, Mrs. Hall published "Tales of Woman's Trials," short stories of decidedly moral tendency, written in the happiest style of the authoress. In 1835, appeared "Uncle Horace," a novel, and in 1838 "Lights and Shadows of Irish Life," three volumes. The latter had been previously published in the New Monthly Magazine, and enjoyed great popularity. The principal tale in the collection, "The Groves of Blarney," was dramatised at one of the theatres with distinguished success. In 1840, Mrs. Hall issued what has been styled the best of her novels, "Marian; or a Young Maid's Fortunes," in which her knowledge of Irish character is again displayed. Katty Macane, an Irish cook, who adopts Marian, a foundling, and watches over her with untiring affection, is equal to any of the Irish portraits since those by Miss Edgeworth. The next work of our authoress was a series of "Stories of the Irish Peasantry," contributed to Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, and afterwards published in a collected form. In 1840, Mrs. Hall aided her husband in a work chiefly composed by him, and which reflects credit upon his talents and industry—"Ireland, its Scenery, Character," &c. Topographical and statistical information is here blended with the poetical and romantic features of the country—the legends of the peasantry—scenes and characters of humour and pathos—and all that could be gathered in five separate tours through Ireland, added to early acquaintance and recollection of the country. The work was highly embellished by British artists, and extended to three large volumes. In tasteful description of natural objects, and pictures of every-day life, Mrs. Hall has few superiors. Her humour is not so broad or racy as that of Lady Morgan, nor her observation so pointed and select as Miss Edgeworth's. Her writings are also unequal, but, in general, they constitute easy, delightful reading, and possess a simple truth and purity of sentiment that is ultimately more fascinating than the darker shades and colourings of imaginative composition."*

Mrs. Hall's residence was for a number of years at The Rosery, Old Brompton, near London; where her home was distinguished for its simple elegance, and the refined taste and hospitality of the gifted pair who presided in this pleasant literary retreat. At present they reside in Surrey, about eighteen miles from London; Mr. Hall is editor of the "Art-Journal," and Mrs. Hall, a constant contributor to its pages. There her latest and one of her most interesting works, "Midsummer Eve; a Fairy Tale of Love," first appeared, with superb illustrations. The most distinguished artists in Great Britain furnished the pictorial semblances of the author's pure and beautiful ideas; we hardly know which deserves most praise. The volume was issued in 1848, and well sustains the intention of the authoress: "I have endeavoured," she says, "to trace the progress of a young girl's mind from infancy to womanhood; the Good and Evil Influences to which it is subjected; and the Trials inseparable from a contest with the World." Mrs. S. C. Hall, as she always gives her name to her works, seemingly desirous of associating her husband's fame with her own, never loses an opportunity of inculcating those virtues as well as graces which make the happiness and enlarge the best influence of her own sex. Another beautiful trait of her character, is her active benevolence; she engages in those associated efforts to benefit society by taking care for woman's education and comfort, now beginning to be made in England. We find her name on the Committee for the Asylum of the "Governesses' Benevolent Institution;" and in the establishment of "The Queen's College" for the better promotion of female education, Mrs. S. C. Hall was warmly interested.

From "Marian; or a Young Maid's Fortunes"

MARIAN'S CHARACTER.

It would be difficult to analyze the feelings with which Marian awoke to this new existence—for new indeed it was; the kindness of Lady Isabel, the dean's benevolence, the joy of her beloved nurse, each succeeding the other, were more like spells, the spells of a happy land, where there were no tears, no anxieties, no troubles. She was filled with joy and gratitude. Not many weeks had elapsed, and she was living a new life, in a new world, remembering only the past to enhance the sweetness of the present. Her heart's beatings, lest it should be a dream, not a reality, had hardly subsided; and when each morning she awoke, she could scarcely believe that what surrounded her was less than fairy-land. It was with mingled delight and astonishment that Lady Isabel discovered her rare excellence in music. She had not only completely mastered the mechanical part of the science, but infused into her performance that pure and exquisite spirit which, like genius, cannot be taught—it cometh we know not whence; but it is impossible to listen to vocal or instrumental music such as hers, without feeling that

* Chambers' Cyclopædia.

Nature has bestowed "a grace beyond the reach of art." Her voice was a soprano, not of extensive compass, but of the finest tone, particularly on the middle notes, where expression so fully tells.

Lady Isabel, accustomed to the best music of Italy, was astonished not only at its richness, as it rolled forth in purest melody, but at the beauty of her conceptions and the truth of their delineation. The few songs she sang were chosen with admirable skill, and she succeeded in exciting whatever interest she pleased in her hearers. Lady Isabel was spell-bound by the charm of this extraordinary talent; it was something so original, so different from any thing she had expected. As yet Marian had only learned the simple melodies of her own land, and a few as simple French songs; but hers was a voice which evidently could sing any thing—round and flexible, perfect in its intonations, and capable of the highest culture. To have understood the pleasure experienced by Lady Isabel at this discovery, it would be necessary to understand the power sweet sounds possessed over her feelings; to those who comprehend this, explanation would be unnecessary; those who do not would think us gone mad on the subject. It is indeed labour in vain to attempt proving to the unmusical the power of music; that high, and pure, and holy enjoyment, which, as we may believe, is one of the delights we are to experience in heaven.

"I do not like to see tears in your eyes, Lady Isabel," said Marian, when she finished singing one of the sweet ballads of poor Ireland, whose euphonious termination, "Colleen das crutheen amo," she had learnt to pronounce with its natural softness, from our friend Katty Macane. "I do not like to see tears in your eyes, dear Lady Isabel; why should you ever shed tears?—you, so good, so happy, so rich, so independent: what made you cry, dear lady?"

"Your music, my dear child."

"I ought to be happy at that! to think of my nurse's ballad making you weep!"

"It is even so," replied Lady Isabel; "ballads such as that excite in a double way, by the words and music, both playing on the feelings together. That voice, Marian, is a fortune!"

"I wish it would make me one: do you think it would?" inquired the girl, eagerly.

"Yes, I am sure of it—there can be no doubt about the matter."

"Oh, then, dear Lady Isabel," she exclaimed, joyfully, "only tell me how I can set about it; you have been so good, so generous to me, that you will not refuse me this request, and then I should be independent; it would make me very, very miserable if I thought that all my life I was to be only a dependant; a thing to subsist upon the cast-off food and cast-off smiles of others! Oh, Lady Isabel, if I could once, even, earn my own bread!"

"You earned it with Mrs. Jones, my poor girl—you surely earned it there."

"I might perhaps have earned food, dear Lady Bell, but not money. I wore the cast-off garments of charity"

"Say, of justice rather; they were earned."

"My dear lady, I could not think they were, when any thing approaching finery was given to me, I could not bear to put it on—I felt how strange the charity-child that crossed my path would look decked out in ribands. I loathed myself."

"No, Marian," replied her friend, "you loathed your dependence; you were proud, child, too proud; that was the pride that 'apes humility.' I do not wish to wound your feelings, Marian; but, in the many tales you have told me, where you were stern and stubborn—and I loved you all the better, because you did not spare yourself—I traced it all to pride."

"But I could kneel and kiss the dust beneath your feet, and the good dean, too; I could serve Lord Augustus not only as a servant but as a slave; my old nurse, my fond and faithful nurse, I could beg for her. Oh, Lady Isabel, is that pride?"

"It is not humility, my dear child; it is affection. We have not insulted you; if we had——"

"Dear Lady Isabel!" exclaimed Marian, astonished at the idea; but seeing her ladyship smile, she reverted to her old purpose. "But this voice—I have practised it as you told me; and now that I understand the Italian words your ladyship so kindly translated, I think I do better; I shall not be content with doing better, I want to do well."

"Marian," said Lady Isabel, "listen to me. You have, above all others, a quality which will render you either very great or very mean—there is no medium—it is PRIDE."

"Oh, Lady Isabel," she interrupted warmly, "what should a foundling do with pride?"

"True; and I may add, what should any one do with pride?—false pride, that builds unto itself a pyramid of false greatness, and frets itself into perpetual agitation, lest its pyramid should be assailed. You have unhappily lived with those who sought to undervalue you; your feelings stimulated by pride, rebelled—you became harsh and irritable—expecting hourly assault, your defiance was ever ready; so that I am not quite certain but that, at times, you might have been the aggressor."

"Not only might, my lady," said the frank-hearted girl, "but was. I can call to mind many instances when I was the aggressor; and now, when I am so happy, I wonder how I could ever have been so bitter. But was it pride?"

"Yes; think, and you will see it was."

"But, dear madam, is the pride that rises against oppression wrong?"

"No, provided it does not degenerate into anger against the oppressor. The sea is deep, my child, but pride is deeper, nor is it more deep than deceitful; it will often seem to betray itself, the more successfully to betray thee. I would have you watch this pride, and separate it from that great and glorious ambition which all great men, and a few great women, have understood."

"Lady Isabel, why did you say a few great women?"

"Because, though many are celebrated, few are great. Women are at so early a period bound to the littlenesses of life, that it is no easy matter for them to break the thousand small intricate chains which keep them down on every side, and which, after all, except with very extraordinary talents, and under peculiar circumstances, had, perhaps, better be only loosened. There are, however, many heroic women, clad in English russet, whose sufferings and whose virtues deserve the martyr's crown. To be truly great we must be above the weaknesses—the petty ambitions of life—soaring as the eagle in the heavens with only the sun in view."

"As I should like to soar!" exclaimed the young enthusiast, "and my sun should be independence."

"And," said Lady Isabella, "if you attained it by the most praiseworthy exertions, you would then desire one other—the only one that ever made woman, however great, happy."

"What is that, madam?"

Lady Isabella paused; the word "Love" was on her lip, but she sent it back, and said, "Affection."

"I do not know," replied the maiden, "but I think I should like to be great."

"And so should I like you to be great in goodness! You have been reading this morning the biography of two very celebrated women: whom would you rather have been, Queen Elizabeth or Lady Rachel Russel?"

Marian paused not, but replied instantly, "Oh, Lady Rachel, to be sure!"

Lady Isabella drew her breath freely. "Thank God!" she instantly exclaimed; "she is right-hearted!"

BLUE-STOCKINGS.

The particular class of blue-stockings of which Lady Barbara, in her day, was so decided a specimen, is passing away. The generality of females are better informed than they were thirty years ago; it is not that there are fewer trout, but there are fewer minnows; consequently, "the trout" do not look so very big. Lady Barbara, toward the conclusion of her career, affected that hardness which, unfortunately, many clever women, now-a-days, mistake for strength. The affectation of sentiment and romance was foolish; the affectation of hard philosophy, in a woman, is worse than that. It is dangerous. Nature! that unerring philosopher! commanded different and separate occupations to the fair portion of her creation, from what she allotted to the stronger; and whatever tends to destroy these obligations, flies in the very face of that nature which it has become the fashion to talk about, and disobey. Women are capable of appreciating, and ought to be ready to exercise and understand the principles of all that is great and beautiful; they ought to be true patriots, firm friends, and honest members of society; these are general virtues: but there are others, especially their own, that must not be forgotten.

SENTIMENTAL YOUNG LADIES.

I hate those mere gentle girls without mind, or spirit, or feeling, to deepen the blush upon a pallid cheek; a fellow might as well think of living upon sweet cake, and sweet cream, and sweet strawberries, and all the sweets, which, after all, are sure to become sours, as going through life with a sleepy-headed beauty, whose roughest word would be, "An if it please you, sir!"

WOMAN FOR WOMAN.

"No, I can't, nor won't!" exclaimed Katty, with a heroic spirit that females would do well and wisely to cultivate. "I will not hould my tongue, where my own poor wake sex is imposed upon. Haven't I often seen the young, and the innocent, and the virtuous, drawn by their natural goodness (which desavers like you twist as a halter about their necks, strangling them with their own good intentions, like seething the kid in its mother's milk;) haven't I often seen such drawn into sin, and left to moulder away in it, till they sunk into a nameless grave? And why? Because there was none of their own sex found with enough judgment to watch over them; or with courage enough to draw them back after the first false step; or to give the broad, the loud, the determined, the steadfast LIE to what is almost as dangerous to a young woman: the first false word that's even whispered against her honest fame!"

THE PUBLIC SINGER.

It will be remembered that Marian once thought her fine voice might promote her independent desires, and Lady Isabella promised to read her one of those practical lessons on the danger of female publicity that are so forcible by the mere strength of example. About a week after the funeral of Mrs. Jones she fulfilled her promise—the lesson was in itself fearful. A young and clever girl without a home, and most painfully situated, married a man much beneath her; and, finding out, after the expiration of a month, that he was not only low in connexion, but of debased mind, sprang, as it were, upon the stage, as a means of support, where her magnificent musical talent commanded success. She had done so with a mind full of honest and excellent resolves—with a firm desire to do right—with a prayer; but, no, she did not pray—if she had prayed, she would not have fallen! Poor thing! she trusted to her integrity of purpose, and, elated with success—flushed with triumph—her unguarded and unworlly manners reaped, as their reward, a reputation, not blight exactly, but breathed upon by that class of men whose breath is poison. Those, few as they were in number, of her own sex whom she respected, and who ought boldly to have rallied round a sister whom they believed in danger, shrank from her. She was worse than alone in the world! for she had the clog of a base and cruel husband—a yoke-fellow, but no help; and this at the time when all the town were at her feet; this, as has been said before, all brilliant as it is, never yet filled the aching void in woman's heart. Her curse seemed to be always to love unworthily; she fell; knowing then that she was degraded, she became reckless, and this recklessness was increased by the desertion of the fashionable roué who courted her as a step to farther notoriety. She went on from bad to worse, and, in the midst of a career of professional success, multitudinous scandal, and bitter self-reproach, the poor actress' health gave way, and she had no friends—envy, and that mock religion which blasts where it ought to bless, did their worst. She crept down to Twickenham with the remnant of her earnings, to die like a hunted cat, away from the scenes of her feverish home.

PREJUDICE.

Prejudice is the more dangerous, because it has the unfortunate ability of accommodating itself to all the possible varieties of the human mind. Like the spider, it makes everywhere a home. Some one of our glorious old divines—South, or Taylor, or Fuller, or Bishop Hall—has it somewhere, that let the mind be as naked as the walls of an empty and forsaken tenement, gloomy as a dungeon, or ornamented with the richest abilities of thinking; let it be hot, cold, dark, or light, lonely or inhabited; still prejudice, if undisturbed, will fill it with cobwebs, and live, like the spider, where there seemed nothing to live upon.

EMULATION.

It is the greatest possible mistake to imagine that being of the same way of thinking, having the same pursuits, the same turn of mind, as it is called, makes people agree. Derogatory as it is to the dignity of human nature, experience forces the knowledge that people having the same pursuits, the same foibles, the same feelings, agree least of all; one thunder-clap deadens the effect of another. A theatre, for instance, is nothing more than a hive, where every bee has a sting ready, not for an intruder, but for its fellow-bee. It is painful to know how actors of similar style and manner mar each other's points, and count the calls and claps which each receives above the other; but it would be invidious to quote this as an instance of discord, arising where many are engaged in the pursuit of the same object, if the confession were not added, that the same fault is observable in every sphere where men's tempers and feelings are called into operation. Higher and nobler minds overcome it altogether, simply because they are high and noble, and above the small artifices and weak emulations which gangrene and fester the heart.

HALL, LOUISA JANE,

IS THE daughter of Dr. James Park of Newburyport, Massachusetts, where she was born in 1802. Dr. Park removed to Boston, and in 1811, opened a school for young ladies, (one of the first institutions of this kind under the care of a man, a mode of female education since become so popular in Boston,) where his daughter was carefully educated. She began to write very early, but did not publish until 1832.

In 1840, she married Rev. Edward B. Hall, a Unitarian clergyman of Providence, Rhode Island, where she has since resided. Her principal works are, "Miriam, a Drama;" "Joanna of Naples, a Historical Tale," and "A Biography of Elizabeth Carter;" besides several poems published in periodicals. Of her most remarkable work, the editor* of "The Female Poets of America," says—"Mrs. Hall wrote Miriam only for amusement, as she did many little poems and tales which she destroyed. The first half of this drama, written in 1825, was read at a small literary party in Boston. The author not being known, was present, and was encouraged by the remarks it occasioned to finish it in the following summer. Her father forbade her design to burn it; it was read, as completed, in the winter of 1826, and the authorship disclosed; but she had not courage to publish it for several years. She saw its defects more distinctly than before, when it appeared in print, and resolved never again to attempt anything so long in the form of poetry. Her eyesight failed for four or five years, during which time she was almost entirely deprived of the use of books, the pen, and what she says she most regretted, the needle."

"'Miriam' was published in 1837. It received the best approval of contemporary criticism, and a second edition, with such revision as the condition of the author's eyes had previously forbidden, appeared in the following year. Mrs. Hall had not proposed to herself to write a tragedy, but a dramatic poem, and the result was an instance of the successful accomplishment of a design, in which failure would have been but a repetition of the experience of genius. The subject is one of the finest in the annals of the human race, but one which has never been treated with a more just appreciation of its nature and capacities. It is the first great conflict of the Master's kingdom, after its full establishment, with the kingdoms of this world. It is Christianity struggling with the first persecution of power, philosophy, and the interests of society. Milman had attempted its illustration in his brilliant and stately tragedy of The Martyr of Antioch; Bulwer has laid upon it his familiar hands in The Last Days of Pompeii; and since, our countryman, William Ware, has exhibited it with power and splendour in his masterly romance of The Fall of Rome; but no one has yet approached more nearly its just delineation and analysis than Mrs. Hall in this beautiful poem."

The prose works of Mrs. Hall evince a cultivated mind and refined taste; the style is carefully finished, and the delineations of character satisfy the judgment of the reader, if they fail to awaken any deep interest in the fate of the Queen or the pursuits of the learned lady. There is something in the genius of Mrs. Hall which seems statue-like; we feel that this repose is a part of the beauty, and yet one would wish to see it disturbed if only to prove the power which the inspired artist possesses.

"From Miriam."

[Miriam, the only daughter of Thraseno, a Christian exile from Judea, residing with his two children at Rome, is seen and loved by Paulus, a young nobleman, whose father, Piso, had in his youth served in the armies in Palestine. The passion is mutual, but secret; and having failed to win the Roman to her faith, the Christian maiden resolves to part from him for ever.]

THE PARTING.

Miriam. The anguish of my soul,
My spirit's deep and rending agony,
Tell me that though this heart may surely break,
There is no change within it! and through life,
Fondly and wildly — though most hopelessly —
With all its strong affections will it cleave
To him for whom it nearly yielded all
That makes life precious — peace and self esteem,
Friends upon earth, and hopes in heaven above!

Paul. Mean'st thou — I know not what. My mind grows dark

Amid a thousand wildering mazes lost.
There is a wild and dreadful mystery
Even in thy words of love I can not solve.

Mir. Hear me: for with the holy faith that erst
Made strong the shuddering patriarch's heart and hand,
When meek below the glittering knife lay stretched
The boy whose smiles were sunshine to his age,
This night I offer up a sacrifice
Of life's best hopes to the One Living God!
Yes, from that night, my Paulus, never more
Mine eyes shall look upon thy form, mine ears
Drink in the tones of thy beloved voice.

Paul. Ye gods! ye cruel gods! let me awake
And find this but a dream!

Mir. Is it then said!
O God! the words so fraught with bitterness
So soon are uttered — and thy servant lives!
Ay, Paulus; ever from that hour, when first
My spirit knew that thine was wholly lost,
And to its superstitions wedded fast,
Shrouded in darkness, blind to every beam
Streaming from Zion's hill athwart the night
That broods in horror o'er a heathen world,
Even from that hour my shuddering soul beheld
A dark and fathomless abyss yawning wide
Between us two; and o'er it gleamed alone
One pale, dim twinkling star! the lingering hope
That grace descending from the Throne of Light
Might fall in gentle dews upon that heart,
And melt it into humble piety.
Alas! that hope hath faded; and I see
The fatal gulf of separation still
Between us, love, and stretching on for aye
Beyond the grave in which I feel that soon
This clay with all its sorrows shall lie down
Union for us is none in yonder sky:
Then how on earth? — so in my inmost soul,
Nurtured with midnight tears, with blighted hopes,
With silent watchings and incessant prayers,
A holy resolution hath ta'en root,
And in its night at last springs proudly up.
We part, my Paulus! not in hate, but love,
Yielding unto a stern necessity.

And I along my sad, short pilgrimage,
Will bear the memory of our sinless love
As mothers wear the image of the babe
That died upon their bosom ere the world
Had stamped its spotless soul with good or ill,
Pictured in infant loveliness and smiles,
Close to the heart's fond core, to be drawn forth
Ever in solitude, and bathed in tears. —
But how! with such unmanly grief struck down,
Withered, thou Roman knight!

Paul. My brain is pierced!
Mine eyes with blindness smitten! and mine ear
Rings faintly with the echo of thy words!
Henceforth what man shall ever build his faith
On woman's love, on woman's constancy? —

Maiden, look up! I would but gaze once more
Upon that open brow and clear dark eye,
To read what aspect Perjury may wear,
What garb of loveliness may Falsehood use,
To lure the eye of guileless, manly love!
Cruel, cold-blooded, fickle that thou art,
Dost thou not quail beneath thy lover's eye?
How! there is light within thy lofty glance,
A flush upon thy cheek, a settled calm
Upon thy lip and brow!

Mir. Ay, even so,
A light — a flush — a calm — not of this earth!
For in this hour of bitterness and woe,
The grace of God is flung on my soul
Like dews upon the withering grass which late
Red scorching flames have seared. Again
The consciousness of faith, of sins forgiven,
Of wrath appeased, of heavy guilt thrown off,
Sheds on my breast its long-forgotten peace,
And shining steadfast as the noonday sun,
Lights me along the path that duty marks.
Lover, too dearly loved! a long farewell!
The bannered field, the glancing spear, the shout
That bears the victor's name unto the skies —
The laurelled brow — be thine —

DYING FANCIES.

Angels are gathering in the eastern sky —
The wind is playing 'mid their glittering plumes —
The sunbeams dance upon their golden harps —
Welcome is on their fair and glorious brows!
Hath not a holy spirit passed from earth,
Whom ye come forth to meet, seraphic forms?
Oh, fade not, fade not yet! — or take me too,
For earth grows dark beneath my dazzled eye!

MIRIAM TO PAULUS, WHO DECLARES HIMSELF A CHRISTIAN.

If but one ray of light from Heav'n
Hath reach'd thy soul, I may indeed rejoice!
Ev'n thus, in coming days, from martyrs' blood
Shall earnest saints arise to do God's work.
And thus with slow, sure, silent step shall Truth
Tread the dark earth, and scatter Light abroad,
Till Peace and Righteousness awake, and lead
Triumphant, in the bright and joyous blaze,
Their happy myriads up to yonder skies!

MIRIAM TO HER BROTHER AND LOVER.

Euphas, thy hand! — Ay, clasp thy brother's hand!
Ye fair and young apostles! go ye forth —
Go side by side beneath the sun and storm,
A dying sister's blessing on your toils!
When ye have pour'd the oil of Christian peace
On passions rude and wild — when ye have won
Dark, sullen souls from wrath and sin to God —
Whene'er ye kneel to bear upon your pray'rs
Repentant sinners up to yonder heav'n,
Be it in palace — dungeon — open air —
'Mid friends — 'mid raging foes — in joy — in grief —
Deem not ye pray alone; — man never doth!
A sister spirit, ling'ring near, shall fill
The silent air around you with her pray'rs,
Waiting till ye too lay your fetters down,
And come to your reward! — Go fearless forth;
For glorious truth wars with you, and shall reign.

HANKE, HENRIETTE WILHELMINA,

Was the daughter of Mr. Arndt, a merchant in Jauer; she was born in 1783. In 1802, she married the pastor Hanke, of Dejherrnfurth; and in 1819, she became a widow. Since which event, she has lived retired with her mother, her time wholly devoted to literary pursuits, and the care of her aged parents. She has written — "The Step-Daughter," published in 1820; "The Twelve Months of the Year," in 1821; "The Hunting Castle of Diana" and "The Garden of Walrys," in 1822; "Pictures of the Heart" and "Claudie," in the year 1823. "The Christmas-Tree" was issued in 1824, and "The Female Friends" in 1825. She has written numerous other novels and romances, which have obtained great popularity in Germany. Her works were published in a uniform edition in 1841, in twenty-one volumes. None of these have been translated into English.

HENTZ, CAROLINE LEE,

Was born in Lancaster, Worcester county, Massachusetts. Her father was General John Whiting, of the army. Her two brothers were also officers in the army, and one of them, General Henry Whiting, was aid-de camp to General Taylor, in the Mexican war; he is still living. Miss Whiting began to write when very young; and before she had completed her twelfth year, she had composed a poem, a novel, and a tragedy in five acts, full of impassioned scenes and romantic situations.

Upon her marriage, she removed to Chapel Hill, North Carolina; in its University, her husband, Mr. N. M. Hentz, was Professor of Modern Languages. After some years spent in this place, they took charge of a flourishing female academy near Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1834, they went to reside near Florence, Alabama, at a place they called Locust Dell, where they taught for several years. Stronger inducements led them to Tuscaloosa, Alabama, the seat of the University, where they spent two years. In 1845, Mr. Hentz removed to Tuskegee with his family, and at present they are residing in Columbus, Georgia, a beautiful city on the banks of the Chattahoochee.

The first work which Mrs. Hentz published, was her drama, "De Lara, or the Moorish Bride," for which she obtained the prize of five hundred dollars and a gold medal, offered in Philadelphia for the best original tragedy. Several of our most eminent writers were competitors for the prize, awarded to Mrs. Hentz by a committee composed of distinguished literary gentlemen. She has also written two other tragedies, "Lamora, or the Western Wild," which was acted at Cincinnati, and "Constance of Werdenberg;" both of these are still unpublished. Many of her minor poems show great sweetness and facility, as well as warmth and earnestness. Indeed, poetry seems to be the natural language of her heart, when stirred by emotions or affections.

Mrs. Hentz is most widely known by her popular prose tales and novellettes, which have appeared in our different periodicals. "Aunt Patty's Scrap Bag" and "The Mob Cap," which obtained a prize of two hundred dollars, have been almost universally read. Some of her other stories are, "Aunt Mercy," "The Blind Girl," "The Pedlar," "The Village Anthem," and a novel, in one volume, called "Lovell's Folly."

As an instructress, she has been eminently successful, especially in that most important qualification, the power of gaining the affections and confidence of those under her care, and of obtaining a personal influence over them, which remains and acts upon them for good, long after they are withdrawn from her presence. Many a young man, as well as woman, who has been thrown into her society, will look back upon his intercourse with her as a time when his mind received an impulse towards the noble and elevated, which affected his whole future life.

In social intercourse, Mrs. Hentz is easy and dignified. Her appearance is exceedingly prepossessing, and her conversational powers are fine.

The prose writings of Mrs. Hentz are distinguished for poetic imagery, vivacity, and a peculiar purity of style, which seems the habitual tone of the writer's mind, and harmonizes well with the quiet lessons of morality and patriotism breathing from, rather than inculcated in, all her fictitious compositions. Born and trained at the North, but removed to the South while her youthful hopes were bright as the sunny climate where her new home was found, and passing some years as sojourner in the great West, Mrs. Hentz has learned the wisdom of loving her whole country, above any particular State or section. This true and noble patriotism she inculcates as a woman should,—like the faith of childhood, to hold its place, next to that of "Our Father, who art in Heaven," in the heart of every American. Of her most elaborate novel, "Lovell's Folly," a writer in the Southern Review says:—"It certainly merits praise, both for its design and execution. The purpose, or morale, is to show the incorrectness of the prejudices commonly entertained towards each other by the Yankee and Southron. The characters are well chosen for this purpose; the incidents fascinating, and artistically managed; and the reflections, in the main true, abounding in delicate perceptions of the beautiful, the right, and the good. The style is even and graceful, and throughout vivified by the colourings of a flowery fancy. There is nothing wild or spasmodic in these pages. They would please the amiable and contemplative lover of Wordsworth, rather than the admirer of Byron's gloom and misanthropy. Reading such productions is like wandering through the greenness and rose-enamelled beauty of one of our Western prairies in spring-time, and not like gazing upon the rough barriers and splintered pinnacles of a huge mountain, or the foam and fury of the sea in a tempest.

"Of her dramatic works, 'De Lara, or the Moorish Bride,' must rank among the best of the kind produced in America. The scene is laid in Spain, during the contests between the rival races, and the events are such as to produce manifestations of many of the intenser passions; and while the tragedy is fraught, throughout, with moral and poetic beauty; while it presents, in vivid colours, to the imagination, the soft and voluptuous scenes about 'golden Granada,'—her olive-bowers and enchanted palaces; while there is pervading feminine chasteness and delicacy,—it is yet marked by great depth and vigour of thought and utterance. Indeed, the masculine energy of style, and the remarkable insight into the fiercer capacities and phases of the human heart,—with which women are seldom familiar,—have, more than anything else, fascinated us with this tragedy. We know no female writer, not excepting Joanna Baillie, who displays more manliness of sentiment and expression, in her writings, than Mrs. Hentz exhibits in this drama."

Of the story or plot, we can give no analysis here, only remarking, as explanatory of the scene we quote, that Osman is a captive Moor in the castle of the Spanish hero, Fernando De Lara, whose father Osman has secretly murdered. De Lara has discovered his prisoner's guilt, but is hindered in his revenge by plighted love for Zorayda, the daughter of the Moor. She has become a Christian in sincerity, as her father has hypocritically, to subserve his hatred.

THE APOSTATE AND THE TRUE BELIEVER.

Zoraya. The blood of th' Abencerrages flows pure
As melting icicles within these veins.
No look of lawless passion ever sent
The conscious crimson to thy daughter's cheek.
Fernando loves me, but the captive maid
Receives as reverent and true an homage,
As if the diadem of Spain she wore,
And pledged my faith unsanctioned by thy blessing.
But, glorying in my innocence, I dare
Present my bosom to thy glittering steel,
And tell thee, with my dying breath, that here
Fernando's worshipped image is enshrined.

Osman. Would that the tomb of her who made me father,
Had closed on thee, the infant of a day,—
Sweet in thy bud, but fatal in thy bloom.
Leagued with the fell oppressors of thy land,
The curses of thy country shall be thine! —
Leagued with an infidel! May Allah send —

Zor. Oh! curse me not: thou know'st not all my crime.
Thou, to redeem thyself from captive chains,
Assumed the Christian's name, yet loathed his creed.
I, at thy bidding, knelt before the cross:
But, ere the mandate came, my heart had bowed
In adoration to the Christian's God.
This sacred cross I've sheltered in my breast —

Os. (Snatching it from her, and throwing it on the ground.)
Perish the symbol of a faith abhorred, —
Perish the seal of infamy and wo, —
Down, down, to dust!

Zor. (Throwing herself at his feet, and grasping the cross.)
No, trample on thy child,
But spare from sacrilege this holy relic!
Fernando's mother, on the bed of death,
Gave me this pledge of her immortal hope,
This precious pledge! I'll guard it, as of old
The wandering Hebrews watched the ark of heaven

The dying features of the lovely saint, —
The light, the glow, the ecstasy, the peace! —
Thou would'st, like me, have wept and have believed.
Father, there is a truth, I feel there is,
In this religion sealed by blood divine.
It gives me strength to wrestle with thy wrath:
It arms me, — me, a young and timid maid, —
With power a hero's arm, in battle, lacks.
This cross is mine. Back to my guardian heart,
Thou sacred sign, — remain for ever there!

Os. Shame of thy lineage, alien from thy kind, —
Traitor, exulting in thy daring guilt!
I have no daughter. Never be it said
That this unnatural thing is child of mine.
I will have none, — away — away, thou serpent,
Whom once I warmed and fostered in my breast.
'Tis done! — there is no other place to sting!
Fool that I was, — amidst the wreck of fame,
The dearth of joy, I dreamed that fate had left
A daughter, and, still more, that she did love me.

* * * * *

But hear me while I swear by Allah's throne,
A father's curse —

Zor. Thou can'st not utter it.
Heaven will not hear. Thus, prostrate at thy feet,
Behold me fall submissive to thy will.
Leave me this cross, this anchor of my faith,
Take all the rest, but leave — oh, leave me this!

DE LARA'S LOVE.

Oh! there is something in the secret thought,
That we are shrined in some pure vestal heart,
Whose trembling fears our blood-stain'd path pursue,
Whose holy prayers for us are winged on high,
Whose tears and blushes welcome our return, —
Something in this, Francisco, that embalms,
Refines and sanctifies the warrior's spirit.

All that I can reveal is written here,
Here on this brow, from which despair unthrones
The sovereignty of mind. My spirit now
Is calm and clear, — and ponders o'er the wreck
Its own unmastered agony has made.
The wretch, who's drifted o'er the surging waves
Of ocean, when its foam is lashed by storms,
Sees not his yawning sepulchre more clear,
Than I, the chasm o'er which my reason totters.

Oh! that no mortal eye
Had e'er beheld these humbling agonies.
Zoraya, thou hast heard me utter sounds
That leave a sleepless echo, murdering peace.
I'll tell thee all — give back thy virgin vows, —
Tear thy seducing image from my heart, —
Drown, in black vengeance, love's forbidden fires,
And let this bridal day go down in blood.

ZORAYA'S LOVE.

Shall I desert him now,
When grief has laid its blighting hand upon him?
He, who in all the splendour of his rank,
With royal favour crowned, and martial fame, —
By beauty wooed, by chivalry adored, —
In this full blaze of glory, bowed his pride,
And knelt a captive at the captive's feet?
Is love alone in beds of roses found,
Beneath a heaven of fair, unshadowed blue?
No! — 'tis to shame, to sorrow, to despair,
That faithful love its holiest triumph owes!

From "Poems."

THE SNOW-FLAKE.

Ye're welcome, ye white and feathery flakes,
That fall like the blossoms the summer wind shakes
From the bending spray — Oh! say do ye come,
With tidings to me, from my far-distant home?

"Our home is above in the depths of the sky —
In the hollow of God's own hand we lie —
We are fair, we are pure, our birth is divine —
Say, what can we know of thee, or of thine?"

I know that ye dwell in the kingdoms of air —
I know ye are heavenly, pure and fair,
But oft have I seen ye, far travellers, roam,
By the cold blast driven, round my northern home.

"We roam over mountains and valley and sea :
We hang our pale wreaths on the leafless tree :
The herald of wisdom and mercy we go,
And perchance the far home of thy childhood we know.

"We roam, and our fairy track we leave,
While for Nature a winding sheet we weave —
A cold, white shroud that shall mantle the gloom,
Till her Maker recalls her to glory and bloom."

Oh! foam of the shoreless ocean above!
I know thou descendest in mercy and love:
All chill as thou art, yet benign is thy birth,
As the dew that imparts the green bosom of Earth.

And I've thought, as I've seen thy tremulous spray,
Soft curling like mist, on the branches lay
In bright relief on the dark blue sky,
That thou meltedst in grief when the sun came nigh.

"Say, whose is the harp whose echoing song
Breathes wild on the gale that wafts us along?
The moon, the flowers, the blossoming tree,
Wake the minstrel's lyre, they are brighter than we."

The flowers shed their fragrance, the moonbeams their light,
Over scenes never veild by your drap'ry of white,
But the clime where I first saw your downy flakes fall,
My own native clime, is far dearer than all.

Oh! fair, when ye cloth'd in their wintry mail,
The elms that o'ershadow my home in the vale,
Like warriors they looked, as they bowed in the storm,
With the tossing plume, and the towering form.

Ye fade, ye melt — I feel the warm breath
Of the redolent South o'er the desolate heath —
But tell me, ye vanishing pearls, where ye dwell
When the dew-drops of summer bespangle the dell

"We fade, — we melt into crystalline spheres —
We weep, for we pass through a valley of tears;
But onward to glory — away to the sky —
In the hollow of God's own hand we lie."

HOWITT, MARY,

Is by her mother's side directly descended from Mr. William Wood, the Irish patentee, on account of whose half-pence issued under a contract from the government of George II., Dean Swift raised so much disturbance with his Drapier's Letters. His son, Charles Wood, the grandfather of Mrs. Howitt, and who became assay-master in Ireland, was the first introducer of platinum into Europe. By her father's side she is of an old race of Quakers, many of her ancestors having suffered imprisonment and spoliation of property in the early times when that people produced martyrs. Her childhood and youth were passed in the old paternal mansion in Staffordshire, whence she was married in 1821 to William Howitt, a man of congenial tastes. Of herself she relates — "My childhood was happy in many respects. It was so, indeed, as far as physical health and the enjoyment of a beautiful country, of which I had an intense relish, and the companionship of a dearly beloved sister went — but oh! there was such a cloud over all from the extreme severity of so-called religious education, it almost made cowards and hypocrites of us, and made us feel that if this were religion, it was a thing to be feared and hated. My childhood had completely two phases — one as dark as night — one as bright as day — the bright one I have attempted to describe in 'My Own Story,' which is the true picture of this cheerful side of the first ten years of my life. We studied poetry, botany and flower-painting, and as children wrote poetry. These pursuits were almost out of the pale of permitted Quaker pleasures, but we pursued them with a perfect passion — doing in secret that which we dared not do openly; such as reading Shakspeare, translations of the classics, the elder novelists — and in fact, laying the libraries of half the little town where we lived under contribution

"We studied French and chemistry at this time, and enabled ourselves to read Latin, storing our minds with a whole mass of heterogeneous knowledge. This was good as far as it went — but there wanted a directing mind, a good sound teacher, and I now deplore over the secrecy, the subterfuge, the fear under which this ill-digested, ill-arranged knowledge was gained. On my marriage, of course, a new life began. The world of literature was opened to me, and a companion was by my side able and willing to direct and assist."

Soon after the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Howitt, they published, jointly, two volumes of poems, which met with so much success, that they were rapidly followed by a variety of other works, in prose and verse. Partly to perfect themselves in the German language, and partly for the purpose of bestowing upon their children a better education than they could obtain in England, Mr. and Mrs. Howitt, about the year 1835, repaired to Germany, where they remained three years, travelling extensively, and acquainting themselves with the country, its literature, and its people; and pursuing, at the same time, their literary labours. Here Mrs. Howitt first met with the works of Frederika Bremer, which delighted her so much, that she determined to introduce them to the English public by translation. For this purpose, she acquired the Swedish language, to enable her to give them from the original; Miss Bremer's later works having all been translated from the manuscripts. Her acquaintance with the Swedish language induced her to acquire its kindred tongue.

the Danish, from which, as well as from the German, she has translated numerous works.

Mrs. Howitt's marriage has been one of singular happiness, and is blessed with children of great promise. In her literary pursuits, she possesses the sympathy and good offices of her husband, himself an extensive and popular writer, and in many of her translations she has been assisted by him. It is to be lamented that talents, worth and industry, like Mrs. Howitt's, should, through unmerited misfortune, have been stripped of all substantial reward, at a period of life when she might naturally have looked for some relaxation of her labours. Mr. Howitt having embarked, under the influence of an artful speculator, as partner in the "People's Journal," was, in a short time, held responsible, by its failure, for debts to a large amount; not a pennyworth of which was originated by him. His financial ruin was the consequence; the copy-rights even of his own and his wife's works—the hard-won results of years of labour—were sacrificed, and they were obliged to begin the world anew. That their renewed exertions have met with such happy success as to warrant a hope of the retrieval of their fortunes, we have every reason to believe, and we trust, for the honour of human nature, that such exertions, based upon the honest character and good reputation of a quarter of a century, will be justly estimated, and meet with the reward they merit.

Mrs. Howitt has written much in prose; her books for children are very attractive, from the sympathy with youthful feelings, which seems to well up in her loving heart as freely as a mountain-spring sends out its pure freshness, after a summer-shower. But these warm sympathies make her more truly the poet; and the acknowledgment of this bias, made by William and Mary Howitt, in the preface of their first joint publication, was certainly true of the wife. They say—"Poetry has been our youthful amusement, and our increasing daily enjoyment in happy, and our solace in sorrowful hours. Amidst the vast and delicious treasures of our national literature, we have revelled with growing and unsatiated delight; and, at the same time, living chiefly in the quietness of the country, we have watched the changing features of nature; we have felt the secret charm of those sweet but unostentatious images which she is perpetually presenting, and given full scope to those workings of the imagination and of the heart, which natural beauty and solitude prompt and promote."

Mrs. Howitt's first prose work was "Woodleigh-ton," in three volumes, which was exceedingly popular. She next wrote for children the following works,—"Tales in Verse," "Tales in Prose," "Sketches of Natural History," "Birds and Flowers," "Hymns and Fireside Verses;" and also a series of books, which are very popular, called "Tales for the People and their Children,"—of these there are, "Strive and Thrive," "Hope on, Hope Ever," "Sowing and Reaping," "Alice Franklin," "Who shall be Greatest?" "Which is the Wiser?" "Little Corn, much Care," "Work and Ways," "Love and Money," "The Two Ap- prentices," and "My Own Story." After the publication of these, Mrs. Howitt wrote "The History of Mary Leeson," "The Children's Year," and "Our Cousins in Ohio." She published, about 1835, her largest poetical work, "The Seven Temptations." She also edited for three years, "The Drawing-Room Scrap-Book," furnishing for that work a large mass of poetry. About 1848, she collected her fugitive poems in a volume, entitled "Ballads, and other Poems."

Mrs. Howitt has also written Memoirs, in the very kindest spirit, of several Americans; those of Miss Cushman and Mrs. Mowatt we have used in this work.

"The Seven Temptations," the largest and most elaborate of Mrs. Howitt's poetical works, represents a series of efforts, by the impersonation of the Evil Principle, to seduce human souls to his power. Mrs. Howitt, in the preface, remarks:—"The idea of the poem originated in a strong impression of the immense value of the human soul, and of all the varied modes of its trials, according to its own infinitely varied modifications, as existing in different individuals. We see the awful mass of sorrow and of crime in the world, but we know only in part—in a very small degree—the fearful weight of solicitations and impulses of passion, and the vast constraint of circumstances, that are brought into play against suffering humanity. In the luminous words of my motto,

What's done we partly may compute,
But know not what's resisted.

Thus, without sufficient reflection, we are furnished with data on which to condemn our fellow-creatures, but without sufficient grounds for their palliation and commiseration. It is necessary, for the acquisition of that charity which is the soul of Christianity, for us to descend into the depths of our own nature; to put ourselves into many imaginary and untried situations, that we may enable ourselves to form some tolerable notion how we might be affected by them; how far we might be tempted—how far deceived—how far we might have occasion to lament the evil power of circumstances, to weep over our own weakness, and pray for the pardon of our crimes; that, having raised up this vivid perception of what we might do, suffer, and become, we may apply the rule to our fellows, and cease to be astonished, in some degree, at the shapes of atrocity into which some of them are transformed; and learn to bear with others as brethren, who have been tried ten-fold beyond our own experience, or perhaps our strength." Thus we see how earnestly the writer sought to do good; the effort was noble, if not entirely successful; many touching incidents give interest to the poem, and the sentiments are uniformly pure, generous and hopeful. But her Ballads are the best exponents of her genius. In these she is unrivalled, except, perhaps, by Mr. Macaulay, in modern times. The play of her warm, rich fancy, is like sunlight on icicles, giving the glow and glory of its own hues to any object, no matter how cold or colourless, it touches. Who ever read her "Midsummer Legend," without believing in fairies? This union of the tenderest human sympathies with the highest poetic faculty—that of creative fancy—is remarkable in some of her smaller poems. She has faith in human progress, and the love which makes her an earnest worker in the field of reform. All her productions manifest “that love of Christ, of the poor, and of little children, which always was, and will be, a ruling sentiment of her soul.” She gains the loving admiration and esteem of her readers, and is as popular in America as in her own England. Mrs. Howitt resides in London.

AWAY WITH THE PLEASURE.

Away with the pleasure that is not partaken!

There is no enjoyment by one only taken.

I love in my mirth to see gladness awaken

On lips and in eyes that reflect it again.

When we sit by the fire that so cheerily blazes

On our cozy hearthstone, with its innocent glee,

Oh! how my soul warms, while my eye fondly gazes,

To see my delight is partaken by thee!

And when, as how often, I eagerly listen

To stories thou read'st of the dear olden day,

How delightful to see our eyes mutually glisten,

And feel that affection has sweetened the lay.

Yes, love—and when wandering at even or morning,

Through forest or wild, or by waves foaming white,

I have fancied new beauties the landscape adorning,

Because I have seen thou wast glad in the sight.

And often in crowds, where a whisper offendeth,

And we fain would express what there might not be said,

How dear is the glance that none else comprehendeth,

And how sweet is the thought that is secretly read!

Then away with the pleasure that is not partaken!

There is no enjoyment by one only taken:

I love in my mirth to see gladness awaken

On lips, and in eyes, that reflect it again.

SONG OF EDNA.

Little waves upon the deep

Murmur soft when thou dost sleep;

Gentle birds upon the tree

Sing their sweetest songs for thee;

Cooling gales, with voices low,

In the tree-tops gently blow!

Dearest, who dost sleeping lie,

All things love thee,—so do I!

When thou wak'st, the sea will pour

Treasures for thee to the shore;

And the earth, in plant and tree,

Bring forth fruit and flowers for thee!

And the glorious heaven above,

Smile on thee, like trusting love.

Dearest, who dost sleeping lie,

All things love thee,—so do I!

SONG OF MARGARET.

There is a land where beauty cannot fade,

Nor sorrow dim the eye;

Where true love shall not droop nor be dismayed,

And none shall ever die.

Where is that land, oh, where?

For I would hasten there—

Tell me—I fain would go,

For I am wearied with a heavy woe;

The beautiful have left me all alone!

The true, the tender, from my paths are gone!

Oh guide me with thy hand,

If thou dost know that land,

For I am burdened with oppressive care,

And I am weak and fearful with despair!

Where is it?—tell me where—

Thou that art kind and gentle—tell me where.

Friend! thou must trust in Him who trod before

The desolate paths of life;

Must bear in meekness, as He meekly bore.

Sorrow and pain and strife!

Think how the Son of God

Those thorny paths hath trod;

Think how he longed to go,

Yet tarried out for thee the appointed woe;

Think of his weariness in places dim,

Where no man comforted, nor cared for Him!

Think of the blood-like sweat

With which his brow was wet;

Yet how he prayed, unaided and alone

In that great agony—“Thy will be done!”

Friend! do not thou despair,

Christ from his heaven of heavens will hear thy prayer!

THE FAIRIES OF THE CALDON-LOW—A MIDSUMMER LEGEND.

‘And where have you been, my Mary,

And where have you been from me!’

‘I’ve been to the top of the Caldon-Low,

The Midsummer night to see!’

‘And what did you see, my Mary,

All up on the Caldon-Low?

‘I saw the blithe sunshine come down,

And I saw the merry winds blow.’

‘And what did you hear, my Mary,

All up on the Caldon-Hill?’

‘I heard the drops of the water made,

And the green corn ears to fill.’

‘Oh, tell me all, my Mary—

All, all that you ever know;

For you must have seen the fairies,

Last night on the Caldon-Low.’

‘Then take me on your knee, mother,

And listen, mother mine:

A hundred fairies danced last night,

And the harpers they were nine.

‘And merry was the glee of the harp-strings,

And their dancing feet so small;

But, oh, the sound of their talking

Was merrier far than all!’

‘And what were the words, my Mary,

That you did hear them say?’

‘I’ll tell you all, my mother—

But let me have my way!

‘And some they played with the water,

And rolled it down the hill;

‘And this,’ they said, ‘shall speedily turn

The poor old miller’s mill;

For there has been no water

Ever since the first of May;

And a busy man shall the miller be

By the dawning of the day!

Oh, the miller, how he will laugh,

When he sees the mill-dam rise!

The jolly old miller, how he will laugh,

‘Till the tears fill both his eyes!’

And some they seized the little winds,

That sounded over the hill,

And each put a horn into his mouth,

And blew so sharp and shrill:—

‘And there,’ said they, ‘the merry winds go,

Away from every horn;

And those shall clear the mildew dank

From the blind old widow’s corn:

Oh, the poor, blind old widow—

Though she has been blind so long,

She’ll be merry enough when the mildew’s gone

And the corn stands stiff and strong!’

And some they brought the lintseed,
And flung it down from the Low --
'And this,' said they, 'by the sunrise,
In the weaver's croft shall grow!

Oh, the poor, lame weaver,
How will he laugh outright,
When he sees his dwindling flax-field
All full of flowers by night!

And then upspeke a brownie,
With a long beard on his chin --
'I have spun up all the tow,' said he,
And I want some more to spin.

I've spun a piece of hempen cloth,
And I want to spin another --
A little sheet for Mary's bed,
And an apron for her mother!

And with that I could not help but laugh,
And I laughed out loud and free;
And then on the top of the Caldon-Low,
There was no one left but me.

And all, on the top of the Caldon-Low,
The mists were cold and grey,
And nothing I saw but the mossy stones
That round about me lay.

But, as I came down from the hill-top,
I heard, afar below,
How busy the jolly miller was,
And how merry the wheel did go!

And I peeped into the widow's field;
And, sure enough, was seen
The yellow ears of the mildewed corn
All standing stiff and green.

And down by the weaver's croft I stole,
To see if the flax were high;
But I saw the weaver at his gate
With the good news in his eye!

Now, this is all I heard, mother,
And all that I did see;
So, prithee, make my bed, mother,
For I'm tired as I can be!

THE USE OF FLOWERS.

God might have made the earth bring forth
Enough for great and small,
The oak tree and the cedar tree,
Without a flower at all.

He might have made enough, enough
For every want of ours;
For luxury, medicine, and toil,
And yet have made no flowers.

The clouds might give abundant rain,
The nightly dews might fall,
And the herb that keepeth the life in man
Might yet have drukk them all.

Then wherefore, wherefore were they made,
And dyed with rainbow light,
All fashioned with supremest grace,
Upspringing day and night?

Springing in valleys green and low,
And on the mountains high;
And in the silent wilderness,
Where no man passes by?

Our outward life requires them not,
Then, wherefore had they birth?
To minister delight to man;
To beautify the earth:

To comfort man -- to whisper hope,
Whene'er his faith is dim;
For who so careth for the flowers,
Will much more care for Him!

FATHER IS COMING.

The clock is on the stroke of six,
The father's work is done;
Sweep up the hearth, and mend the fire,
And put the kettle on.
The wild night-wind is blowing cold,
'Tis dreary crossing o'er the wold.

He is crossing o'er the wold apace,
He is stronger than the storm;
He does not feel the cold, not he,
His heart it is so warm.
For father's heart is stout and true
As ever human bosom knew.

He makes all toil and hardship light:
Would all men were the same!
So ready to be pleased, so kind,
So very slow to blame!
Folks need not be unkind, austere,
For love hath readier will than fear

Nay, do not close the shutters, child;
For far along the lane
The little window looks, and he
Can see it shining plain.
I've heard him say he loves to mark
The cheerful firelight through the dark.

And we'll do all that father likes;
His wishes are so few,
Would they were more! that every hour
Some wish of his I knew!
I'm sure it makes a happy day,
When I can please him any way.

I know he's coming by this sign,
That baby's almost wild;
See how he laughs and crows and stares --
Heaven bless the merry child!
He's father's self in face and limb,
And father's heart is strong in him.

Hark! hark! I hear his footsteps now;
He's through the garden gate.
Run, little Bess, and ope the door.
And do not let him wait.
Shout, baby, shout! and clap thy hands,
For father on the threshold stands.

THE CHILDREN.

Beautiful the children's faces!
Spite of all that mars and sears;
To my inmost heart appealing;
Calling forth love's tenderest feeling;
Sleeping all my soul with tears.

Eloquent the children's faces --
Poverty's lean look, which saith,
Save us! save us! wo surrounds us;
Little knowledge sore confounds us:
Life is but a lingering death!

Give us light amid our darkness;
Let us know the good from ill;
Hate us not for all our blindness;
Love us, lead us, show us kindness --
You can make us what you will.

We are willing; we are ready;
We would learn, if you would teach;
We have hearts that yearn towards duty:
We have minds alive to beauty;
Souls that any heights can reach!

Raise us by your Christian knowledge;
Consecrate to man our powers;
Let us take our proper station;
We, the rising generation,
Let us stamp the age as ours!

We shall be what you will make us: --
Make us wise, and make us good!
Make us strong for time of trial;
Teach us temperance, self-denial,
Patience, kindness, fortitude!

ISABELLA II., QUEEN OF SPAIN,

Was born at Madrid, October 10th, 1830. Her father, Ferdinand VII., died when she was three years and six months old, and Isabella was immediately proclaimed Queen; and her mother, Maria Christina, Regent of Spain. The biography of Maria Christina will be found in its place; we need only say here, that her influence had made her daughter Queen, by persuading Ferdinand to issue his famous decree, styled pragmatic, revoking the Salic law which prohibited the rule of a female sovereign. This law, introduced into Castile by the Bourbon family on their accession to the Spanish throne, could not have had much root in the affections of a loyal people, who kept the traditionary memory of their glorious Queen, Isabella I., still in their hearts; and this child-queen was another Isabella. There is no doubt that the bulk of the nation inclined warmly to sustain her claims, and but for the influence of the priests and fanatical monks in favour of the bigoted Don Carlos, younger brother of the deceased Ferdinand, there would have been no bloody civil war.

That Isabella II. was the choice of the people is proved by the acts of the legislative Cortes, which in 1834 almost unanimously decreed that the pretender—Don Carlos, and his descendants—should be for ever exiled from the Spanish throne; and this decree was confirmed by the constituent Cortes in 1836, without a single dissentient voice.

Isabella II., thus made queen by her father's will, was acknowledged by the national authority, and surrounded from her cradle with the pomp and observance of royalty; yet her childhood and youth were, probably, less happy than that of any little girl in humble life, who has a good mother and a quiet home, where she may grow up in the love of God, the fear of evil, and in steadfast devotion to her duties. Isabella was nurtured among the worst influences of civil strife and bloodshed, because religious fanaticism as well as political prejudices were involved in the struggle.

When she was ten years old, her mother, Maria Christina, resigned the regency and retired to France; Espartero became regent. Isabella was for three years under the influence of instructors of his choosing; and he endeavoured, there is no doubt, to have her mind rightly directed. By a decree of the Cortes, the young queen was declared to have attained her majority on the 15th of October, 1843; she has since reigned as the sovereign of Spain, and has been acknowledged such by all the European governments, and by the governments of America.

In 1845, Maria Christina returned to Madrid and soon obtained much influence over Isabella. This, it was apparent, was used to direct the young Queen in her choice of a husband. Isabella had one sister, Louisa, the Infanta, who was next heir to the crown, if the eldest died without offspring. Those keen rivals for political power, England and France, watched to obtain or keep a paramount influence in Spanish affairs. The selfish policy of Louis Philippe, aided by Guizot and Maria Christina, finally prevailed, and forced upon the Spanish nation a prince of the house of Bourbon as husband of Isabella. There were two Bourbon princes, brothers, Francisco and Enrique, sons of Don Francisco, brother of Maria Christina; of these, the youngest had some talent and was attractive; the eldest was weak in intellect and disagreeable in manners; if Isabella could be prevailed upon to marry this imbecile, and a son of Louis Philippe could obtain the hand of the Infanta Louisa, the predominance of French influence would be secured. It was done—both plans succeeded. The following is translated from the Madrid Gazette:—

“The marriage of Isabella to her cousin, Don Francisco d’Assis, the eldest son of her uncle, Don Francisco de Paula, and that of her sister, the Infanta, to the Duke de Montpensier, the youngest son of Louis Philippe, took place October 10th, 1846, on which day Queen Isabella completed her sixteenth year. The ceremony began by the Prelate, who officiated, asking the following questions:—

“‘Lenora Donna Isabella II., of Bourbon, Catholic Queen of Spain, I demand of your Majesty, and of your Highness, serene Sir, Don Francisco d’Assis Maria de Bourbon, Infante of Spain, in case you know of any impediment to this present marriage, and why it should not and ought not to be contracted—that is to say, if there exist between your Majesty and Highness impediments of consanguinity, affinity, or spiritual relationship, independently of those impediments that have been dispensed with by his Holiness—if you have made vows of chastity or religion—and finally, if there exist impediments of any other kind, that you forthwith declare them. The same I demand of all here present. For the second and third time I make the same demand, that you freely discover any impediment you are aware of.’

“The Prelate then addressed the Queen thus—

“‘Lenora Donna Isabella II., of Bourbon, Catholic Queen of Spain, do you wish for your spouse and husband, as the Holy Catholic, Apostolic tolic, and Roman Church directs, Don Francisco d'Assis Maria de Bourbon, Infante of Spain?"

"The Queen kissed her mother's hand; and being again asked the same question by the Bishop, replied 'Yes, I wish.'

"The Prelate then said—

"Does your Majesty give yourself as spouse and wife to his serene Highness Don Francisco d'Assis Maria de Bourbon?"

"The Queen answered, 'I do.'"

She soon afterwards conferred on her husband the title of king.

It hardly seems credible that a crowned Queen would thus give, apparently, her free assent to her own marriage, if the bridegroom had been utterly hateful to her. But two circumstances are certain—she was not old enough to make a judicious choice; and she was urged into the measure while she did not wish to marry at all. She seemed to resign herself to the guidance of others, and doubtless hoped she might find happiness. She thus alludes to the event in her speech at the opening of the Cortes, on the last day of 1846. Her speeches from the throne are models of their kind, whoever prepares them; and she is said to have a fine voice and gracious manner, appearing, indeed, the Queen while delivering them.

"I have contracted a marriage with my august cousin, Don Francisco d'Assis Maria de Bourbon, agreeably to my intention announced to the preceding Cortes. I trust that Heaven will bless this union, and that you, also, gentlemen, will unite your prayers with mine to Almighty God. The marriage of my beloved sister has also taken place in the way which has been already explained to the Cortes."

But this contentment with her lot did not long continue. Early in the following year, 1847, there arose a dislike on the part of the Queen towards her husband, and soon the royal pair became completely estranged from each other, and neither appeared together in public, nor had the slightest communication in private. The people seemed to sympathize warmly with the Queen, and she was loudly cheered whenever she drove out, or attended any of the theatres or bull-fights at Madrid.

On the accession of Narvaez to office as President of the Council, he used his utmost endeavours to effect a reconciliation, and at length succeeded. The meeting between the royal pair occurred October 13th, 1847, and is thus described:

"When the King reached the Plaza of the Arsenal, and alighted at the principal entrance of the palace, the President of the Council and the Holy Father's Legate, warned the Queen of it, who advanced with visible emotion unto the royal chamber, and received in her arms the royal consort."

Since then there have been estrangements and reconciliations; it seems almost hopeless to anticipate conjugal happiness, or even quiet, for Isabella. The only event which appears likely to give a new and healthy tone to her mind, is motherhood. She gave birth to a son in the autumn of 1850, but, unfortunately, the child lived only a few hours. If he had survived, and her affections had thus been warmly awakened, there would be little doubt of her becoming a changed being. That she has talents of a much higher order than was given her credit for in childhood is now evident.* She certainly possesses great physical courage, and a strong will. She manages the wildest and most fiery steed with the coolness and skill of a knight of chivalry. She delights in driving and riding, and exhibits much, even daring energy. She is prompt in her attention to the duties of her government; and, what is best of all, she evinces that sympathy for her people, and confidence in their loyalty, which are never felt by a crafty, cruel, or selfish ruler. In all her speeches from the throne there is a generous, even liberal spirit apparent; and were it not for the obstacles which priestcraft interposes, there can be little doubt that the Queen would move onward with her government to effect the reforms so much needed. In "features and complexion," Isabella bears a striking resemblance to her father, Ferdinand VI., and his line of the Bourbons; but her forehead has a better development, and she is, undoubtedly, of a nobler disposition.

There is, indeed, great reason to hope she will yet prove worthy of the name she bears. She is only twenty; not so old by three years as Isabella I. was when she ascended the throne. Spain has never had a good great sovereign since her reign.

J.

JAGIELLO, APPOLONIA.

DISTINGUISHED for her heroic patriotism, was born about the year 1825, in Lithuania, a part of the land where Thaddeus Kosciuszko spent his first

* The following is from the pen of a late resident at Madrid:—

"The letters written by the young Queen Isabella are the most charming things in the world; so say not only her courtiers, but her enemies, and those who have read them declare if her Catholic Majesty was not Queen of Spain, she would very certainly be a blue-stocking. Besides, although a sovereign, or rather because she is a sovereign, Isabella II. is a veritable lioness; not a lioness as understood in the fashionable world, but in the true acceptance of the word, a lioness, like the noble partner of the king of the forest. If the young Queen ever loses her crown, she will not do it without having defended it sword in hand. She fences like Grisier, and it is her favorite amusement.

"This is the way she employs her time. At three o'clock, not in the morning, but in the day, she rises. As soon as dressed, and her toilette is the least of her occupations, she orders a very elegant, light equipage, a present from her royal sister of England, and goes out alone; but sometimes she is accompanied by her husband, to his great despair and terror, for he believes in a miracle every time that he re-enters the palace safe and sound; for the young Queen is her own driver, and generally urges on her horses to their full speed.

"She dines at five o'clock, eats very little and very fast; and as soon as her repast is finished, she exercises some time with the sword, then she mounts her horse and takes a ride. These exercises ended, she becomes a young and pretty woman; she dances, sings, and in fact takes all the possible pleasure of her sex and age. But when one o'clock strikes, the Queen re-appears, and Isabella assembles her council over which she always presides.

days. She was educated at Cracow, the ancient capital of Poland—a city filled with monuments and memorials sadly recalling to the mind of every Pole the past glory of his native land. There, and in Warsaw and Vienna, she passed the days of her early girlhood.

She was about nineteen when the attempt at revolution of 1846 broke out at Cracow. "That struggle," says Major Tochman, "so little understood in this country, although of brief duration, must and will occupy an important place in Polish history. It declared the emancipation of the peasantry and the abolition of hereditary rank, all over Poland; proclaimed equality, personal security, and the enjoyment of the fruits of labour, as inherent rights of all men living on Polish soil. It was suppressed by a most diabolical plot of the Austrian government. Its mercenary soldiery, disguised in the national costume of the peasants, excited against the nobility the ignorant portion of the peasantry in Gallicia, which province, with other parts of ancient Poland, had to unite in insurrection with the republic of Cracow. They were made to believe, by those vile emissaries, that the object of the nobility was to take advantage of the approaching revolution, to exact from them higher duties. In the mean time the civil and military officers of the Austrian government circulated proclamations, at first secretly, then publicly, offering to the peasants rewards for every head of a nobleman, and for every nobleman delivered into the hands of the authorities alive. Fourteen hundred men, women, and children, of noble families, were murdered by the thus excited and misled peasantry, before they detected the fraud of the government. This paralysed the revolution already commenced in Cracow.

"The Austrian government, however, did not reap the full fruit of its villany; for when the peasants perceived it, they arrayed themselves with the friends of the murdered victims, and showed so energetic a determination to insist on the rights which the revolution at Cracow promised to secure to them, that the Austrian government found itself compelled to grant them many immunities."

This was the first struggle for freedom in which Mlle. Jagiello, who was then at Cracow, took an active part. She was seen on horseback, in the picturesque costume of the Polish soldier, in the midst of the patriots who first planted the white eagle and the flag of freedom on the castles of the ancient capital of her country, and was one of the handful of heroes who fought the battle near Podgorze, against a tenfold stronger enemy. Mr. Tyssowski, now of Washington, was then invested with all civil and military power in the republic. He was elevated to the dictatorship for the time of its danger, and by him was issued the celebrated manifesto declaring for the people of Poland the great principles of liberty to which we have already alluded. He is now a draughtsman in the employ of our government.

After the Polish uprising which commenced in Cracow was suppressed, Mlle. Jagiello resumed female dress, and remained undetected for a few weeks in that city. From thence she removed to Warsaw, and remained there and in the neighbouring country, in quiet retirement among her friends. But the struggle of 1848 found her again at Cracow, in the midst of the combatants. Alas! that effort was but a dream—it accomplished nothing—it perished like all other European attempts at revolutions of that year, so great in grand promises, so mean in fulfilment. But their fire is yet smouldering under the ashes covering the Old World—ashes white and heavy as death to the eye of the tyrant, but scarcely hiding the red life of a terrible retribution from the prophetic eye of the lover of freedom.

Mlle. Jagiello then left Cracow for Vienna, where she arrived in time to take an heroic part in the engagement at the faubourg Widen. Her chief object in going to Vienna was to inform herself of the character of that struggle, and to carry news to the Hungarians, who were then in the midst of a war, which she and her countrymen regarded as involving the liberation of her beloved Poland, and presaging the final regeneration of Europe. With the aid of devoted friends, she reached Presburg safely, and from that place, in the disguise of a peasant, was conveyed by the Hungarian peasantry carrying provisions for the Austrian army, to the village of St. Paul.

After many dangers and hardships in crossing the country occupied by the Austrians, after swimming on horseback two rivers, she at last, on the 15th of August, 1848, reached the Hungarian camp, near the village of Eneszey, just before the battle there fought, in which the Austrians were defeated, and lost General Wist. This was the first Hungarian battle in which our heroine took part as volunteer. She was soon promoted to the rank of lieutenant, and, at the request of her Hungarian friends, took charge of a hospital in Comorn. Whilst there, she joined, as volunteer, the expedition of 12,000 troops, under the command of the gallant General Klapka, which made a sally, and took Raab. She returned in safety to Comorn, where she remained, superintending the hospital, until the capitulation of the fortress.

She came to the United States in December, 1849, with Governor Ladislas Ujhazy and his family, where she and her heroic friends received a most enthusiastic welcome.

"Those who have never seen this Hungarian or Polish heroine," says a *writer in the National Era, to which we are indebted for this sketch, "may be interested in hearing something of her personnel. She is of medium height, and quite slender. Her arm and hand are especially delicate and beautiful, and her figure round and graceful. She is a brunette, with large dark eyes, and black, abundant hair. Her lips have an expression of great determination, but her smile is altogether charming. In that the woman comes out; it is arch, soft, and winning—a rare, an indescribable smile. Her manner is simple and engaging, her voice is now gentle or mirthful, now earnest and impassioned—sometimes sounds like the utterance of some quiet, home-love, and sometimes startles you with a decided ring of the steel. Her enthusiasm and intensity of feeling reveal themselves in almost every thing she says and does. An amusing instance was told me when in Washington. An album was one day handed her, for her autograph. She took it with a smile; but on opening it at the name of M. Bodisco, the Russian ambassador, pushed it from her with flashing eyes, refusing to appear in the same book with 'the tool of a tyrant!'

"Yet, after all, she is one to whom children go, feeling the charm of her womanhood, without being awed by her greatness. She bears herself with no military air; there is nothing in her manner to remind you of the camp, though much to tell you that you are in the presence of no ordinary woman."

JAMESON, ANNA,

Is one of the most gifted and accomplished of the living female writers of Great Britain. Her father, Mr. Murphy, was an Irish gentleman of high repute as an artist, and held the office of Painter in Ordinary to her Royal Highness Princess Charlotte. By her order he undertook to paint the "Windsor Beauties," so called; but before these were completed, the sudden death of the princess put a stop to the plan. Mr. Murphy lost his place; and his pictures, from which he had anticipated both fame and fortune, were left on his hands, without any remuneration. It was to aid the sale of these portraits, when engraved and published, that his daughter, then Mrs. Jameson, wrote the illustrative memoirs which form her work, entitled "The Beauties of the Court of King Charles II.," published in London, in 1833. Prior to this, however, Mrs. Jameson had become known as a graceful writer and accomplished critic on the Beautiful in Art, as well as a spirited delineator of Life. Her first work was the "Diary of an Ennuyée," published in London, in 1825, about two years after her marriage with Captain Jameson, an officer in the British army. Of this marriage—union it has never been—we will only say here, that it seems to have exercised an unfortunate influence over the mind of Mrs. Jameson, which is greatly to be regretted, because it mars, in a degree, all her works;—but especially her latter ones, by fettering the noblest aspirations of her genius, instinctively feminine, and therefore only capable of feeling the full compass of its powers when devoted to the True and the Good. We shall advert to this again. The "Diary of an Ennuyée" was published anonymously; it depicted an enthusiastic, poetic, broken-hearted young lady, on her travels abroad; much space being given to descriptions of works of art at Rome, and other Italian cities. This, on the whole, is Mrs. Jameson's most popular and captivating work; it appeals warmly to the sensibilities of the young of her own sex: its sketches of adventures, characters and pictures, are racy and fresh; and the sympathy with the secret sorrows of the writer is ingeniously kept alive to the end. Her second work was "Memoirs of Celebrated Female Sovereigns," in two volumes, published in London, in 1831. To this she gave her name. With much to commend, these "Memoirs" are unsatisfactory, because the writer bases her plan on a wrong principle, namely, the inferiority of the female sex to the male. Mrs. Jameson adopts the philosophy of men, which places reason as the highest human attribute; the Word of God gives us another standard; there we are taught that moral goodness is the highest perfection of human nature.

In other portions of our work,* we have explained our views on these questions, and only remark here, that Mrs. Jameson seems, while writing these "Memoirs of Queens," to have attempted, by her deep humility as a woman to propitiate her male critics on behalf of the author.

In 1832, appeared "Characteristics of Women, Moral, Poetical, and Historical;" in many respects this is the best and most finished production of Mrs. Jameson's genius. "Visits and Sketches at Home and abroad; with Tales and Miscellanies," was published in 1834; and soon afterwards, "Memoirs of the Loves of the Poets," &c., appeared. In the autumn of 1839, Mrs. Jameson visited America; going directly from New York to Toronto, Upper Canada, where she passed the winter. Her husband had been stationed for many years in Canada; she had not seen him since her marriage; it has been said that they parted at the altar; but the painful circumstance that they only met as acquaintances, not even as friends, was too well known to require an apology for stating it here. Yet we would not allude to this but for the sake of correcting the false impressions which some of her late works leave on the mind to mislead the judgment of young readers. "Winter Studies and Summer Rambles," is the title of the work published in 1842, in which Mrs. Jameson records her observations on Canada and the United States, as far as she travelled. The shadow over these original and spirited pictures is—unhappiness in wedded life! Everywhere she finds marriage a slavery, a sin, or a sorrow The shaft in her own bosom she plants in that of every other married pair; like a person afflicted with a painful disease, she hears only of the afflicted, and fancies the world to be a hospital of incurables. As we observed in the beginning, the cloud over her early life has darkened her spirit. She has, naturally, a love for the innocent and the pure,—is a true woman in her warm sympathies with her sex, and had she been fortunate (like Mrs. Howitt) in the connexion which possessed for her, as it does for the noblest and purest of both sexes, the holiest elements of happiness and the best opportunities of self-improvement, she would have been a shining light in the onward movement of Christian civilization; she would have devoted her heart and her genius to the True and the Good, instead of bowing her woman's soul to man's philosophy, and deifying the worship of the Beautiful in Art. In this work—"Winter Studies," &c., Mrs. Jameson, commenting on the gratitude due those great and pure men, who work out the intellectual and spiritual good of mankind, closes thus:—"Such was the example left by Jesus Christ—such a man was Shakspeare—such a man was Goëthe!" To understand the depth of this moral bewilderment, which could class Goëthe with the Saviour, we will insert from the volume which contains the shocking comparison, her own account of the last mental effort of her German idol.

"The second part of the Faust occupied Goëthe during the last years of his life; he finished it at the age of eighty-two. On completing it, he says, 'Now I may consider the remainder of my existence as a free gift, and it is indifferent whether I do any thing or not;' as if he had considered his whole former life as held conditionally, binding him to execute certain objects to which he believed himself called. He survived the completion of the Faust only one year.

"The purport of the second part of Faust has puzzled many German and English scholars, and in Germany there are already treatises and commentaries on it, as on the Divina Commedia. I never read it, and if I had, would not certainly venture an opinion 'where doctors disagree;' but I recollect that Von Hammer once gave me, in his clear, animated manner, a comprehensive analysis of this wonderful production—that is, according to his own interpretation of it. 'I regard it,' said he, 'as being from beginning to end a grand poetical piece of irony on the whole universe, which is turned, as it were, wrong side out. In this point of view I understand it; in any other point of view it appears to me incomprehensible.'"

The next work of Mrs. Jameson was "Sacred and Legendary Art," two volumes, published in London in 1848, in which the peculiar tastes and talents of the authoress had a fine scope, and deserve what has been freely awarded her, high praise. The sequel, "Legends of the Monastic Orders," one volume, published in 1850, is tinged with the same false views noticed in some of her previous works. She seems quite inclined to forgive, if not to justify, all the profligacy, ignorance, and errors which monkery engendered and entailed on the Christian world—because these institutions preserved and ennobled works of art! As an author there is a false air of eloquence thrown over some of her writings, even where simplicity would be more suitable. Generally, in her descriptive passages, there is something pantomimic, theatric, unreal; everything figures in a scenic manner. She is, no doubt, a sincere lover of pictures, probably understands them better than most connoisseurs, but readers tire of "Raphaels and Correggios," when too often thrown in their faces, and call them "stuff."

Now that we have honestly stated what we do not like in Mrs. Jameson's books, we are happy to dwell on their merits, and the many commendable qualities of the authoress, which these suggest. She has an earnest and loving admiration for genius, a discriminating sense of the benefits it confers upon the world, and an unselfish eagerness to point out its merits and services. All this is seen in her very pleasing descriptions of the many celebrated men and women she had encountered. She has a deep sense of the dignity of her own sex; she seeks to elevate woman, and many of her reflections on this subject are wise and salutary. We differ from her views in some material points, but we believe her sincerely devoted to what she considers the way of improvement. Of her extraordinary talents there can be no doubt.

ARTISTS.

I have heard young artists say, that they have been forced on a dissipated life merely as a means of "getting on in the world" as the phrase is. It is so base a plea, that I generally regard it as the excuse for dispositions already perverted. The men who talk thus are doomed; they will either creep through life in mediocrity and dependence to the grave; or, at the best, if they have parts as well as cunning and assurance, they may make themselves the fashion, and make their fortune; they may be clever portrait painters and bust-makers, but when they attempt to soar into the ideal department of their art, they move the laughter of Gods and men; to them higher, holier fountains of inspiration are thenceforth sealed.

* * * * That man of genius who thinks he can tamper with his glorious gifts, and for a season indulge in social excess, stoop from his high calling to the dregs of earth, abandon himself to his native powers to bring himself up again; O believe it, he plays a desperate game! One that in nearly ninety-nine cases out of one hundred is fatal.

WOMEN ARTISTS—SINGERS—ACTRESSES, &c.

To think of the situation of these women! And then to look upon those women who, fenced in from infancy by all the restraints, the refinements, the comforts, the precepts of good society—the one arranging a new cap—the other embroidering a purse—the third reading a novel—far, far removed from want, and grief, and care—now sitting in judgment, and passing sentence of excommunication on others of their sex, who have been steeped in excitement from childhood, their nerves for ever in a state of terror between severe application and maddening flattery; cast on the world without chart or compass—with energies misdirected, passions uncontrolled, and all the inflammable and imaginative part of their being cultivated to excess as part of their profession—of their material! Oh, when will there be charity in the world? When will human beings, women especially, show mercy and justice to each other, and not judge of results without a reference to causes?"

FEMALE GAMBLER.

Unless I could know what were the previous habits and education of the victim—through what influences, blessed or unblessed, her mind had been trained—her moral existence built up—ought I to condemn? Who had taught this woman self-knowledge? Who had instructed her in the elements of her own being, and guarded her against her own excitable temperament? What friendly voice had warned her ignorance? What weariness of spirit—what thankless husband or faithless lover—had driven her to the edge of the precipice?

M. You would then plead for a female gambler?

A. Why do you lay such an emphasis on female gambler? In what respect is a female gambler worse than a male? The case is more pitiable—more rare—therefore, perhaps, more shocking; but why more hateful?

ENGLISH PRIDE.

It is this cold impervious pride which is the perdition of us English, and of England. I remember, that in one of my several excursions on the Rhine, we had on board the steamboat an English family of high rank. There was the lordly papa, plain and shy, who never spoke to any one except his own family, and then only in the lowest whisper. There was the lady mamma, so truly lady-like, with fine-cut patrician features, and in her countenance a kind of passive hauteur, softened by an appearance of suffering, and ill health. There were two daughters, proud, pale, fine-looking girls, dressed à ravir, with that indescribable air of high pretension, so elegantly impassive—so self-possessed—which some people call l'air distingué, but which, as extremes meet, I would rather call the refinement of vulgarity—the polish we see bestowed on debased material—the plating over the steel—the stucco over the brick-work!

THE DUTY OF TRAVELLERS.

Every feeling, well educated, generous, and truly refined woman, who travels, is as a dove sent out on a mission of peace; and should bring back at least an olive-leaf in her hand, if she bring nothing else. It is her part to soften the intercourse between rougher and stronger natures; to aid in the interfusion of the gentler sympathies; to speed the interchange of art and literature from pole to pole: not to pervert wit, and talent, and eloquence, and abuse the privileges of her sex, to sow the seeds of hatred where she might plant those of love—to embitter national discord and aversion, and disseminate individual prejudice and error.

CONVERSATION.

Conversation may be compared to a lyre with seven chords—philosophy, art, poetry, politics, love, scandal, and the weather. There are some professors, who, like Paganini, "can discourse most eloquent music" upon one string only; and some who can grasp the whole instrument, and with a master's hand sound it from the top to the bottom of its compass. Now, Schlegel is one of the latter: he can thunder in the bass or caper in the treble; he can be a whole concert in himself.

From "The Loves of the Poets."

The theory, then, which I wish to illustrate, as far as my limited powers permit, is this: That where a woman has been exalted above the rest of her sex by the talents of a lover, and consigned to enduring fame and perpetuity of praise, the passion was real, and was merited; that no deep or lasting interest was ever founded in fancy or in fiction; that truth, in short, is the basis of all excellence in amatory poetry, as in every thing else; for where truth is, there is good of some sort, and where there is truth and good, there must be beauty, there must be durability of fame. Truth is the golden chain which links the terrestrial with the celestial, which sets the seal of heaven on the things of this earth, and stamps them with immortality.
